When I asked Becker if he believed, at the time, what Marcello said to him about intending to kill Kennedy, he chuckled and said, "No. If the mobsters killed everyone they threatened to kill, we'd be depopulated." He then proceeded to tell me that he spent a lot of time at the Riviera in Las Vegas, and in Los Angeles, with Johnny Roselli (about whom he later coauthored the book All-American Mafioso) when the New York mob (Roselli's affiliation) was in the process of building the Tropicana and Roselli and his people would "hang out at the Riviera." And every time Roselli would get angry with someone, "He'd threaten to kill him. That's the way the mobsters talked."^{*} However, Becker said that when he heard Kennedy had been killed, which was fourteen months after Marcello's threat, his first thought was that Marcello was behind it and had meant what he said. But today, after much reflection and study, he feels very confident that Marcello was not involved in the assassination. As indicated, one reason among many he has for this belief is the way he was treated by the mob once his revelation of what Marcello told him became public. In fact, he said, in 1970 he and his wife were flying to Washington, D.C., on business and they stopped off in Shreveport, Louisiana (where he first met Carl Roppolo, Marcello's "nephew"), and "had a nice dinner and evening with Roppolo and his wife."

On the issue of the mob not going after public officials in America, Becker said that "on no less than a half-dozen occasions" throughout the years when a mobster would be complaining bitterly about, and reviling, a public official, "I'd ask them, tongue in cheek, and using their language, 'Geez, why don't you whack him?' and they'd always say, with little variation, 'No, no, we don't kill cops or politicians.'" Becker said, "It's like it's a part of their constitution." The exceptions, if any, are so very few and far between, and so insignificant, as to be irrelevant—as Dean Jennings's 1967 book on Bugsy Siegel and the mob is titled, We Only Kill Each Other.⁹⁷ This reality is known among students of organized crime as "internecine warfare."

Carlos Marcello was not one of the nine national commission members in 1963, and he was also the lone Mafia leader whom the FBI was unable to eavesdrop on for many years. A former FBI official knowledgeable about the FBI's surveillance program told the HSCA, "That was our biggest gap. With Marcello, you've got the one big exception in our work back then. There was just no way of penetrating that area. He was too smart."⁹⁸ † One reason was probably that Marcello's New Orleans Mafia family was very small and most of its operations were controlled by his loyal younger brothers, Joseph, Peter, Pascal, Vincent, Sammy, and Anthony.⁹⁹

But for over a year and a half starting in February of 1979, the FBI was finally able to conduct electronic surveillance on Marcello at his office in New Orleans and wiretap his phone as part of its BRILAB (code name for "bribery of organized labor") operation. On July 19, 1998, the Assassination Records Review Board released the transcript of thirteen conversations of Marcello that related to the Kennedy assassination. Most took place in the summer of 1979, when the HSCA released its report on the assassination. John Volz, the U.S. attorney in New Orleans at the time who got the court order for the electronic surveillance and wiretapping, told me, “There were nineteen months of BRILAB surveillance, and hundreds of hours. I didn’t listen to all the tapes, but the prosecutors I assigned to the case did. I can tell you, there was nothing on those tapes indicating any complicity by Marcello in the assassination.”¹⁰⁰

The transcripts are revealing on several levels, one of the most important of which is that although the HSCA’s report suggested that it was “unlikely” that Marcello was involved in the assassination, reporters at the time like Jack Anderson strongly implied his involvement, and the articles on his possible involvement were on the front page of Marcello’s local paper, the New Orleans Times-Picayune. Yet Marcello and his intimates, though angry at the negative publicity, treated the suggestion of his involvement in the assassination as absurd and, indeed, would bring it up in their conversations after more important discussions about business and, in one instance, women they were sharing. The following are some excerpts:

In a July 13, 1979, phone conversation between Isaac Irving Davidson and Marcello, Davidson, a close friend of Marcello’s who was a Washington lobbyist for organized labor (as well as the Dominican Republic), comments about an Anderson article in the Washington Post the previous day that erroneously reported that the imminent HSCA report would name Marcello as the “chief suspect” in the assassination.

Davidson: “You had as much to do with Kennedy as I have.”

Marcello: “Yeah, well, I ain’t worried about that.”

Marcello then proceeds to talk about something that is more real to him, a proposed civil lawsuit against a New Orleans figure named “Cronvich [phonetic spelling].”

On July 18, 1979, Marcello calls his office and speaks to his secretary, Loretta, to tell her to set up an appointment with someone for the next day.

Then, Marcello: “Let’s see what else I want... You’ve got the [Times-Picayune] newspaper there?”

Loretta: “Yeah, I got it.”

Marcello: “Okay, cut that uh.”

Loretta: “Yeah, I know.”

Marcello: “That Kennedy deal, that whole thing... And put it in the mail.”

(The HSCA Report came out the previous day and was all over the news. Knowing the HSCA at least considered the possibility of his involvement in the assassination, he apparently wasn’t even going to bother going out immediately to get the paper, content to have Loretta send it to him in the mail. He obviously was very worried.)

Later that day (July 18), Joe Campisi, the owner of the restaurant in Dallas (the Egyptian Lounge) where Jack Ruby dined frequently, and a friend of Marcello's and other underworld figures throughout the country, calls Marcello. After a conversation about business and women, he tells Marcello about an article on the HSCA Report in the Dallas Morning News.

Campisi: "They had a big write-up here yesterday morning about all that shit, you know."

Marcello: "That Kennedy deal?"

Campisi: "Oh yeah. And uh they said that Jack Ruby had all the connections. You wouldn't know Jack Ruby if the mother fucker was uh crawl in your room."

Marcello: "Shit, he never talked to me in his li...I don't even know him."

Later on that same day (July 18), an unknown male (UM) calls Marcello. After talking about business and contract matters for most of the conversation, the man talks about President Carter asking his cabinet to resign, then about Ted Kennedy being on television that morning talking about Mary Jo Kopechne. This incites Marcello. "Yeah, that mother fucker [Ted Kennedy]...If we'd uh done that we'd go in the penitentiary." He then segues into newspapers talking about his alleged hatred for JFK and RFK, and he tells the man about his testimony before the HSCA.

Marcello: "They asked me that...I say I ain't never hate nobody. I say I have a argument with people...You know what I mean? I can have argument with you...but I make up, maybe tomorrow, next week or next month."

UM: "Yeah."

Marcello: "But ain't hatin' ya to kill ya. I'm a kill somebody? Shit. President or (laugh) [It's only a laugh to you, Carlos. Conspiracy theorists don't know enough to laugh about something as silly as this] Attorney General?...I say I used to love John Kennedy President...I say he would a made the best President if he'd a lived."

UM: "Ya."

Marcello: "I uh I say I was really hurt when they, when they killed him...Far as Bobby Kennedy, I didn't hate him either...[but] I never did like him. How could I like a man that throwed me out to the dogs?"

(Marcello, the Tunisian-born immigrant, spoke broken English all his life.)

On August 1, 1979, another unknown man calls Marcello's office. Apparently Marcello is not in and he speaks to Loretta about a recent Jack Anderson article about her boss. He reminds her that he has been a close friend of Marcello's for "almost well, thirty-five years." What is instructive about his remarks is that intimates of Marcello's would obviously have a much, much better sense of whether Marcello had been involved in the assassination than anyone else. And if they knew, or thought, or even wondered about whether he did, it is rather unlikely they'd be talking like this in an unguarded and private (to them) conversation. The man complains bitterly that the Anderson article was "absolutely vicious...They got Carlos mixed up in this...And I wanta tell you something. Uh, Uh, it's all I can do [to] restrain myself."

Loretta: "Well, that's right...It's ridiculous, it really is."

UM: "It is, but you see, at the same time, how is he gonna fight it, cause the minute he opens his mouth, he's gonna lose."

Loretta: "You just don't pay any attention to him [Anderson]. Period."

UM: "Well, but you see, a lot of people do."

Loretta: “Well, that’s the sad part about it. People believe everything they read.”

With respect to this issue of how intimates of Marcello’s viewed the charges against him, in an earlier July 17, 1979, phone conversation between Marcello’s lobbyist friend Isaac Irving Davidson, calling from Marcello’s office at the Town and Country Motel in New Orleans, and a Jim Draykel, Davidson tells Draykel that he’s been close to Marcello for twenty-five years, that the HSCA Report scheduled to come out that day was “all bullshit” and that he had talked to Walter Sheridan (a top aide to RFK) “and he says it’s all bullshit too... The only reason it makes [Carlos] feel badly is because of his grandchildren, [they] all hear that bullshit.”

It is all bull...and will always be bull...to anyone who is using the gray matter between their ears. That, of course, automatically excludes virtually all of the resident habitués of the conspiracy community.

After reviewing several hundred hours of conversations recorded by telephonic wiretapping and bugs on the premises, the FBI concluded that “nothing developed in the Brilab investigation...could be considered evidence in the Kennedy assassination.”¹⁰¹

It has to be repeated that even if we accept Becker’s allegation, no evidence has ever surfaced that Marcello had Kennedy killed by Oswald or anyone else. The HSCA, in its investigation of Marcello, said that although it could not positively conclude that “Marcello and his associates were not involved” in the assassination (i.e., the committee couldn’t prove a negative), it pointed out that “Marcello’s uniquely successful career in organized crime has been based to a large extent on a policy of prudence; he is not reckless. As with the case of the Soviet and Cuban Governments, a risk analysis indicated that he would be unlikely to undertake so dangerous a course of action as a Presidential assassination.”¹⁰² Speaking not just of Marcello, but also Trafficante, Newsweek pointed out that one of the big problems with “fingering them as the culprit” was “their own prudence. The two men lasted as dons for decades in part by being cagey, not by trying to kill the president of the United States.”¹⁰³

It is noteworthy that Marcello, who died in New Orleans on March 2, 1993, at the age of eighty-three, was never charged with any murder during his storied career in organized crime. It is perhaps even more noteworthy that other than some early assault and robbery charges brought against him in his late teens and early twenties, over the almost sixty-year period between 1935 and his death in 1993, with one exception being a charge of assault in 1966 for taking a wild swing at someone he thought was impeding his way as he walked through a crowd at New Orleans International Airport, he was never charged with any crime involving physical violence of any kind.¹⁰⁴ All of the charges against him were nonviolent in nature. In 1938, Marcello was convicted of selling marijuana to an FBI undercover officer. For the next forty-two years, other than the assault charge in 1966, there were no prosecutions of any kind against him. In 1981, he was convicted of mail fraud and conspiracy to violate federal racketeering laws in his effort to win a multimillion-dollar state group insurance contract (later reversed by a U.S. Supreme Court decision that changed what constituted fraud under federal law), and in 1983, for conspiracy to bribe a federal judge in California presiding over the trial of underworld friends of his. After serving six and a half years in prison on these charges, and in very poor health, he was paroled in 1989.

However, Marcello's chief nemesis, Aaron Kohn, the former FBI agent out of Chicago who took over the privately financed New Orleans Metropolitan Crime Commission in 1953 and was its managing director for twenty-four years, doggedly investigated Marcello for years and became convinced, though he could not prove, that Marcello was behind three and possibly four murders in New Orleans.¹⁰⁵ Even if true, this would be very small potatoes next to the murder-drenched Mafia families in cities like New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia.

No one was ever more respected in New Orleans law enforcement than John Volz. His outstanding resumé bespeaks enormous experience and stature. From 1963 to 1968 he was an assistant district attorney under Jim Garrison, heading up the section on narcotics enforcement. After a year as a special agent for the federal Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs (the predecessor to today's Drug Enforcement Administration), he returned to the DA's office as Garrison's chief assistant district attorney between 1970 and 1974. From 1974 to 1978 he was New Orleans's first federal public defender and was the U.S. attorney in New Orleans from 1978 to 1991. From 1991 to 1993 he served as special counsel to the Department of Justice. No one has more of a background in New Orleans law enforcement than he, and no one knows the "players" any better than he. When I asked him about the notion that Marcello may have been behind Kennedy's assassination, he had a one-word reply: "Absurd." Marcello (whom Volz personally prosecuted in 1981 on the charge of conspiring to obtain an insurance contract by bribery), he acknowledged, was the head of organized crime in New Orleans, but he hastened to add that New Orleans organized crime wasn't anything like "the Eastern Mafia families." For instance, he said, "Marcello, almost exclusively, was into gambling,* not extortion, narcotics, or murder."¹⁰⁶

Extortion, of course, has been a staple of organized crime almost from its inception. The essence of Mafia extortion during the mob's heyday was simple: either you paid for "protection" or you'd be murdered or maimed for life. Yet Life magazine, in an in-depth three-part series on organized crime in America in 1967, which was decidedly negative about Marcello, nonetheless reported, "[Marcello's] Jefferson Music Company almost monopolizes vending machines and pinball games in Jefferson Parish. Each year he lends thousands of dollars to restaurant or tavern owners if they agree to accept his jukeboxes, cigarette machines or pinball games."¹⁰⁷ Some extortion. The thrust of Life's investigation of Marcello was that through payoffs and favors extending all the way up to the governor's office, Marcello's gambling empire was permitted to flourish unimpeded.

When I mentioned Aaron Kohn's allegation about murder, Volz said, "Aaron [now deceased] was a good man and his office and mine worked together on many cases, but many times he kind of went off half-cocked, basing conclusions on hearsay and unsubstantiated rumor." Volz added that the federal authorities "investigated Marcello for thirty years, and let me tell you this, if they—and I was a part of that effort—had come up with any credible evidence that Marcello was responsible for any murders, or was involved in narcotics, I can guarantee you, we would have come down hard on him and there would have been prosecution."

When I said I had heard that people feared Marcello, he confirmed that this was so, explaining that "Marcello was more a myth. His reputation was much worse than he was, and he enjoyed this and profited from it. He had a reputation for being violent, which he wasn't, and he loved it because he scared a lot of people."^{108*}

Since Marcello had no history of violence, the suggestion that he would start committing violent crimes by committing the most violent crime of all, murder, and do so against the most powerful man on earth, makes no sense at all.

One important addendum to all of this: In their desperation to connect Oswald with organized crime (necessary because why would Ruby silence Oswald for the mob, as they claim, if Oswald hadn't killed Kennedy for the mob?), the conspiracy theorists who allege in their books that Marcello had Kennedy killed, and that Oswald was his hit man, try to connect Oswald with Marcello through Oswald's uncle, Charles "Dutz" Murret. Since there is no evidence that Marcello had Kennedy killed, and the whole notion that he did makes no sense at all, what follows necessarily is a meaningless discussion. Nevertheless, let's look at what the conspiracy theorists say. We know from the biography of Oswald in this book that Oswald had a moderately close relationship with his mother's sister, Lillian Murret (his aunt), and her husband, Dutz, even staying at their home in New Orleans for two weeks in April of 1963 while he looked for a job and waited for Marina and their daughter, June, to join him from Dallas.

According to a 1944 FBI report, Dutz Murret was the operator of two illegal handbook (bookmaking) clubs in the French Quarter at the time. In these early years he also managed a few pro fighters, having been a boxer himself when he was younger.¹⁰⁹ But that was almost two decades before the assassination. Was he still involved in gambling and bookmaking in the 1960s? Everyone seems to concede that point, but there doesn't seem to be any hard evidence to support it. Indeed, the HSCA Report refers to Murret as a "minor" gambling figure in the 1940s and 1950s and "possibly" until his death in 1964.¹¹⁰ But even "possibly" is too strong a word because the HSCA cites no evidence to support it for the 1960s. In fact, as far as I can tell, the report doesn't offer any support for Murret being involved in gambling in the 1950s, only the 1940s. Citing Marguerite Oswald's statement that Murret had been a bookmaker "for many, many years"¹¹¹ doesn't address itself to the issue since Marguerite only knew the goings on of her sister and husband in the 1930s and 1940s, not later.

And of course if Dutz Murret was just a bookmaker, at some time in his life, that wouldn't help the conspiracy theorists. Their main argument is their claim that around the time of the assassination, Dutz was working for Sam Saia, a prominent New Orleans gambling figure who, per Aaron Kohn, was "very close to Carlos Marcello," and that is how they try to connect Oswald (through Murret) with Marcello, who they claim was behind the assassination.¹¹²

But there is no evidence that Murret was associated with Saia at any time near the assassination. Indeed, the only evidence on this point, from Murret's wife, Lillian, suggests he wasn't. In her deposition before the HSCA, the always candid Mrs. Murret testified that "in the thirties and forties" her husband worked for Sam Saia, a man she said was "in the gambling business," at Saia's club, the Lomalinda, in the French Quarter. When HSCA counsel asked her if her husband continued to work for Saia in the 1950s and 1960s, she replied, "Maybe he did."

"Up until his death?"

"Oh, no. He was working on the riverfront when he died."

"Are you pretty sure that Dutz was not involved in any gambling activities during 1963?"

"I am sure he was not," Mrs. Murret answered. "He worked pretty hard up there on the riverfront." And she made it very clear that when her husband did work for Saia he did not work at the riverfront at the same time (i.e., the riverfront being the day job and the gambling business at night and/or over weekends).

“Did he have both jobs at the same time?” HSCA counsel asked.

“No,” Mrs. Murret answered without equivocation, clearly adding that he went to work at the riverfront after he quit the gambling business. So when Mrs. Murret testified that her husband had been working at the riverfront (checking boxcars coming in for the T. Smith and Company steamship line) “for quite a few years,” that means that, if true, Murret would have long been out of his association with Saia or with gambling and other gamblers around the time of the assassination.¹¹³ And, as indicated, that’s bad for the conspiracy theorists.

The 1978 testimony of Dutz Murret’s son, Eugene, before the HSCA was even worse for the conspiracy theorists, since it was a little more precise. Eugene Murret, a lawyer working as the judicial administrator of the Supreme Court of Louisiana at the time of his testimony, was very clear that although his father had been a bookie for years, at some point “before 1959,” his father “was a self-employed bookie.” When asked if he worked before 1959 for Sam Saia, he answered, “Well, that would have been way back, I think,” the implication being before the 1950s. He said his father “mainly ran his own operation most of the time and maybe with one or two other people as time went along,” adding that although his father at some point in time worked with Saia, whenever he worked with anyone else it was usually with a man named Larry Rue, not Saia. He said his father’s bookie operation “was solely and exclusively to support his family and that is about what it made,” and believed he quit bookmaking around 1959 or slightly earlier because “business might have been bad, it might have been off” and “not producing the kind of income he needed to support his family,” suggesting his father wanted a job that “was eight hours a day and steady income.”¹¹⁴

But let’s assume, for the sake of argument, that Murret, unbeknownst to Lillian or his family, kept his hand in the gambling business during the last years of his life by working evenings and weekends. It is certainly highly improbable that he’d be able to do this without their knowledge, but it’s possible. It’s also very unlikely that if he was moonlighting as a bookie, he would try to conceal it from his family since, in his family, it was never something to hide, his son Eugene even telling the HSCA that in high school he used to visit his father at his bookie establishments. It’s also possible that Mrs. Murret and Eugene lied under oath, though it is unclear why they would do this when they readily admitted Dutz worked as a gambler at one time. It really was nothing to be that ashamed of in New Orleans. As Mrs. Murret said, “Gambling at that time was wide open,” though it is not clear whether it remained that way in later years. Murret was apparently never perceived as a “real criminal” when he was involved in the gambling business, law enforcement apparently looking the other way at such activity in those years, one indication of which is that Murret doesn’t appear to have had any criminal record. Indeed, Lillian referred to him as being “very square,” and at the time in the summer of 1963 when Oswald was arrested for his confrontation on the streets and needed bail money, Dutz was away at Manresa, a “Catholic retreat house” where he went more than once a year.¹¹⁵

But again, to please the conspiracy theorists, and without any evidence to support it, let’s assume that Dutz Murret was working with Sam Saia around the time of the assassination at Saia’s Lomalinda club, where gambling activity took place, and Saia was connected to Marcello. So what? Marcello, of course, had gambling and other enterprises throughout the Gulf States region, so Dutz working for someone who in turn was close to Marcello is of no consequence. And the HSCA learned that bookmakers throughout the New Orleans area subscribed, for a fee, to a Marcello-controlled wire service, which enabled them to get race results.¹¹⁶ However, the HSCA was unable to find any evidence that Murret knew or even met Marcello, his only known connection being that he worked for Saia at one time, who apparently would have been paying Marcello for the use of the latter's wire service.¹¹⁷

But if we were to believe the conspiracy theorists, Murret worked for Marcello himself. One example among many: In his book Contract on America, author David E. Scheim writes that Murret was "associated with Marcello's criminal organization." Well, "associated" implies a lot more than merely working for someone who subscribes to Marcello's wire service, even if we were to assume for the sake of argument that Murret himself, not Saia, paid the subscriber's fee. Elsewhere, Scheim writes that Murret was a "criminal operative in the empire" of Marcello and "Murret worked as a bookie in Marcello's criminal organization." In other words, without any evidence to support his assertion, Scheim says that Murret worked not for himself or even Saia, but directly for Marcello.¹¹⁸ Emile Bruneau, himself a gambler and a close friend of Murret's for years, didn't hesitate to tell authorities that Murret worked for Saia at one time and "assumed," without knowing, that he knew New Orleans crime figure Nofio Pecora. But he said that though he couldn't be sure, "I don't think" Murret knew Marcello.¹¹⁹ And Murret's wife, Lillian, told the HSCA that although her husband probably knew of Marcello (who didn't?) she was "sure he didn't know him personally."¹²⁰

But even if we make the further assumption that Marcello wanted to kill Kennedy, and Murret worked directly for Marcello, isn't there still a big piece of the puzzle missing? Why does Marcello get in touch with Oswald, of all people, to kill Kennedy for him? I mean, did he interview all the many underlings in his "empire" to find out if any of them, or anyone they knew, was willing to kill Kennedy for him, and one of his many interviewees, Murret, suggested his nephew Oswald (thereby now bringing Murret in as yet another co-conspirator in the assassination of Kennedy)? This is the line of reasoning of former HSCA chief counsel Robert Blakey in his book The Plot to Kill the President:

We [he has to be referring to his coauthor here, not the HSCA, which did not subscribe to any of what follows] considered it unlikely that [Oswald] would have bragged openly, least of all to his own relatives, of having tried to assassinate [General] Walker, but Marina knew, and she might not have been so loath to tell about it. [No evidence has ever surfaced that Marina told anyone back then about Oswald's attempt on Walker's life. All of the evidence is that she told absolutely no one, and only acknowledged it when Oswald's letter of instructions to her, written before his attempt on Walker's life, surfaced in the cookbook after the assassination.] She had, after all, confided to Ruth Paine about the beatings she got from Oswald. [As if telling someone with whom you are living that your husband had beaten you is the same as telling your husband's aunt and uncle that he tried to murder someone.] We, therefore, believed it was quite possible that the Murrets learned of the Walker incident, and Dutz Murret was in an ideal position to connect his nephew with organized crime, since he himself was an underworld figure. We did not have reason to believe that Murret was a co-conspirator in the assassination, but we did regard him a likely conduit of information about Oswald—his conduct, his political beliefs, his violent bent (specifically, the assault on Walker)—to people who had the motive and the capability to plot the assassination.¹²¹

So maybe Marina told the Murrets about Oswald trying to kill Walker, and maybe Dutz Murret told people close to Marcello about it, and maybe Marcello decided Oswald was his man. And maybe if I had wings I could fly. It's okay to ruminate and daydream, but to use these reveries as the basis for the conclusion that Marcello had Oswald kill Kennedy is astonishing, particularly when there is no evidence at all that Marcello had anyone, much less Oswald, kill Kennedy. One would not expect such reasoning from someone of the considerable intelligence and stature of Blakey, who currently is a professor of law at Notre Dame Law School. Blakey continues to surprise when he concedes that "other than Murret, we were unable to identify [any] underworld associates of Oswald, though we theorized they would have been unlikely to be seen with him in public."¹²² And based only on Oswald's being a nephew of Murret, Blakey concludes that Oswald killed Kennedy for the mob?

I find it remarkable that Blakey, who is a leading authority on organized crime, actually believes that the mob would decide to kill Kennedy. Remarkable in the sense that, unlike virtually all students of the mob, he apparently, at least with respect to the Kennedy assassination, has very little respect for the mob's intelligence and pragmatism. I mean, for the Mafia to murder Kennedy they'd have to be crazy. And for them to get Oswald, of all people, to do it for them, they'd have to be, in a legal sense, not guilty by reason of insanity.

Blakey's position is additionally remarkable because other than the fourth-bullet conspiracy conclusion of the HSCA, which he embraces, Blakey demonstrated much common sense and competence as chief counsel for the committee.*

Years after all their deaths, Carlos Marcello, Santo Trafficante, and Jimmy Hoffa were accused of having Kennedy murdered by the late Frank Ragano, a mob attorney who represented not only Trafficante but also Hoffa when he was president of the largest union in the country, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. Since trial lawyers, as Ragano was, live in a world of lies, either by their client or by their opposition, one would think Ragano would be capable of a better lie than the one he told in his 1994 book, Mob Lawyer.

Many who have implicated themselves or others in the assassination either are within the grasp of, or flirting very heavily with, psychosis, or have such a passion for the notion of a conspiracy that they're willing to believe virtually anything. We've already seen both of these types on these pages. But Ragano, being a completely rational person who obviously just made up his story for his own self-aggrandizing reasons (to be discussed later), clearly doesn't fit into either category.

If we're to believe Ragano, around 2:30 p.m. on July 23, 1963, in the executive dining room of the Marble Palace Hotel in Washington, D.C. (so far, Ragano is not too bad—the details smack of the truth, right?), Hoffa, under constant investigation and indictment at the hands of RFK's Justice Department (the most recent incident being his indictment the previous month, along with seven associates, for looting $25 million from the Teamsters pension fund), said to him, "Something has to be done. The time has come for your friend [Trafficante] and Carlos [Marcello, Trafficante's close mob friend] to get rid of him, kill that son-of-a-bitch John Kennedy."^{*} The theory, Ragano carefully explains to his readers, is that Hoffa felt that Kennedy's successor, LBJ, hated Robert Kennedy so much he'd never keep him on as attorney general, and LBJ wouldn't pursue Hoffa because Hoffa had made large cash contributions to LBJ's political campaigns. "This has got to be done," he quotes Hoffa as telling him. "Be sure to tell them what I said. No more fucking around. We're running out of time—something has to be done."¹²³ †

Now mind you, by Ragano's own admission, he says he couldn't believe what Hoffa had told him, but the very next day at the Royal Orleans Hotel in New Orleans, he dutifully says he passed on the message to the two mobsters. "Marteduzzo [Little Hammer, Hoffa's Sicilian nickname] wants you to do a little favor for him. You won't believe this, but he wants you to kill John Kennedy. He wants you to get rid of the President right away." Ragano says he thought that Hoffa's wish would be met with laughter from the two mobsters, but, he tells his readers, there was "silence. Santo and Carlos exchanged glances. Their facial expressions were icy. Their reticence was a signal that this was an uncomfortable subject, one they were unwilling to discuss."¹²⁴ (In a Frontline documentary, Ragano said that when he told Marcello and Trafficante that Hoffa wanted them to kill Kennedy, "they looked at one another and I got the distinct impression that it was as if, well, that's what we were going to do anyhow."¹²⁵ This is what Ragano also told New York Post reporter Jack Newfield in an earlier 1992 interview.¹²⁶)

Two weeks after the assassination, Ragano says in his 1994 book, he was in the passenger seat of a car in New Orleans driven by Marcello's brother, Joe. Carlos and Trafficante were in the backseat. When a news item on the car radio questioned whether Oswald acted alone in the assassination, Ragano reports that Trafficante said, "Carlos, you mark my words. Before this thing is over with, they're going to blame you and me for the killing."¹²⁷ But twenty-seven years earlier, in an interview with the FBI in Tampa, Florida, on April 10, 1967, Ragano said the above incident (this later version had Carlos Marcello driving, Trafficante in the front seat, and Ragano in the backseat alone) took place not two weeks after the assassination but four years later, in 1967, and what prompted Trafficante's remark was the car radio's news about New Orleans DA Jim Garrison's investigation of the assassination. Ragano told the FBI that the allegations about Trafficante being involved in Kennedy's death "were ridiculous," and illustrated Trafficante's attitude about the assassination by telling the agents about Trafficante's alleged remarks in the car and his belief that he would be "framed" by law enforcement to put him behind bars.¹²⁸ So, according to Ragano, up until 1967, Trafficante was innocent.

But in the aforementioned 1992 Frontline documentary, Ragano said that before dying, Trafficante confided to Ragano that he and Marcello had Kennedy murdered. In his book, he elaborated on the incident. According to Ragano, on March 13, 1987, in Tampa, Florida, just four days before Trafficante's death, Trafficante called him. In an extremely enfeebled voice ("between gasps I could hear him wheezing") Trafficante said, "Frank, please come and see me today... I want to talk to you. It's very important." Trafficante was figuratively on his deathbed, per Ragano. During a drive in Ragano's car, the Mafia leader, per Ragano, told him in Italian, "Carlos é futtutu. Non duvevamu ammazzari a Giovanni. Duvevamu ammazzari a Bobby" ("We shouldn't have killed Giovanni [John in Italian]. We should have killed Bobby").¹²⁹ Ragano doesn't say in his book why Trafficante, who, like the HSCA said, was always "discreet,"¹³⁰ would confess to the biggest murder ever.

Conspiracy theorist Anthony Summers, who smells a rat almost everywhere in the assassination of President Kennedy, but unlike most of his brethren in the conspiracy community is rational, responsible, and intelligent enough to never say he thinks he actually found the rat (i.e., “The mob killed JFK,” etc.), checked this last story out. He learned that on March 13, 1987, Trafficante was no longer living in Tampa, having taken up permanent residence at his home in North Miami Beach, and hadn’t been to Tampa since the previous Christmas holidays. Trafficante’s widow (who Ragano says he saw in the Tampa home when he picked up her husband for the ride), his two daughters, and several friends and neighbors told Summers the meeting between Ragano and Trafficante not only didn’t take place but couldn’t have, since he was in North Miami Beach the entire day. Summers also learned from hospital records that Trafficante was treated in the dialysis unit of Miami’s Mercy Hospital the previous evening, March 12, until 7:15 p.m., and was back in the unit by the afternoon of March 14, leaving a one-day window for him to fly to his father confessor, Ragano, for his mea culpa. But there is no evidence, other than Ragano’s word, that Trafficante, near death, did so. Oh yes. Ragano told Summers he had three witnesses who could corroborate his story, but he declined to tell Summers who they were.¹³¹

But quite apart from Summers’s good investigative work exposing Ragano’s story, the story from start to finish does not make one iota of sense. Ragano writes in his book, after revealing Trafficante’s alleged confession, that “Carlos [and] Santo...undoubtedly had roles in Kennedy’s death,”¹³² but had he forgotten that earlier in his book he wrote that Trafficante and Marcello were “two ultra-cautious men...two prudent godfathers,” and the thought that they would “dare to get involved in a plot against the President...was too absurd for credibility...It was absurd to contemplate that these Mafia dons or any Mafia boss had the audacity to pull off the biggest hit the world—the murder of the President of the United States”?¹³³ Of course, that’s what I have said more than once in this book—that the thought that Trafficante, Marcello, or any of the mob leaders would plot to murder the president is too ridiculous to even mention. If that’s an absurd thought, multiply by one thousand the unlikelihood that Trafficante and Marcello would murder the president of the United States simply as a favor for Jimmy Hoffa, a union leader, and someone whom Trafficante, Ragano says, had never even met.¹³⁴ No sensible person would believe a story like that.

There’s perhaps an even bigger reason why we know that Ragano’s entire story is a giant fabrication. Were it true, he’d never in a million years talk about it since he’d automatically be exposing himself to the high probability of being killed twice over. First, if he had conveyed the message from Hoffa to Trafficante that he believes resulted in Kennedy’s murder, as a criminal lawyer for several years Ragano would have to know that he’d also be guilty of the assassination under the law of aiding and abetting. Indeed, he writes, after the alleged confession from Trafficante, about his “possible complicity in the assassination.”¹³⁵ Since there’s no statute of limitations for murder, he could be prosecuted for the president’s murder and sentenced to death. Second, no one knows better than he that, as the flap on the dust jacket of his own book says, “A bullet in the head is the customary penalty for violation of omerta, the Mafia’s code of silence.” But you see, Ragano never had any of these fears, since he knew he hadn’t aided and abetted any crime, nor squealed on those who he said did, so knowing neither the authorities nor the Mafia would pay any attention to his blather, he felt perfectly safe to say what he did.

Why did Ragano make up his tale? Some have suggested that Ragano may have been seeking revenge for the fact that Trafficante refused to loan him money at an earlier time when he needed it. After Ragano was disbarred from the practice of law in 1976 following his conviction for income tax evasion, he was near bankruptcy, and when he asked Trafficante for a loan he was devastated by the response: “Ask me for anything—except money.”¹³⁶ But although bitter for a long time about the rejection, Ragano, whose license to practice law had been reinstated, defended Trafficante in a subsequent 1986 federal racketeering case in Tampa (which ended in a mistrial when the judge ruled there wasn’t enough evidence for the case to proceed), and attended his funeral the next year. In any event, I find it hard to believe that Ragano would try to implicate not only Trafficante in Kennedy’s murder, but also himself (even if he knew the mob and authorities would know his story was a fraud) just to get revenge against someone he couldn’t even hurt (since Trafficante was already dead), all because his request for a loan was turned down fifteen years earlier. I would think the likelier reasons for Ragano’s fable were more self-aggrandizing in nature. At the time he first told it in 1992, he was in the process of writing his book, and the allegation, per the dust jacket and promotional material, was the most sensational and explosive part of the book. So the hope of stimulating book sales probably was at the heart of the story. Also, as a concomitant thereof, the opportunity to be a media celebrity and tell his story, as he did on several national TV shows, may have held its appeal to him. Another possibility is that when he first came forward with his story in 1992, he was fighting to stay out of prison for a second conviction in 1990 for income tax evasion (he was unsuccessful), and by some manner of thinking he may have thought the story, and the prospect of telling more, would give him some leverage with the authorities. Fighting to stay out of prison and promoting his book may have been the combination that caused Ragano, close to thirty years after the assassination, to come up with his whopper.

Ragano had no credibility left to squander, but if anyone thought he did, his testimony before the ARRB should disabuse them of this notion. Let’s let the ARRB tell it: “Ragano...stated in his book that he possessed original, contemporaneous notes of meetings with organized crime figures. To determine whether Ragano’s notes were relevant to the assassination, the Review Board subpoenaed the notes and deposed Ragano. He produced several handwritten notes regarding the assassination, but he could not definitely state whether he took them during the meetings [with mob figures] in the 1960’s or later when he was working on his book in the 1990’s.”¹³⁷ Really believable, isn’t it?

Before going on, I should note that although the Hoffa plan to kill President Kennedy is clearly a fabrication of Frank Ragano’s, it is pretty well accepted that Hoffa, though never ordering, at least discussed the possibility of murdering his chief nemesis, the president’s brother, RFK. The main confirmation for this came from one of Hoffa’s close confidants, Edward Partin, a Baton Rouge teamsters official with a criminal record who informed the authorities in September of 1962 that he had participated in such a discussion with Hoffa. In October of 1962, the FBI gave Partin a polygraph test and he passed. In an interview with the HSCA in 1978, Partin reaffirmed the account of Hoffa’s discussion with him about having RFK killed, Hoffa suggesting a lone gunman with a rifle equipped with a telescopic sight shooting RFK as he rode in a convertible. While there are the similarities to the president’s death, the HSCA observed that they “were not so unusual as to point ineluctably in a particular direction.” Hoffa also discussed the alternative possibility of killing RFK with plastic explosives, but Partin said Hoffa never pursued the matter of killing RFK.¹³⁸

The HSCA also confirmed that in early 1967, Frank Chavez, another Teamsters official, spoke to Hoffa about murdering Robert Kennedy, even suggesting ways to get the job done, but Hoffa “sharply rebuked his aide, telling him that such a course of action was dangerous and should not be considered.”¹³⁹

The HSCA noted that, unlike the various organized-crime figures with whom he associated, “Hoffa was not a confirmed murderer,”* his association with them having derived from the nature of his union activities. Further, the only credible evidence pertained to Hoffa’s discussion about killing RFK, not President Kennedy, and even with RFK it never went beyond mere talking with Partin, and Hoffa sternly rejected the proposal set forth by Chavez. The committee also said it was doubtful Hoffa would have risked something as extremely dangerous as a plot to murder President Kennedy at the very time he was under active investigation by RFK’s Justice Department. Accordingly, the HSCA concluded it was “improbable that Hoffa had anything to do with the death of the President.”¹⁴⁰

The HSCA could have added the most important point of all—that there was no evidence of any kind that Hoffa was involved in the president’s death.

Other than a virtual madman (as Oswald was), no person or group in America would ever seriously consider murdering the president of the United States. For well over a century this has been so, and will continue to be so indefinitely if our culture and democratic form of government remain in existence. The president is simply someone you don’t mess with. That is why, as I have said, the very thought of groups like organized crime, the CIA, military-industrial complex, and so on, sitting around and actually planning to murder the president of the United States is inherently crazy on its face, and except for the necessities of this book, I reject the proposition out of hand.

But if, for instance, the mob did intend to “mess with” the president because it wanted to get his brother, Robert Kennedy, off its back, what it would do is something like this (and I maintain the mob wouldn’t even try to do this against the president): It is well known, and too well chronicled to require documentation, that President Kennedy was a hound dog when it came to women, continuing his indiscriminate liaisons with many women through his one thousand days in office. As Time magazine observed in 1975, “Even after he entered the White House, the handsome and fun-loving Kennedy never stopped pursuing attractive women—nor they him... Once, he startled two proper Britons, Prime Minister Harold MacMillan and Foreign Minister R.A.B. Butler, during a 1962 conference in Nassau by casually confiding that if he went too long without a woman, he suffered severe headaches.”¹⁴¹ The story was just a rumor, but because of the continuing revelations through the years of Kennedy’s girlfriends, Time magazine’s Hugh Sidey wrote in 2003, “This story has been largely discounted, but now it has new currency.”¹⁴²

It is also well known that one of Kennedy’s lovers was Judith Campbell Exner, an attractive, blue-eyed Las Vegas and Palm Springs party girl and one-time starlet who was introduced to Kennedy in 1960 by Frank Sinatra in Sinatra’s “presidential suite” at the Sands Hotel in Las Vegas.¹⁴³ During a two-year period, she saw Kennedy as well as Chicago mobster Sam Giancana, although, per Exner, she did not share her bed with Giancana until after she broke up with Kennedy.

And where did these interludes with the president take place? Not only at the White House (the White House telephone logs showed some seventy calls from Exner to the president during a fifty-four-week period in 1961 and early 1962),¹⁴⁴ but at various hotels around the country, even at her apartment below the Sunset Strip near Doheny Drive in West Los Angeles,^{145*} which was probably provided for by Giancana since Exner had no other visible means of support during this period. It would seem that if the mob were going to do anything at all to the president, it could have—particularly when it had, through Giancana, a handle on Exner and her whereabouts—gotten a compromising photo of Kennedy and her together, or even film or audio of their lovemaking in one of the hotel suites or Exner’s apartment.* Then the mob could have delivered a copy of what they had to the president or one of his people with the explicit or implied threat that if RFK didn’t stop vigorously pursuing organized crime, the world would see or hear what the mob had. But murder the president? Please, okay? Just please. And select the completely unstable and unreliable Lee Harvey Oswald to get the job done? And then have the almost childlike Jack Ruby, after Oswald had already been in police custody for three days and grilled for twelve hours, kill Oswald to silence him? Again, please.

As set forth earlier, the Warren Commission examined, in considerable depth, Jack Ruby’s connection with organized crime and concluded that Ruby’s “denial” of being associated with organized crime was “confirmed” by law enforcement agencies. It also concluded that its own investigation produced no grounds for believing that Ruby’s killing of Oswald “was part of a conspiracy.”¹⁴⁶ However, assistant Warren Commission counsel Burt W. Griffin testified before the HSCA that other than Ruby’s possible involvement with the mob, “the possibility that someone associated with the underworld would have wanted to assassinate the President...[was] not seriously explored” by the Warren Commission.¹⁴⁷ The HSCA, more conspiracy-oriented than the Warren Commission, criticized the Commission for this narrow focus and did conduct a more expansive investigation of organized crime’s possible involvement in the assassination. Ultimately, the committee concluded that “the national syndicate of organized crime...was not involved in the assassination of President Kennedy.” It went on to say it could “not preclude the possibility [who could preclude such a possibility?] that individual members may have been involved.”¹⁴⁸

With respect to the possibility of organized crime, or individual members, being involved in the assassination, it’s not as if the mob’s oath of omerta still permanently zippers the lips of all mafiosi. Following Joseph Valachi’s lead in 1963, there has been a string of Mafia members who, as part of a plea bargain, have sung like canaries to law enforcement about the mob’s misdeeds, including murder. But as indicated earlier, not once in close to forty-five years has any mob member told law enforcement he knew (or had even heard within the mob) of any mob involvement in the assassination. And the electronic surveillance and wiretapping of mob figures by the FBI has continued through the years, yet not the slightest hint of the mob being behind the assassination has been picked up.

Speaking of Valachi, even if we assume for the sake of argument and against all evidence and logic, that the Mafia decided to kill Kennedy, it never would have set the date for November 22, 1963. Just the previous month, Valachi’s sensational testimony before the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee had placed a far, far bigger spotlight on the Mafia than ever before in its history. Indeed, nothing remotely like it had ever occurred. Yes, mobsters had been called before congressional committees before, but after being sworn in, they’d take the Fifth. But Valachi, as Newsweek pointed out, was “the first good singing voice in the history of Senatorial crime investigations... spill[ing] out the terror, the atrocities, the inside-out moralities of life in the underworld society that he called Costa Nostra.”¹⁴⁹ Under hot television lights in a Senate caucus room crowded with more than five hundred spectators, including twenty U.S. marshals to ensure his protection, Valachi exposed the Mafia to an enthralled, national audience. Even in the caucus room full of professionals, Valachi's "sinister story held his listeners in its grip."¹⁵⁰ After the first day of his testimony, Newsweek said "millions of viewers looked forward" to his next appearance before the subcommittee. How big was Valachi's story? Big enough to be the main, front-page headline in the New York Times the first two days of his testimony, with two other front-page stories on the third day. Similar headlines appeared in papers across America, and Valachi, overnight, became so well known that national comedians told jokes about his canary role. And the Grand Council of Columbus Associations, an Italian-American organization, publicly expressed its resentment over the national spotlight being given Valachi's testimony and story. Mario Biaggi, a New York City police lieutenant who was the president of the council, called the Valachi hearings "a grim circus" and charged that the effect of it was to attribute the nation's crimes to Italians.¹⁵¹

With this backdrop of the national spotlight being on the Mafia as never before, with Bobby Kennedy's Justice Department putting unprecedented heat on organized crime, and with Kennedy and Senator McClellan, the senate subcommittee chairman, calling for new and tougher legislation to combat the Mafia, I can just picture Vito Genovese, the "boss of bosses," per Valachi, in his hospital bed with a heart condition at the federal penitentiary in Leavenworth, Kansas,¹⁵² telling a mob courier in a raspy voice, "Tell the boys that it's always good to strike when the iron's hot. We're hot now. We've been waiting for the spotlight like this for a long time. Now's the best time to whack Kennedy."

Even if one wanted to believe that Genovese or any other Mafia leader would order Kennedy's death around the time of the Valachi hearings, how could one do it without tying up and gagging one's intellect first?

No other reasoning is needed or has to be adduced to show that organized crime was not behind the assassination of John F. Kennedy, but I should add one more point: although organized crime had considerable power in the world of crime at the time of the assassination, what power could it possibly have had over others to get them to go along with its plot to murder Kennedy?

Quite apart from the absence of any evidence, as well as the illogic, that organized crime killed Kennedy, we know that this theory by conspiracy theorists is absolutely negated by many other theories they cherish and hold close to their bosoms. For instance, the conspiracy theorists believe that the route of the president's motorcade in front of the Book Depository Building was set up by the conspirators who killed the president. But even Jim Garrison, the New Orleans DA who prosecuted an innocent man for conspiracy to murder Kennedy (see later text) asks, How in the world would the Mafia be able to control the parade route?¹⁵³ The theorists believe that the Zapruder film was tampered with, that the wounds on Kennedy's body were altered, and the autopsy surgeons distorted their findings. But again, how could organized crime have exercised any influence or control over such matters and people? And so on. To pull off the monstrous conspiracy that conspiracy theorists have crafted in their minds, many agencies of government, like the FBI, even the Secret Service, would have had to have cooperated. But how in the world could organized crime have control over such agencies?

Equally importantly, it is conspiracy dogma that the Warren Commission suppressed the truth about the assassination from the American people. But it covered it up for whom? Organized crime?

Please. If the Warren Commission were to cover up the truth, which is a notion ludicrous on its face, it would be to protect a person, agency, or group that was a part of its establishment world. The CIA, Secret Service, FBI, military-industrial complex, or LBJ would qualify. But the mob? Again, please. (For the same reason, the Warren Commission covering up for Castro, anti-Castro Cuban exiles, or the KGB is silly on its face. And by extension, the chief investigative arm for the Warren Commission, the FBI, covering up for Castro, the KGB, or organized crime is also ludicrous on its face.)

That the Warren Commission would not be covering up for organized crime is a verity that no reasonable person can dispute. Yet conspiracy theorists (Jim Garrison was a rare exception), even very intelligent ones like David E. Scheim, who has a doctorate in mathematics from MIT, apparently haven't thought about this. In his book Contract on America, Scheim, clearly without cognizance of this verity, has no trouble writing things like this: "Glaring clues to Mafia assassination culpability [for Kennedy's murder] were buried, distorted and disingenuously deflected in the Warren Commission's final report" "Telephone records and other documents showed extensive contacts between Ruby [whom Scheim describes as the most important source of information on the Kennedy assassination then alive] and underworld figures from across the country in the months before the assassination. . . That evidence establishing these criminal ties had been repeatedly suppressed or distorted by the Warren Commission."¹⁵⁴ Another verity is at play here: there is virtually no correlation between intelligence and common sense.

To put it mildly, it is almost insane to believe that organized crime would decide to murder the president of the United States, then take this insanity to an even higher level by getting Oswald, of all people, to do the job, then take the insanity to previously unimaginable heights by getting Ruby to silence Oswald. What fool could possibly believe this?

For years, conspiracy theorists have written books about the Central Intelligence Agency's involvement in the assassination of JFK. And as conspiracy theorist E. Martin Schotz, a mathematician and practicing psychiatrist, puts it, "I and other ordinary citizens know, know for a fact, that there was a conspiracy [to murder Kennedy] and that it was organized at the highest levels of the CIA."¹ The fact that Schotz and his fellow conspiracy theorists haven't been able to come up with any evidence connecting the CIA to the assassination or Oswald has not troubled them in the least. In their opinion, they have been able to come up with motive (JFK's refusal to give air support to the CIA-sponsored Bay of Pigs invasion, his allegedly being soft, in the eyes of some, on Communism, his aim to cut the CIA budget by 20 percent by 1966,² etc.), means, and opportunity, which, as mentioned earlier, is not coming up with any hard evidence at all.

Whatever the CIA's short laundry list of dissatisfactions (some merely illusory, some real) with Kennedy, as I discuss later in the anti-Castro Cuban exile section of this book, Kennedy was highly disturbed with the CIA for its incompetence and its having misled him on the probable success of the Bay of Pigs invasion in 1961. Perhaps the most famous alleged quote from Kennedy about his animus toward the CIA after the Bay of Pigs debacle was that he wanted "to splinter the CIA into a thousand pieces and scatter it to the winds." But in the two and a half years after the attempted invasion he never did anything remotely close to this, and it is not known to whom he supposedly said these words. The New York Times only said that Kennedy made this statement "to one of the highest officials of his administration."³

The reality is that the relationship between Kennedy and the CIA, though strained by the Bay of Pigs debacle, was not nearly as bad and combustible as conspiracy theorists would want people to believe. And as we shall see, and most important on the issue of motive, the period of difficult relations was apparently short-lived.*

We know that no one has ever come up with any evidence of any kind that the CIA decided to kill Kennedy, and got Oswald or anyone else to do the job for it. Indeed, despite the admitted problems Kennedy had with the CIA over the Bay of Pigs invasion, William Colby, who was a ranking official in the CIA during the period of the assassination and went on to become CIA director, would later write, "The fact of the matter is that the CIA could not have had a better friend in a President than John F. Kennedy. He understood the Agency and used it effectively, exploiting its intellectual abilities to help him analyze a complex world, and its paramilitary and covert political talents to react to it in a low key way."⁴

And in 1996, the CIA released a study titled "Getting to Know the President, CIA Briefings of Presidential Candidates, 1952–1992," by the CIA deputy director for intelligence, John L. Helgerson. On a one-year assignment, Helgerson interviewed "former presidents, CIA directors, and numerous others involved" in the nine presidencies covered by the subject period to ascertain the CIA's relationship with the various presidents. On the issue so dear to conspiracy theorists—the CIA's alleged animosity for Kennedy, and hence, its motive to kill him—it is very noteworthy that Helgerson's study reported that "the [CIA's] relationship with Kennedy was not only a distinct improvement over the more formal relationship with Eisenhower, but would only rarely be matched in future administrations.” And alluding, by implication, to the strained period with Kennedy following the Bay of Pigs invasion in April of 1961, the report goes on to say that “in November 1961, Allen Dulles had been replaced by John McCone, who served Kennedy as DCI [Director of Central Intelligence] for almost two years. In the early part of this period, McCone succeeded in rebuilding the Agency’s relationship with Kennedy. McCone saw Kennedy frequently, and the President—more than any other before or since—would telephone even lower level Agency officers for information or assistance.”⁵

One reason why it’s been so easy for the conspiracy theorists to focus on the CIA is that since it officially started operations on September 18, 1947 (after being created under the National Security Act passed in July of that year to help fight the cold war against Communism and give the president centralized and coordinated foreign intelligence, which the country lacked prior to the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor), it has been a shadowy, somewhat autonomous governmental agency whose mantra seems to be secrecy (its motto in a clandestine operation is that if the participants say nothing at all they’re talking too much), Machiavellian intrigue, and operating outside the constraints of the law. As former CIA director Richard Helms once said about the culture of the CIA, “The only sin in espionage is getting caught.”

If the CIA could actually have begun a study, code-named “Artichoke,” in 1954 (later abandoned as not being feasible) to find out whether a person, through mind control, could be induced to commit an assassination against his will;⁶ get in bed with organized crime in a plot to murder Castro;* sponsor the coup (its first attempt to topple a foreign government) against Iran’s prime minister, Mohammed Mossadegh, in 1953, which actually aborted a move toward democracy in that country; engineer, by funding and directing a rebel force, the frightened resignation of Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán, the leftist Guatemalan president, in 1954; plot to assassinate the left-leaning premier of the Republic of the Congo, Patrice Lumumba, in 1960; be heavily supportive (to the extent of supplying arms) to dissidents who eventually assassinated Dominican Republic strongman Rafael Trujillo in 1961; encourage a coup of South Vietnam’s president, Ngo Dinh Diem, that resulted in his assassination in early November of 1963; promote the military coup against Chile’s Salvador Allende in 1973; and so on—how much of a stretch is it to believe the agency had the type of mentality to murder its own president? Almost as much of a stretch as to believe that American soldiers who kill their counterparts in wars to defeat a foreign dictator like Hitler or Mussolini are just as likely to commit treason by trying to forcibly overthrow the government of the United States. But not to the buffs. They see no difference at all between the CIA, an American federal agency, trying to kill Castro and killing their own president.

In its early years more than now, the CIA was composed mostly of men who, though not necessarily born to the manor, were tweedy, often intellectual, Ivy League alumni (authors Warren Hinckle and William Turner observed that Yale’s secretive Skull and Bones Society had “more CIA men than the Vatican has cardinals”)⁷ who shared a deeply patriotic love for this country and its always rim-full plates and cocktail glasses, and a pulsating fear that global Communism might end the party.* Though they were “gentlemen” warriors, they procured ring-around-the-collar men much more coarse than they to implement their plans. And they were committed and passionate enough to not be above whatever it took—including assassination of foreign leaders, even breaking bread with organized crime—to carry out their mission “in the national interest.”^{8†}

These men (e.g., Harvard-trained lawyers like Tracy Barnes and Desmond FitzGerald, Yale economics professor Richard Bissell, Wall Street lawyer Frank Wisner, etc.), author Evan Thomas writes, “were not a secret cabal. Their views on the need for covert action against the Soviet Union and communist insurgencies around the world were widely shared at the upper levels of government... If their masters in Congress and the executive branch did not know precisely what [they] were up to in this era, it is in part because they did not wish to know.” Thomas said that these men “found in their [previous] wartime experiences a sense of drama and meaning that could not be matched back at their law firms or lecture halls in peacetime. They saw the opportunity of American predominance [in world affairs] and reached out to seize it.” Thomas quotes a former deputy inspector of the CIA, Ed Applewhite, who worked alongside the elitist pioneers of the CIA, as saying, “They arrogated to themselves total power, with no inhibiting precedent. They could do what they wanted, just as long as ‘higher authority,’ as we called the president, did not expressly forbid it. They were extremely aristocratic in their assumptions..., very romantic and arrogant. They had a heaven-sent obligation and, God knows, what opportunity. They ate it up.”⁹ The freewheeling life they were leading was so intoxicating that the independently wealthy FitzGerald would let “his paychecks pile up on the front-hall table” of his Georgetown home.¹⁰

But at the bottom of it all, and hence, the historical context in which all of the CIA’s “homicidal tendencies” in the 1950s through the mid-1970s have to be viewed, but not condoned, is this country’s—some now say—hysterical fear of the spread of Communism.* Let’s not forget that the early years of the CIA were contemporaneous with a culture in Washington and elsewhere in which loyalty oaths and blacklists were looked on as acceptable means to combat Communism here at home.

Internationally, many nations in Eastern Europe and elsewhere did indeed fall under Communist (i.e., Soviet) influence or control following the end of the Second World War. The war had no sooner ended than a new struggle began. The Communist threat, emanating from what came to be called the “Sino-Soviet bloc,” led to a U.S. policy of containment intended to prevent further encroachment into the “Free World.” And this policy enjoyed widespread popular support in America. Castro’s assumption of power in Cuba was viewed as particularly ominous since it was the first significant penetration by the Communists into the Western Hemisphere, a Soviet outpost at America’s doorstep.¹¹

With the Soviet leaders making no effort to conceal their objective of a world Communistic state, America’s leaders were willing to commit U.S. combat troops abroad (e.g., Korea and Vietnam) to abort the “domino effect” of Soviet imperialism. And in some cases, assassination was deemed to be the most appropriate means to prevent the metastasizing of Communism. Though clearly contrary to American ideals, the Church Committee said that “the [assassination] plots occurred in a Cold War atmosphere perceived to be of crisis proportions” and concluded that “those involved [at the CIA]... appeared to believe they were advancing the best interests of their country.” Despite all the plotting and all the efforts, the Church Committee found that “no foreign leaders were killed as a result of assassination plots initiated by officials of the United States.”¹²

We all know, of course, that today’s CIA has reached a nadir in the public’s perception of its competence and effectiveness, mostly because of its catastrophic failure to learn of Osama bin

Laden's plan to attack the United States on September 11, 2001, and its terribly clumsy and incorrect assessment of Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction. But it wasn't always this way. As Philip Taubman writes, in the early years CIA Director Allen W. Dulles was able to build "a first class intelligence agency, a pioneer in espionage science and technology." The CIA took the lead "in developing exotic hardware that revolutionized the spy business, including highflying spy planes and satellites. Eisenhower's decision to turn the project over to the CIA instead of the Air Force—he thought the agency was more nimble and better at keeping secrets—gave it an important new role that produced some prized accomplishments, including the first photo reconnaissance satellite in 1960."¹³

The five paragraphs that created the CIA in the National Security Act of July 26, 1947, do not specifically authorize the conduct of covert political activity nor, apparently, was that the original intent—its main function being the "correlation, evaluation and dissemination" of "intelligence as [it] relates to the national security."¹⁴ So how did the CIA, our government's principal foreign intelligence spy organization,* get involved in foreign assassination plots and become the paramilitary force it was in the 1960s? One could argue that it was in its genes. The CIA's genetic predecessor, the Office of Strategic Services (OSS), was formed in December of 1942 at the height of the Second World War† and headed by William "Wild Bill" Donovan, a prominent Wall Street lawyer and World War I hero (Congressional Medal of Honor). Donovan was "an incurable romantic" who "molded the OSS into his own image: dashing, slightly madcap, and highly effective." He set the tone for the later CIA by recruiting men from the nation's upper class such as the son of Andrew Mellon and both sons of J. P. Morgan Jr., and including scholars such as Arthur Schlesinger Jr., Walt Rostow, and William Langer. "This led to sniffing [by some] that OSS stood for 'Oh So Social.'" But no one claimed the OSS didn't get the job done.¹⁵

However, anyone concluding that Donovan only recruited from the elite would be wrong. It just so happened that the elite had much to offer. But the main imperative that drove Donovan was to find whoever could do the job, resulting, for instance, in his arranging for the release of a few master forgers from prison to work for the OSS. Shunning bureaucracy and convention, the free-wheeling Donovan was able to do things like this not only because it was his nature but also because he had the confidence of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the man who created the OSS by presidential order and appointed him to head it and to whom Donovan reported directly. They tell the story of Donovan, a Republican, bringing a silent pistol invented by his OSS into the Oval Office and firing it, and Roosevelt responding by telling Donovan he was the only Republican he would allow in the Oval Office with a gun.¹⁶

Operating mainly in the European theater, with headquarters in London, the OSS was the nation's first foreign spy agency. President Truman disbanded it on October 1, 1945, just two years before the CIA was created, and as writer William Bleuer points out, "Most of the early leaders and members of the CIA, like Allen Dulles and Richard Helms [even a much later leader, William Casey], cut their covert teeth with the OSS in World War II." An integral part of the OSS's mission of sabotage, espionage, and covert action in enemy territory was to aid in bringing about the death of America's adversaries. Indeed, the pipe-smoking patrician Dulles, from his headquarters in Bern, Switzerland, became famous for his covert work with German military officers plotting the assassination of Hitler. To OSS veterans in the CIA, the "Cold War was [merely] a corollary of the shooting war from the beginning."^{17*}

After the first four paragraphs of the aforementioned National Security Act of 1947, which enumerate the functions of coordinating, evaluating, and disseminating intelligence, paragraph five allows the CIA to perform such “other functions” relating to intelligence and affecting the national security “as the National Security Council† may from time to time direct.” (See expanded discussion on this issue with respect to the Special Group, a National Security Council creation, in the section dealing with whether President Kennedy knew of the CIA’s plan to kill Castro.) And at its first meeting in December of 1947, the National Security Council issued a top-secret directive granting the CIA authority to conduct covert psychological operations, primarily to counter, reduce, and discredit “International Communism” throughout the world in a manner consistent with U.S. foreign and military policies.¹⁸

In December of 1963, President Truman, deeply dismayed over the direction in which the CIA had gone, wrote from his home in Independence, Missouri,

I think it has become necessary to take another look at the purpose and operations of our Central Intelligence Agency—CIA. At least I would like to submit here the original reason why I thought it necessary to organize this agency during my administration...A President’s performance in office is as effective as the...information he gets...The Departments of State, Defense, Commerce, Interior and others are constantly engaged in extensive information gathering...But their collective information reached the President all too frequently in conflicting conclusions. At times, the intelligence reports tended to be slanted to conform to established positions of a given department...Therefore, I decided to set up a special organization charged with the collection of all intelligence reports from every available source, and to have those reports reach me as President without departmental “treatment” or interpretations. I wanted and needed the information in its “natural raw” state...The most important thing about this move was to guard against the chance of intelligence being used to influence or lead the President into unwise decisions...For some time I have been disturbed by the way the CIA has been diverted from its original assignment. It has become an operational and at times a policy-making arm of the government...I never had any thought that when I set up the CIA it would be injected into peacetime cloak-and-dagger operations...This quiet, intelligence arm of the President has been so removed from its intended role that it is being integrated as a symbol of sinister and mysterious foreign intrigue.¹⁹

Since it has been established beyond all doubt that Oswald killed Kennedy, the conspiracy theorists who propound the idea of the CIA being behind Oswald’s act are necessarily starting out in a very deep hole before they even take their first breath of air. This is so because Oswald was a Marxist, and a Marxist being in league with U.S. intelligence just doesn’t ring true. More specifically, why would a passionate pro-Castro follower like Oswald want to join forces with the very U.S. intelligence agency—the CIA—that Oswald knew was behind the Bay of Pigs invasion to overthrow Castro, his hero? The conspiracy theorists realize, of course, the difficulty of knitting these conflicting threads together, and try to get around the problem by saying that Oswald was only “posing as a pro-Castro sympathizer.” In other words, Oswald was really a rightist who was only acting like a leftist. “Oswald’s actual political orientation was extreme right wing,” said New Orleans DA Jim Garrison.

“Oswald would have been more at home with Mein Kampf than Das Kapital.”²⁰ “Oswald was an American agent posing as a Marxist,” says conspiracy theorist James DiEugenio.²¹ But this contention cannot seriously and rationally be made. To believe it, one would have to disbelieve not only all of Oswald’s words, including those uttered when he was only a teenager, but all of his conduct, as well as the impressions (many given under oath) of the considerable number of people who knew Oswald personally and spoke of his being a confirmed and passionate Marxist. In other words, one would have to believe that year in and year out for almost a decade, Oswald was putting on an Academy Award–winning performance, fooling everyone, including his family and wife, by the virtuosity of his acting skills.

In its final report, the HSCA took the Warren Commission to task for what it characterized as a virtual lack of investigation of the CIA, which itself was one of the federal agencies investigating the assassination. “Testifying before the Commission,” the HSCA Report says, “CIA Director John A. McCone indicated that ‘Oswald was not an agent, employee, or informant of the Central Intelligence Agency. The Agency never contacted him, interviewed him, talked with him, or solicited any reports or information from him, or communicated with him directly or in any other manner...Oswald was never associated or connected directly or indirectly in any way whatsoever with the Agency.’ McCone’s testimony was corroborated by Deputy Director Richard M. Helms.”²² Helms had told the Warren Commission, “I had all of our records searched to see if there had been any contacts at any time prior to President Kennedy’s assassination by anyone in the Central Intelligence Agency with Lee Harvey Oswald. We checked our card files and our personnel files and all our records. Now, this check turned out to be negative.”²³

The HSCA Report then goes on to say, “The record reflects that once these assurances had been received, no further efforts were made by the Warren Commission to pursue the matter.”²⁴ But this simply is not true. Although the HSCA can take justifiable credit in investigating the CIA more than the Warren Commission did, the starting point for any investigation of the CIA, and the principal way to investigate it, would be to look at its entire internal file. If the people responsible for preparing the HSCA Report had bothered to read the very next page in the above-quoted joint testimony by McCone and Helms before the Warren Commission, they would have learned that the Warren Commission did, in fact, do this precise thing. Lee Rankin, Warren Commission chief counsel, asked Helms, “Can you tell the Commission as to whether or not you have supplied us all the information the agency has, at least in substance, in regard to Lee Harvey Oswald?”

Mr. Helms: “We have; all.”

Representative Ford: “Has a member of the Commission staff had full access to your files on Lee Harvey Oswald?”

Mr. Helms: “He has, sir.”

Representative Ford: “They have had the opportunity to personally look at the entire file?”

Mr. Helms: “We invited them to come out to our building in Langley and actually put the file on the table so that they could examine it.”

Chairman Warren: “I was personally out there, too, and was offered the same opportunity. I did not avail myself of it because of the time element, but I was offered the same opportunity.”

Mr. Rankin: “Mr. Helms, can you explain, according to the limitations of security, the reasons why we examined materials but did not always take them, in a general way?”

Mr. Helms: “Yes, I can. In our communications between individuals working overseas and in Washington, we for security reasons have a method of hiding the identities of individuals in telegrams and dispatches by the use of pseudonyms and cryptonyms. For this reason, we never allow the original documents to leave our premises. However, on the occasion when the representatives of the Commission staff looked at these files, we sat there and identified these pseudonyms and cryptonyms and related them to the proper names of the individuals concerned, so that they would know exactly what the correspondence said.”

Mr. Rankin: “By that you mean the representatives of the Commission were able to satisfy themselves that they had all the information for the benefit of the Commission without disclosing matters that would be a threat to security; is that right?”

Mr. Helms: “It is my understanding that they were satisfied.”²⁵

When I asked Warren Commission assistant counsel W. David Slawson (whose area of inquiry for the Warren Commission was the possibility of a conspiracy) about the HSCA’s remark that the Warren Commission never went beyond McCone’s and Helms’s assurances, he said, “That’s wrong. Rankin, [William] Coleman, I, and a few other members of the staff went over to CIA Headquarters at Langley, and to the best of my recollection—this was over thirty-five years ago—we looked at the entire CIA file.” (Warren Commission assistant counsel William Coleman told me that he and other members of the Commission staff went over to CIA headquarters “several times” to look at the Oswald file.) He added that although the Warren Commission staff ended up leaving most of the documents pertaining to Oswald in the CIA files, “We did get copies of a substantial number of them.” Slawson said that CIA agent Raymond Rocca, chief of research and analysis for counterintelligence, was assigned as the liaison between the Warren Commission and the CIA, and “whenever we needed anything, he got us what we needed. Rocca was not passive. For instance, he suggested lines of inquiry to us and helped us interpret and contextualize whatever KGB or other foreign intelligence documents came into our possession.”²⁶

It was Slawson’s belief that the CIA was very cooperative with the Warren Commission. The HSCA, after having said in its report that the Warren Commission did not investigate whether the CIA had any association with Oswald, went on later to say, in seeming contradiction, that it “contacted both members of the Warren Commission staff and those representatives of the CIA who played significant roles in providing CIA-generated information to the Commission. The general consensus of these people was that the Commission and the CIA enjoyed a successful working relationship during the course of the Commission’s investigation.”²⁷ Slawson said that an example of CIA cooperation was when he, Coleman, and another assistant counsel, Howard P. Willens, flew to Mexico City to investigate Oswald’s contact with the Cuban consulate and Soviet embassy in April of 1964. He said that David Atlee Phillips, an official at the CIA station in Mexico City, and his number-one assistant (Slawson could not recall his name) took them into their operations room and “showed us everything, how they wiretapped all calls coming into the Soviet Embassy, where they had hidden cameras and listening devices, et cetera. They didn’t hold back anything.”

Slawson said, “I can assure you that if, at any time, we came into possession of any evidence at all that showed any kind of relationship between Oswald and the CIA, or in any way pointed toward CIA complicity in the assassination, we would have vigorously pursued it. But nothing like this ever surfaced.”²⁸ Coleman told me, “We looked at every conspiracy theory out there. We could find nothing to support any of these various theories.”²⁹ association further when, as indicated, the fact that the Commission did is on the very next page of the volume of Warren Commission testimony the HSCA cited, and is also in one of the volumes of the HSCA itself. HSCA volume 11, page 493 speaks of another visit to CIA headquarters, this time by Warren Commission counsel Samuel Stern, on March 25, 1964. "Stern's memorandum of his visit reveals that he reviewed Oswald's file with [Raymond] Rocca." Stern also noted in his memorandum, the HSCA said, that in addition to reviewing Oswald's entire file, "Rocca provided him for his review a computer printout of the references to Oswald-related documents located in the Agency's electronic data storage system. [Stern] stated 'there is no item listed...which we [the Warren Commission] have not been given in either full text or paraphrase.'"

It’s curious the HSCA Report would state that the Commission never pursued the Oswald-CIA

With respect to its own investigation, the HSCA said that "recognizing the special difficulty in investigating a clandestine agency, the committee sought to resolve the issue of Oswald's alleged association with the CIA by conducting an inquiry that went beyond taking statements from two of the Agency's most senior officials." Accordingly, the committee made an effort "to identify circumstances in Oswald's life or in the way his case was handled by the CIA that possibly suggested an intelligence association." It also "undertook an intensive review of the pertinent files, including the CIA's...Oswald file and hundreds of others from the CIA, FBI, Department of State, Department of Defense and other agencies. Based on these file reviews, a series of interviews, depositions and executive session hearings was conducted with both Agency and non-Agency witnesses. The contacts with present and former CIA personnel covered a broad range of individuals, including staff and division chiefs, clandestine case officers, area desk officers, research analysts, secretaries and clerical assistants." The HSCA also pointed out that "each of the present and former Agency employees contacted by the committee was released from his secrecy oath by the CIA."

Quite impressive, right? The conclusion formed from all of this? The HSCA said, "The results of this investigation confirmed the Warren Commission testimony of McCone and Helms...The committee found no evidence of any relationship between Oswald and the CIA."* The HSCA added that "taken in their entirety, the items of circumstantial evidence that the committee had selected for investigation as possibly indicative of an intelligence association [CIA or other] did not support the allegation that Oswald had an intelligence agency relationship."³⁰

Also, contrary to allegations by conspiracy theorists, the HSCA could find no evidence that Oswald "ever received any intelligence training or performed any intelligence assignments during his term of service."³¹ Although Kerry Wendell Thornley, a member of Oswald's unit at El Toro Marine base near Santa Ana, California, testified before the Warren Commission, "Oswald, I believe, had a higher clearance" than confidential, "probably a secret clearance,"³² the HSCA learned that Oswald only had a security clearance of confidential (the lowest) and "never received a higher classification."³³ Oswald's Marine Corps records show that he was "granted final clearance up to and including CONFIDENTIAL."³⁴ While it is true that John Donovan, the officer in charge of Oswald's radar crew in Santa Ana, testified before the Warren Commission that Oswald "must have had secret [above confidential, but below top secret] clearance to work in the Radar Center,"³⁵ the HSCA concluded that Donovan's assumption was incorrect. A review by the HSCA of the U.S. Marine Corps personnel files of four enlisted men who had worked with Oswald in either Japan or

California (Richard Call, Zack Stout, Robert Augg, and Nelson Delgado) revealed that all only had, like Oswald, a security clearance of confidential.³⁶

The CIA (specifically, the Special Investigations Group [SIG] of the CIA's counterintelligence unit) did not open a 201 file (a file kept on an individual, including CIA employees, that brings him into the agency's records system) on Oswald until December 9, 1960, after he had defected to the Soviet Union, and then only after the agency had received a request from the State Department for information on American defectors.³⁷ However, the agency, before December 9, was already receiving information on Oswald from other agencies of the government.³⁸ It had four written communications in 1959 from the State Department pertaining to Oswald's defection to the Soviet Union, the first one dated October 31, 1959, from Moscow, and a fifth communication dated May 25, 1960.³⁹

The CIA told the HSCA that there were "no specified criteria for automatically opening a 201 file on an American."⁴⁰ And when the HSCA reviewed the 201 files of twenty-nine other defectors, eight of whom had 201 files opened before their defection, they found that for only four of the remaining twenty-one the files were opened because of the defection. The files on the seventeen other defectors were opened from four months to several years after the defection. The HSCA said that "at the very least, the committee's review indicated that during 1958–1963, the opening of a [201] file years after a defection was not uncommon. [Oswald's defection to the Soviet Union first came to the attention of American officials in Moscow on October 31, 1959. So his 201 file was opened more than thirteen months later.] In many cases, the event was triggered by some event, independent of the defection, that had drawn attention to the individual involved."⁴¹

The HSCA went on to say that "the existence of a 201 file does not necessarily connote any actual relationship or contact with the CIA." Though not automatic, such a file is normally opened by the CIA when "a person is considered to be of potential intelligence or counterintelligence significance." Oswald's 201 file, the HSCA said, "contained no indication that he had ever had a relationship with the CIA."⁴²

The CIA dossier or 201 file on Oswald after December 9, 1960, and up to November 22, 1963, consisted of twenty-nine documents: seven documents received from the FBI, ten from the Department of State, two from the Department of Navy, one from the Immigration and Naturalization Service, four newspaper clippings, and five internal CIA notes, all of which the CIA turned over to the Warren Commission on March 6, 1964.⁴³ In fact, prior to October 9, 1963, when the Mexico City office of the CIA sent a memorandum to CIA headquarters in Washington, D.C., that an American male identifying himself as Lee Oswald contacted the Soviet embassy in Mexico City, "the Oswald file held by CIA [headquarters] consisted entirely of press materials and disseminations received from the Department of State, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Navy Department."⁴⁴

As indicated, and to the great dismay of the conspiracy community, the HSCA said that from its entire investigation, it found "no evidence" of any relationship that Oswald ever had with the CIA. The committee went on to say, "Moreover, the Agency's investigative efforts prior to the assassination regarding Oswald's presence in Mexico City served to confirm the absence of any relationship with him. Specifically, when apprised of his possible presence in Mexico City, the Agency both initiated internal inquiries concerning his background and, once informed of his Soviet experience, notified other potentially interested Federal agencies of his possible contact with the Soviet Embassy in Mexico City.”⁴⁵

Not only is there no evidence that Oswald had any relationship with the CIA (i.e., no relationship that CIA headquarters was aware of and sanctioning), but as we’ve seen elsewhere in this book, Oswald clearly was not CIA agent or operative material. As John Scelso, chief of clandestine operations for the CIA in the Western Hemisphere at the time of the assassination, put it in sworn testimony before the HSCA,

Oswald was a person of a type who would never have been recruited by the Agency...His personality and background completely disqualified him for clandestine work or for work as an agent to carry out the instructions of the Agency...When the Agency hires an agent, engages someone to do our work and gives him a certain amount of training and places him under our guidance, whether we pay him or not, or whether he signs an agreement or not, he has to meet certain standards. He has to go through a security check, a file check. And the Counter-intelligence Staff has to examine his personality and background and evaluate his reliability...Oswald, by virtue of his background and so on, would miserably fail to meet our minimum qualifications. Oswald would have been debriefed had he walked in and volunteered information, you see. However, he would not have been given any mission to perform. He might have been given instructions, you see, which would tend to neutralize him and make him less of a nuisance and danger than he otherwise would be, like go away and do not contact us any more...Oswald’s whole pattern of life was that of a very badly, emotionally unbalanced young man.⁴⁶

And author Peter Grose points out that in addition to Oswald’s “loose and undisciplined” life, “he stood out from his environment. His strange odyssey [to Russia] only invited questions from all around him. This is not the sort of person that those who build intelligence networks seek for their agents.”⁴⁷

But if the CIA, as an agency, wasn’t involved with Oswald in the assassination, what about the argument by many conspiracy theorists that “rogue elements” or agents within the CIA may have been, and it was they who were behind Oswald and the assassination? The conspiracy community has made this argument ad nauseam, but after well over forty years of investigation, isn’t it fair to ask the conspiracy theorists what evidence they have to support this contention? Of course, not only don’t they have any evidence, but with very few exceptions (e.g., David Atlee Phillips, see later text), they never even tell us just who they believe these rogue agents were. Instead, they can be no more specific than to resort to vague allusions such as “fairly senior or even highly placed...renegade CIA agents,”⁴⁸ or “lower echelons” at the agency,⁴⁹ or “angry...more fanatical rogue agents” at the CIA,⁵⁰ or “a number of aberrant agents” in the CIA.⁵¹ I say this to the conspiracy community: Is that all you people have? *After over forty years of investigation?

With respect to the argument that rogue agents within the CIA were behind Kennedy’s murder, the HSCA said it “attempted to identify [any such] CIA employees” but was unable to do so.⁵² The committee said that in that regard, “an effort was also made to locate a man identified as Maurice Bishop who was said to have been a CIA Officer who had been seen in the company of Lee Harvey Oswald. The effort to find ‘Bishop’ was likewise unsuccessful.”⁵³

The source of the Bishop-Oswald sighting was one Antonio Veciana Blanch, one of the founders of Alpha 66, a militant, anti-Castro exile group. In March of 1976, Veciana told a staff investigator for U.S. Senator Richard S. Schweiker, a member of the Church Committee, that between 1960 and 1973 he had a working relationship in the anti-Castro effort with someone known to him as Maurice Bishop, whom he believed to be a CIA agent. Veciana said that in 1973 Bishop had given him a suitcase containing $253,000 in cash for his services over the years in attempting to assassinate Castro. Two hundred and fifty-three thousand dollars? A quarter of a million dollars? In some kind of balloon payment delivered only at the end of thirteen years of work? Surely a believable story. (What’s particularly laughable about this is that Veciana was Alpha 66’s secretary of finance.) Veciana said that at one of his meetings with Bishop—in Dallas in August or early September of 1963—Lee Harvey Oswald was present. Veciana repeated these claims in testimony before the HSCA in April of 1978.⁵⁴

We know (see Oswald biography) that Veciana could not have met with Oswald and Bishop in Dallas in late August or early September of 1963, because we know Oswald was in New Orleans during this entire period. Moreover, though Veciana claims to have met with Bishop more than a hundred times, he could not point to a single witness to corroborate his association with Bishop, or help HSCA investigators locate Bishop, which they made an intense and unsuccessful effort to do. Coupled with the additional fact that the HSCA felt Veciana “had been less than candid” and waited more than ten years after the assassination to reveal his information, the committee concluded it “could not...credit Veciana’s story of having met with Lee Harvey Oswald.”⁵⁵

HSCA investigator Gaeton Fonzi had been convinced that Bishop was David Atlee Phillips, the head of the Cuba section at the CIA station in Mexico City at the time of the assassination, but when Fonzi arranged for Veciana to see Phillips at the HSCA hearings in Washington, D.C., Veciana said that although there was a “physical similarity,” Phillips was not Bishop. “No. It is not him,” he stated unequivocally.⁵⁶ However, Fonzi remained convinced that “Maurice Bishop was David Atlee Phillips” and that Phillips “played a key role in the conspiracy to assassinate President Kennedy,”⁵⁷ but never provided any evidence to support his accusation.

An investigative journalist and former senior editor of Greater Philadelphia Magazine, Fonzi had long been a conspiracy theorist. Brought in as an HSCA investigator by Richard Sprague, the prominent Philadelphia prosecutor who was the HSCA’s first chief counsel, Fonzi believed that the CIA was complicit in the assassination, and the heart of his belief was that Phillips, using the pseudonym Maurice Bishop, was Oswald’s CIA case officer whom Veciana saw in Dallas in Oswald’s presence. It became a canard that many embraced, often to their considerable detriment. In their 1980 book, Death in Washington, authors Donald Freed and Fred Landis asserted not only that Phillips played a role in the cover-up of the assassination of former Chilean foreign minister Orlando Letelier (along with his aide, Ronni Moffit) in Washington, D.C., in 1976, but also that he used the alias Maurice Bishop in serving as Oswald’s CIA case officer.⁵⁸ Phillips’s 1982 libel lawsuit against the two authors and their publisher was settled in February 1986 with a retraction and an unspecified (but “suitable,” per Phillips) sum of money.⁵⁹

I spent a goodly amount of time preparing Phillips for his testimony in the London docu-trial as a rebuttal witness to Edwin Lopez, the former HSCA investigator who, like Fonzi, suggested CIA complicity in the assassination, and he said the entire Maurice Bishop allegation was “false and crazy.”⁶⁰ But Phillips eventually decided not to testify. The main reason was that he had another libel lawsuit pending against the London Observer for publishing the same Maurice Bishop allegation, and his lawyer felt it would not be advisable for him to get into the same issue, if it came up, at our London trial because opposing counsel in the libel lawsuit might be able to derive some advantage from it. Additionally, though he had told me in an earlier letter, “I am going to depend on you to make it easier for me to avoid...violating my secrecy agreement” with the CIA, he wrote that as a former CIA officer, “I would probably be a lousy witness anyway, because I would have to avoid confirming or denying information” contained in still-classified reports, and “a jury would probably believe I was stonewalling.”⁶¹ On October 7, 1986, attorneys for the London Observer “unreservedly apologized” to Phillips in Britain’s High Court for suggesting he was in any way involved in Kennedy’s assassination, and agreed to pay all his legal expenses and a “substantial” sum in settlement.⁶² On October 12, 1986, the Observer printed its retraction in which it said that “there was never any evidence to support the suggestion” that Phillips knew Oswald.

HSCA officials regretted not only parroting Fonzi’s Maurice Bishop allegation, but also having him as one of their investigators. In the November 1980 issue of the Washingtonian, Fonzi wrote a blistering, inordinately long article (virtually book size at eighty thousand words) about the HSCA, suggesting it was a farce that played “political games.” He continued to allege that Phillips might be Bishop and said that “what the Kennedy assassination still needs is an investigation guided simply, unswervingly, by the priority of truth,” describing Chief Counsel G. Robert Blakey as a mere hired hand whose main objective was to shield government institutions from effective scrutiny and criticism.⁶³

The Washingtonian being a prestigious publication, Blakey and Gary Cornwell, deputy chief counsel to the HSCA, felt it advisable to respond in the Congressional Record. Blakey rued the day he departed from his policy of hiring impartial investigators, saying he kept Fonzi on the staff after Sprague left because “I felt that his obsession [over the CIA’s complicity in the assassination] would help assure that this aspect of the committee’s investigation would receive its due,” adding that committee staff members “derisively referred to [Fonzi] as an ‘Ahab’ and to his quest as a search for ‘Moby Dick.’” Cornwell was no more kind in his denunciation of Fonzi, referring to his “bad faith” and “lost credibility.”⁶⁴ Michael Ewing, a member of the HSCA staff, was so put off by Fonzi’s article in the Washingtonian that he felt obliged to send a personal letter to Phillips himself, saying, “I wouldn’t want you to think that there are many of us who think like Gaeton Fonzi...I would like you to know that Fonzi’s writing does not reflect the views of responsible former members of the Select Committee.”⁶⁵ In an eight-page letter to the editor of the Washingtonian, Ewing said that Fonzi “worked exclusively out of Miami, locating and interviewing Cubans,” and that he “never worked on the Committee in Washington” other than for a short period “during the editing process at the very end of the investigation. I think Fonzi’s nearly total absence from Washington—where, of course, the investigation was planned, directed and concluded—was probably a primary factor behind his embarrassingly misinformed perceptions of how the investigation was conducted.”⁶⁶

Congressman Richardson Preyer of North Carolina, the chairman of the HSCA subcommittee on the JFK assassination, also saw fit to write Phillips on November 19, 1980, to say, “I can understand your concern over the Fonzi article. Mr. Fonzi’s views are not shared by me nor, I think, by the Committee. I believed your testimony and did not find the testimony of Veciana credible.”⁶⁷

One of the main leads on a CIA-Oswald relationship that the HSCA pursued was the allegation of one James B. Wilcott, a finance officer for the CIA from 1957 until 1966. At the time of the assassination, Wilcott was assigned to the CIA station in Tokyo. (Oswald was assigned to the First Marine Air Wing at Atsugi Naval Air Station, about thirty-five miles southwest of Tokyo, in 1957–1958.) Wilcott testified before the committee that the day after the assassination, “there was at least six or seven people, specifically, who said that they either knew or believed Oswald to be an agent of the CIA,” but could only recall the name of one, Jerry Fox, who “at least made some mention of it.” He did name several other fellow workers who made references to Oswald being an agent, but they did so only “in a speculative manner.” Wilcott said, “I didn’t really believe this when I heard it, and I thought it was absurd. Then, as time went on, I began to hear more things in that line.” The main thing, he testified, was an incident “two or three months after the assassination...when a [CIA] case officer came up to my window to draw money and he specifically said... ‘Well, Jim, the money that I drew the last couple of weeks ago or so was money’ either for the Oswald project or for Oswald,” he could not remember which. If we’re to believe Wilcott’s story, the CIA case officer had been drawing money for Oswald or the Oswald project even though Oswald had already been dead for at least a month and a half. Since the CIA is notorious for secrecy, why would a CIA officer share the information that the presidential assassin had been a CIA agent with someone like Wilcott, who merely worked in the finance section? When asked that very question, Wilcott could only say lamely, “I don’t know how to answer that question.”

Wilcott’s story started to quickly unravel when he was unable to identify the case officer who allegedly told him this, and could not recall what the officer told him Oswald’s cryptonym was. Nonetheless, though he had no evidence to support his position, he told the HSCA it was “my belief that [Oswald] was a regular agent and this was a regular project of the Agency to send Oswald to the Soviet Union.” He also believed Marina Oswald was a CIA agent who had been recruited before Oswald’s “phony defection” to the Soviet Union “and was waiting there in Tokyo for Lee Harvey Oswald.”*

When Wilcott was asked, “Were you ever able to find any indication in any of the Tokyo station’s records that Oswald was, in fact, a CIA agent?” he responded, “Well, I never really looked,” even, he said, at his own disbursement records. Wilcott had a ready answer for why he never furnished his allegedly valuable information to the Warren Commission. “I really didn’t think that the Warren Commission was out to really get at the facts,” but he did bother to write an unpublished article on the matter, which he gave to the HSCA.⁶⁸ Wilcott’s credibility suffered even further when an intelligence analyst whom Wilcott said he discussed the Oswald allegation with at the post told the committee he wasn’t in Tokyo at the time of the assassination, the committee verifying that he had been transferred back to the United States in 1962, the previous year. Finally, the committee interviewed many CIA personnel who had been stationed in Tokyo at the time, including the chief of the post and other personnel who surely would have known if Oswald had had any association with the agency in Tokyo, and all had no knowledge of such an association. The HSCA concluded that based on all the evidence, “Wilcott’s allegation was not worthy of belief.”⁶⁹

Another alleged Oswald-CIA link emerged when Gerald Patrick Hemming Jr. told conspiracy author Anthony Summers in 1978 that he was a former Marine sergeant who had been stationed at Atsugi air base in Japan working as a radar control operator shortly before Oswald did. He told Summers that he had been recruited by naval intelligence while there, and that he had met Oswald once at the Cuban consulate in Los Angeles. (At the time, Hemming was reportedly pro-Castro, but later switched sides when he and fellow former marine Frank Sturgis went to Cuba to help Castro in his revolution, and became disenchanted with Castro.) From the questions Oswald asked, Hemming said he got the impression that Oswald was “an informant or some type of agent working for somebody,” and that at Atsugi, Oswald would have been “a prime candidate for recruitment” by some U.S. intelligence agency. Apart from the fact that Hemming doesn’t make the allegation that Oswald was a CIA agent, only that he sensed he was “some type of agent,” Summers acknowledges that “Hemming’s reliability as a source has on occasion been called into question.”⁷⁰

Although it is an article of faith among most conspiracy theorists that the CIA was directly behind or at least somehow involved in the assassination, other than fanciful daydreaming on their part, the likes of Wilcott and Hemming are the only basis for their allegation.

One relationship Oswald had which conspiracy theorists find particularly suspicious and incriminating is his friendship in Dallas with the Russian emigré of purportedly noble pedigree, George de Mohrenschildt. This relationship is discussed in depth earlier in this book, but it should be noted here that virtually all conspiracy theorists postulate that de Mohrenschildt had a very close relationship with the CIA, either as an agent or as some other type of operative, and many suspect he had a hand in the assassination.* But the HSCA thoroughly checked de Mohrenschildt’s background and concluded that there was “no evidence that de Mohrenschildt had ever been an American intelligence agent.” His contact with the agency seemed to be limited to being debriefed several times in Dallas between 1957 and 1961 by J. Walton Moore of the CIA’s Domestic Contact Service. For instance, Moore interviewed de Mohrenschildt following his return from a trip to Yugoslavia in 1957. (De Mohrenschildt went there, under salary with the International Cooperation Agency [ICA] in Washington, D.C., to “help [the ICA] develop oil resources” in Yugoslavia. The HSCA said that Moore “was an overt CIA employee... He was not part of a covert or clandestine operation.”)

Around this time, as the HSCA pointed out, “upon returning from trips abroad, as many as 25,000 Americans annually provided information [about countries they had visited] to the CIA’s Domestic Contacts Division [actually, Domestic Contact Service] on a nonclandestine basis. Such acts of cooperation should not be confused with an actual Agency relationship.”⁷¹ But since a great many conspiracy theorists believe the CIA was behind the assassination, they feel it simply cannot be a benign coincidence that Oswald had a friend who was connected in any way with the CIA.

Speaking of coincidences, as mentioned in the Oswald biography section, what a remarkable coincidence that de Mohrenschildt knew Jackie Kennedy and her mother, Janet Auchincloss. Additionally, as alluded to earlier, de Mohrenschildt, quite a writer of letters, wrote a letter to President Kennedy on February 16, 1963, congratulating Kennedy on his recent goal to try to make the average sedentary American more physically fit. De Mohrenschildt told Kennedy of the long and physically rigorous journey, by foot, that he and his wife had taken in 1961 throughout Latin America, and said that if the “typescript and many photographs” of the journey he offered to send Kennedy impressed him, “I would ask you, Mr. President, for a foreword to my book.” He closed by saying, “By the way, I am an old friend of the Bouvier family and of Mrs. Janet Auchincloss, but I prefer to write to you directly, as ‘getting fit’ seems to be a personal concern of yours. Please accept my sincere wishes of success in all your endeavors. Sincerely yours, George De Mohrenschildt.”*

A man of George de Mohrenschildt’s innate theatricality just had to exit this planet with a bang. His Haitian adventure, intended to put him on easy street like all of his others, had failed, his Haitian Holding Company folding in 1967. George and Jeanne returned to Dallas, where George seemed to be resigned, for the first time in his life, to living a more mundane existence, and took a position as an assistant professor of foreign languages, teaching French at Bishop College, a small black school in South Dallas.⁷² In the early 1970s he started slipping into dementia, Jeanne later saying that he began acting in an “insane manner,” having delusions of persecution. He also attempted suicide and beat her, breaking several of her ribs and damaging several teeth. In November of 1976, she finally got him committed to a state mental institution. But he was released after around three months.⁷³

If George was limiting himself to an ordinary life of teaching with an occasional attempted suicide, someone else wanted to bring him back on stage for one last chance at a prize. NOS Television (a small group of TV and radio stations in the Netherlands) journalist Willem Oltmans, who attended Yale University in 1950, met Marguerite Oswald on an American Airlines flight from New York to Dallas in 1964, and Marguerite succeeded in convincing Oltmans that her son may not have acted alone in the assassination. Back in the Netherlands, when he told a clairvoyant, Gerard Croiset, Marguerite’s story, Croiset said that Oswald had a Dallas friend with the letters sch and de in his name. This man was of noble descent and was a geologist, Croiset said, and it was he, backed by big Texas oil interests, who had been the architect behind Kennedy’s assassination, Oswald being the fall guy. Oltmans returned to Texas, and Marguerite pointed to de Mohrenschildt as Croiset’s mysterious Mr. X. Oltmans eventually hooked up with de Mohrenschildt, and per de Mohrenschildt, they became personal friends and de Mohrenschildt believed he had “convinced” Oltmans that he “had nothing to do whatsoever with the JFK assassination.” Indeed, de Mohrenschildt thought about suing Croiset but said he was probably “broke” anyway. Despite de Mohrenschildt’s denials, Oltmans persisted in trying to get de Mohrenschildt to confess, visiting him and Jeanne every year and hoping for a breakthrough.

According to Oltmans, but not de Mohrenschildt, he got what he wanted in February of 1977 in Dallas. On April 12, 1977, after an appearance on the Good Morning America show that morning where he said Oswald and de Mohrenschildt were involved in a conspiracy to kill Kennedy, Oltmans told the HSCA in executive session all he knew about the de Mohrenschildt story. He testified that when he would visit de Mohrenschildt every year or so in Dallas, the latter was always “a man who wins tennis matches, who is always suntanned, who jogs every morning, who is as healthy as a bull.” But Jeanne de Mohrenschildt told him during one visit in late 1976 that George was in a mental hospital and receiving electric shock treatments, and when Oltmans saw him on February 23, 1977, though he was out of the mental hospital, there was a “total transformation” in him. He was “shaking” and “trembling.” Oltmans said, “I couldn’t believe my eyes. The man had changed drastically.” Oltmans said that de Mohrenschildt took him out to Bishop College. Per Oltmans, de Mohrenschildt proceeded to confide in him that he was “responsible” for what Oswald had done “because I guided him. I instructed him, to set it up.” De Mohrenschildt begged Oltmans to “take me out of the country because they are after me,” they being Jews, the CIA, and FBI. Because of feeling “responsible” for Oswald’s conduct, de Mohrenschildt spoke many times to Oltmans of wanting to kill himself, not wanting to be around when his children learned of his responsibility, and said he had tried to commit suicide several times but had failed.

When Oltmans excitedly called collect from a pay phone in the library at Bishop College to his home office in the Netherlands to report that he had gotten a “confession” in the Kennedy assassination from de Mohrenschildt, he was instructed “to get him at any cost...to the Netherlands.” But de Mohrenschildt suddenly started to waver and it wasn’t until March 1 that the two flew, at NOS’s expense, to New York, stayed overnight at the Waldorf hotel (NOS’s “at any cost”), and then traveled on to London and the Netherlands the next day. In Amsterdam on March 3 and 4, de Mohrenschildt negotiated with the head of Dutch National Television himself, Karl Enklaar, as well as the representative of a book publishing house, on the sale of TV, film, and book rights to his story, all of which, he said, was contained within a manuscript he had left behind in Dallas. The understanding was that NOS would put de Mohrenschildt up in a hotel for a month and be given a staff to help him get the story out quickly.

Just what was that story? What, specifically, were the instructions on the assassination de Mohrenschildt had given Oswald? HSCA counsel Robert Tanenbaum kept pressing Oltmans, who assured Tanenbaum he had nine hours of tape, some on film, of his conversations with de Mohrenschildt, tapes he had somehow neglected to bring with him to the hearing. But he said he had some of his notes of the taped interviews with him. Fine, said Tanenbaum, who wanted to know what his notes said. “What were his instructions?”

“I think that—I don’t know. I guess it was the cross-fire, to round up, you see. He also said that Oswald had many friends among the Cubans.”

Oltmans was full of it. And he was full of it largely because de Mohrenschildt—if he, indeed, told anything at all to Oltmans—was full of it. A can’t give B something that A doesn’t have. But when Tanenbaum kept pressuring him for concrete information, Oltmans reluctantly said de Mohrenschildt had indicated there was more than one gunman, and H. L. Hunt, the Dallas oil man, was apparently somehow involved.

The exasperated HSCA counsel asked Oltmans, “Mr. Oltmans, did he tell you what his instructions were to Oswald?”

“No.”

“Did he tell you what his instructions were from H. L. Hunt, or anyone else?”

“No.” Oltmans, trying to defend himself, said that de Mohrenschildt “talked in question marks—like, ‘Why do you think Oswald wrote to Hunt?’—...and in circles.* He wasn’t on record yet. He was negotiating to go on record” (i.e., apparently de Mohrenschildt was devilishly exploring how much money he could get for selling nothing, or whatever he decided to pull out of his hat). And, Oltmans said, before he could press him for the details (nine hours wasn’t enough?), de Mohrenschildt, no contract yet being signed, “walked out” on him, disappearing right from “under my own nose. So I hadn’t [yet] asked everything I planned to.”

How and when had George disappeared? Oltmans said that George “was a nervous wreck,” and to get a breath of fresh air away from the intense negotiations, George and he drove to Brussels for several days. Early on the afternoon of March 5 at their hotel, the Metropole, George said he wanted to take a walk and would be back “in an hour.” He left with his attaché case and never returned, leaving all of his belongings, even his pipe and keys, behind. In late March, George's Dallas lawyer called Oltmans to inform him George had returned to America and was in South Florida.⁷⁴†

De Mohrenschildt had flown to New York City and taken a Greyhound bus from there to Florida to visit his daughter Alexandra, who was staying at the seaside mansion of Mrs. Nancy Tilton. Mrs. Tilton was the cousin of de Mohrenschildt's first wife, and when the latter abandoned Alexandra shortly after she was born, Mrs. Tilton raised her. Alexandra had lived with Mrs. Tilton off and on all her life and they referred to one another as mother and daughter. De Mohrenschildt had told Oltmans that when he called Alexandra from the Waldorf hotel and told her he was going to the Netherlands, Alexandra had told him, "Papa, come back to Palm Beach. I will save you."⁷⁵

De Mohrenschildt arrived in West Palm Beach on the evening of March 16, 1977, and was picked up by Mrs. Tilton and a friend of Alexandra's, Katherine Loomis. His only baggage was a green attaché case† and a few articles of clothing. He was taken to Mrs. Tilton's home in Manalapan, a town of a few hundred people just south of Palm Beach, where Alexandra was waiting. Between March 16 and March 28, 1969, though having bouts of depression during which he spoke of suicide, he otherwise seemed to enjoy his leisure at the sun-splashed villa facing the sea. He had agreed to be interviewed by writer Edward Epstein in four sessions for a fee of four thousand dollars paid by Reader's Digest. The first session was a short one at the Breakers hotel in Palm Beach on March 28 that basically covered de Mohrenschildt's early life and did not get very much into his relationship with Oswald.⁷⁶

On March 29, after an early-morning breakfast prepared by the cook, a Miss Romanie, de Mohrenschildt took a short walk on the beach, then drove to the Breakers for his second session with Epstein in a car Epstein rented for him. Meanwhile, HSCA investigator Gaeton Fonzi, in Miami, had been apprised by his office in Washington (which had been alerted by Oltmans, who had been in touch with Tanenbaum since February about the story) as to where de Mohrenschildt was staying, so he went to the Tilton residence around 10:00 a.m. to interview de Mohrenschildt. When Alexandra told Fonzi her father was in Palm Beach, he left his card and said he'd call back later in the day. When de Mohrenschildt returned home for lunch and Alexandra told him of the HSCA investigator's visit, he seemed upset by the news but did not appear to be overly fearful. Around 1:30 p.m., after bidding good-bye to his daughter and her friend, Katherine Loomis, who were going shopping, de Mohrenschildt went upstairs to his room, presumably to rest for awhile before returning to the Breakers for the next scheduled session at 4:00 that afternoon. But at roughly 2:15 p.m., he apparently left his room and walked the short distance down the hallway to Mrs. Tilton's room. He removed a double-barrel 20-gauge shotgun from its resting place beside her bed, along with two live 20-gauge shotgun shells from a nightstand beside the bed. He then walked out of the bedroom, entered a small hallway off the main hallway, sat in a chair, placed the barrel of the shotgun in his mouth, and fired it at an upward angle through the roof of his mouth and into his brain.⁷⁷

In the conspiracy community, de Mohrenschildt's suicide shortly after he learned an HSCA investigator was seeking to interview him immediately elevated de Mohrenschildt to a higher position than he already had as a probable conspirator in the assassination of Kennedy, book after book implying a possible connection between the suicide, Oswald, and the CIA's role in Kennedy's murder, suggesting he was murdered.^{78*}

Indeed, if we're to believe HSCA investigator Gaeton Fonzi, the committee's investigation of Kennedy's murder only survived as long as it did "because de Mohrenschildt committed suicide. That basically is why the committee survived.”⁷⁹

Immediately, de Mohrenschildt’s last interview with Epstein assumed major importance to conspiracy theorists. But on the issue of de Mohrenschildt’s contact with Oswald for the CIA, Epstein writes vaguely that de Mohrenschildt said that in late 1961 at a lunchtime meeting with J. Walter Moore to discuss a trip to Central America from which de Mohrenschildt had just returned, “although no specific requests were made by Moore, de Mohrenschildt gathered that he would be appreciative to learn more about this unusual ex-Marine’s activities in Minsk.” He quotes de Mohrenschildt as telling him, “I would never have contacted Oswald in a million years if Moore had not sanctioned it.”⁸⁰ Assuming de Mohrenschildt told Epstein precisely what Epstein said he did, if anything it goes in the exact opposite direction of what the conspiracy theorists believe—that Oswald was a secret CIA operative, and when he killed Kennedy, he was acting at the agency’s behest. Because if Oswald were a CIA operative whom the agency thought so highly of that it had entrusted the assassination to him, why would it ask (and, apparently, vaguely at that) de Mohrenschildt, who wasn’t even a CIA operative, to keep tabs on Oswald?

By far the most reasonable inference is that either de Mohrenschildt, who was delusional and approaching dementia at the time he killed himself, made up or imagined the purported CIA-implied instruction to him,* or even if everything de Mohrenschildt told Epstein was true, it doesn’t connote anything sinister at all. As the HSCA said, Moore’s duties in the Dallas office of the CIA were to gather information from people in the Dallas area who had information on foreign matters.⁸¹ Since de Mohrenschildt was a friend of Oswald’s, and Oswald was a defector to the Soviet Union who had returned to America, Moore would obviously be interested in learning, through de Mohrenschildt, what Oswald had to say about Minsk and Russia. But when de Mohrenschildt testified before the Warren Commission, not only didn’t he suggest that Moore was interested in learning about Oswald’s activities in Minsk, but he thinks he may have asked Moore about Oswald. De Mohrenschildt told the Warren Commission that because Oswald was a defector, he tended to believe that he “asked point-blank [Max] Clark [whose wife was a part of the Russian emigré community in Dallas with de Mohrenschildt] or Walter Moore about Oswald. I probably spoke to both of them about him. My recollection is...that either of them said he is a harmless lunatic.”⁸² However, although Moore said he had interviewed de Mohrenschildt, he told the HSCA that he never spoke to de Mohrenschildt about Oswald.⁸³

When HSCA staff investigator Harold Leap asked Moore if he knew Oswald, Moore replied, “I never met or talked to Lee Harvey Oswald. In fact, I never heard of the name until the day of the assassination.”

Question: “Are you aware that allegations have been made that de Mohrenschildt asked permission of you to contact Lee Harvey Oswald?”

Answer: “Yes, the allegation is not true.”⁸⁴

The Palm Beach County sheriff’s office, which investigated de Mohrenschildt’s death, concluded he died “by his own hand.”⁸⁵ As indicated, the conspiracy theorists find de Mohrenschildt’s suicide highly suspicious (many suspect he was actually murdered), but they don’t go on to say why—they can’t because no conspiratorial inference can be drawn. Neither the Warren Commission nor the HSCA ever considered de Mohrenschildt a suspect in the assassination. Even if they did, why wouldn’t simply telling the truth and denying guilt to an HSCA investigator be preferable to killing oneself? Indeed, even if de Mohrenschildt were guilty, again, why wouldn't lying under oath and denying guilt, which thousands of defendants in criminal cases do every day throughout the land, be preferable to killing oneself? It makes absolutely no sense at all that de Mohrenschildt would "rather die than lie" to an HSCA investigator, even if he was eventually asked to testify under oath. In fact, de Mohrenschildt had already testified under oath about his relationship with Oswald before the Warren Commission in 1964. Even if he were involved in the assassination, which there's absolutely no evidence of, why wouldn't he, in 1977, be willing to simply tell the same story under oath again?

What does make sense (and the conspiracy books don't usually tell their readers this) is that George de Mohrenschildt, age sixty-five at the time of his death, had in recent years, as indicated, become a deeply depressed and mentally unstable individual who wanted to die. The Palm Beach County sheriff's office conducted a fairly thorough investigation of de Mohrenschildt's death, and everyone whom chief investigating officer Thomas Neighbors (a detective for the Palm Beach County sheriff's office) spoke to confirmed that de Mohrenschildt was mentally ill. His investigative report said that Mrs. Tilton recounted that during de Mohrenschildt's stay, "he discussed previous attempts at suicide...[and] expressed feelings of persecution from unspecified Jewish elements, the federal government, and [being] blackmailed by an attorney in Dallas, but she knew that he was suffering from mental illness and depression and she did not lend credence to his fears." His daughter Alexandra told Neighbors that her father had been shadowed with the suspicion among conspiracy theorists that he had been involved in the assassination and that this, along with other personal problems, disturbed him to the point where he had made several previous attempts on his life, was committed briefly to a mental institution, and since his stay in Florida had expressed a desire to commit suicide.

When Neighbors reached de Mohrenschildt's wife, Jeanne, by phone in Los Angeles, she elaborated on his mental condition. He wrote, "She stated that...over the past several years he has been acting in an 'insane manner.' He constantly was in fear of what he termed the 'Jewish Mafia' and the FBI, but she felt his fears were groundless...On November 9, 1976, Mrs. de Mohrenschildt signed commitment papers in Dallas...to have her husband placed in a mental home for treatment [actually, the psychiatric unit at Parkland Memorial Hospital]...In the affidavit she stated that the victim suffered from depression, heard voices, saw visions, and believed that the FBI and 'The Jewish Mafia' were persecuting him." Also, that he "had attempted suicide four times in 1976 by slashing his wrists, trying to drown himself in a bathtub, and twice taking overdoses of medicine." De Mohrenschildt was confined for eight weeks in Parkland, during which time, per his lawyer Pat Russell, he received heavy shock treatment.^{86*}

Neighbors said in his report that shortly before de Mohrenschildt shot himself with Mrs. Tilton's shotgun, "he questioned Mrs. Viisola (the maid) about a scratching sound which apparently annoyed him. He speculated that it was a cat, which there are none in the Tilton residence, and he began to pace up and down the long main hallway, calling for a cat...Mrs. Viisola felt that the visitor was not behaving normally and was, in her own words, slightly mad."⁸⁷

The Palm Beach County sheriff's office was able to determine the precise time of death on March 29, 1977, at 2:21 (and 3 seconds) p.m. because Mrs. Tilton, who was out, was recording a television program and the "gunshot is audible" (per the sheriff's office report) on the tape recorder. There were no "non-television-related sounds on the tape cassette," the report said, to indicate anything other than a suicide.*

Oh yes, in the left pocket of de Mohrenschildt's pants when his body was found was a clipping of a front-page headline about him from the Dallas Morning News dated March 20, 1977 (nine days earlier), captioned "Mental Ills of Oswald Confidant Told."⁸⁸ Apparently de Mohrenschildt's mental problems went way back. For instance, as noted earlier, Mrs. Igor Vladimir Voshinin, a member of the Russian emigré community in Dallas who knew de Mohrenschildt well, told the Warren Commission back in 1964 that "he was a neurotic person. He had some sort of headaches and sometimes he would flare into a rage absolutely for no reason at all practically...He complained to me several times that he could not concentrate very well."⁸⁹

Along with all his other demons, according to one of his friends, Samuel B. Ballen, who had dinner in Dallas with de Mohrenschildt shortly before he died, de Mohrenschildt was "beating himself pretty hard" with guilt over the assassination. He knew Oswald had liked and looked up to him, and wondered whether something he had done or said, something "childish" and "sophomoric" on his part, might have nudged Oswald over the edge in the direction he ultimately took. Ballen felt depressed over his meeting with de Mohrenschildt, later recalling that for all of his friend's frailties, the greatest of which was his "utter irresponsibility," George, he believed, was "one of the world's great people," and looking back, felt he had been dining with "Hemingway before the suicide."⁹⁰

Both the HSCA and the Warren Commission took a more than casual interest in de Mohrenschildt to determine if he was an intelligence agent with a possible connection to the assassination, the latter question being the whole point of the exercise. The HSCA never got around to addressing itself to this ultimate point of its inquiry, but it did so indirectly by concluding it had found "no evidence that de Mohrenschildt had ever been an American intelligence agent."⁹¹ And nothing in its report or volumes suggests he was acting at the behest of any foreign country in his association with Oswald. The Warren Commission said its investigation had not produced "any evidence linking [de Mohrenschildt] in any way with the assassination of President Kennedy."⁹²

The effort by the conspiracy theorists to connect Oswald to the CIA is so intense that one conspiracy author, John Newman, actually managed to devote 612 pages to the task. In Oswald and the CIA, Newman, a former military intelligence officer, reads between the lines and the grammatical contours of hundreds of documents (CIA, FBI, Department of State, etc.) and finds "peculiar," "strange," "unusual," and "intriguing" entries and omissions everywhere concerning Oswald, from which he constructs one anemic inference upon another. His book reminds me of the story about two psychiatrists who pass each other on the street one day and when one says, "Good morning," the other mutters to himself, "I wonder what he meant by that?" After taking his readers on a guided "journey through the labyrinth" of intelligence documents and files on Oswald, Newman, despite the presumptuous title of his book, comes up completely empty-handed.⁹³ If any reader can find in Newman's book any evidence that Oswald was a CIA agent or operative, or even that he, at any time, talked to or communicated with a member of the CIA, on the street, over the phone, by carrier pigeon, or in any other way, please let me know.

I have a very important suggested area of research for Mr. Newman and other members of the conspiracy community. If Oswald was a CIA operative—indeed, if he killed Kennedy for the CIA—I would imagine he would have been paid handsomely by his employers. Even if he wasn't, we certainly can assume he was not working for free. Yet we know that Oswald always was very low on money, leaving behind for his wife and two children the grand total of $183.87. We also know from his 1962 federal income tax returns (Oswald was in Russia in 1960 and 1961) that his declared income was $1,354.06.⁹⁴ Granted, he would not declare money given to him from the CIA to kill Kennedy, but the question for researchers is, What did Oswald do with his CIA (or FBI, KGB, mob, etc.) money? Although he didn't have to draw attention to himself by flaunting it on luxuries, wouldn't he have at least used it to pay for a normal, regular room for himself instead of living in a virtual closet on North Beckley? So what did Oswald do with his CIA money? Where is there one tiny piece of evidence that Oswald lived, in any way at all, above his means?

Though if Oswald had been a CIA agent or operative, we could probably expect the CIA to deny this fact, what follows are brief excerpts from the CIA's 1963 report on its awareness of Oswald prior to the assassination. It should be noted that after almost forty-four years of investigation and searching by conspiracy theorists for contrary evidence, nothing has ever surfaced to rebut these assertions by the CIA:

Lee Oswald defected to the Soviet Union in October 1959... Since Oswald was a former Marine and a U.S. citizen, his defection was of primary interest to the State Department, the FBI, and the Navy Department. CIA does not investigate U.S. citizens abroad unless we are specifically requested to do so by some other Government Security agency. No such request was made in this case... During the 2½ year period that Oswald was in the Soviet Union, CIA had no sources in a position to report on his activities or what the KGB might be doing with him. The good Soviet sources we had were engaged in reporting on other important matters, and they were not directed to check on U.S. defectors like Oswald... It was suspected that Oswald and all other similar defectors were in the hands of the KGB and carefully watched by them, so any casual operation to learn their whereabouts or activities would have been highly dangerous and probably unsuccessful... To sum up our interest in Lee Oswald before he visited Mexico, we knew he was a U.S. defector to the Soviet Union, we read the FBI reports on him, we watched as the State Department did its job of screening him for repatriation, and we knew the FBI was keeping track of him in the U.S.A. As a footnote, it should be added that we were not even aware of the existence of Jack Ruby, the Dallas nightclub owner who later shot Oswald. We had a few Rubys in our files, but none were Jack Ruby. On 9 October 1963, our Mexico City Station received information from a very sensitive source indicating that Lee Oswald had been in contact with the Soviet Embassy there on 1 October... It appeared that he had visited the Embassy as early as 28 September 1963... The name Lee Oswald meant nothing to our Mexico City Station, but our Headquarters in Washington checked its files and when we disseminated the report on 10 October 1963 to the FBI, the State Department, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, and the Navy Department, we commented in the report that he might be identical with the former Marine who had defected to the Soviet Union in 1959.⁹⁵

To repeat, because it warrants being repeated, after over four decades of painstaking scrutiny by literally thousands of conspiracy-minded researchers in this country as well as around the world, no one has come up with any evidence to contravene anything set forth in this simple CIA report of December 20, 1963, a little less than one month after the assassination.

Vladimir Semichastny was the director of the KGB during Oswald's time in Russia. The KGB surveilled Oswald and quickly learned, Semichastny said, that he was a "mediocre, uninteresting, useless man." He said it best about Oswald's alleged connection to the CIA: "I had always respected the CIA and FBI, and we knew their work and what they were capable of. It was clear that Oswald was not an agent, couldn't be an agent, for the CIA or FBI."⁹⁶

In addition to conspiracy theorists being unable to find any evidence of Oswald killing Kennedy for the CIA, four national investigative commissions or committees found no CIA involvement in Kennedy's death. The Warren Commission concluded that Oswald acted alone and he was not an agent of the CIA.⁹⁷ The HSCA also searched and searched and could find "no evidence of any relationship between Oswald and the CIA."⁹⁸ Apart from finding no connection between the CIA and Oswald, the committee likewise (even assuming for the sake of argument that Oswald was not the assassin) could find no connection between the CIA and the assassination itself.* And it should not be forgotten that the HSCA had every reason to want to uncover such a CIA conspiracy. Not only would it be doing its job, it would also receive a great deal of praise, even adulation, from the American people. And the HSCA was particularly predisposed to wanting to find evidence of CIA (or FBI, Secret Service, etc.) complicity since it desperately needed (but never got) any proof to support its ultimate conclusion of a conspiracy. All the committee had was the eventually discredited "fourth bullet" from the acoustic analysis, nothing else. But after a very intensive investigation of the CIA, the HSCA concluded that the CIA was "not involved in the assassination."⁹⁹

Two other national bodies investigated possible CIA involvement in the assassination of President Kennedy. Going beyond the mandate of the executive order signed by President Gerald Ford on January 4, 1975, to "determine whether any domestic CIA activities exceeded the Agency's statutory authority," the so-called Rockefeller Commission (formally, "Commission on CIA Activities within the United States"), named after its chairman, Vice President Nelson A. Rockefeller, investigated whether the CIA was involved in the assassination of JFK. In addition to Rockefeller himself, the members of the Commission included distinguished Americans such as C. Douglas Dillon, former secretary of the Treasury; Lane Kirkland, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO; former California governor Ronald Reagan; Erwin N. Griswold, former U.S. solicitor general and former dean of Harvard Law School; and Lyman L. Lemnitzer, former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. David W. Belin, a former assistant Warren Commission counsel, was the executive director, and a staff of nine attorneys with substantial investigative experience was recruited. President Ford directed the CIA and other federal agencies to cooperate with the commission. The commission wrote that "much of the evidence [it] examined has come from CIA files and personnel. But the Commission has sought wherever possible to verify the evidence independently." After five months of investigation, in its June 6, 1975, report to President Ford, the commission said that "numerous allegations have been made that the CIA participated in the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. The Commission staff investigated these allegations. On the basis of the staff's investigation, the Commission concluded there was no credible evidence of any CIA involvement" in the assassination of President Kennedy.¹⁰⁰

Finally, the U.S. Senate's 1975–1976 Church Committee, though highly critical of the CIA's plots to assassinate Castro and the CIA's concealing this information from the Warren Commission, said its investigation had not “uncovered evidence” of CIA complicity in Kennedy’s assassination.¹⁰¹

It is very noteworthy that the only books written that suggest the CIA was behind the assassination are those by conspiracy theorists, who are convinced that a conspiracy was behind the assassination whether or not the CIA was involved. On the other hand, a considerable number of books have been written about the CIA and its history, warts and all, and not one of their authors, even though they had every ethical, professional (Pulitzer Prize, esteem of peers, etc.), and commercial reason to expose the CIA, or rogue elements thereof, as being behind the assassination, found the need to devote more than a paragraph or two in their long books to Lee Harvey Oswald and the assassination. (Where there are more than a few paragraphs, the discussion usually concerns Yuriy Nosenko’s information about Oswald that divided the CIA over Nosenko’s bona fides—see KGB conspiracy section later in text.) What does that tell you? It can only tell you one thing. They never wrote anything about the CIA’s alleged connection to the assassination because in their minds there simply was nothing substantive and credible to write about. And this dismissal, by omission, of the allegation of CIA complicity in the assassination (which, if true, would be far and away the most important part of their book) reflects their obviously considered assessment that such an allegation is so groundless it deserved none of their ink.

Indeed, as I have alluded to elsewhere in this book, the very thought of CIA officials (or rogue elements) sitting around the table at CIA headquarters or elsewhere actually plotting to murder the president of the United States belongs, if anywhere, in a Robert Ludlum novel. For those who may not know—people oftentimes refer to a particular true-crime book as a novel—novels are fiction, not nonfiction.

FBI

The other federal intelligence agency that many conspiracy theorists have sought to implicate in the assassination is the FBI, the main villain being J. Edgar Hoover, its longtime director. Born in Washington, D.C., on New Year's Day in 1895 of American, British, German, and Swiss stock, Hoover graduated from George Washington University's nighttime school of law in 1916, passed the bar, and was admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in 1917. In July of that same year, he started working for the Department of Justice as a clerk in the files division, earning an annual salary of $990. The Department of Justice remained his only employer for fifty-five years, Hoover dying while still in office in 1972. Today, FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C., are in the J. Edgar Hoover Building, which was dedicated on September 30, 1979.

It is often said that Hoover, in 1924, became the first director of the FBI. This is not completely accurate. The first criminal investigative division in the Department of Justice was created on July 1, 1908, and informally called the Special Agent Force. It consisted of thirty-five investigators under the command of a "chief examiner," Stanley W. Finch. The head of the Justice Department, Charles J. Bonaparte (a grandnephew of Napoleon Bonaparte), formalized this arrangement by issuing an order on July 26, 1908, and the FBI considers that day as the date of its birth. So technically, Finch was the first director of what eventually became known as the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The Special Agent Force was named the Bureau of Investigation on March 16, 1909. Finch was succeeded by A. Bruce Bielaski in 1912, William J. Flynn in 1919, and William J. Burns in 1921. Hoover, who had become an assistant director of the Bureau of Investigation, was appointed director, at the age of only twenty-nine, on May 10, 1924. The Bureau of Investigation was renamed the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) on March 22, 1935.¹

Though, on the operational charts, it is under the jurisdiction of the attorney general in the Department of Justice, through practice and tradition the FBI, particularly during the Hoover years, has had "a very large measure of autonomy in their operations."²

The conspiracy theorists who maintain that the FBI was behind the assassination say that the bureau "could not do its job [investigating the assassination] because its leader at the time of the assassination, J. Edgar Hoover, participated in the conspiracy."³ In other words, how can you possibly trust members of the conspiracy to investigate their own conspiracy? Unfortunately, there is not a shred of evidence to support this wild allegation.

The suspicion that the FBI may have been involved in the assassination stemmed in part from the early revelation that the FBI had interviewed Oswald in New Orleans and Dallas before the assassination, and the finding of Agent Hosty's name, contact information, and license plate number in Oswald's address book. Both of these matters are discussed elsewhere in this book and provide no basis whatsoever for the inference of FBI complicity. But what immediately caused concern and anxiety, particularly with the Warren Commission, was the rumor that Oswald had been a paid FBI informant. This rumor started, tentatively, just two weeks after Kennedy's death, in a December 8, 1963, article in the Philadelphia Inquirer by reporter Joseph Goulden in which he referred to "the FBI attempt to recruit Oswald as an informant." Goulden said his unnamed source "did not know if the FBI succeeded in hiring Oswald.” But two articles appearing shortly thereafter stated that the bureau had succeeded, officially starting the rumor. The first was a January 1, 1964, article in the Houston Post by Alonzo (Lonnie) Hudkins in which Hudkins said his (again) unnamed source told him that Oswald had been assigned informant number S179 and was on the FBI payroll receiving $200 per month at the time of the assassination.* Hudkins’s article created such a storm that at 5:30 p.m. on January 22, just two days after the Warren Commission first met with its staff, Chairman Warren hurriedly called the members of the Commission into emergency session to inform them that General Counsel Rankin had received a telephone call earlier in the day from Waggoner Carr, the attorney general of Texas, in which he informed Rankin of the rumor circulating in Dallas and seemingly embraced the rumor as possibly being true.⁴

Who was Hudkins’s unnamed source who started the rumor? What follows here is a series of denials and contradictions (unavoidably difficult reading) that make the answer to this question impossible at this time. When Secret Service agent Lane Bertram interviewed Hudkins on December 17, 1963 (pursuant to a phone call by Hudkins to the Dallas office of the Secret Service the previous day), Hudkins said that his source was Allan Sweatt, chief of the Criminal Division of the Dallas sheriff’s office. Sweatt, he said, had told him it was his “opinion” that Oswald was a paid FBI informant,⁵ though Sweatt’s saying it was only his opinion is inconsistent with the details he allegedly gave Hudkins of Oswald receiving $200 per month and having an informant number of “S172” (not 179).

On February 8, 1964, Hudkins elaborated on his story to the FBI, telling Agents Vincent Drain and James Wood that his original belief that Oswald was an FBI informant started when Dallas assistant district attorney William Alexander told him that in Oswald’s notebook, taken from his apartment on the afternoon of the assassination, there appeared the name of FBI agent James Hosty, Hosty’s office and home telephone numbers, and the license plate number on Hosty’s car. He coupled this information with what Oswald’s mother, Marguerite, had told him in an interview, that she believed her son had been doing important subversive work for the government. He said that subsequently a Dallas official not working for the federal government had told him Oswald was on the payroll of either the FBI or the CIA, with “voucher number 179” (not 172), and received no less than $150 nor more than $225 per month. The Dallas official presumably was Sweatt, though the details given to the FBI were slightly different from what Hudkins told the Secret Service. Hudkins refused to disclose the identity of the Dallas official to the FBI or to furnish a signed statement.⁶

Earlier (January 25, 1964), however, Alexander told the FBI that Hudkins had come to him sometime in December saying he was working on a really good story trying to prove Oswald was a paid informant for the FBI or CIA, Hudkins saying he had received information that Oswald’s address book had Hosty’s name and telephone number in it as well as possibly the license plate number of his car. Alexander, who already knew this, told Hudkins, “It looks like you have the story there,” suggesting to Hudkins that his information was correct. Alexander also said that after a bond hearing for Ruby on January 21, while reporters were standing around outside the courtroom waiting for a ruling from the judge, he heard a number of them talking about the possibility that Oswald was a counterspy for the FBI or CIA and also remembered hearing one reporter—he didn’t know who—talking about Oswald receiving $200 a month from one of these federal agencies beginning in September of 1962 and his payroll voucher number being 179.⁷ When the FBI reinterviewed Alexander on February 13, he reiterated his story and vigorously denied he was the source of the rumor when the special agents told him that their investigation “strongly implied that he was.”⁸

It would have been nice if Allan Sweatt, whom Hudkins originally said he received his information from, had cleared up the matter, but he simply muddied it further. On the evening of January 24, 1964, the Secret Service informed a member of the Warren Commission staff that Sweatt had been interviewed and stated he received his information about the allegation and details of Oswald’s paid informant status from Alexander and Hudkins. And Secret Service inspector Thomas J. Kelley expressed his view that Hudkins “was not very reliable,” based on previous unfounded reports which he had furnished to the Secret Service.⁹

In Hudkins’s testimony before the Church Committee in 1975, his vague and incoherent answers were only exceeded by the inept questioning of a Church Committee staff member. In bits and pieces, Hudkins claimed that he did not receive information from Sweatt about Oswald receiving $200 a month from the FBI and having an informant number of S172. In one of the very few good questions asked, staff counsel queried Hudkins as to why Secret Service agent Lane Bertram would state, in his report, that Hudkins had told him this if Hudkins hadn’t? Hudkins responded, “I would like to ask Lane [Bertram] that myself...All of his [Bertram’s] stuff was obviously to my mind routed through the FBI...It had to come from the FBI.” So according to Hudkins, FBI agents made up the story that Oswald, the accused presidential assassin, had been a paid FBI informant. Well, they’d certainly have a great motive to make up such a story—to implicate themselves in Kennedy’s murder.

Hudkins also denied telling the FBI on February 8 or any other time about believing Oswald was an FBI or CIA informant with voucher number 179 who received between $150 and $225 per month. So apparently the FBI report by Special Agents Drain and Wood was also a fabricated, untruthful report. The true story, Hudkins said, is that he admitted to Drain the previous month that he, Dallas Morning News reporter Hugh Aynesworth, and Assistant DA Bill Alexander, during a conference call, presumably on another matter, decided to concoct the story that Oswald was a paid informant for the FBI with a payroll number of S172 or S179 (he said they never discussed the amount of money Oswald was paid each month) so they could test whether their phones were being tapped by the FBI. When Church Committee staff member William Wallach mentioned that Alexander hadn’t told Chief Justice Warren and General Counsel Rankin this when he, DA Henry Wade, and Texas attorney general Waggoner Carr met with them in Washington on January 24, 1964, Hudkins said, “Knowing Bill Alexander, he wasn’t lying to them. He just wasn’t telling them all the information [he knew].”¹⁰

When the HSCA interviewed Hudkins in 1978, he said that he and Aynesworth (he never mentioned Alexander this time) decided to test their suspicion that they were under FBI surveillance by discussing over the telephone a fabricated FBI payroll number for Oswald. He said they discussed the numbers S172 and S179. According to Hudkins he was soon contacted by the FBI to find out what he knew about Oswald’s alleged informant status. He said that in his January 1, 1964, article for the Houston Post on the Oswald informant allegation, he merely quoted what others had said. It consisted of “wondering aloud” rather than having any evidence, adding that he did not know whether Oswald was an FBI informant.^{11*}

When I called Aynesworth about all of this, he chuckled and said, “Lonnie made up the whole story,” though he said there was a kernel of truth to it. Aynesworth, who later became a Newsweek correspondent, told me, “Lonnie was a nice, friendly, likable guy, but he had a habit of making up stories.” That’s why, Aynesworth said, Hudkins had ended up losing jobs at papers. (He had been with the Dallas Morning News, then Houston Post, the Baltimore News-American, then some paper up in Buffalo, all before Aynesworth lost track of him in the late 1970s. In his testimony before the Church Committee in November of 1975, Hudkins listed eleven media employers in his career to that point.) Aynesworth said that since he was the lead reporter on the Kennedy assassination for the paper of record on the case, the Dallas Morning News, “All leads on the case came across my desk. During the week following the assassination, I was working very hard on my account of Oswald’s escape route, and Lonnie was calling me constantly for leads. On one of his calls, he said he had a hunch that Oswald was a paid informant for the FBI. He asked me to check and see what I could find. The next time Lonnie called I got a number, S172, off my desk—with all the papers and reports on my desk there were always a lot of numbers and I can’t remember at all where I got the number—and gave Lonnie the number just to get rid of him more than anything else. So I made up this number, and the next thing you know Lonnie wrote his big story in the Houston Post saying the number was S179, and Oswald was paid $200 a month. There’s nothing to this Oswald FBI informant story. And as far as Lonnie and I testing our suspicions that we were under FBI surveillance by the two of us making up the number and talking about it over the phone, that’s not true at all, although there was a period, when I later got a hold of Oswald’s diary before anyone else, that I believe the FBI was tapping my number.”¹²

Since Aynesworth has acknowledged that he was the source of the FBI informant number (which Hudkins changed by seven digits), the allegation that Bill Alexander, DA Henry Wade’s chief assistant, was a party to making the informant story up, falls. When I called Alexander anyway for his comments on the allegation, his recollection of the incident was that “Lonnie [Hudkins] and one or two of his fellow reporters covering the assassination got the idea—I don’t know from where—that maybe Oswald was an FBI informant. Hudkins told me, or maybe it was one of the other reporters involved, I forget, that to flush out the FBI, they made up a bogus FBI informant number for Oswald, and one of them called the FBI and asked whether this number belonged to Oswald, hoping that in the process they might find out if, in fact, Oswald was an informant. They got nowhere. I heard it said that I was one of the ones who had dreamed up this whole Oswald FBI informant story, but that’s not true. I was told about it. I didn’t do anything.” Alexander said he was never party to any telephone conference call with Hudkins and Aynesworth in which it was decided to come up with the phony informant story.

When I asked Alexander if he called the FBI to let the bureau know it was a phony story, Alexander, no fan of the FBI because of what he believes is its lack of cooperation with local law enforcement, said no. “I thought it was a funny story, but I decided to let them [FBI] find out on their own it was all bull——.” However, the Warren Commission took the rumor very seriously, and Alexander said that on January 23, 1964, he, Henry Wade, and Texas attorney general Waggoner Carr were summoned back to Washington, where they met the following day with Warren, Rankin, and another person whom Alexander can’t recall. Alexander said Wade knew nothing about the matter and all Carr knew was someone calling him on the phone and telling him about the rumor. Alexander said he didn’t want to hurt Hudkins and his fellow reporters, who were “nice guys and hadn’t really hurt anyone by their prank,” but he also “didn’t want to mislead the Warren Commission,” so he told them it was common knowledge among the media covering the case in Dallas that the story about Oswald’s informant number and wages of $200 per month from the FBI was false and trumped up by some reporters to flush the FBI out, but he doesn’t think he mentioned Hudkins’s name.¹³

There is no transcript or recording of the informal January 24, 1964, meeting in Washington, but

Rankin, who was present at the meeting, never said in his memorandum to the files subsequent to the meeting that anyone in the Texas contingent (which included Carr's assistants, Leon Jaworski and Dean Storey) had said the rumor was false and trumped up. However, Rankin did say that Alexander and Wade "both indicated that they would not vouch for the integrity or accuracy" of the reporters who were promulgating the story.¹⁴

District Attorney Henry Wade, in his testimony before the Warren Commission, said he had heard the rumor that Oswald was an FBI informant but had no knowledge of its veracity, and added that "Alexander mentioned it some, but Alexander is not a great lover of the FBI. They fuss all the time openly."¹⁵

Whatever the illegitimate birth of the rumor, it has led a robust life among conspiracy theorists, despite the fact that there is no evidence to support it. The Warren Commission took the testimony of FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, Assistant to the Director Alan H. Belmont, FBI agents John W. Fain and John L. Quigley (who interviewed Oswald in Fort Worth upon his return from Russia), and FBI agent James P. Hosty, people who would have knowledge of Oswald's informant status if it were true. "All declared, in substance," the Commission said, "that Oswald was not an informant or agent of the FBI, that he did not act in any other capacity for the FBI, and no attempt was made to recruit him in any capacity... This [position was] corroborated by the Commission's independent review of the Bureau files dealing with the Oswald investigation."^{16*} Among other evidence under penalty of perjury, on February 6, 1964, Hoover gave a sworn affidavit to the Warren Commission that he "caused a search to be made of the records of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Department of Justice, by employees of the said Bureau of Investigation acting under his direction, and that said search discloses that Lee Harvey Oswald was never an informant of the FBI, was never assigned a symbol number in that capacity, and was never paid any amount of money by the FBI in any regard. Such a statement can be made authoritatively and without equivocation because of the close supervision FBI Headquarters affords its security informant program and because of the safeguards established to ensure against any abuse or misuse of the program."¹⁷ And on February 12, 1964, Hoover sent to Rankin nine additional affidavits from each FBI agent who had any direct contact with Oswald (e.g., Hosty, Fain) or would have had any indirect contact with him if he had been a paid informant (e.g., J. Gordon Shanklin, special agent in charge of the Dallas FBI office, who would have had to "authorize and approve of any payment to confidential informants"), all attesting under penalty of perjury that Oswald was not an FBI informant.¹⁸ The HSCA likewise conducted an investigation of the issue and "found no credible evidence that Oswald was an FBI informant."¹⁹

When, in analyzing an allegation (here, the Oswald FBI informant story), you find that you're spending most of your time not in trying to determine if it's the truth, since you know it's a lie, but who (here, Hudkins, Alexander, Sweatt, Aynesworth, etc.) is telling the truth about the lie, then it's time to move on to another subject.

Apart from the rumor that Oswald was a paid informant for the FBI, the belief has persisted among some conspiracy theorists that Oswald worked for the FBI in some never-disclosed capacity, and eventually killed Kennedy as a hit man for the FBI. But no one has ever offered any evidence to support this allegation, and the reason, obviously, is that none exists. The notion of Oswald working for the FBI produced a rather humorous exchange between Warren Commission members Allen Dulles and John McCloy at an executive session of the Commission on January 27, 1964:

Dulles, to the Commission at large: "This fellow [Oswald] was so incompetent that he was not the kind of fellow that Hoover would hire...Hoover didn't hire this kind of stupid fellow."

McCloy: "I wouldn't put much confidence in the intelligence of all the agents I have run into. I have run into some awfully stupid agents."

Dulles: "Not this irresponsible."

McCloy: "Well, I can't say I have run into a fellow comparable to Oswald but I have run into some very limited mentalities both in the CIA and the FBI. (Laughter)"²⁰

Besides the informant allegation, other alleged specific associations between Oswald and the FBI have surfaced throughout the years. One that has received some attention is the allegation of one Orest Pena, a member of an anti-Castro group, the Cuban Revolutionary Council, who operated a New Orleans bar, the Habana Bar and Lounge. On national television (CBS) in 1975, Pena claimed for the first time that he had seen Oswald with FBI agent Warren de Brueys "numerous times" in New Orleans, and that before he, Pena, testified before the Warren Commission in 1964, de Brueys threatened him physically not to reveal this information.²¹ Pena repeated the allegation of de Brueys's threat in his 1978 deposition before the HSCA, saying de Brueys told him "that if I talk about him [before the Warren Commission] he will get rid of my ass." Pena added that the Warren Commission counsel who took his testimony in 1964, Wesley J. Liebeler, did not let him talk freely, so he decided to "keep my mouth shut." So if we're to believe Pena, not only de Brueys, but also Liebeler was an accessory after the fact to the murder of Kennedy, trying to suppress the truth. No one has insulted Liebeler by asking him if he prevented Pena from talking freely (his Warren Commission testimony consumed seventeen pages in the volumes, about thirty pages of transcript, in which Pena gives many long and free-flowing answers), but de Brueys, in his deposition before the HSCA, categorically denied ever threatening Pena to not tell the truth in his Warren Commission testimony.²²

How did Pena know de Brueys? Pena told the HSCA that he had been an FBI informant and "Warren C. de Brueys was the FBI agent assigned to me." Although de Brueys also denied this, it's more a matter of semantics than disagreement in that de Brueys acknowledged that since Pena was a bar owner, he was an occasional source of information for him, but there was no systematic reporting relationship. The HSCA found that FBI records confirmed that Pena was not an FBI informant for de Brueys or any other agent.²³

On the matter of seeing de Brueys with Oswald "numerous times" in New Orleans, Pena backed down in his HSCA testimony. Pena testified that he used to see Oswald "go to the restaurant [Greek restaurant on Decatur Street in New Orleans] in the morning with other federal agents from the Customs House Building," that he saw de Brueys at the restaurant "at the same time," and that he saw Oswald, de Brueys, and several other federal agents leaving the restaurant together and going back to the Customs House Building. When he was specifically asked if he ever observed "Oswald and de Brueys speaking to each other," Pena responded, "I cannot answer that question. If I cannot prove myself what de Brueys did to me, how am I going to prove other things?"

Question: "My question is, Mr. Pena, do you recall ever seeing Oswald and de Brueys speaking together or acting in such a way that you would think that they knew each other?"

Answer: "I believe they knew each other very, very well."

Question: "Can you explain why you believe Oswald and de Brueys knew each other very well?”

Pena answered unresponsively and unintelligibly that “my belief, I would have to report in as informant to Mr. de Brueys. I have to report myself to Mr. de Brueys and that is my point of view on that question.” He then immediately added what appeared to be the main reason for his belief that Oswald and de Brueys knew each other: “When Oswald was transferred to Dallas, Mr. Warren de Brueys was transferred to Dallas, Texas, at the same time.” He said he was “very, very, very sure” this was “before the assassination.”²⁴

De Brueys testified that it was “an unmitigated lie” that he knew Oswald or that Oswald was an FBI informant for him. “It has no basis whatsoever in fact.” He added he never even met Oswald, and never “knowingly” spoke to him over the phone, explaining that people can call “under pretension.” And the HSCA confirmed that de Brueys was sent to Dallas on temporary assignment to aid in the investigation the day after the assassination, and remained there until January 24, 1964.²⁵ Further, Dallas FBI agent Jim Hosty, who was de Brueys’s partner in Dallas in the post-assassination investigation, told me de Brueys “arrived in Dallas from New Orleans the day after the assassination.”

Pena’s bartender at his place, Evaristo Rodriguez, had testified before the Warren Commission that a few days before or after Oswald’s August 9, 1963, confrontation on the street with Carlos Bringuier, whom Rodriguez knew, Oswald came into his bar in the early morning hours with a Latin man (“He could have been a Mexican; he could have been a Cuban”), that Oswald “was drunk” (a very unlikely condition for Oswald), and although Oswald’s companion had ordered a tequila, Oswald asked for a lemonade—a drink, Rodriguez said, they didn’t serve in the bar. Rodriguez asked Pena what to do and Pena said to take a little of the lemon flavoring and squirt in some water.²⁶ Even assuming Rodriguez’s identification of Oswald was accurate (the time, “between 2:30 and 3:00 o’clock in the morning,” and the man being “drunk” do not sound like Oswald, but the man protesting the price of the lemonade, twenty-five cents, as being too high and accusing the owner of the bar, therefore, of being a “capitalist” does), and that he did not make it up, or that he was not one of the great many people after the assassination who were convinced they had seen Oswald somewhere when we know they could not have, the point is that when Orest Pena was called to the stand after Rodriguez and asked if he, Pena, ever saw Oswald at any time other than that alleged night in Pena’s bar when Oswald ordered a lemonade, he answered, “No, I didn’t...I saw him once,” the time at his bar.²⁷ This, of course, flatly contradicts his statement on CBS eleven years later and his HSCA testimony fourteen years later that he had seen Oswald many times with de Brueys.

Indeed, Pena has made contradictory statements as to whether he even saw Oswald that one night at his bar. His bartender, Rodriguez, testified Pena was in the back part of the bar that night and said, “I don’t believe that Orest saw Oswald.”²⁸ Although Pena did tell the FBI in a December 5, 1963, interview that he had seen Oswald at the bar that night, in a June 9, 1964, FBI interview he said he had never told anyone he had seen Oswald in the bar, then proceeded to tell the Warren Commission he didn’t think he had told the FBI this on June 9.²⁹ In view of Pena’s waiting so many years before he came up with his allegation, his “frequently evasive” testimony before committee, and the many conflicts and contradictions in his story, the HSCA concluded the obvious, that Pena “was not a credible witness.”³⁰

One naturally wonders what the origins are for apparent fabrications like Pena’s. But in his case, we may not have to look any further than the peerless Mark Lane. The mere exposure to Lane and his blandishments and suggestions has caused witness after witness in the Kennedy case to experience a remarkable improvement in their memory and suddenly come up with, for the first time, very pro-conspiracy observations. And Mark Lane's footprints, fingerprints, and palm prints may be all over Pena's story. It seems that Orest was serving more than booze at his place at 117 Decatur Street in the French Quarter. Rooms at his Habana club were also being used for prostitution, and when he was arrested for it, whom did he seek out? Not a New Orleans attorney, but Mark Lane. Lane, in his book Plausible Denial, doesn't say when this was, but it clearly was before Pena's public accusations were aired on CBS in 1975, since Lane suggests to his readers that Pena told him things he did not already know. There is a suggestion that Lane never got paid any fee by Pena for his representation. The quid pro quo? "He [Pena] told me that if I did so [represented him] he would tell me all that he knew about Oswald." Since everyone already knows the only information—pro-conspiracy—Lane has any interest in, Pena would have known what Lane wanted to hear. Lane writes that "Pena told me that Oswald had worked for the FBI. He showed me the buildings in New Orleans where de Brueys and Oswald had met." Not only, per Lane, was Pena privy to all this information, but remarkably he even knew that "the CIA was aware of the relationship [between Oswald and de Brueys]." ³¹

One other New Orleans person has come forward with an allegation of a connection between Oswald and the FBI. This one, if true, goes beyond Pena's story in its conspiratorial implications. Adrian Alba, the part owner and operator of the Crescent City Garage in New Orleans who became acquainted with Oswald when the latter worked next door at the Reily coffee company in May, June, and July of 1963 (see Oswald biography), told the HSCA in a 1978 deposition that one day during the subject period, an FBI agent from out of town entered his garage, showed his credentials, and requested to use one of the Secret Service cars garaged there, a dark green Studebaker. (In an earlier interview, he told HSCA investigators it was a "light green Plymouth.") ³² That same day or the next, Alba, about a quarter of a block away, claims he observed this agent, inside the Studebaker, hand a white envelope to Oswald (who was standing outside the car) in front of the Reily coffee company. There was no exchange of words between Oswald and the agent, and Oswald, having been in a bent-over position to receive the envelope, turned away from the car window and held the envelope close to his chest as he walked back to the Reily building "in a crouched position." Alba said he believes he saw a similar transaction a day or so later, but he was farther away and did not see what was handed to Oswald. He did not recall when the Secret Service car was returned to his garage or by whom. ^{33*}

One of the big problems with Alba's story is that he waited so many years (fifteen) to tell it. In two interviews with the FBI in New Orleans, one on November 23, 1963, the very day after the assassination, and one two days later, Alba made no reference to the suspicious incident he recalled so vividly fifteen years later. ³⁴ In his lengthy testimony before the Warren Commission on April 16, 1964, he again never mentioned the incident. And it must be noted that by April 1964, conspiracy theories that Oswald may have been, among many other charges, a paid agent of the CIA or FBI were already rampant and publicized in America. Indeed, though Alba did not address himself directly to this fact in his testimony, he did say, "Things I have seen on television, of course, and read in the newspapers, and so forth, has laid out some suggestive pattern that Lee Oswald was a subversive, et cetera, toward the country, and maybe even the President, or something; but prior to that assassination he gave me no indication at any time he was burdened with such a charge, or that he was concerned or involved with anything of that nature.” And at the end of his testimony, when Warren Commission counsel asked him, “If you can’t think of anything else, anything else you would like to add at this point, I have no further questions,” Alba said, “I would feel free if there was, but I don’t think there’s anything further that I would like to add that can be of any help to you.”³⁵

What perhaps destroys Alba’s credibility about the incident even more than the fifteen-year delay in telling the authorities is the reason he has given for the delay. Although he told Summers that in 1963 he was fearful of telling his story³⁶ (even though when Alba was interviewed by the FBI back then, Penn Jones and his ridiculous “mysterious deaths” allegation hadn’t yet surfaced, that silliness not starting until 1966), he told the HSCA that the very first time he even remembered these two incidents was in 1970, seven years later, when his memory was triggered by a television commercial of the Rosenberg furniture store in New Orleans, which urged people to shop at the store by cab. The commercial showed, Alba said, a “Jewish merchant, in a bent-with-age posture running out to the cab” to pay the fare for the customer.³⁷

The HSCA investigated Alba’s story. Among other things, the committee found that in 1963, “several Secret Service Agents had signed out two Studebakers, a Ford and a Chevrolet [from Alba’s garage] at various times, but the records do not indicate that any FBI agents had signed out any of these cars.”* The HSCA rejected Alba’s story as being of “doubtful reliability.”³⁸ Further indication of Alba’s lack of reliability is that he told Case Closed author Gerald Posner that “it was a fact” that Robert Kennedy had personally selected Lee Harvey Oswald to kill Castro, and when Oswald instead killed his brother, RFK went around crying out, at the Justice Department, “Oh God, I killed my brother, I killed my brother.”³⁹

The HSCA thoroughly investigated every alleged association between Oswald and the FBI and found nothing at all. Since the committee concluded that Oswald killed Kennedy, it also logically concluded that “absent a relationship between Oswald and the FBI, grounds for suspicions of FBI complicity in the assassination become remote.”⁴⁰

When the conspiracy theorists accuse the FBI of being behind the Kennedy assassination, the object of their scrutiny is always J. Edgar Hoover. But they virtually never bother to present a motive other than that Hoover “hated” Kennedy.⁴¹ Actually, though no one disputes that Hoover intensely disliked RFK, his nominal superior at the Department of Justice who did not treat him with the respect he required of others, the evidence is at best ambiguous as to whether he harbored the same animosity for JFK, though no one says affirmatively that he liked JFK. Former assistant FBI director William Sullivan, whom Hoover forced to retire in 1971 after Sullivan had asked him to resign (telling Hoover he ruled the bureau by fear and he did not intend to be intimidated), is one of the few who has publicly said that Hoover did not like JFK. But he does not offer anything substantive in his book to support this, limiting himself to assertions such as “the director never disguised his true feelings for Jack Kennedy...when he was among his close aides,” without favoring us with even one quote or paraphrase of just what Hoover said.⁴² What we do know is that in addition to the Kennedy glamour being inimical to his starched-collar notion of public office, the sanctimonious Hoover was apparently offended by Kennedy's sexual hijinks, particularly with married women.

Conspiracy theorists who make an extra effort to come up with a motive claim that Hoover had Kennedy killed to keep his job. You see, Hoover was coming up for mandatory retirement under federal law on January 1, 1965, when he would be seventy years old, and unless there was a presidential waiver,[†] which was much more likely under President Johnson (whom he was very friendly with, being neighbors in Washington for nineteen years, and with whom he shared a dislike for Ivy League patricians in Washington) than under Kennedy, he'd be out of a job in a little over a year.⁴³ Apart from the preposterous notion that Hoover would be behind Kennedy's murder to keep his job or for any other reason, conspiracy theorists, when they excitedly posit their theory, never stop to realize that even if a particular person or group had some motive to kill Kennedy, that person or group would have an even more compelling motive not to do it—if they did it and got caught, they could be arrested, prosecuted, convicted, and sentenced to death. It should be added that Hoover was a man who was so concerned about his image and reputation that the head of the Dallas FBI field office ordered that Oswald's note to FBI agent James P. Hosty be destroyed because he knew that if Hoover found out about it, he would go orbital with anger over exposing him and his agency to the charge of negligence in not alerting the Secret Service to Oswald. And this same fellow, Hoover, apparently had no fear of his possibly being exposed to the charge of murder? Former attorney general Nicholas Katzenbach, nominally Hoover's boss at the Department of Justice when Katzenbach was attorney general, told the HSCA that "Mr. Hoover resented criticism to a degree greater than any other person that I have ever known."⁴⁴

One of the few conspiracy theorists who has added a touch of substance to the heretofore very simplistic thinking about Hoover's alleged connection with the assassination does not conclude that Hoover was behind the assassination or that he was a co-conspirator. Instead, he stitches a series of facts and assumptions (presented as facts to his readers) together to support the scenario that the mob killed Kennedy, and that Hoover learned of its plans through the report of two Miami FBI agents and elsewhere and, wanting to keep his job, never did anything to prevent the murder from happening. In Act of Treason: The Role of J. Edgar Hoover in the Assassination of President Kennedy, author Mark North builds his case around Florida Mafia chieftain Santo (referred to by some as Santos) Trafficante allegedly telling Cuban exile José Aleman in September of 1962 that President Kennedy was "going to be hit." North's book is perhaps the only one in the entire library of conspiracy books that postulates a theory that, though almost assuredly not true, has some commonsense inferences on its side (other than that some group had a motive to kill Kennedy, so therefore it must have), which, if true, though not establishing a crime, would forever mark Hoover as one of history's greatest villains. It is therefore surprising that his book and theory have received all the attention of a new fly in the forest from his peers in the conspiracy community.

A note about Trafficante: Though Trafficante has frequently been referred to, as here, as the head of the Florida Mafia, and though he was certainly the most powerful Mafia figure in Florida (attending the infamous November 14, 1957, meeting of the mob's leadership in Apalachin, New York), the Trafficante family's principal sphere of influence, according to the McClellan Committee, was in Tampa and central Florida, not Miami and Florida's east coast. Trafficante's father, Santo Trafficante Sr., a Sicilian immigrant, was one of the pioneers and overseers, along with Meyer Lansky (the mob's moneymen, who first opened up Havana to the mob—with the blessing of his new friend, military strongman Colonel Fulgencio Batista—way back in 1933), of mob gaming interests in wide-open Havana. Grooming his son, one of six, to be a mobster, Santo Sr. sent Santo Jr., while in his twenties, to New York to serve his apprenticeship under Mafia boss Carlos Gambino. Unlike nearly all other Mafia leaders, Santo Jr. became well read and gave the appearance of being moderately cultured and sophisticated.* His lawyer, Frank Ragano, described him as wise and very clever. Santo Jr., who lived in Havana for several years, took over the Havana operations from his father in the early 1950s (and the Tampa operations in 1954 when his father died). But in Havana, Santo Jr. was always just under Lansky, who himself took up residence in Havana during periods in the 1950s as well as earlier, between 1937 and 1940, when he was operating the gambling casino at the Hotel Nacional and the local racetrack, which he had leased from the National City Bank of New York. Havana was Lansky's empire, and at the time it was a virtual playground for wealthy Americans with sybaritic appetites.

Trafficante's primary base was Havana's Sans Souci Hotel and Casino. From 1952 through 1958, Cuban dictator Fulgencio Batista's last of two reigns (the first being from 1940 to 1944, though the general was the most powerful man in Cuba for years before then), the San Souci (along with eleven other casinos or hotels the mob either owned or controlled, including the Deauville, which Trafficante also ran, and Lansky's two main hotels, the Hotel Nacional and the spectacular Havana Riviera) shared its proceeds with Batista. The mob, and reportedly U.S. intelligence, had helped return Batista to power in an almost bloodless military coup on March 10, 1952. He remained in power for six years until he was overthrown by Castro's revolution, fleeing from the island by plane on January 1, 1959.⁴⁵ When Castro assumed power in 1959, he ordered all the casinos closed. For all practical purposes, this had already been done. Mobs of Cubans, angry at the rule of Batista, had taken over the city. They had stormed the casinos, overturned card tables and roulette wheels, and thrown slot machines into the street. Lansky fled back to the states, but Castro detained Trafficante in a small jail for several months, though he eventually agreed to release him.⁴⁶†

Like his New Orleans intimate, Carlos Marcello, in 1963 Trafficante was not a member of the “national commission,” the nine-member group that made decisions of national importance to the Mafia.⁴⁷

José Aleman's story first appeared in a long article about Trafficante in the May 16, 1976, edition of the Washington Post. Aleman was a young, rich revolutionary in Batista's Cuba whose father, José Aleman Sr., had been the minister of education under Ramón Grau San Martín, a previous president. Aleman Jr. was involved in a March 13, 1957, failed attack on the presidential palace to overthrow Batista. At the time, Aleman was the leader of Directorio Revolucionario Estudiantil, a group of militant Cuban students who were supportive of Castro. “Our main trouble is Batista,” Aleman was quoted as saying around that time. “Kill him or get him out of the country and Cuba could return to a democracy.”⁴⁸ But Castro turned out to be worse, in Aleman's eyes, than Batista, and Aleman was forced into exile as a counterrevolutionary. His wealthy father had left Cuba for Florida before the revolution, becoming very big in Miami real estate with his ownership of beachfront hotels, Miami Stadium, and other interests worth around $20 million.⁴⁹

When Aleman's father died in 1950, the inheritance taxes were so high that Aleman's family had to sell Miami Stadium to pay them. Coupled with other business reverses and poor management, by

1962 Aleman was almost in debt, only owning the run-down Scott Bryan Hotel in Miami Beach. In the late 1950s Aleman had become friendly with agents in the FBI office in Miami when he convinced them, early on, that Castro was actually a Communist (not advertised by the “Bearded One” initially), and particularly when they found him to be “reliable” and a valuable source of information by alerting them to exiles he suspected as being agents of Castro. He told the Washington Post’s George Crile III that in September of 1962 a revolutionary colleague of his (George Nobregas) told him that Trafficante, whom he had never met and only knew by reputation as a casino operator in Havana, wanted to meet him. Trafficante, his colleague said, felt indebted to Aleman’s cousin, Garcia Bango, an attorney who represented Trafficante in Cuba and had succeeded in getting him out of a Cuban detention center and returned to the United States. Trafficante wanted to express his gratitude by helping Aleman out of his current financial difficulties. Aleman said that when they met at the Scott Bryan, the Tampa-based mob chief told him that a $1.5 million Teamster loan to replace his ramshackle hotel with a twelve-story condominium, and a penthouse apartment for Aleman, had already been cleared by Jimmy Hoffa. During an evening of talk that followed, Trafficante, Aleman said, started speaking out against Kennedy’s treatment of Hoffa, who he felt was a friend of blue-collar people. “Mark my words, this man Kennedy is in trouble, and he will get what is coming to him,” Aleman quoted Trafficante as saying. When Aleman responded that he felt Kennedy would be reelected, he said Trafficante responded, “No, José, he is going to be hit.” Though he had several meetings with Trafficante thereafter, the loan never came through. Aleman told the Post that he informed his FBI contacts of Trafficante’s statement that Kennedy was going to be hit.⁵⁰

On March 12, 1977, Aleman was interviewed by HSCA staff investigator Gaeton Fonzi, and Fonzi’s report of the interview said that “Aleman...got the impression that Trafficante was hinting that Hoffa was going to make the hit, not him, and that Kennedy would never make it to the election because of Hoffa.”⁵¹

When Aleman, wearing an expensive pin-striped suit, testified before the HSCA on September 27, 1978, the heart of his story to the Washington Post remained the same, but the details and interpretation differed. The meetings with Trafficante were in June and July of 1963, not September of 1962, Aleman now said. Also, the reason for the original meeting with Trafficante was entirely different from what he told the Post.

Aleman: “Mr. George Nobregas came to me and said that J. J. Vila, director of public relations in the city of Miami, wanted to see me because he had a message from President Bosch of the Dominican Republic, and President Bosch was a man that was very grateful to my father and that he wanted to talk to me about bringing to the Dominican Republic a lot of businessmen and whoever wanted to invest there.”

HSCA counsel Gary Cornwell: “So you understood that it was a request from people with business interests?”

Aleman: “Yes...At the same time, he said that one of the possible individuals who was interested in going was Santos Trafficante, going to the Dominican Republic.”

Moreover, although Aleman testified that Trafficante did mention a Teamster loan to him, Trafficante added that “Hoffa could not secure the loan so far.”

When HSCA counsel asked Aleman what he took the words “he is going to be hit” to mean, the bespectacled, distinguished-looking Aleman, speaking slightly broken English, said that Trafficante may only have meant that Kennedy was “going to be hit with a lot of votes from the Republicans or anything... The way he said that word, I interpreted with a lot of votes from the Republican Party or something like that.” But clearly, Aleman, for reasons of his own, probably his fear of retaliation by organized crime (it didn’t help that he knew Trafficante was in the next room, listening to his testimony),* was not testifying truthfully here. If Trafficante said what Aleman said he did, Aleman could not possibly have construed the words to mean what he told the HSCA. Additionally, HSCA investigator Fonzi, in his 1977 interview of Aleman, clearly got the impression that he was talking about murder, not Republican votes. I mean, since when is “Jimmy Hoffa” a synonym for “Republican votes”? Aleman added in his testimony before the HSCA, “This happened fifteen years ago and to the best of my recollection I think that is the word [“hit”] he put. I am not saying positively that. I mean, the wording he put was something he [Kennedy] is not going to make it... He is not going to be re-elected. In a long conversation like that I didn’t pay too much attention on it.”⁵²

From this very shaky foundation, North, in Act of Treason, assumes as fact that Trafficante definitely did tell Aleman that Kennedy was going to be hit, and that the hit he was referring to was not by Hoffa but by his close associate, Carlos Marcello, who, North assumes as fact, had told Trafficante of it, and that Marcello and organized crime did in fact thereafter have Kennedy murdered (for which there is no evidence). To tie Hoover into it all, North accepts without question Aleman’s statement to the Post that he did tell his FBI contacts at the time about Trafficante’s threatening words. North then asserts that the agents wrote up a report of the incident, which he says included Trafficante’s threat, and that Hoover eventually saw it. Though he offers no support for this assertion, his assumption is a reasonable one.

Additionally, North has a compelling point on his side. In the 1976 Washington Post article, the author, George Crile III, says that when he asked Aleman’s two FBI contacts, George Davis and Paul Scranton, “to comment on Aleman’s conversations with Trafficante,” though they acknowledged frequent contacts with Aleman, “both declined to comment,” explaining they “would have to have clearance.” This is common, and hence, not troubling. But then Scranton added, per Crile, “I wouldn’t want to do anything to embarrass the Bureau.” One very strong inference from this is that Aleman had, indeed, told the agents of Trafficante’s alleged threat. However, the FBI could be embarrassed not only if the agents did put the threats in their report and their superiors did nothing about it, but also if they didn’t bother to put the threats in their report—that is, bureau officials would be embarrassed by their own blunders as well as by those of their men in the field, as with the Hosty and Shanklin situation. Assuming Aleman did tell the agents what Trafficante allegedly told him, my guess is that they did not put it in their reports, though I in no way feel serene about this conclusion. I conclude this for several reasons. Crile writes, “Aleman says that he reported this conversation to his FBI contacts, who expressed interest only in Trafficante’s business proposals. Aleman assumed that they dismissed the Kennedy warnings as gangland braggadocio.” However, Aleman told Crile that on the day of the assassination the agents came out to see him and suddenly had a lot of interest in what Trafficante said. “They wanted to know more and more,” Aleman said, adding that they stayed until they had explored every possible angle and then told him to keep the conversation confidential.⁵³

The main reason I don’t believe the agents put Trafficante’s alleged threat in their reports is that the HSCA reviewed all FBI reports submitted in 1962 and 1963 by the agents dealing with Aleman, and the reports “did not reveal a record of any such disclosure or comments at the time.”⁵⁴ North, in his book, makes a fairly good argument, but only at the cost of not telling his readers the absolutely critical fact that the FBI reports from the Miami agents contained no reference to Trafficante’s alleged threat.

The HSCA also said (again, not mentioned by North in his book) that “the FBI agent who served as Aleman’s contact during that period denied ever being told any such information by Aleman.”⁵⁵ But the HSCA gives no citation of authority for that assertion so we don’t know, for sure, whether the committee was talking about Davis or Scranton. However, almost for sure, it was Davis. Through a retired FBI agent contact, I wrote to Davis’s last known address in West End, North Carolina, seeking his comments on the Aleman matter, and received a letter back from his widow on July 1, 2000, that he had died the previous August. I had no address for Scranton, but she forwarded my letter to a retired FBI agent, Bill Kelly, who worked with both of them in 1963 in Miami.

Kelly told me that he and George Davis were assigned to the Internal Security-Cuba section of the Miami field office, and the section was broken down into an anti-Castro squad (working with anti-Castro Cuban exiles), which Davis headed, and a pro-Castro squad (investigating Cuban exiles and Americans who were pro-Castro), of which he, Kelly, was a member. Unofficially, they were called the “Tamale Squads.” Though he did not know Aleman, Kelly said that Davis, not Scranton, would have been Aleman’s FBI contact because his recollection (which he later confirmed with two other retired agents from the Miami field office) was that Scranton did not work Internal Security. His principal job was “police training coordinator,” and he was also assigned to the organized-crime squad. Since even in 1978, in his appearance before the HSCA, Aleman spoke broken English, I assume he spoke much worse English in 1963, and since there may have been a communication problem, I asked Kelly if Davis spoke Spanish. “George didn’t speak a word of Spanish. We used to kid him about it.” Before Castro ascended to power in 1959, Kelly said, no one in the Miami FBI office spoke Spanish. “There wasn’t any need for it. Davis had been working Internal Security since 1956, and he just stayed on even after Castro took over. There was no better or more respected agent in the entire FBI than George Davis. As early as 1956, when no one would listen, he told the State Department that Castro was a Communist.” Kelly said that although Davis didn’t speak Spanish, Scranton did. “My guess is that George took Scranton along when he spoke to Aleman.”⁵⁶

I asked Kelly to try to locate Scranton for me so I could interview him. Kelly finally reached Scranton by phone several days later. Scranton, in his eighties, had just had a massive stroke and was not inclined to speak to me, so I gave Kelly some questions to ask Scranton for me. In a July 31, 2000, telephone conversation with Kelly, Scranton, though speaking slowly, Kelly said, because of his stroke, said very clearly and deliberately, “I have absolutely no recollection of Aleman ever having said that Trafficante told Aleman before the assassination, or any other time, that Kennedy was to be hit. If Aleman had made that statement to us, I guarantee I would have written it up, even if George [Davis] hadn’t, for transmission to [FBI] headquarters.”

Scranton also confirmed that he did not work Internal Security, but Kelly, feeling he already knew the answer (that Scranton could speak Spanish), did not ask Scranton why he went along with Davis on the Aleman interview. Kelly also did not ask Scranton why he told the Post’s Crile, “I wouldn’t want to do anything to embarrass the Bureau,” and when I asked Kelly, who was very helpful, to call Scranton back on this point a few days later, Scranton was in the hospital with another stroke. When Kelly called Scranton back on August 9, after Scranton had been released from the hospital, and asked him if he had made the subject remark to the Post’s Crile, he told Kelly he did not recall telling Crile this, but that it was a quarter of a century ago and in any event his memory had been affected by his recent strokes.

As circumstantial evidence as to what happened in this case, I asked Kelly how many people in the FBI chain of command would have seen a memo from Davis or Scranton quoting Trafficante as saying Kennedy was going to be hit. “I may leave out someone along the way,” Kelly said, “but at a minimum, Davis’s memo would go to Howard Albaugh, the supervisor of the Internal Security section of the [Miami FBI field] office, then to Wesley Grapp, the agent in charge of the [Miami field] office, then, because of its extreme importance, it would be teletyped [not airtel, he said, which was priority mail] to the Internal Security-Cuba section at headquarters in [Washington, D.C.], and, because of Trafficante, to the organized-crime division, then it would go to either the assistant director of internal security or domestic intelligence, or both, as well as to the assistant director back then who had responsibility for organized crime, then to Clyde Tolson, the assistant director, then to the old man [Hoover].” Kelly added that even if, for some strange reason, the memo had been sent by Airtel, before it was placed in an envelope the same people in Miami would have seen it, and when it arrived at FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C., it would have been opened by a clerk at the bureau and the same people at headquarters would have seen it. When I told Kelly about the charge in North’s book, he said, “That’s just ridiculous. Hoover would never suppress something like this. Even if he wanted to, he couldn’t because he’d know too many other people had already seen the report.” Conceding that Hoover was a “dictator,” Kelly said Hoover was “a good man, a benevolent dictator.”⁵⁷

Now let’s look at what Mark North gives his readers as support for his assertion that there was an FBI report of the Trafficante-Aleman incident and it did reach Hoover’s desk. “Pursuant to standard FBI procedure, the two agents [George Davis and Paul Scranton] report the assassination plan to their superior, Miami SAC Wesley Grapp.”^{*} North then writes that “the information is then sent by [FBI] AIRTEL to Hoover.” North gives no source or citation of authority at all for this assertion, which goes to the heart of his book. He simply states an assumption on his part as fact. What does Hoover do with this information he now has (courtesy of Mark North), that the mob is going to murder Kennedy? North speculates that “Hoover shifts his efforts from attempting to gain political leverage over the President to ensuring the success of the contract [to kill Kennedy]. Word of the plot is withheld from the Secret Service.”⁵⁸

It should be pointed out that in addition to Scranton’s denial and the absence of an FBI report confirming that Aleman told the agents what he said he did, Aleman’s testimony before the HSCA itself isn’t perfectly clear on this matter. Indeed, although at one place in his testimony he said he did tell the agents this, at another point he implies he may not have. He said, “If, in any way, I would have thought the context at that time was that something was going to happen in that respect, I would have immediately advised the proper authorities about it.” Whereupon HSCA counsel asked Aleman this leading question: “And didn’t you do so?” And Aleman said he did, although not as expressly as HSCA counsel clearly wanted. Aleman said, “I talked in some way to members of the FBI about what was going on in the conversation [with Trafficante], and I told them that something wrong was in some way.” When HSCA counsel pressed and said to Aleman, “I believe you previously told me... that you did specifically tell the FBI about the comments of Trafficante on this occasion,” instead of simply saying yes, Aleman only responded, “We talked in some way,” suggesting the difficulty of “trying to recollect things that happened 15 years ago.”⁵⁹

As to the more seminal question of whether Trafficante ever made the remark to Aleman in the first place, in testimony before the HSCA on September 28, 1978,^{*} Trafficante said, “I want to tell you something now, Mr. Stokes [chairman of the HSCA]. I am sure as I am sitting here that [in] all the discussion I had with Mr. Aleman, that I never made the statement that Kennedy was going to get hit.” Trafficante’s vehement denial, of course, by itself means nothing. But he did add something noteworthy concerning Aleman’s implication in his testimony that Trafficante made his threat in English.⁶⁰ “I spoke to [Aleman] in Spanish. No reason for me to talk to him in English because I can speak Spanish fluently and he speaks Spanish. That is his language. There was no reason for me to tell him in English that Kennedy is going to get hit.”⁶¹

But far more importantly, for those who believe that Trafficante was behind Kennedy’s murder, and cite his alleged statement to Aleman as support, why in the world would Trafficante confide such a monstrous murder plot to Aleman, who not only wasn’t a fellow mafioso, but also was someone he had never met before? It makes no sense at all. The HSCA said it “found it difficult to comprehend why Trafficante, if he was planning or had personal knowledge of an assassination plot, would have revealed or hinted at such a sensitive matter to Aleman,”^{*} particularly, it said, when Trafficante had a reputation for being cautious and discreet. (FBI agent Jim Kenney, who investigated Trafficante for fifteen years, said in a November 17, 1992, Frontline documentary on the mob that “our investigation of Santo Trafficante throughout the years proved to be frustrating in that he maintained a low profile and he was very, very circumspect about whom he would talk with and meet with.”)⁶² The HSCA ended up rejecting Aleman’s story, concluding that “there were substantial factors that called into question the validity of Aleman’s account.”⁶³

On the one hand, if Trafficante were actually behind the assassination, his confiding such a murder plot to Aleman is, as indicated, nonsensical and not worthy of belief. But this doesn’t mean he didn’t say what Aleman said he did. By George Davis’s own admission to George Crile in the Washington Post, “José’s a real nice fellow. He’s a reliable individual.” Even the HSCA, which did not accept Aleman’s story, said he was a “reputable person who did not seek to publicize his allegations.” Moreover, what would Aleman possibly have to gain by making up such a story? It seems like he could only hurt himself. And FBI agent Paul Scranton’s telling the Post’s George Crile III that he did not want to comment on Aleman’s allegation without clearance because “I wouldn’t want to do anything to embarrass the Bureau” certainly sounds, as least to a layman unfamiliar with the practice of FBI agents, as if Aleman did tell them what he claims Trafficante told him, and they either didn’t put it in their report, or they did and no action was taken. However, Kelly, a thirty-year veteran of the bureau, told me, “Don’t read too much into those words of Scranton’s. It’s a standard response by agents, even when there’s nothing that could embarrass the bureau. I’ve used almost those exact words myself many times in my career. Don’t forget that FBI policy back then, and I believe even today, is that only three people in a field office are authorized to say anything of substance to the media: the agent in charge of the field office [special agent-in-charge], the assistant agent-in-charge, and the press liaison guy.”⁶⁴

The situation seems irreconcilable unless, taking into account the problems of communication between Aleman and Trafficante (if, in fact, Trafficante spoke to Aleman, as Aleman suggests, in English) as well as between Aleman and the two agents, one of whom spoke no Spanish, one concludes that, as the HSCA said, “it is possible that Trafficante may have been expressing a personal opinion, ‘The President ought to be hit.’”⁶⁵

There are several parenthetical observations to be made about the Trafficante-Aleman incident. One is that even if Trafficante said precisely what Aleman said he did, as discussed elsewhere in this book, there is absolutely no credible evidence that Trafficante was connected in any way with the assassination, so his utterance to Aleman wouldn't have any relevance to this case. Furthermore, although FBI electronic surveillance of Trafficante was limited, its on-site surveillance of him was very extensive. In a letter to J. Edgar Hoover in 1967, Frank Ragano, Trafficante's lawyer, complained of the absolutely suffocating surveillance of "Mr. Trafficante and members of his family [that] has been going on since 1961," and beseeched Hoover to order a stop to it. Ragano wasn't just talking. Not only did he give Hoover physical descriptions of the agents, but he also provided the license plate numbers of four of their cars.⁶⁶ To believe that someone under this type of "surveillance," as Ragano put it, would nonetheless decide to order the murder of the president of the United States is simply ridiculous.

Additionally, as alluded to earlier, when HSCA staff investigator Gaeton Fonzi interviewed Aleman on March 12, 1977, a year and a half before his HSCA testimony on September 27, 1978, he wrote, "[Aleman] also said that Trafficante brought up Jimmy Hoffa's name and said that Hoffa would never forgive the Kennedys for what they did to him. Aleman said he got the impression that Trafficante was hinting that Hoffa was going to make the hit, not him, and that Kennedy would never make it to the election because of Hoffa. This, says Aleman, was the one aspect of the conversation with Trafficante that [Washington Post reporter George] Crile did not properly put into perspective in his piece; otherwise, the piece was very accurate."^{67*}

Finally, as indicated earlier, the HSCA reviewed all the reports that Davis and Scranton prepared on their contacts with Aleman and found no mention of the Trafficante threat. Therefore, if Hoover had received information in a report from Davis and Scranton about the threat, this necessarily means he had to order the destruction of these reports and the preparation of new ones, thus automatically bringing into the cover-up not only the earlier mentioned chain of command, but Davis and Scranton as well. The extremely high improbability of all of this happening is one of the reasons why I believe that if Aleman told Davis and Scranton about the Trafficante threat, they did not put it in their report or reports.

But if Aleman told FBI agents Davis and Scranton what Trafficante allegedly told him, and if they put this in their report, and if the report reached Hoover, and if Hoover, believing the mob would in fact kill Kennedy, did not furnish this information to the Secret Service or do anything else about it because he was hoping the mob would kill Kennedy, thereby avoiding his impending compulsory retirement, Hoover, even though the mob did not, in fact, end up killing Kennedy, would, as indicated, be an incredible villain. I am very, very confident that this scenario did not happen. However, based on the existing record, there is no way that one can dismiss the notion completely out of hand. I mean, to retain power, men have done much worse things than stand by and let someone else commit a murder that redounds to their benefit.

One footnote to the Trafficante-Aleman issue: Contrary to Mark North's conclusion that if the assumed facts set forth in his scenario were true, they would make Hoover guilty of treason,⁶⁸ they would not. Treason is the only crime defined in the U.S. Constitution: "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying War against them, or adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort."⁶⁹ Neither clause would apply to Hoover's alleged conduct, the courts defining "enemy" as a "foreign power," and ruling that aid to the foreign country has to take place while the United States is "in a state of open hostility" with the other country (i.e., while we're at war).⁷⁰

The main contention by the fringe element of the conspiracy community is that Hoover actually conspired to have Kennedy murdered (unlike Mark North's allegation of passivity on Hoover's part). But they present not the tiniest sliver of evidence to support their wild allegation. However, because Hoover is such a central figure in the assassination saga, a very brief profile of who J. Edgar Hoover was, and how he ran his empire, is called for.

J. Edgar Hoover, since his appointment as FBI director in 1924, at once formed and effectively ran perhaps the finest, most incorruptible law enforcement agency in the world, while being personally beset by obsessions, paranoia, and insecurities that would run off the edge of the paper of any psychiatric report analyzing him. Just one illustrative example: In 1959 in California, Hoover's chauffeur-driven car was struck from behind while in the process of making a left turn, and he was shaken up. Thereafter, on instructions from Hoover, his drivers had to take him to his destination without making a left turn.⁷¹

Hoover, it seemed, believed he was incapable of error as the FBI's director, something akin to the doctrine of papal infallibility in the Catholic Church. As former FBI agent Joseph L. Schlott wrote, "In the FBI under Mr. Hoover, you had to work on the premise that the Director was infallible." Indeed, Hoover himself would only admit to having been conned twice in his life (not in FBI business, naturally), "once by a door to door salesman who sold him black sawdust for his flower bed as pure manure, and once by the Birdman of Alcatraz, who sold him a sparrow dyed yellow as a canary."^{72*}

Above all, Hoover was a megalomaniac—he had to be the only person in the FBI who received the acclamation of the public. When the most famous G-man ever (other than Hoover), Melvin Purvis, who most believed to be the key agent in the tracking down and killing of John Dillinger (the bureau's "Public Enemy Number One") in the alley behind the Biograph Theater in Chicago in 1934, received national attention and fame, Hoover could not tolerate it. Purvis, who at one time was a big favorite of Hoover's, and was the recipient of several personal letters from him, suddenly became persona non grata at the bureau. Hoover had told Purvis in one letter, "Well, son, keep a stiff upper lip and get Dillinger for me and the world is yours." But after Purvis became widely known as "the man who got Dillinger," he was demoted to a desk job in the Chicago office and forced to resign the following year.† In Hoover's 1938 book, Persons in Hiding, he devotes much space to Dillinger (more than the likes of notorious outlaws like Ma Barker, Baby Face Nelson, and Charles "Pretty Boy" Floyd, all FBI prey),† the most famous "person in hiding" the FBI has ever brought to ground, and the one about whose celebrated capture the bureau has always taken the greatest pride. Yet remarkably, in his telling of the Dillinger capture, Hoover does not even mention Melvin Purvis. In fact, the name Melvin Purvis doesn't appear anywhere in the book, even though Purvis was also very instrumental in bringing to an end the career in crime of Baby Face Nelson and Pretty Boy Floyd.⁷³

It is common in nonfiction for authors to ignore the accomplishments of competitors or people they don't like (for whatever reason). When they do this, their books, in which they have an obligation to rise above their pettiness for the historical record, lose credibility. Because of Hoover's pettiness, I read his book, not just the part on Dillinger, with a jaundiced eye.

Hoover not only easily controlled, in a dictatorial fashion, his entire agency, but also induced enormous fear in (and hence, largely controlled) every major public figure—including President John

F. Kennedy—who ever strayed in his personal life. His gunpowder? The very well-known secret dossiers (“Hoover’s files” they were known as) he kept in two file cabinets behind the desk of his secretary, Helen Gandy, on wayward congressmen, diplomats, celebrities, and so on.⁷⁴ William Sullivan, a former assistant director of the FBI under Hoover, said that the dossiers or files did not necessarily include references to “sex alone, but financial irregularities or political chicanery. He gathered all the dirt that was present on people in high-ranking positions... Knowledge is powerful, and he had knowledge of the most damaging kind, knowledge of people’s misbehavior.”⁷⁵ Emanuel Celler, for years chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, liked and respected Hoover, but said Hoover “had a dossier on every member of Congress and every member of the Senate.” Though he could not speak for the Senate, he said, “The members of the House were aware of this” and many “had a lot of skeletons in their closet... That’s what made him so feared.” Celler said, “There’s no question in my mind” that Hoover tapped the telephones of congressmen.⁷⁶ Author Victor S. Navasky wrote that “the Director, with the FBI files as his private library, [was the] de facto caretaker to the nation’s reputations.”⁷⁷

The brimming contents of these files were gathered by Hoover’s agents through the wiretapping of telephones (which was unlawful but routinely authorized for years by the U.S. attorney general in national security cases) or “bugging” (installing, usually by criminal trespass, hidden microphones in people’s homes, apartments, etc., to pick up nontelephonic verbal communications), called “black bag jobs” in the FBI. Even where national security wasn’t involved, as was frequently the case, it was widely reported that Hoover regularly ordered telephone taps (wiretaps) and bugging without the approval of the attorney general,⁷⁸ who had no legal authority to allow them anyway.

Hoover’s abuse of the national security exception was notorious, perhaps the most prominent example being his secret Counterintelligence Program (COINTELPRO), a program that took Hoover’s FBI far beyond its sole mandate to enforce federal law. Deciding he knew what was best for America, its values, and its culture, Hoover’s COINTELPRO was a series of covert missions starting in 1956 (to 1971) to identify, penetrate, and neutralize what Hoover decided were subversive elements in the United States, including, Hoover believed, civil rights groups, black liberation and antiwar groups, and the political Left, mostly American Communists. However, the first group COINTELPRO operated against, ironically, was a group on the Far Right, the Ku Klux Klan. A favorite tool of COINTELPRO was to fabricate and spread pernicious rumors and write anonymous letters with false accusations about individual members of these groups. A report from the House Select Committee on Intelligence (“Pike Committee Report”) in 1976 said that in the process, “careers were ruined, friendships severed, reputations sullied, businesses bankrupted and, in some cases, lives endangered.”⁷⁹ A typical example of COINTELPRO: The bureau learned, through electronic surveillance, of a civil rights leader’s plan in 1964 to attend a reception at the Soviet mission to the United Nations honoring a Soviet author. The FBI arranged to have news photographers at the scene to photograph him entering the Soviet mission.⁸⁰

One of the very worst examples of COINTELPRO abuse occurred in the late 1960s and involved prominent Hollywood actress Jean Seberg, a known supporter and financial contributor to the Black Panthers, a militant black nationalist group. When she became pregnant in 1970, the FBI became aware of it through the wiretap of a telephone conversation from Black Panther headquarters to Seberg, and the special agent in charge of the Los Angeles FBI office sent an Airtel to Hoover on April 27, 1970, stating that “permission is requested to publicize the pregnancy of Jean Seberg, well-known movie actress, by Ray Hewitt of the Black Panthers Party...by advising Hollywood gossip columnists in the Los Angeles area of the situation. It is felt that the possible publication of Seberg's plight could cause her embarrassment and serve to cheapen her image with the general public. It is proposed that the following letter from a fictitious person be sent to local columnists." Permission was granted and on May 19, 1970, Los Angeles Times gossip columnist Joyce Haber published the story, which was syndicated to about a hundred papers around the country. On August 23, Seberg, who was married to French diplomat and novelist Romain Gary, prematurely delivered a baby daughter, who died two days later. At the infant's funeral, Seberg opened the casket to prove the child was white and the story about her a lie. According to the Los Angeles Times, the story "triggered the actress' downward spiral across a decade, her husband and others close to her said. For nine years, Seberg tried to take her life around the baby's birthday. On September 8, 1979, her body was found naked in the back of a Renault parked on a Paris side street, the death credited to an overdose of barbiturates."^{81*}

Hoover's illegal wiretaps to gain compromising information on anyone he perceived to be a threat to his power, and oftentimes on political opponents of the president then in the White House (sometimes at the request of the president himself), started in the 1930s under FDR, reaching their zenith in the 1960s under the Machiavellian LBJ, Hoover's personal friend. Only one president, Truman, had virtually no relationship with Hoover, to the extent of not even allowing Hoover to deal directly with him, forcing Hoover to deal with Truman's chief military aide, Brigadier General Harry Vaughn.⁸²

Hoover's power was such that President Kennedy was fond of telling people when they asked why he never fired Hoover, "You don't fire God."⁸³ LBJ had a more earthy way of putting it: "In the long run, I'd rather have Edgar on the inside pissing out, than on the outside hosing me down."⁸⁴

After Hoover died, New York Times reporter Tom Wicker wrote that Hoover had "wielded more power, longer, than any man in American history."⁸⁵ And Hoover was never shy about letting everyone know just how powerful he was, referring to his FBI headquarters office as "SOG" or "Seat of Government."⁸⁶ In fact, the term "Seat of Government" was even used routinely in official FBI documents, for example, "All of the supervisors and officials who came into contact with this case at the seat of government, as well as agents in the field..."⁸⁷ It seemed that Hoover didn't know his place in the executive branch of government, and during his lifetime no one was about to remind him.

Virtually every Hoover biography, from Curt Gentry's best-selling J. Edgar Hoover: The Man and the Secrets on down, has confirmed not only that Hoover had a bulging, six-hundred-page file on JFK's dalliances,* but also that Kennedy was well aware of what Hoover had on him.⁸⁸ And Hoover made sure his targets knew, directly or indirectly, that he had the goods on them.

The most blatant, outrageous, and vile example of this was the fifteen FBI bugging tapes of Martin Luther King, containing words and physical sounds of King with other women in hotel rooms around the country. These tapes were sent to King (whom Hoover despised and viewed as a Communist pawn dangerous to America, which resulted in King's telephone also being tapped under authorization from RFK on national security grounds) at King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference office in Atlanta in mid-November of 1964. FBI coverage of King had revealed that King's wife, Coretta, "opened his mail for him when he was on the road." A letter accompanying the tapes was from an anonymous writer, who told King that he was "a complete fraud...and an evil, vicious one at that... You are done.” One note is believed to have actually encouraged King to commit suicide, reading, “King, there is one thing left for you to do. You know what it is.”⁸⁹ DeLoach confirmed that the FBI’s wiretaps of King’s phone, which RFK approved, were at the request of the FBI, not RFK. However, in May of 1968, columnist Drew Pearson said that RFK ordered the wiretaps on King’s phone, and that he would soon release the documentation he had to support this, which he never did.⁹⁰ Hoover showed his personal distaste for King and his firsthand involvement in the effort to destroy him in a handwritten note at the bottom of an internal FBI memo discussing the “microphone surveillance” of King in his room at the Shroeder Hotel in Milwaukee. “King is a tomcat,” Hoover scribbled, “with obsessive degenerate sexual urges.”⁹¹ Hoover even went so far as to try to peddle a dossier on King, which included a taped composite of King’s sexual activities in various hotel rooms, to key members of the Washington, D.C., press corps, but they declined to accept his offer.⁹²

By all accounts, though there is no record of what was said, Hoover’s lunch with Kennedy at the White House on March 22, 1962 (at which he brought along an FBI memo on Judith Campbell Exner, prepared for him two days earlier, that set forth the dates of her calls to the White House and the fact that she had “associated with prominent underworld figures Sam Giancana of Chicago and John Roselli of Los Angeles”), was to inform the president that he must cease seeing Exner. It is no coincidence that White House records show the last of seventy telephone calls put through the White House switchboard to Exner’s number occurred that afternoon after the luncheon.⁹³

Just as those who wear their patriotism on their sleeves usually have very little left inside—in a similar vein one is reminded of Ralph Waldo Emerson’s remark that “the louder he talked of his honor, the faster we counted our spoons”—many law-and-order extremists like Hoover very often have no compunction about violating the law themselves. In addition to the well-chronicled fact that Hoover often used FBI personnel to make repairs to his home, there is at least one clear case of a prosecutable felony (grand theft) committed by Hoover; many people have gone to jail for less. “As you know,” former assistant FBI director William Sullivan wrote to Hoover in 1971, a few days after he left the FBI, “I had a number of men working for many months writing your book, Masters of Deceit, for you. Contrary to what you have said it was not done on private time. It was done on public time, during the day at taxpayers’ expense [we’re obviously talking here about well over $100,000] ... Do you realize the amount of agent time that was spent not only in writing the book but on advertising and publicizing it all around the country? All our field offices were told to push it... We even wrote reviews here at the Headquarters which were sent to the field to have printed by different papers.”⁹⁴ Louis Nichols, the FBI’s first publicist and lobbyist, and a Hoover partisan who was more responsible for the lionization of Hoover in the public’s eye than anyone else, confirmed Sullivan’s story about Masters of Deceit, which sold 250,000 copies in hardcover and 2 million in paperback.⁹⁵

Returning to the central issue, as previously stated, no one, ever, has produced one piece of evidence connecting J. Edgar Hoover with Kennedy’s death, and your more responsible conspiracy theorists don’t devote any space to the charge. Indeed, the very thought that J. Edgar Hoover decided to murder President John F. Kennedy is too far-fetched for any but the most suspicious and irrational minds. Hoover had already proved (the March 22, 1962, luncheon with JFK over Judith Campbell Exner) the power he had to blackmail the president, and it is therefore ridiculous to say that he would try to kill Kennedy—and thus expose himself to a sentence of death—in order to keep his job. When we couple all of this with the fact that, as author Curt Gentry writes, “Hoover’s concern with preserving his good name became an obsession” and “the fear that his carefully constructed image would come tumbling down obsessed him most of his life” (the “hundreds of hours” he spent “fussing over the blueprints” to the building in Washington, D.C., that currently bears his name is a metaphor for his all-consuming concern over his image and reputation),⁹⁶ the thought becomes too crazed to put to paper, and I apologize to his surviving relatives, if he has any, for even discussing this issue.

The Warren Commission found no evidence of FBI involvement in the assassination.⁹⁷ And the HSCA, having examined the allegation of FBI complicity in the assassination, concluded that the FBI was “not involved in the assassination of President Kennedy.”⁹⁸ (Both the Warren Commission and the HSCA had the good taste not to even ask the question of whether J. Edgar Hoover, individually, was involved.) And the earlier Church Committee, in 1975, after investigating the possibility of U.S. intelligence (specifically the FBI and CIA) being involved in the assassination, said it did not uncover “any evidence” of such involvement.⁹⁹

Secret Service

One other U.S. intelligence agency has had the suggestion of complicity in the assassination leveled against it by the conspiracy theorists, the Secret Service, but nowhere near as much as the CIA and FBI.

The U.S. Secret Service, a bureau of the Department of the Treasury, dates back to 1865, the last year of the Civil War, when it was created primarily to combat the widespread counterfeiting of U.S. currency. Nearly one-third of all currency in circulation at the time was counterfeit, and the country's financial stability was in jeopardy. In 1894, since the Secret Service was the only federal investigative agency at the time, it began to provide informal and part-time protection to the president. In 1902, following the assassination of President William McKinley the previous year, the Service, without statutory authority, and in addition to its anticounterfeiting mandate, assumed full-time responsibility for the protection of the president. Following the election of William Howard Taft in 1908, the Secret Service started protecting the president-elect. In 1913, Congress enacted legislation expressly providing for full-time Secret Service protection of the president. Although the Secret Service began protecting the vice president in 1945, it wasn't until 1951 that Congress enacted legislation authorizing such protection, but only upon the vice president's request. Legislation in 1962 required protection of the vice president, with or without his request.

During fiscal year 1963, the Secret Service had an average strength of 513 personnel, 351 of whom were special agents (weapon-carrying personnel, whether members of the Presidential Protection Division or some other division), with sixty-five field offices throughout the country. The core of the presidential security arm of the Secret Service is the White House detail, which in 1963 consisted of 36 special agents and 6 special agent-drivers.¹

With respect to the Secret Service, for all intents and purposes the inquiry about complicity in the assassination begins and ends with the motorcade route. This is so because if the Service or any of its agents were involved in the assassination, they necessarily would have had a determinative or at least important hand in helping to make sure the limousine proceeded beneath Oswald's window on Elm Street. But all the evidence shows they did not have such a hand; in fact, the Secret Service let it be known that it favored, for security reasons, a different destination for the motorcade, which would have meant a different route altogether, and no assassination.

On November 4, 1963, Gerald Behn, the special agent in charge of the White House's Secret Service detail, called Forrest Sorrels, the special agent in charge of the Dallas field office of the Secret Service, to inform him of the president's intent to visit Dallas "around November 21st." He said that two buildings had been suggested for a luncheon site following the presidential motorcade—the Trade Mart, a new and attractive convention hall off the Stemmons Freeway to the northwest of Dealey Plaza, and the old Women's Building located on the fairgrounds in the southern part of Dallas—and asked Sorrels to survey both sites. Sorrels immediately did and reported back to Behn that same day that "security-wise the Women's Building appeared to be preferable" (because there were only two entrances to the building, whereas the Trade Mart had many entrances as well as suspension bridges on the second and third floors) but that, as opposed to the Trade Mart, the one-story building “wasn’t a very nice place to take the president” because the ceiling was low and the “air-conditioning equipment and everything was all exposed.”² So Sorrels made no choice. However, Behn, who was in charge of trip security, did, announcing on November 5 that he favored the Women’s Building.³ But selection of the luncheon site was out of the hands of the Secret Service. It was to be decided by politicians.

Today, there are two main parties in Texas, the dominant Republican Party and the Democratic Party. However, in 1963 Texas was essentially a one-party state (Democratic) and the party was clearly divided along liberal and conservative lines. The relationship between the two wings of the party was so bitter and combustible that, for instance, they even engaged in fistfights on the floor of the 1960 Democratic national convention in Los Angeles. The liberals, led by Senator Ralph Yarborough, lobbied the White House hard for the Women’s Building, which not only had a larger seating capacity, permitting more of the president’s supporters to attend, but also had an atmosphere more compatible with that of the common man, the so-called working class. But the conservative wing of the party, led by Governor Connally, was fiercely opposed to the Women’s Building site, demanding that the luncheon be held at the Trade Mart, the headquarters in Dallas for the city’s predominantly conservative business community.^{4*}

The White House ultimately deferred to the governor, and Kenneth O’Donnell, special assistant to the president, notified the Secret Service of its position on November 14, 1963.⁵ A presidential advance man, Jerry Bruno, wrote in his November 15, 1963, diary entry, “The White House announced that the Trade Mart had been approved.† I met with O’Donnell and [Press Secretary Bill] Moyers who said that Connally was unbearable and on the verge of canceling the trip. They decided they had to let the Governor have his way.” As the HSCA concluded, “The Secret Service was, in fact, a bystander in the process; its protective functions were subordinated to political considerations.”⁶

However, just because the Trade Mart was chosen didn’t mean there was going to be a motorcade to get to it. Indeed, both Governor Connally and Frank Erwin, the executive secretary of the Texas State Democratic Committee, objected to the motorcade, fearing that because Dallas was so conservative, there might be some incident or sign along the parade route that would be embarrassing to the president. Connally also felt that the motorcade, requiring the president’s interaction with the crowd along the motorcade route, would put an excessive strain on the president, especially in view of his tight schedule.⁷ In the end, the White House wishes for a motorcade prevailed. Kenneth P. O’Donnell told the Warren Commission, “We had a motorcade wherever we went. Particularly when we went to a large city, the purpose of going there was to give the president as much exposure to the people...as possible. The speaking engagement was a luncheon which was rather limited. And the president would not want to leave Dallas feeling that the only ones that were able to see him were a rather select group.”⁸

The fateful decision to send the motorcade along Main Street and then in front of the Book Depository Building was somewhat preordained by the prior decision to make the Trade Mart the luncheon site. (If the Women’s Building, in a different part of the city, had been selected, the motorcade would not have passed by the Depository Building.) Sorrels and Winston G. Lawson, a member of the White House Secret Service detail in Washington who acted as an advance agent for the Dallas trip, obviously could have come up with a different route from Love Field to the Trade Mart without passing by the Book Depository Building. But Main Street had always been the traditional parade route in Dallas (including for the only previous presidential visit, by President Roosevelt in 1936, which Sorrels, who joined the Service in 1923, had worked), and to reach the Trade Mart from Main Street, the most direct route is the Stemmons Freeway. And contrary to the allegations by conspiracy theorists, the only practical way for westbound traffic on Main Street to reach the northbound lanes of the Stemmons Freeway is by way of Elm Street past the Book Depository Building. Continuing on Main past Houston (instead of turning right on Houston to Elm) does not enable one to get on the Stemmons Freeway. An island separates Main from Elm at the Stemmons Freeway, and it extends beyond the freeway for the specific purpose of preventing drivers on Main Street from trying to get on the Stemmons Freeway by changing lanes across Elm Street (on the right) to do so. Dallas police officials were briefed on the parade route on November 15, and they agreed it was a proper one, not expressing a belief that any route might be better.⁹

But even if it could be shown that the Secret Service was responsible for the selection of the luncheon site and the motorcade route, the notion that the Secret Service was behind the assassination is, like virtually all the conspiracy theories, ridiculous on its face. What conceivable motive would the Secret Service have had? None. In fact, even if Secret Service agents got away with it, it would only hurt their individual careers in the Secret Service that the president had been killed on their watch.*

Why, indeed, would an agency (or any member thereof) whose agents are literally trained to take a bullet themselves to protect the president want to murder him? As former Secret Service agent Dennis McCarthy writes in his book, Protecting the President, “Every minute of every day, agents are on duty protecting the President, both as an individual and as a symbol of the government that he leads.” And part of their duty is to give their very life to save his, if necessary. All agents are trained, McCarthy says, “to put themselves between the President and the source of the shots,” making themselves “as large a target as possible.” A celebrated example was when John Hinckley attempted to assassinate President Ronald Reagan just after Reagan had exited the Hilton Hotel in Washington, D.C., on March 30, 1981. McCarthy writes, “The first shot was fired when Reagan was just three feet from the limousine door that Agent Tim McCarthy was holding open. Immediately, Tim turned in the direction of the shots, spread his arms and legs to protect the President, and took a bullet in the abdomen.”¹⁰

In response to a series of questions submitted to him by J. Lee Rankin, general counsel for the Warren Commission, the then chief of the Secret Service, James J. Rowley, wrote that one of the “two general principles in emergencies involving the President” that the Secret Service has “consistently followed” is for agents “to place themselves between the President and any source of danger.”¹¹

Though it defies logic that the Secret Service was involved in the assassination, many conspiracy theorists don't agree. For instance, although he responsibly concludes that the Service was not involved, Walt Brown, in his book Treachery in Dallas, can't resist asking rhetorical questions like, “Why was a fifty-four year old Secret Service Agent the driver of the car? Why, since it was Dallas, did the head of the [Secret Service] White House Detail stay in Washington?”¹² (Hmm. Maybe the Secret Service was behind the assassination after all.) Conspiracy theorist Harrison Edward

Livingstone, in his book Killing the Truth, has it all figured out. He writes that “Secret Service Agents close to the President who knew of some of his feminine liaisons resented it, sat in judgment of him, and cooperated with the plotters to kill him.”¹³ Livingstone, of course, does not, cannot, cite any source for his speculation other than his own very fertile imagination. It should be noted that Warren Commission assistant counsel Arlen Specter, who conducted the questioning of the Secret Service agents before the Commission and interviewed them beforehand, said that only Roy Kellerman (who he did not say showed any dislike for the president, only appeared “blasé”) “did not seem to share the other agents’ attachment to Kennedy,” adding that William Greer “clearly felt deep affection for Kennedy, which I sensed had been reciprocal.”¹⁴ As Greer would later say, “He [the president] and I were pretty close friends. He treated me just wonderful.”¹⁵

Only one book I’m aware of, Vincent Palamara’s Third Alternative—Survivor’s Guilt: The Secret Service and the JFK Murder, is devoted solely to the Secret Service’s role in the case. From his exhaustive investigation, Palamara ends up finding the Secret Service guilty of incompetence, not complicity in the murder. Although Palamara seems honest and intelligent, and his 1993 book is reasonably well researched, I found it very difficult to read. It virtually has no discernible structure or organization, being a rambling and discursive, almost stream-of-consciousness exploration of the Secret Service’s protection—or lack thereof—of the president, with no index or even page numbers. Yes, you heard me right. No page numbers. Although Palamara is “suspicious” of the conduct of three agents (Bill Greer, Emory Roberts, and mostly Floyd Boring—“Boring is interesting,” Palamara writes), he seems to conclude, with no concrete evidence to support his conclusion, that his Third Alternative for the Secret Service’s role in the assassination is not the guilt or innocence of the Service, but an “innocent” but intentional “security stripping test” by the Service to “test the President’s security” that “unknowingly backfired into a full-blown assassination,” for which, apparently, the Secret Service was defenseless. Among the many examples, he says, of the deliberate “security stripping”: the railroad overpass was not cleared of people (Palamara does not say why the overpass should have been cleared of people as opposed to other areas, and ignores the fact that two Dallas police officers were assigned to be on top of the overpass); buildings along the motorcade route were not checked out;* there was no bubbletop on the limousine;† the Service went along with a route that necessitated a 120-degree turn at Houston and Elm that slowed the limousine down to a dangerous speed; and so on.¹⁶

Palamara, moving almost exclusively in the world of conspiracy theorists, resisted forfeiting his common sense for as long as he could as he proceeded reasonably well in his assassination research. But somewhere along the way he got off the bus and in 1997 declared, “It is now my strong belief, after shaking off years of equivocation, that several [Secret Service] agents had to have been involved in the actual assassination by getting wind of the impending threat and letting it happen.”¹⁷

Palamara, naturally, welcomes whatever company he can get. And in an interview with the HSCA in 1978, John Marshall, the retired former special agent in charge of the Miami Secret Service, told his interviewers that the Secret Service “could possibly have been involved in the assassination,” though he had nothing specific to support his speculation. The HSCA interviewer wrote that “it is the first time that an agent has acknowledged the possibility that the Secret Service could have been involved.”¹⁸ Of course, as they say, “could have, schmood have.”

And then, there’s the inimitable Colonel L. Fletcher Prouty, whom you will meet later as an adviser to Oliver Stone on Stone’s movie JFK. In the December 1999 edition of the magazine

Prevailing Winds, Prouty asserts nakedly that on the day of the assassination “what happened to the Secret Service was not that the Secret Service didn’t do their job. They were told: ‘Your unit isn’t needed, you can go home.’” But as conspiracy theorist Walt Brown responds, “Colonel Prouty, who are these Secret Service agents? Who was ‘sent home’ from Dallas before the motorcade? Are you suggesting that the White House detail was not there?”¹⁹

With respect to the argument made by Prouty and some other conspiracy theorists that the president’s protection was so bad it must have been intentional, I have a question. If that reasoning has merit, why don’t these same theorists allege that the Secret Service must have been complicit in the two attempted murders of Gerald Ford in 1975? In one of them, on September 5, 1975, former Charles Manson follower Lynette “Squeaky” Fromme, attired in a bright red robe and matching turban, no less,* was able to walk up to within two feet of Ford in a public park in Sacramento and pull out and point her .45 caliber Army Colt pistol at him before being thrown to the ground.

What makes the Secret Service’s conduct even more egregiously incompetent in the Fromme-attempted assassination is that the Manson “Family” hated former president Nixon for declaring, in the middle of Manson’s trial for the Tate-LaBianca murders, that Manson was guilty. Also, for his continuation of the Vietnam War. And they had taken to calling President Ford, “the new face of Nixon.” After Manson was convicted of the murders he was incarcerated at San Quentin, but in October of 1974 was transferred to Folsom State Prison, fifteen miles west of Sacramento. Fromme moved to Sacramento to be near Manson and headed up the last remnants of the Family not behind bars. A few weeks before Ford came to Sacramento, Fromme and Sandra Good, a Family member, issued a communiqué to the media in Sacramento that “if Nixon’s reality wearing a new face [i.e., Ford] continues to run this country against the law, your homes will be bloodier than the Tate-LaBianca homes and My Lai put together.” I don’t know how many other potential likely assassins of Ford there could have possibly been in Sacramento, but even without the Manson Family’s feelings against him, I would think that Fromme and Good, being Manson Family members, would have been on the list of people in Sacramento that the Secret Service would be watching when Ford came to town, but they were not.²⁰

Talk about being given a heads-up. On September 20, 1975, forty-five-year-old Sarah Jane Moore, a former FBI paid informant turned radical, called Inspector Jack O’Shea of the San Francisco Police Department and told him she was part of the protest movement in the city and was thinking of driving from San Francisco to Stanford University the following day to “test” the security system around President Ford when he spoke there. Moore implied, without expressly saying, that because of her state of mind, maybe O’Shea should put her in custody. O’Shea dispatched two officers to Moore’s residence, where they arrested her on a misdemeanor charge of being in possession of an unloaded .44 caliber revolver. (Moore had many bullets in her residence.) The police confiscated the revolver and released Moore from custody, but O’Shea called the local office of the Secret Service that night to alert them to Moore’s implied threat against President Ford and the fact she was found in possession of the revolver. The following day, September 21, the Secret Service interviewed Moore, ran a background check on her (which probably showed that she was, in fact, a former FBI informant) and, unbelievably, released her from custody, later saying that Moore was “not of sufficient protective interest to warrant surveillance during the President’s visit,” referring to Ford’s visit the next day in San Francisco. This gross negligence is magnified by the fact that Fromme’s attempt on Ford’s life had taken place just sixteen days earlier. The following morning at eleven, Moore bought a .38 caliber Smith & Wesson revolver from a private seller, and four and a half hours later took a shot at Ford as he walked to his limousine after leaving the St. Francis Hotel. A former marine standing near her was able to push her arm down almost at the instant she pulled the trigger, causing the bullet to miss Ford.²¹

And then there was the attempted murder of President Reagan by John Hinckley, the son of a Denver oil executive, on March 30, 1981, behind the Hilton Hotel in Washington, D.C. The incompetence of the Secret Service enabled Hinckley, carrying a loaded .22 caliber gun, to position himself just ten feet from the president among TV camera crews and reporters assembled outside the back door of the hotel. Hinckley fired six shots at Reagan, one hitting the president in the chest. In emergency surgery, doctors removed the bullet from Reagan's left lung. Again, making the incompetence worse, three civilians in the crowd behind the hotel, including an AP reporter and Pinkerton detective, said they (but apparently not the Secret Service) had noticed Hinckley looking "fidgety, agitated," acting even "hostile" toward the reporters, and at times walking rapidly back and forth.²²

The Fromme, Moore, and Hinkley cases are far more egregious examples of a lack of adequate Secret Service protection than the Kennedy assassination, yet the conspiracy theorists remain silent about them.

Although there is absolutely no evidence that the Secret Service was involved in the assassination, its performance left something to be desired, the HSCA concluding that "the Secret Service was deficient in the performance of its duties."²³ Warren Commission assistant counsel Arlen Specter put it better: "The Secret Service had the responsibility to protect the president and they did not protect the president."^{24*} Among other things—although these failures almost assuredly did not contribute to what ultimately happened—the Protective Research Section (PRS) of the Secret Service, whose job it is to gather and evaluate information on people and groups who are thought to present some potential danger to the president and make sure it is usefully disseminated, did not forward on to the agents responsible for Kennedy's Dallas trip information it had on threats to the president's life for his November 2, 1963, trip to Chicago (which had been canceled, but apparently for other reasons) or his November 18, 1963, trip to Miami (the Joseph Milteer threat [see later text], which the Secret Service learned of on November 12), actions the HSCA said should obviously have been taken.²⁵ Indeed, not only didn't the name Lee Harvey Oswald appear in any Secret Service file prior to November 22, 1963—there being no record that it even knew of his existence—but the PRS never gave the Secret Service detail traveling with the president the name of even one individual in its "trip file" for the entire Dallas area who might be considered dangerous!²⁶ According to Secret Service agent Rufus Youngblood, that was because a search of PRS files "revealed that there were no known individuals in the Dallas area [which had a population of around 700,000] who posed a direct threat to the President."²⁷

In a secret internal memo dated December 10, 1963, from FBI special agent J. H. Gale to Clyde Tolson, the number-two man at the bureau, in which he signed off on disciplinary action against thirteen FBI agents for their negligent pre-assassination handling of the case, Gale says that the FBI also never had Oswald's name on any list of people to check out and watch when Kennedy came to Dallas. He writes, "It is definitely felt that subject Oswald should have been on the Security Index (SI) based on the following facts." Gale sets forth eight facts, among which were Oswald's defection to Russia and his contact with the Soviet embassy in Mexico that September and October.²⁸ It is not the direct responsibility of the FBI to protect the president, but if Oswald had been on such an FBI Security Index, it would have been the responsibility of the FBI to furnish the information on Oswald to the PRS. The head of the PRS told the Warren Commission that the Secret Service had a standing request to all federal agencies to provide “any and all information that they may come in contact with that would indicate danger to the president.”²⁹ And Sorrels said that if the FBI had informed him “that a defector to Russia was working along the motorcade route, I would have picked him up as part of the presidential protection.”³⁰

Then there was the now famous incident of nine Secret Service agents, four of whom were assigned to the motorcade route, having had beer and mixed drinks at the Fort Worth Press Club the night before the motorcade, the last one leaving at 2:00 a.m. Seven agents then proceeded to the Cellar Coffee House in Fort Worth, which served no intoxicating beverages. Most left by 3:00 a.m., but one remained until 5:00 a.m. In a later investigation, their supervisor advised that each of the agents reported for duty on time the next day, with full possession of his mental and physical capabilities.³¹ Though “the use of intoxicating liquor of any kind, including beer and wine,” by Secret Service agents “while they are in a travel status [with the president] is prohibited,”³² Chief Rowley elected not to discipline the agents because it might give rise to the inference by others that this violation had contributed to the assassination, and he was convinced that this was not the case.³³

Those who believe the Secret Service was involved in the assassination should almost be put in the same zany category as those who believe that maybe Jackie Kennedy or RFK was involved. The mainstream conspiracy community has never made the allegation of Secret Service complicity. For example, in perhaps the principal book propounding the conspiracy theory of the assassination, Anthony Summers’s Conspiracy, the author doesn’t devote one page, not even one paragraph or one sentence, to the possibility of the Secret Service being involved. (As to whether there were “Secret Service” agents on the grassy knoll, he says that they were not “authentic” agents.)³⁴ The idea is so outlandish that the Warren Commission couldn’t force itself to ask the question of Secret Service complicity, but the HSCA did, and concluded that it found “no evidence of Secret Service complicity in the assassination.”³⁵

With respect to the issue of Oswald being a hit man for any U.S. intelligence agency such as the CIA, FBI, and Secret Service, there is, of course, no evidence of this whatsoever. One would think the conspiracy theorists, having failed abysmally to connect Oswald in any way to these intelligence agencies, would have their energy and enthusiasm drained. But they have remained undeterred and undaunted. Suggesting that the roots behind the assassination may have been in New Orleans, author Anthony Summers writes, “It may be that Oswald was at least—in the months before the assassination—one remove away from the formal structures of the intelligence community. In the world of intelligence, many operations are run through ‘cut-outs,’ buffer organizations or individuals whose sins can never formally be laid at the door of any agency or government. Thus, it may have been with Oswald in New Orleans.”³⁶ And it also may be that since, after more than forty years of relentless searching, no one has ever come up with one iota of evidence connecting Oswald to any federal intelligence agency or even to any such “cut-out” buffer organization, the best course of action for those in the conspiracy community would be to just give up and find a new passion.

KGB

As the reader may have already inferred from the pages of this book and from simple common sense, none of the conspiracy theories make any sense. And among them, the theory that Oswald was acting at the behest of the KGB when he killed Kennedy, fueled in large part because Oswald was a Marxist who defected to the Soviet Union, is one of the very worst. As Newsweek pointed out in 1993, “Why risk nuclear war to replace a young hard-liner with an old one?” And, “Khrushchev was trying to make peace with Kennedy in 1963, not kill him.”¹

Indeed, on the very day before the assassination, the National Council of Soviet-American Friendship was meeting in Washington, D.C., and a message from Khrushchev, written on November 19, was read to the council. Khrushchev observed “the 30th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and the U.S.S.R. Normalization of relations between our countries, associated with the name of a great American, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, was an historical landmark in developing relations between the Soviet and American people.” He recalled “the grim years of World War Two when we fought together side by side against the common enemy, Hitler’s Germany. The experience of the war years...shows that, despite the difference in our social systems, businesslike cooperation and friendly relations between the U.S.S.R. and United States are quite possible. Development of such cooperation on the basis of the principles of peaceful co-existence would meet the interests of people of our countries and would affect the entire international situation.”²

And for his part, Kennedy gave no indication to Khrushchev by deed or word that he wanted to extend American hegemony throughout the world, and would therefore pose a threat to the Soviet Union. Kennedy’s foreign policy was always containment, not military expansionism. He had a pluralistic view of the world that, Arthur Schlesinger Jr. writes, was a central thesis set forth by Kennedy to Khrushchev at their Vienna summit in June of 1961, a thesis “which implied that nations should be free to seek their own roads to salvation without upsetting the balance between the superpowers.” The previous November, Schlesinger writes, Kennedy told an audience at the University of Washington “that the United States is neither omnipotent nor omniscient—that we are only 6 percent of the world’s population—that we cannot impose our will upon the other 94 percent of mankind—that we cannot right every wrong or reverse each adversity—and that therefore there cannot be an American solution to every world problem.”³ So even if Khrushchev were irrational enough to want to murder any adversary he perceived as constituting a threat to the Soviet Union, why would he feel Kennedy was such a threat? He didn’t. As Khrushchev said in a 1967 Moscow interview, “Although President Kennedy was young, he was obviously interested in finding ways to avoid conflict with the Soviet Union and somehow to solve those problems which might lead to war.”⁴

There could be little question that after taking each other’s measure when they met as leaders for the first time at the Vienna summit in 1961, Kennedy and Khrushchev, despite the bluster and veiled threats at the summit by both sides, had started to forge a special tie that eased cold war tensions. By the summer of 1963 the two leaders even established a “hot line” for instantaneous communication between them.⁵

Indeed, Khrushchev's main adversary at the time of Kennedy's death was not the United States, but China. Though both Communist nations wanted to turn the world Communist, competition between them for leadership of the international Communist movement as well as disagreement on how to achieve world dominion (Khrushchev advocated a strategy that emphasized economic, diplomatic, and ideological means; Mao Tze-Tung, the Chinese leader, was inclined to more violent revolutionary tactics and subversion) led to increasing and public acrimony between the two nations, Khrushchev fearing the Chinese position would heighten the risk of nuclear war with America.* While the Sino-Soviet split widened, it appeared that Kennedy was moving cautiously toward a possible detente with Russia, which Khrushchev welcomed. For instance, to the consternation of conservatives, on October 9, 1963, just a month and a half before the assassination, Kennedy approved the sale of $250 million worth of wheat to the Soviet Union when Khrushchev turned to America for help in feeding millions behind the Iron Curtain.⁶

If the Soviet Union were, in fact, behind the assassination, the mission would undoubtedly have been assigned to the KGB, its Secret Service. And as set forth earlier in this book, while Oswald was in the Soviet Union between 1959 and 1962, the KGB, rather than conspiring with Oswald, initially thought he might be an American intelligence agent, and even when that appeared unlikely, its agents followed him everywhere, including opening his mail and bugging his apartment in Minsk. Such conduct by the KGB really sounds as if it were in a conspiracy with Oswald to murder Kennedy, doesn't it?

The contents of the five-foot-long KGB file on Oswald, naturally, have been hard to come by. But on February 4, 1964, Yuriy (frequently spelled "Yuri") Ivanovich Nosenko, a thirty-six-year-old KGB agent, walked out of his room at the Hotel Rex in Geneva, Switzerland, and, leaving a wife and two children behind in Russia and his suitcase in his hotel room, defected to the West by going to a CIA safehouse in Geneva. Nosenko had been listed as an "expert" on the Soviet delegation to the seventeen-nation disarmament conference in Geneva, but his actual function was to act as the KGB's watchdog over the rest of the Soviet delegation.⁷ He had first approached American intelligence officers in Geneva when he was last there in June of 1962. Nosenko would eventually tell his CIA and FBI debriefers that as an agent in charge of KGB investigations of diplomats, journalists, tourists, and defectors from the United States (the American department of the internal counterintelligence service of the KGB), he was fully cognizant of the Oswald case. He said that he was one of the agents who had been assigned to Oswald and that he had looked at the KGB's entire five-volume file on Oswald. He assured his American inquisitors that Oswald was never a KGB operative and that the KGB believed Oswald to be "mentally unstable" and had no use for him.⁸

Nosenko ran into immediate credibility problems because Anatoliy Golitsyn, a KGB agent who had defected to the West in early 1962, got the ear of James Jesus Angleton, the CIA's legendary chief of counterintelligence whom David Atlee Phillips referred to as the "CIA's answer to the Delphic Oracle: seldom seen, but with an awesome reputation nurtured over the years by word of mouth and intermediaries padding out of his office with pronouncements which we seldom professed to understand fully but accepted on faith anyway."^{9*} KGB files would later reveal that Golitsyn, whom the KGB tried to discredit by falsely implicating him in contraband operations across the Finnish border, had betrayed a wide range of intelligence to the CIA, particularly on KGB methods of operation. However, he also fed Angleton and the CIA some unintentional misinformation that sprang from his paranoid tendencies—for example, that as part of the KGB’s effort at global deception, the Sino-Soviet split and the Prague Spring in Czechoslovakia were merely charades to deceive the United States.¹⁰

Golitsyn convinced Angleton that Nosenko was a double agent and false defector who was part of a KGB disinformation effort to neutralize the CIA,[†] and that the KGB had already planted one of its agents “within the highest echelons of U.S. intelligence.”¹¹ Golitsyn told Angleton that any subsequent KGB defector who vouched for Nosenko would also be a false defector, and indeed, Golitsyn said, any CIA officers who claimed to believe Nosenko’s alleged bona fides could possibly be moles for the KGB.

Angleton, already a congenitally suspicious person who was notorious for believing the KGB was behind every tree, was particularly amenable to accepting the mole possibility. Harold “Kim” Philby, Angleton’s counterpart as head of counterintelligence for the British SIS (Secret Intelligence Service), was a brilliant spy, someone whom a young Angleton, along with other OSS (Office of Strategic Services) agents during the Second World War, greatly admired, looked up to, and learned from. Angleton became a close friend of Philby’s, but Philby turned out to be a double agent who had worked with a KGB case officer for years. The Cambridge-educated Philby was actually recruited as a Soviet spy in 1934, six years before he joined the SIS. Angleton would later say, “Looking back on it, Kim taught me a great deal. He taught me never to assume anything... Once I met Philby, the world of intelligence that had once interested me, consumed me.” Philby’s double-agent status was an intelligence disaster not only for London but also, though to a much lesser extent, for Washington, since at the time his duplicity was discovered in 1951, he was the SIS’s liaison with the CIA in Washington (since 1949) and on the best of terms with intelligence officers, from CIA Director Allen Dulles on down, many of whom told him things over drinks they “regretted ever since.” Remarkably, Philby was so iconic and politically connected in Britain that he was allowed to resign from the SIS and was not publicly denounced as a Russian spy until after he defected, in 1963, to the Soviet Union, where the Soviets eventually put his image on a stamp.¹² Philby, living a reasonably pleasant life in Russia with his American-born wife, Eleanor, was well protected by the KGB, who believed that the CIA might try to assassinate him if it could find him.¹³

In a book about Angleton, Cold Warrior, Tom Mangold writes, “For twelve years, from 1962 until 1974, the CIA conducted a civil war within its own corridors over Nosenko’s bona fides. An issue that would normally have been settled within weeks by mature men became a decade of destructive battles which left Nosenko...abused to the point of torture,^{*} the operations of the CIA’s most important division effectively paralyzed, and the reputation of some of the agency’s most senior officers destroyed... The CIA’s entire top management was sucked into the battle. Neutrality was regarded with contempt.”¹⁴

The internal conflict virtually tore the CIA in half, one side being led by Angleton, the other side, which accepted Nosenko’s bona fides, by eventual CIA director William Colby. The latter group ultimately prevailed. In a September 1, 1978, letter to the HSCA, written on behalf of the director of Central Intelligence, Scott Breckenridge of the CIA’s Office of Legislative Counsel wrote that “the final conclusion [of the CIA] was that [Nosenko] is a bona fide defector, a judgment that has been reinforced convincingly by 14 years of accumulated evidence.” Breckenridge said that the CIA was “unable to resolve satisfactorily the question of his bona fides until well after the Warren Commission had completed its work.”¹⁵

Indeed, if the old expression “put your money where your mouth is” applies to the CIA, it seems very clear that the prevailing powers that be at the CIA came to the conclusion that Nosenko was bona fide a lot earlier than 1978, when they merely reported their conclusion. Apparently, when Nosenko defected on February 4, 1964, he was promised $25,000 a year in compensation by the CIA for future services. But “no effort was made to fulfill the promise until 5 years after Nosenko’s defection.” The CIA told the HSCA that “following acceptance of Nosenko’s bona fides in late 1968, an arrangement was worked out whereby Nosenko was employed as an independent contractor for the CIA, effective March 1, 1969. His first contract called for him to be compensated at a rate of $16,500 a year. As of 1978 he is receiving $35,325 a year. In addition to regular, yearly compensation, in 1972 Nosenko was paid for the years 1964–1969 in the amount of $25,000 a year. . . He also received. . . for March 1964 through July 1973 amounts totaling $50,000 to aid in his resettlement in the private [sector].”¹⁶

Nosenko is not mentioned in the Warren Commission volumes. However, inasmuch as he defected in February of 1964, when the FBI was right in the middle of its assassination investigation, he naturally did not escape the attention of the bureau, which interviewed Nosenko twice in February and three times in March of 1964.¹⁷ The FBI told the HSCA it had “no direct access to Nosenko from April 3, 1964, until April 3, 1969” (nearly all of which time Nosenko was in CIA custody), and that on October 1, 1968, four years after the Warren Commission concluded its investigation, it had advised the CIA that it “found no substantial basis to conclude that Nosenko was not a bona fide defector.” The FBI further told the HSCA that “effective May 11, 1977, the FBI and CIA concurred that Nosenko was a bona fide defector” and it did not “perceive any credible evidence that Nosenko’s defection was a Soviet ploy to mask Soviet governmental involvement in the assassination.”¹⁸

Unlike the Warren Commission, which did not feel it had the capacity back in 1964 to determine Nosenko’s bona fides (see endnote discussion), and despite the aforementioned CIA and FBI assurances, the HSCA made every effort to determine whether or not Nosenko was a bona fide defector, but eventually the committee threw up its arms and conceded it was “unable to resolve” this issue. The HSCA did conclude, however, that Nosenko was “an unreliable source of information about the assassination, or, more specifically, as to whether Oswald was ever contacted, or placed under surveillance, by the KGB.”¹⁹ But the matter of surveillance was conclusively put to rest by Norman Mailer’s book, Oswald’s Tale, published in 1995, in which Mailer was able to procure actual tapes and transcripts from the KGB’s surveillance of Oswald. (See Oswald biography section.)

The reason why the HSCA concluded Nosenko was unreliable was that it caught him in too many inconsistencies. For example, Nosenko told the HSCA in 1978 that Oswald had been under extensive KGB surveillance, including mail interception, wiretapping, and physical observation. But in 1964 he told the CIA there had been no such surveillance. Nosenko also told the CIA in 1964 that Oswald never received any psychiatric examination in Moscow after his suicide attempt, but he told the HSCA in 1978 he had. The HSCA also tended to disbelieve Nosenko’s claim that the KGB never had any direct contact with Oswald because it was not interested in him and never even bothered to interview him. Nosenko said that although the KGB was interested in the U-2 plane, the spy agency did not know that Oswald might have knowledge about the plane.²⁰ One clear piece of misinformation Nosenko gave the HSCA was that Oswald's phone in Minsk was "tapped,"²¹ but Marina said they had no phone in their apartment in Minsk.²²

Nosenko, when confronted by the HSCA with contradictions between what he had told the CIA and what he told the committee, said that the transcripts he was shown of the CIA interrogations were inaccurate (the tapes showed they were not) and that nothing he told the CIA prior to 1967 could be relied on because he had been drugged by the CIA.²³

In any event, whatever dispute there is about the accuracy of several of Nosenko's statements about Oswald, and although there is a residue of disbelief among some to this day about his bona fides, subsequent events have strongly enhanced his credibility on his two main points, that he was not a KGB mole but a bona fide defector, and that Oswald was never a KGB operative.

In the wake of the failed, hard-line coup against Gorbachev in the late summer of 1991, when there was euphoria over the fall of Communism, there was a brief interlude of increased openness by the KGB, and ABC News Nightline correspondent Forrest Sawyer and senior producer Bob Haverill, after much lobbying on their part in Moscow, were allowed to look and take notes from, but not make copies of, Oswald's KGB file (No. 31451) for several hours one day in mid-September.

Valentin Kandurian, lieutenant colonel, KGB: "We are opening the door."

Sawyer: "The original material."

Kandurian: "The original, exactly, this is the original material."

Sawyer: "Is this everything?"

Kandurian: "Yes. This is it."

Of course, to an agency whose highest virtue is deception, Kandurian's assurances cannot be automatically accepted. However, Sawyer, for several reasons, was under the impression he was viewing the original file. "The reformers who are running the KGB have it not at all in their interest to protect the past. The file was voluminous. It was quite old. It was quite detailed and it was not self-contradictory, so if it was falsified, it had to be falsified, I think, sometime long ago, and the KGB never dreamed then that they would release their files. Finally, there is corroboration." Sawyer said that Nosenko, back in 1964, "claims to have seen the file" and Nosenko said "virtually the same things" he, Sawyer, had found in it.

One report in the file read, "Taking into account that the personality of the applicant [Oswald] is absolutely unclear to us and the fact that the first directorate of the KGB and counter-intelligence have no interest in Lee Harvey Oswald...he [was] refused citizenship." But because there was some suspicion that Oswald was an American intelligence agent, the KGB monitored his movements throughout Russia, code-naming its target, in a play on Lee Harvey, "Likhoi."²⁴

The issue of Nosenko's credibility as a bona fide defector was virtually laid to rest by the publication, in 1999, of the book The Sword and the Shield: The Mitrokhin Archive and the Secret History of the KGB by British author Christopher Andrew and his coauthor Vasili Mitrokhin, who had worked for years in the foreign intelligence archives of the KGB. Before defecting to Britain through the British SIS in 1992, Mitrokhin spent over a decade making notes and transcripts of these highly classified files, which he smuggled out of the archives and kept beneath the floor in his dacha. Andrew had exclusive access to both Mitrokhin and his archive. Internal KGB documents provided by Mitrokhin showed that the KGB viewed Nosenko's defection as a serious setback, made every effort to discredit him after he defected, and added him to its list of “particularly dangerous traitors” to be assassinated abroad if the effort would not carry an unacceptable risk. In 1975, the KGB actually found a gangster willing to kill Nosenko for $100,000, but before the contract killer could earn his fee, he was arrested for other crimes.²⁵

Vladimir Semichastny, the head of the KGB at the time of Oswald’s defection to the Soviet Union, told NBC through an interpreter in 1993 that when Oswald first defected to the Soviet Union, the KGB took an interest in him. But “Oswald turned out to be a mediocre, uninteresting man. We had had high expectations of him as an informant, but nothing ever came of it. We soon learned we couldn’t put any hopes on him. We realized that Oswald was a useless man. I was told at some point in time that he didn’t like this country and was considering leaving. I told my workers immediately, ‘Let him go. Try to keep him from changing his mind.’”²⁶ And Semichastny wasn’t just saying this to an American audience thirty years after the assassination. In an internal 1963 KGB memo from Semichastny to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, he writes, “During the time of Oswald’s stay in the USSR, and after he left our country, the Committee for State Security exhibited no interest in him.”²⁷

This impression of Oswald as useless, and the notion of the KGB using him in any way being a bad joke, was widespread. UPI correspondent Aline Mosby, who interviewed Oswald in Moscow in 1959, says that she had a strong impression that Oswald was “emotionally unbalanced, and wanted to be a ‘big shot.’ I quickly sized him up as a little nobody that the Russians would not be interested in. My impression was confirmed when they shipped him off to Minsk.”²⁸ That Mosby was not engaging in post-assassination revisionism is established by the fact that in her pre-assassination book about her Moscow experience, The View from No. 13 People’s Street, she was so unimpressed with Oswald she made no reference to him at all.²⁹

Former FBI assistant director Cartha DeLoach told CNN on November 21, 1993, “The Russians have an excellent intelligence operation. And they wouldn’t have dealt with Oswald. They wouldn’t deal with someone who was mentally unbalanced. They just wouldn’t do that.” When Paul Roderick Gregory, a member of the Russian community in Dallas who got to know Oswald and Marina well, was asked whether Oswald might have been an agent of the Soviet Union, he responded, “If the Soviets wanted to get someone, they could get someone a lot more reliable. They would have a lot more sense than to get him.”³⁰

One of the most prevalent beliefs among conspiracy theorists is that the KGB may have recruited Oswald as an agent for the Soviets as far back as when he was a radar specialist at Atsugi air base in Japan.³¹ But obviously, if the Soviets had, the very last thing they would have had him do is defect to their country. As a Marine radar specialist in Japan he may have eventually reached the point where he could have provided them with valuable classified information. By defecting to Russia and publicly speaking out against the United States, he would lose all possibility of ever being in a position to gain access to U.S. military information helpful to the Soviets.

The most recent revelations about Oswald in the Soviet Union occurred on August 5, 1999, when the National Archives released more than eighty pages of long-secret documents that Russia’s president, Boris Yeltsin, gave to President Clinton as a gesture of friendship when the two met at the “Big 8” summit in Cologne, Germany, in June of 1999. (Clinton had requested the file from Yeltsin back in 1993, the thirtieth anniversary of JFK’s death.) Among them was a November 26, 1963, internal memorandum stamped “Top Secret” and “Highest Priority” from the Soviet ambassador to the United States, Anatoly Dobrynin, dealing with the November 9, 1963, letter Oswald had sent to the Soviet embassy in Washington, D.C., the one he typed when he was at Ruth Paine's house visiting his wife and daughters. Dobrynin thought the letter was a fake. "This letter was clearly a provocation," Dobrynin says in the memo. "It gives the impression we had close ties with Oswald [in the letter, Oswald mentioned his visit with a KGB official at the Russian embassy in Mexico City when he was seeking a Russian visa] and were using him for some purposes of our own... The suspicion that the letter is a forgery is heightened by the fact it was typed, whereas the other letters the embassy had received from Oswald before were handwritten. One gets the definite impression that the letter was concocted by those who, judging from everything, are involved in the President's assassination. It is possible Oswald himself wrote the letter as it was dictated to him, in return for some promises, and then, as we know, he was simply bumped off after his usefulness had ended."

That same day, November 26, another one of the Yeltsin documents shows that the Soviet foreign minister, Andrei Gromyko, and KGB chairman, Vladimir Semichastny, sent a letter classified "Secret" to the Soviet Central Committee stating that the American Press is spreading various slanderous allegations about "connections" between Oswald and the Soviet Union and Cuba. Oswald, accused of assassinating the President of the USA J. Kennedy, was later killed under mysterious circumstances. Some representatives of the American press are trying to justify their insinuations [by] referring to the fact that Oswald had been in the Soviet Union from October, 1959 till June 1962... After Oswald has been killed himself, the real face of those circles who are responsible for the killing of President Kennedy, and who are now trying to cover their tracks, is more evident... If American authorities contact the Soviet Embassy in Washington with a request to supply them with some information regarding Oswald's stay in the Soviet Union, they can be provided with a relevant document relating to it.

News of the death of Kennedy, who was widely hailed in the Russian media as an "outstanding American statesman" who was "striving for peace," was greeted by great shock and consternation. Grief was felt throughout the Russian leadership and people, including the satellite nations, with tributes and commentaries about the fallen president dominating the news and airways for days.³² Church bells were tolled throughout the Soviet Union in memory of the fallen president. Even the KGB showed its respect, providing approximately twenty men who spoke English to handle duties in the immediate vicinity of the American embassy in Moscow to ensure that no disrespect was shown during this period.³³ Moscow Radio had interrupted a concert of classical music at 10:55 p.m. to report Kennedy's death, and played funeral music until it signed off at midnight.³⁴

Since, in a dictatorship like the Soviet Union, there is strictly enforced censorship and the people can hardly form any opinion opposite of what they are allowed to hear, what is the likelihood that the Soviet Union would permit its people to have a favorable view of someone whom they did not like and intended to assassinate? This is why it is instructive that, as the New York Times reported, "in death Mr. Kennedy was praised and mourned in Moscow as no Western statesman before him had been... There could be no doubt about the depth of the feeling that the death had evoked among plain Soviet citizens.” The Times’s Moscow bureau provided some representative quotes: “Here was a man who tried to do good, and they would not let him live.” “What will U.S.-Soviet relations be in the future? Will the hope of peace be diminished?”³⁵ “Those wretches [referring to Kennedy’s killer or killers]. In his own country! Wasn’t he protected?”³⁶ The outpouring of emotion appeared second only to that in the United States. Premier and Mrs. Khrushchev sent personal messages of condolence to Mrs. Kennedy, and when Khrushchev and Foreign Minister Gromyko went to the residence of the U.S. ambassador in Moscow, Foy D. Kohler, on the morning after the assassination to pay their tribute and sign the condolence book, Gromyko “had tears in his eyes.”³⁷ In a November 25 letter to President Johnson, Khrushchev said, “J.F. Kennedy’s death is a grievous blow to all people for whom the cause of peace and Soviet-American cooperation is dear.”³⁸

TASS, the official Soviet press agency, in its first announcement about the assassination on November 23, was of the firm view that Kennedy had been killed by “extreme rightwing elements” in the United States.³⁹ On November 25, Moscow Radio stated its belief that the assassination “was a provocation by the Fascist forces and the reactionary circles who are madly resisting all steps leading to international relaxation. These are the elements that not only killed the U.S. President but strike at the interests of the U.S. people.”

That this wasn’t just for public consumption is the fact that documents in several internal KGB files enunciated the same belief. For instance, a December 1963 report from the deputy chairman of the KGB to the Central Committee reads, in part, “A reliable source...reported in late November that the real instigators of this criminal deed [assassination of Kennedy] were three leading oil magnates from the South of the USA—Richardson, Murchison and Hunt, all owners of major petroleum reserves in the southern states who have long been connected to pro-fascist and racist organizations in the South.”⁴⁰

The internal KGB documents further reflect the belief that Oswald was chosen as the assassin by the right wing because of his Russian-Marxist background so as to divert public attention away from the right wing and make the assassination appear to be the result of a Communist plot.⁴¹

According to a top-secret FBI document (because of the importance of this document, I’m excerpting substantial portions of it) declassified in 1996, a “source who has furnished reliable information in the past and who was in Russia on the date of the assassination” gave the FBI the following information on December 4, 1963: Officials of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the informant said, believed that the assassination was the result of some well-organized conspiracy on the part of the “ultra-right” in the United States to effect a “coup.” They seemed convinced that the assassination was not the deed of one man, but that it arose out of a carefully planned campaign in which several people played a part. They felt that those elements interested in utilizing the assassination and playing on anti-communist sentiments in the United States would then utilize this act to stop negotiations with the Soviet Union, attack Cuba and thereafter spread the war. As a result of these feelings, the Soviet Union immediately went into a state of national alert.

The document also says that “Soviet officials were fearful that without leadership, some irresponsible general in the United States might launch a missile at the Soviet Union.” The declassified FBI document goes on to say that Soviet officials said that “Lee Harvey Oswald had no connection whatsoever with the Soviet Union. They described him as a neurotic maniac who was disloyal to his own country and everything else.” The document quotes a second “reliable” source as saying that Nikolai T. Fedorenko, the Permanent Representative to the Soviet Mission to the United Nations, held a brief meeting with all diplomatic personnel employed at the Soviet Mission on November 23, 1963 [in New York City]. During this meeting, Fedorenko...stated that Kennedy’s death was very much regretted by the Soviet Union and had caused considerable shock in Soviet Government circles. Fedorenko stated that the Soviet Union would have preferred to have had President Kennedy at the helm of the American Government. He added that President Kennedy had, to some degree, a mutual understanding with the Soviet Union, and had tried seriously to improve relations between the United States and Russia. Fedorenko also added that little or nothing was known by the Soviet Government concerning President Lyndon Johnson and, as a result, the Soviet Government did not know what policies President Johnson would follow in the future regarding the Soviet Union.*

Since the Soviets didn’t know what they could expect of Johnson, do those conspiracy theorists who actually believe the Soviet Union was behind Kennedy’s assassination want us to believe that, in effect, the Soviets said, “Let’s kill Kennedy so we can find out”? I’m being facetious, but only to demonstrate how inconceivable it would be for the Soviets to murder Kennedy when they would have no way of knowing if his successor would be worse than Kennedy, particularly when U.S.-Soviet relations under Kennedy were relatively good.

Perhaps more tellingly (since, as indicated, any Soviet plot to kill Kennedy would have to involve the KGB), this second source said that Colonel Boris Ivanov, “chief of the Soviet Committee for State Security (KGB) Residency in New York City” (presumably the Soviet embassy in New York City, most of whose officials could be expected to be KGB), held a meeting of KGB personnel on the morning of November 25, 1963. Ivanov informed those present that President Kennedy’s death had posed a problem for the KGB and stated that it was necessary for all KGB employees to lend their efforts to solving the problem. Ivanov stated that it was his personal feeling that the assassination...had been planned by an organized group... [and] that it was therefore necessary that the KGB ascertain with the greatest possible speed the true story surrounding President Kennedy’s assassination. Ivanov stated that the KGB was interested in knowing all the factors and all of the possible groups which might have worked behind the scenes to organize and plan this assassination.⁴²

It really sounds as if the KGB and Khrushchev and the Soviet Union were behind the assassination after all, doesn't it? Along these same lines, we all know that before Gorbachev, the Soviet media, most prominently the Soviet newspapers Pravda and Izvestia, were simply a propaganda arm of the Communist Party and never published anything harmful to its interests. Indeed, before anything but routine, benign news was published, the Communist Party had to first clear it. Yet the September 28, 1964, edition of Pravda and the September 21, 1965, edition of Izvestia had large articles criticizing the Warren Commission's conclusion that there was no conspiracy in the Kennedy assassination.⁴³ Why would agents (Pravda, Izvestia) of the conspirators (Soviet Union, KGB) behind Kennedy's assassination want to criticize a report that concluded there was no evidence of a conspiracy? Wouldn't you think they'd want to remain as quiet as a painting on a wall?

Quite apart from the fact that no evidence has ever surfaced connecting the Soviet Union or KGB in any way with Kennedy's murder—and indeed, all the evidence points to the exact opposite—simple common sense, that rarest of attributes among conspiracy theorists, tells us the Soviets never would have sponsored Kennedy's assassination. And no one articulated this common sense better than Secretary of State Dean Rusk in his testimony before the Warren Commission.

Rusk: "I have not seen or heard of any scrap of evidence indicating that the Soviet Union had any desire to eliminate President Kennedy nor in any way participated in any such event. Standing back and trying to look at that question objectively despite the ideological differences between our two great systems, I can't see how it could be to the interest of the Soviet Union to make any such effort. Since I have become secretary of state I have seen no evidence of any policy of assassination of leaders of the free world on the part of the Soviets, and our intelligence community has not been able to furnish any evidence pointing in that direction. I am sure that I would have known about such bits of evidence had they existed but I also made inquiry myself to see whether there was such evidence, and received a negative reply. I do think that the Soviet Union, again objectively considered, has an interest in the correctness of state relations. This would be particularly true among the great powers, with which the major interests of the Soviet Union are directly engaged."

Warren Commission counsel: "Could you expand on that a little bit so that others than those who deal in that area might understand fully what you mean?"

Rusk: "Yes. I think that although there are grave differences between the Communist world and the free world, between the Soviet Union and other major powers, that even from their point of view there needs to be some shape and form to international relations, that it is not in their interest to have this world structure dissolve into complete anarchy, that great states and particularly nuclear powers have to be in a position to deal with each other, to transact business with each other, to try to meet problems with each other, and that requires the maintenance of correct relations and access to the leadership on all sides. I think also that although there had been grave differences between Chairman Khrushchev and President Kennedy, I think there were evidences of a certain mutual respect that had developed over some of the experiences, both good and bad, through which these two men had lived. I think both of them were aware of the fact that any chairman of the Soviet Union and any president of the United States necessarily bear somewhat special responsibility for the general peace of the world; indeed, without exaggeration, one could almost say the existence of the Northern Hemisphere in this nuclear age. So that it would be an act of rashness and madness for Soviet leaders to undertake such an action as an act of policy.* Because everything would have been put in jeopardy or at stake in connection with such an act. It has not been our impression that madness has characterized the actions of the Soviet leadership in recent years. I think also that it is relevant that people behind the Iron Curtain, including people in the Soviet Union and including officials in the Soviet Union, seem to be deeply affected by the death of President Kennedy. Their reactions were prompt, and I think genuine, of regret and sorrow. Mr. Khrushchev was the first to come to the embassy to sign the book of condolences. There were tears in the streets of Moscow. Moscow Radio spent a great deal of attention to these matters.”⁴⁴

In short, Russia had absolutely nothing to gain but much to lose in killing Kennedy.

Though Rusk’s reasoning is impeccable and cannot be controverted, the Warren Commission did not rely alone on such common sense. As it stated (and the volumes of the Commission demonstrate), the Commission “examined all the known facts regarding Oswald’s defection, residence in the Soviet Union, and return to the United States. At each step the Commission sought to determine whether there was any evidence which supported a conclusion that Soviet authorities may have directly or indirectly influenced Oswald’s actions in assassinating the President,”⁴⁵ but it could not find any such evidence.⁴⁶ The HSCA, after its own thorough investigation, stated its belief that on the basis of the evidence it had seen, “the Soviet Government was not involved in the assassination of President Kennedy.”⁴⁷

Even were we to imagine the unimaginable, that the Soviets wanted to murder Kennedy, they obviously would have employed someone who was stable, not completely unstable like Oswald. Also, to distance themselves from the vile deed as much as possible, they would have chosen someone with no known previous contact or association with them, not a Marxist who had defected to their country just a few years earlier. With respect to this same issue of distancing, a foreigner in the Soviet Union, as Oswald was, cannot marry a Soviet citizen without the permission of the Soviet government.⁴⁸ If the KGB had any intention of using Oswald as its agent to kill Kennedy, it makes little sense that it would have allowed him to marry Marina and take her with him back to America. The KGB would know that having a Russian wife would most likely increase the probability of surveillance or interest in him by U.S. intelligence during the height of the cold war, which would not be beneficial to its plans. A Russian wife would even, necessarily, make Oswald more conspicuous to his neighbors (again, incompatible with its interests), and would even decrease his freedom of movement and mobility.⁴⁹

Indeed, if the KGB did send Oswald, as a secret agent, to America in June of 1962 for the apparent purpose, as some conspiracy theorists would want us to believe, of assassinating Kennedy, would it have allowed him, right up through the summer of 1963, to draw attention to himself and continue to be openly Marxist (passing out pro-Castro leaflets on the streets of New Orleans and proclaiming his Marxism on New Orleans radio, etc.)? Such a proposition is too absurd to even comment on.

Right Wing

The initial belief, exemplified by an FBI Teletype, that the right wing in America, scalding angry at Kennedy for his pro-civil rights stance, was responsible for Kennedy's death didn't last very long—the seventy-five minutes between the time of the assassination at 12:30 p.m. on November 22, 1963, and the arrest of Oswald, an avowed Marxist as the only suspect, at 1:45 p.m. that day.¹

Actually, at the beginning Kennedy was not a particularly aggressive advocate of expanding civil rights in America. In fact, during the better part of his short presidency, civil rights leaders like Martin Luther King frequently expressed their dissatisfaction with the insufficient vigor with which they felt Kennedy was legislatively promoting their agenda. He was, for example, completely silent on civil rights in his January 20, 1961, inaugural speech.^{2*} But civil rights have never been the sole concern of the nation's black population. Certainly, for most of the disproportionate number of blacks living in poverty, their lowly economic condition is of perhaps even more immediate concern to them. And Kennedy had said eloquently in his speech that “if a free society cannot help the many who are poor, it cannot save the few who are rich.” How much of a jump was it for a black man to conclude that someone who wanted to help the poor would also be mindful and protective of his civil rights? A 1962 national poll among blacks showed that next to Martin Luther King, John Kennedy was their favorite public figure,³ and they took his death particularly hard. “When my father died,” a black New York City cabdriver told the New York Times right after the assassination, “I didn't shed a tear until the funeral was almost over. When Mr. Kennedy died, I cried so much I couldn't drive this cab. I didn't know I could love a white man that much.”⁴

One Kennedy biographer, Richard Reeves, attributed his lassitude about civil rights not to his being unsympathetic to the plight of blacks in America, but more to his being, at bottom, a politician, and polls showed that the majority of Americans wanted to proceed slowly in the area of civil rights, the nation's temperature for civil rights change being lukewarm at best. “For Kennedy, civil rights, Negro demands, were just politics, a volatile issue to be defused.” Reeves also notes that Kennedy's blue-blood roots had not given him the knowledge and feelings about the deep suffering of many blacks in America that one with a more proletarian background might have. (“The only Negro he spent time with” for fourteen years prior to his becoming president, per Reeves, was his valet, George Thomas.)⁵ As author Victor S. Navasky wrote, “The civil rights program of the new Administration was more limited than John Kennedy's campaign rhetoric would have suggested or than civil rights activists hoped.”⁶

However, the aristocratic president, whose penchant for philosophy, poetry, and the arts made him beloved by the eastern intellectual cognoscenti, had an instinctual concern for the less fortunate, the natural extension of his patrician sense of noblesse oblige. In other words, Kennedy's heart was in the right place, and he did, finally, in a televised speech to the nation on the evening of June 11, 1963—two and a half years into his presidency—speak forcefully for the first time of the “moral crisis” in America of blacks not having the same rights as whites. He stated, “One hundred years of delay have passed since President Lincoln freed the slaves, yet their heirs, their grandsons, are not fully free. They are not yet freed from the bonds of injustice. They are not yet freed from social and economic oppression. And this nation, for all its hopes and all its boasts, will not be fully free until all its citizens are free.” He said, “I am, therefore, asking the Congress to enact legislation giving all Americans the right to be served in facilities which are open to the public—hotels, restaurants, theaters, retail stores and similar establishments...I am also asking Congress to authorize the Federal Government to participate more fully in lawsuits designed to end segregation in public education.”⁷ “Kennedy was the first president,” civil rights leader John Lewis observed, “to say the issue of race was a moral issue. That tied him to the black community forever.”⁸ Indeed, Look magazine observed, Kennedy “was the first President since Lincoln to marshal all his authority for the cause of the Negro.”⁹ Although Kennedy’s speech was cobbled together almost at the last moment and contained repetition, even some ad lib by JFK, it was one of his very finest moments, one of the most powerful and important (yet surprisingly unheralded) civil rights speeches ever given by a public figure.*

Even before June 11, 1963, however, as we saw earlier in this book, on September 30, 1962, Kennedy and his brother Robert, the attorney general, had dispatched U.S. marshals and troops to “Ole Miss,” the University of Mississippi at Oxford, to escort a black, James Meredith, into the administration building to enroll (his fourth attempt) over the opposition of the segregationist governor, Ross Barnett, and rioters shouting, “Two-four-one-three, we hate Kennedy.”

Although an interracial group of 230,000 Americans marched in Washington, D.C., on August 28, 1963,† to urge Congress to enact Kennedy’s comprehensive civil rights legislation (the march was culminated by King’s “I have a dream...” oration), the proposed legislation, which would be the most sweeping civil rights legislation since Reconstruction, was never enacted during the Kennedy presidency. That would have to wait until Kennedy’s successor, ironically a southerner, shepherded through Congress the landmark Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. But certainly, the seeds of racial equality and justice, brought to fruition during LBJ’s presidency, had been planted very firmly during the Kennedy years, and it was said by many that the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was a “memorial” to the slain president.‡

Despite Kennedy’s efforts to fog up their view, it was very clear to the nation’s racists, primarily in the Ku Klux Klan–infested South, whose side he was on, and they of course developed a strong hatred for him. It wasn’t just the conviction among racists and reactionaries that blacks were still chattels to be owned and used by the white man, but the abiding belief that any social measures to improve their lot would take this country in the inevitable direction of socialism and hence, in their mind, Communism. (“Integration is Communism inspired,” Mississippi’s Governor Ross Barnett charged.) In the middle of the cold war with Communist Russia, this was another reason for the Far Right’s hatred of Kennedy. As if that were not enough, there was the fear among the radical Right that a progressive administration like Kennedy’s would ultimately turn this nation over to the United Nations, a one-world government controlled, they believed, by international Jews.

The most powerful group in the Far Right during this period, claiming a membership of 100,000, was the John Birch Society. Headed by Robert Welch, the society advocated segregation, an invasion to liberate Cuba, and the abolition of foreign aid. The society’s principal bête noire was Communism, and it kept files on “Comsymps,” all those they suspected were Communists or Communist sympathizers. The Minutemen was a smaller paramilitary group of around 25,000 members who were training in camps around the country, preparing to provide armed resistance to what they predicted was an imminent Communist invasion. They had recently declared Dallas an “impregnable” city, vowing to trap the Reds in the desert surrounding Dallas with their “guerilleros.”¹⁰ The yet smaller Ku Klux Klan, with its murderous antipathy for blacks, only accepted into its ranks “loyal citizens born in the United States, Christian, white, with high morals, of the Protestant faith, believing in Americanism and the supremacy of the white race.” All three of these groups, as well as religious groups like the Christian Anti-Communist Crusade, viewed Kennedy as a threat to America and its values, and actively fomented opposition and venom against him and his administration. This is why many of them rejoiced in his death. “Kennedy died a tyrant’s death,” Richard Ely, president of the ultraconservative Memphis Citizens Council, said after the assassination. “He encouraged integration, which has the support of Communism. He was a tyrant.”¹¹

With the heavy migration of southern blacks—who felt there had to be more to life than cotton, spirituals, and the Ku Klux Klan—to large northern cities disrupting the calcified social structure of these cities (with resultant riots), and the South continuing to resist integration in each and every public facility, the 1960s was a period of almost unparalleled civil strife between blacks and whites in America. Blacks, particularly in the South under the leadership of Martin Luther King, were demanding their share of the American dream, and white supremacists were not only resisting, but resorting to murder to prevent it, much of the violence occurring right in the months preceding Kennedy’s assassination. On April 23, 1963, William L. Moore, a thirty-five-year-old white mailman and World War II veteran from Binghamton, New York, bearing a sign on his back urging equality for blacks, was shot to death along a remote stretch of highway near Colbran, Alabama. Moore, known for his “one-man marches,” was on his way from Chattanooga, Tennessee, to Jackson, Mississippi, to deliver a letter (found on his body) to Governor Barnett, which said, “The white man cannot truly free himself until all men have their rights.” On June 12, 1963, the descendant of a southern shareholding family, Byron De La Beckwith, shot and killed Medgar W. Evers, the secretary of the Mississippi NAACP, as he was walking in his driveway to the front door of his home in Jackson. And on September 15, 1963, in Birmingham, Alabama, four KKK members detonated a bomb at a black Baptist church, killing four young girls and injuring twenty parishioners. (The killings continued after Kennedy’s death. For instance, on June 21, 1964, near Philadelphia, Mississippi, a deputy sheriff delivered three civil rights workers, two northern whites and a black Mississippian, to a squad of Ku Klux Klansmen, who gunned them to death.)

Though there had not yet been any murders in Dallas directly traceable to the civil rights movement, the city was widely perceived as being a hub of right-wing fanaticism. Among other things, it was the home of oil magnate H. L. Hunt, a Kennedy critic who funded conservative causes, and Major General Edwin A. Walker, a leader of the John Birch Society in Dallas whom Kennedy, as we saw earlier in this book, had relieved of his command in West Germany for distributing right-wing literature to his troops, prompting Walker to resign from the military.* Byron Skelton, a national Democratic committeeman from Texas concerned about the president’s safety, wrote Attorney General Robert Kennedy seeking to dissuade his brother from coming to Texas. Indeed, as noted earlier, a month before the assassination, Adlai Stevenson had spoken in Dallas at a United Nations Day celebration, and leaving the auditorium was confronted by an angry mob of hecklers, one of whom crashed her sign down on top of his head, another expectorating on him. The next day, Stevenson spoke to Kennedy assistant Arthur Schlesinger about the “very ugly and frightening” atmosphere in Dallas and wondered whether the president should travel there.† But political considerations outweighed the fears. As previously indicated, in October, Newsweek reported that Kennedy’s position on civil rights had cost him 3.5 million votes, and that no Democratic president had been so disliked in the South.¹²

It was amidst this highly charged and combustible atmosphere that Kennedy, trying to shore up his image in the South, came to Dallas on November 22, 1963, and the Far Right predictably greeted him with its vitriol. It started the previous day and continued throughout the morning of the assassination when five thousand throwaway handbills captioned “Wanted for Treason” were distributed on the streets of Dallas. As set forth in seven numbered paragraphs, among the many “treasonous activities against the United States” that Kennedy was wanted for was “turning the sovereignty of the U.S. over to the communist controlled United Nations,” giving “support and encouragement to the Communist inspired racial riots,” and appointing “Anti-Christians to Federal office.”¹³ The author of the handbill was one Robert A. Surrey, a business and political associate of retired General Walker.¹⁴ Naturally, when Kennedy was shot, the instinctive reaction of a great many was that it must have been at the hands of his political enemy, the radical Right. Leftist Thomas G. Buchanan, perhaps hyperbolizing a bit, wrote that before Oswald’s arrest, Kennedy’s death “had been universally attributed to southern white-supremacy fanatics.”¹⁵

And the immediate response of the FBI clearly illustrates its belief (before Oswald was arrested) that the Far Right was behind the assassination: agents called H. L. Hunt and told him that his and his family’s lives would probably be threatened “as a result of the president’s death,” and urged him to leave town (Dallas) at once. Although the head-strong Hunt “objected strenuously,” his chief of security, former FBI agent Paul Rothermel, ordered plane tickets for Hunt and his wife and they departed for Washington, D.C., Hunt saying that rather than go into hiding somewhere, “I believe I can do better going to Washington to help Lyndon. He’s gonna need some help.”¹⁶ A Teletype from FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C., to all FBI field offices just over an hour after the shooting assumed that the right wing was responsible for Kennedy’s murder, directing all field offices to “immediately establish whereabouts of...all known Klan and hate group members, known racial extremists...[who] may possibly have been involved.”¹⁷ And the Atlanta FBI office immediately “ascertained the whereabouts” of Joseph Milteer (see later text), J. B. Stoner, and Melvin Bruce, all prominent members of the militant Far Right.¹⁸

But today, even among conspiracy theorists, the belief that the Far Right was behind Kennedy’s murder has not had, to use an entertainment term, legs. It has taken a backseat to the more popular theories about the mob, CIA, and military-industrial complex. In fact, some conspiracy books don’t even bother to mention the right wing. But there continue to be conspiracy books that do mention it as a possible suspect in the assassination, and they usually focus their attention on Dallas multimillionaire H. L. Hunt or Georgia right-wing extremist Joseph Milteer.

Hunt, the founder and president of the Hunt Oil Company headquartered in Dallas, was the wealthiest and most powerful of all the big Texas oil barons. He was also eccentric, someone who, it was said, brought his lunch to work every day in a brown paper bag so he wouldn’t have to buy it. He was so close with his money that he never left tips for waitresses, even when twelve people were at his table.¹⁹ But like most people, he had passions, among which were having more than one wife (at one time), gambling, writing a torrent of letters to the editors of newspapers large and small throughout the country, and supporting conservative causes.

Terrified of the Communist threat, Hunt funded his pet, “LIFE LINE,” a right-wing organization whose fifteen-minute radio broadcasts of Christian fundamentalism and political conservatism went out six days a week (the Sabbath broadcast was all religion) to 354 stations in the country. Though very conservative, “Hunt remained an independent” throughout the years,²⁰ and there’s no evidence that he ever belonged to radical Right groups like the John Birch Society. His principal attack on Kennedy came during the presidential campaign of 1960 when Hunt, hoping LBJ would get the Democratic nomination, secretly funded the dissemination of two hundred thousand copies of a sermon by the Reverend W. A. Criswell of Dallas’s First Baptist Church in which Criswell said that “the election of a Catholic as president would mean the end of religious freedom in America.”

There being no evidence that Hunt had anything to do with the assassination,* the fringe conspiracy theorists postulate he had a motive, and to their way of thinking, if he had a motive this alone means he’s guilty of the murder.

Hunt’s motive, per the conspiracy theorists? In addition to Kennedy’s pro-civil rights stance,† mainly his alleged desire to reduce the oil-depletion allowance.²¹

The oil-depletion allowance, dating in this country to the Revenue Act of 1916, was a recognition by Congress of the uniqueness of “extractive” industries, whose business literally requires the sale of its primary asset (in this case, oil). Other businesses, like manufacturing, obviously don’t require this. Because their capital asset is depleted with every sale, Congress gave the oil and gas industries a substantial tax break. Since 1926, and through Kennedy’s term of office, the tax break (oil-depletion allowance) exempted from taxation the first 27.5 percent of the gross income of oil and gas producers, with a limit of 50 percent of net income. Originally being at 5 percent, it was increased to 12.5, then 25, and finally, in 1926, to 27.5 percent. Indicative of the power of the oil and gas lobby, in 1963 the depletion allowance was 23 percent for sulfur and 15 percent for metal.²²

What was Kennedy’s position on the oil-depletion allowance? In response to an inquiry by Gerald C. Mann, the director of the Kennedy-Johnson 1960 Texas Democratic Campaign, on Kennedy’s position vis-à-vis the allowance, Kennedy wrote in an October 13, 1960, letter to Mann that “I have consistently...made clear my recognition of the value and importance of the oil-depletion allowance. [It] has served us well...A healthy domestic oil industry is essential to national security.”

Although there were unsuccessful congressional efforts to reduce the oil-depletion allowance in 1950, 1951, 1954, 1957, 1958, and 1960, at no time during Kennedy’s term of office was there any publicized proposal or legislative effort to repeal or reduce the allowance. In the January 24, 1963, tax reduction ($13.6 billion) and reform package Kennedy presented to Congress, as the New York Times said, Kennedy “avoided a head-on fight over the controversial 27½ per cent depletion allowance for oil and gas producers.” However, Kennedy, who had come to believe that the oil and gas titans had become too greedy, proposed changes in the capital gains tax as a part of his reform package that would generate an additional $300 million a year from the oil and gas people.²³ But by September 1963, seeing how the reform features of his tax bill were being diluted and eviscerated in the House Ways and Means Committee by congressmen beholden to big oil and other corporate interests that contributed to their campaigns, Kennedy told his secretary of the Treasury, C. Douglas Dillon, that he was dropping his reforms.²⁴

But even if Kennedy had reduced or even eliminated the oil-depletion allowance, the notion that Hunt (and, per the conspiracy theorists, other big oilmen like Clint Murchison) would hire someone to kill Kennedy because of it is really too ridiculous to talk about—unless, of course, there is some evidence, which there is not.

Interestingly, in 1975 a copy of a handwritten letter dated November 8, 1963, and presumably signed by Oswald, was mailed anonymously from Mexico City to Texas conspiracy theorist Penn Jones.* The letter, to “Mr. Hunt,” read as follows:

I would like information concerding [sic] my position.

I am asking only for information. I am suggesting that we discussed the matter fully before any steps are taken by me or anyone else.

Thank you.
Lee Harvey Oswald²⁵

If legitimate, which it was not, the letter would indeed be some evidence connecting Hunt to the assassination. In March of 1977, Jones turned a copy of the letter over to the Dallas Morning News for analysis. Three handwriting experts employed by the News concluded that the writing belonged to Oswald.²⁶ In 1978, the first hint of forgery emerged when handwriting experts from the HSCA said that although the “writing pattern” was “consistent” with other documents known to have been written by Oswald, the writing in this letter was suspicious because it was “much more precisely and much more carefully written.” Also, the “H” in Harvey differed “significantly” from Oswald’s handwriting. In other words, if it were a forgery, the forgers weren’t real pros. The HSCA concluded that “we were unable to come to any firm conclusion regarding this particular document. It is suspicion [sic], although we are not able to accurately determine that it is specifically a forgery.”²⁷

For years no one knew for sure whether the letter was a forgery or not, and who “Mr. Hunt” was, although most of the conspiracy community assumed he was the Texas oil magnate. Both mysteries were cleared up in 1999 with the publication of the book The Sword and the Shield by Christopher Andrew and Vasili Mitrokhin. As indicated earlier, Mitrokhin was the former KGB agent who worked in the foreign intelligence archives of the KGB for almost thirty years and defected to Britain in 1992, taking a decade’s accumulation of notes and transcripts with him. It turns out that the KGB, naturally eager to deflect the continuing suspicion of some that it was behind the assassination, and to promote the more popular theory that the CIA was responsible for Kennedy’s murder, forged the letter, its addressee referring to E. Howard Hunt, the shadowy CIA officer who seemed to be part of so many CIA intrigues and whose name, in conspiracy literature, is sometimes confused with H. L. Hunt. Mitrokhin said that before the letter was sent to “three of the most active conspiracy buffs, . . . the forgery was twice checked for authenticity by the Third Department of the KGB’s OTU (Operational Technical) Directorate.”²⁸

The allegation of right-wing responsibility for the assassination that has always carried the most serious implications is that involving Joseph Milteer, a sixty-one-year-old right-wing extremist. Having inherited enough money to make him independent, Milteer lived in a rundown mansion in Quitman, Georgia. He belonged to militantly conservative groups like the National States Rights Party, the White Citizens’ Council, and the Dixie Klan. In October of 1963 he formed his own party, the obscure Constitutional American Parties of the U.S. in Valdosta, Georgia.

On November 9, 1963, William Somerset, a union organizer and former Ku Klux Klansman who had become a paid informant for the Intelligence Division of the Miami Police Department in 1962, but still retained close ties to the right-wing community, allowed the Miami police to set up a recorder in the broom closet of his Miami apartment and secretly tape a conversation with his old friend Milteer. If one selectively excerpts from the transcript of the conversation, as most conspiracy theorists have done,^{*} it reads as if Milteer was definitely part of the conspiracy to kill Kennedy or had intimate knowledge of it, right down to the details. Here's an example, from Henry Hurt's Reasonable Doubt: "Milteer informed a 'friend' that the assassination of JFK was in the works. Milteer explained that Kennedy would be killed 'from an office building with a high-powered rifle.' He stated that 'they will pick up somebody within hours afterwards...just to throw the public off.'"²⁹ Sounds pretty cut and dried, right? But when we look at the entire portion of the transcript dealing with Kennedy, it's clear that Milteer really had no advance knowledge of any plot at all and was merely engaging in loose talk.

Somerset: "I don't know. I think Kennedy is coming here [Miami] on the 18th [November 18, 1963], or something like that, to make some kind of speech. I don't know what it is, but I imagine it will be on the TV and you can be on the look[out] for that. I think it is the 18th that he is supposed to be here for a speech. I don't know [what] it's supposed to be about."

Milteer: "You can bet your bottom dollar he is going to have a lot to say about the Cubans. There are so many of them here."

Somerset: "Yes. Well, he will have a thousand bodyguards. Don't worry about that."

Milteer: "The more bodyguards he has, the more easier it is to get him."

(It should be noted that when anyone, in conversation, makes a reference to bodyguards, this frequently causes the person to whom he or she is talking to speculate about how effective the bodyguards can be in protecting the subject person. Indeed, the idea for the tape-recording session originated with an assistant to the local Florida state attorney, and as indicated, Miami police set the tape-recording up. So it seems clear that Somerset brought up the subject of bodyguards confident it would elicit a response from Milteer similar to what Milteer ended up saying. But that doesn't necessarily make Milteer's response incriminating.)

Somerset: "What?"

Milteer: "The more bodyguards he has, the easier it is to get him."

Somerset: "Well, how in the hell do you figure would be the best way to get him?"

Milteer: "From an office building with a high-powered rifle."

(So we see that Somerset has asked Milteer how Kennedy could be killed, and Milteer is simply answering how it could be done. Yet Henry Hurt, who read the same words you have just read, told his readers that Milteer informed Somerset “that Kennedy would be killed from an office building with a high-powered rifle.”³⁰ It should be further noted that Milteer’s observation as to how Kennedy could easily be killed by a high-powered rifle from an office building is one that many people had made, including the president himself. “[Kennedy] often talked about how easy it would be for somebody to shoot at him with a rifle from a high building.”³¹ Indeed, Forest Sorrels, head of the Dallas Secret Service office, said that when he was discussing with local authorities the route the president’s motorcade should take through Dallas, he made the remark “that if someone wanted to get the president of the United States, he could do it with a high-powered rifle...from some building.”³²

Milteer: “How many people does he have going around looking just like him? Do you know about that?”

Somerset: “No, I never heard he had anybody.”

Milteer: “He sure has got them.”

Somerset: “He has?”

Milteer: “He has about fifteen. Whenever he goes anyplace...he knows he is a marked man.”

(No one has ever said that as part of Kennedy’s security there were Kennedy doubles wherever he went, much less fifteen of them. The fact that Milteer said this indicates that even if there were a conspiracy to kill Kennedy, Milteer was not an integral part of it.)

Somerset: “You think he knows he’s a marked man?”

Milteer: “Sure he does. Sure does—yeah.”

Somerset: “They are really going to try to kill him?”

Milteer: “Oh yeah, it is in the working. Brown, himself. Brown is just as likely to get him as anybody. He didn’t say so, but he tried to get Martin Luther King.”

(Although Milteer says that killing Kennedy “is in the working,” he says this in response to a very leading question that Milteer buys into. Moreover, it is clear from the context that this is absolutely loose talk on Milteer’s part. Milteer certainly is not saying that he is a party to any conspiracy to kill Kennedy, and Brown is going to be the hit man. He’s merely speculating here that Brown would be a likely hit man. By the way, “Brown” is believed to be Jack Brown, at that time the Imperial Wizard of the Dixie Klan in Chattanooga, Tennessee.)³³

Somerset: “He did?”

Milteer: “Oh yes. He followed him for miles and miles, and couldn’t get close enough to him.”

Somerset: “I never asked Brown about his business or anything, you know just what he told me, told us, you know. But after the conversation, and the way he talked to us, there is no question in my mind who knocked the church off in Birmingham, you can believe that, that is the way I figured it.”

Milteer: “That is right, it is the only way you can figure it.”

Somersett: “That is right.”

Milteer: “Not being there, not knowing anything.”

(Brown obviously fed Somersett and Milteer a line of hooey about Birmingham. Within days of the church bombing there, the FBI arrested four suspects, all members of the Ku Klux Klan, and these four, to this day, are the only ones believed to have been involved. None are named Brown. Their names are Robert E. “Dynamite Bob” Chambliss, Bobby Frank Cherry, Thomas Blanton Jr., and Herman Frank Cash.)³⁴

Somersett: “But from his conversation, as you and me know him, but if they did, it is their business, like you say.”

Milteer: “It is up to the individual.”

Somersett: “That is right. They are individual operators, we don’t want that within the party. Hitting this Kennedy is going to be a hard proposition, I tell you, I believe, you may have figured out a way to get him. You may have figured out the office building, and all that. I don’t know how them Secret Service agents cover all them office buildings, or anywhere he is going. Do you know if they do that or not?”

Milteer: “Well, if they have any suspicions, they do that, of course. But without suspicion, chances are that they wouldn’t. You take there in Washington, of course. It is the wrong time of year, but you take pleasant weather, he comes out on the veranda, there, and somebody could be in a hotel room across the way there, and pick him off just like—(fades out).”

(Since Kennedy was scheduled to come to Miami in nine days, and the tape-recorded conversation took place in Miami, it appears that Somersett’s speculation was probably about Kennedy being killed in Miami, not Dallas. Yet Milteer responds about Washington, D.C., not Dallas. In any event, it’s clearly just speculative, loose talk by Milteer.)

Somersett: “Is that right?”

Milteer: “Sure, disassemble a gun, get on out. You don’t have to take a gun up there. You can take it up in pieces, all those guns come knock[ed] down. You can take them apart...”

Somersett: “Boy, if that Kennedy gets shot, we have got to know where we are at. Because, you know, that will be a real shake, if they do that.”

Milteer: “They wouldn’t leave any stone unturned there, no way. They will pick up somebody within hours afterwards, if anything like that would happen, just to throw the public off.”

(Henry Hurt didn't tell his readers that immediately after Milteer said, "They will pick up somebody within hours afterwards," his very next words were "if anything like that would happen," words clearly showing that Milteer was not saying Kennedy was about to be murdered, but rather, what would happen if he were.)³⁵

Somersett: "Oh, somebody's going to have to go to jail, if he gets killed."

Milteer: "Just like that Bruno Hauptman in the Lindbergh case, you know."³⁶

Such is the lifeblood of the conspiracy theorists' movement—deliberate (or terribly incompetent) distortion of the official record, the precise thing they all accuse the Warren Commission of.

Miami police turned the transcript of the Somersett-Milteer conversation over to the Secret Service on November 12, and it was furnished to the Service's advance agents for the president's upcoming trip to Miami Beach on November 18. There is no indication that the Secret Service took Milteer's words seriously, although Special Agent Robert Jamison of the Miami Secret Service had Somersett call Milteer in Valdosta on November 18, before Kennedy arrived in Miami that day, to verify Milteer was there, not in Miami. When Somersett verified he was and further advised the Secret Service that he did not know of any violence-prone associates of Milteer's in the Miami area, the Protective Research Section of the Secret Service closed the case and didn't notify the Washington, D.C., Secret Service detail in charge of the upcoming Dallas trip or the Secret Service in Dallas of Milteer's remarks.

In the late afternoon on the day after the assassination, Somersett met Milteer at the Union train station in Jacksonville, Florida, and journeyed with him to Columbia, South Carolina, to meet with four members of the Ku Klux Klan. With all of Milteer's clear speculation turning out to have actually occurred, it was easy for him to now sound as if he really knew. "Everything ran true to form," he said (not on tape) to Somersett during the train trip. "I guess you thought I was kidding you when I said he would be killed [as we have seen, this was not what Milteer had said] from a window with a high-powered rifle." When Somersett asked Milteer whether he had originally been guessing, Milteer replied, "I don't do any guessing."³⁷

The HSCA investigated an allegation that two Dealey Plaza photographs, one by James Altgens, the other by Mark Bell, showed Milteer in the motorcade crowd, but three forensic anthropologists for the HSCA concluded the man was not Milteer. Among other things, the man in the photo was "substantially taller" (almost six inches) than Milteer, who was five feet four inches.³⁸ To the allegation that Milteer called a friend from Dallas on the morning of the assassination, the HSCA said it "could find no evidence that Milteer was in Dallas on the day of the assassination."³⁹

The FBI interviewed Milteer* and investigated the entire Milteer story, concluding he was not a suspect in the assassination.⁴⁰ And the HSCA, conducting its own investigation, was unable to find any connection between Milteer's statements and the assassination. Indeed, a thorough HSCA investigation found no connection between any of Milteer's associates and Oswald or Ruby, or with any of the latter's associates.⁴¹

The Milteer tape story first surfaced publicly in an article by reporter Bill Barry in the Miami News on February 2, 1967. Milteer died in February of 1974.

The argument that the right wing was behind Kennedy's assassination suffers, like all other conspiracy theories, from the inconvenient and stubborn reality that there is no evidence of its involvement. Moreover, since we know Oswald killed Kennedy, the only way for right wingers to have been involved in the assassination would be if they had gotten Oswald to kill Kennedy for them. But why would the Far Right even think that an avowed Marxist (someone, by the way, who just five months earlier had attempted to murder one of its own, right-wing icon Major General Edwin Walker) would be willing to murder someone whom the right wing viewed as very liberal? Indeed, why would Oswald, who detested the Far Right, even think of doing its bidding?

Parenthetically, if the Far Right had decided to kill Kennedy, it is hard to believe they would have picked Dallas, a roiling center of ultraconservative activity, as the locus for the assassination, for they would have to know that such a locus would immediately attract suspicion to them, which is precisely what happened prior to Oswald's arrest. It is also very hard to believe that liberals on the Warren Commission and its staff, like Chief Justice Warren and Assistant Counsel Norman Redlich, would cover up the assassination (as almost all conspiracy theorists believe they did) for the Far Right.

LBJ

Because LBJ, above all others, profited the most from the assassination of Kennedy, a death that enabled him to achieve his lifetime goal, many in the conspiracy community have always suspected his involvement in the alleged plot. And according to a 2003 Gallup Poll, an astonishing 18 percent of Americans, nearly one out of every five people, also suspect him of being involved.¹ The rumor that Kennedy was going to replace Johnson—weakened by the burgeoning bribery and influence-peddling scandal involving his Senate aide and friend Bobby Baker—on the 1964 ticket has served to fortify these suspicions. Indeed, an article in the Dallas Morning News on the day of the assassination was captioned “Nixon Predicts JFK May Drop Johnson.”

It is curious how this rumor gained traction when just a little over three weeks earlier, Kennedy had said he wanted LBJ to run with him again. At an October 31 news conference, a reporter, referring to “talk that Lyndon B. Johnson would be dumped next year,” asked the president if he wanted Mr. Johnson on the ticket and if he expected that he would be on the ticket. “Yes to both those questions,” the president said, “That’s correct.”²

Arthur Schlesinger, a member of Kennedy’s inner circle and later a chronicler of the Kennedy presidency, called the belief that Kennedy would jettison Johnson “wholly fanciful. Kennedy... considered [Johnson] able and loyal. In addition, if Goldwater was to be the Republican candidate, the Democrats needed every possible asset in the South.” Within the Kennedy administration at the time of the assassination, “Johnson’s renomination” was “assumed.”³ The president told a confidant in October of 1963 that the idea of dumping Johnson was “preposterous on the face of it. We’ve got to carry Texas in ’64 and maybe Georgia.”⁴ And in April of 1964, Robert F. Kennedy said that there had been no intention of dropping Johnson from the ticket.⁵

It has also been alleged (certainly true) that Johnson, the Texas hillbilly with the boorish manners and pedestrian education (who also happened to be extraordinarily complex and talented), was never comfortable in a presidential administration dominated by Ivy League intellectuals, many with bluish blood coursing through them. He deeply resented their poorly veiled condescension toward him and being the butt of their jokes,* cementing the view, in the eyes of conspiracy theorists, that Johnson just had to be, in some way, complicit in the tragedy of Dealey Plaza.

It cannot be disputed that Johnson achieved much enduring good during his presidency and had some good and honorable qualities to his makeup. I find it difficult to believe that men of substance and unquestionable character like Bill Moyers would have devoted their energies so wholeheartedly to his service if he did not. But he was also a carnivorous political animal who crossed moral and ethical lines from time to time in his ascent to power. Acclaimed biographies of LBJ, such as Robert A. Caro’s three volumes (Path to Power in 1982, Means of Ascent in 1990, and Master of the Senate in 2002), eliminate all doubt as to this point. Robert Dallek captured the essence of Johnson well in the two-word title to his LBJ biography: Flawed Giant. In 1978, when Tom Snyder on the Tomorrow Show asked LBJ friend and respected confidant Jack Valenti, “Was Lyndon Johnson an honest man?” Valenti smiled and answered wryly, “He was an honest man except when honesty didn’t suit the situation.”⁶

I guess it all started with LBJ's highly controversial runoff win over Texas governor Coke Stevenson in the 1948 Democratic primary for the U.S. Senate. Johnson had supposedly lost by 113 votes until a "corrected" vote came in from the now infamous Precinct 13 ballot box in Alice, Texas, giving Johnson 202 additional votes and Stevenson only 1. "Landslide Lyndon" defeated Stevenson by 87 votes statewide, and the suspicion of fraud, and LBJ's complicity or knowledge therein, was immediate.⁷ Indeed, the subtitle of J. Evetts Haley's 1964 book, A Texan Looks at Lyndon, is A Study in Illegitimate Power. However, the notion that LBJ would actually decide to have Kennedy murdered (or be a party to such a plot by others) is not one that, to my knowledge, any rational and sensible student of the assassination has ever entertained for a moment.

But conspiracy theorists are not rational and sensible when it comes to the Kennedy assassination. The first conspiracy author to accuse Johnson of complicity in a book was the German-born American Communist Joachim Joesten, who wrote in his 1968 Dark Side of Lyndon Baines Johnson that there was a "grand conspiracy to kill the President of the United States... It was an all-American plot in which Lyndon B. Johnson, acting in cahoots with the Dallas oligarchy and with the local branches of the CIA, the FBI, and the Secret Service, played the leading part."⁸

Joesten spawned many successors. "Students of the assassination cannot discount the idea that Johnson, in some way, played a role in the Dallas tragedy," writes conspiracy theorist Jim Marrs in Crossfire.⁹ "Lyndon Johnson" is one of the "prime suspects in the JFK assassination," Ralph D. Thomas says in his book Missing Links in the JFK Assassination Conspiracy.¹⁰ The evidence suggests, conspiracy theorists J. Gary Shaw and Larry Harris write in their book Cover-Up, that Johnson "might have had prior knowledge of the assassination" or that "he might have made an agreement to protect Kennedy's killers."¹¹ "It is now very easy to suspect that a mutuality of purpose between LBJ and powerful sources in Texas... had much to do with the behind-the-scenes doings that led to the gunfire in Dealey Plaza," says Walt Brown in his book Treachery in Dallas. Johnson knew, Brown says, that his political life "depended on John Kennedy's political death."¹² Conspiracy author Noel Twyman writes in Bloody Treason, "Recognizing that Lyndon Johnson was part of the conspiracy to assassinate John F. Kennedy is something that I have come to reluctantly."¹³ The outrageous lawyer-author Barr McClellan says, "Stated simply, LBJ killed JFK."¹⁴ New Orleans DA Jim Garrison also weighed in on this point. In a speech on November 14, 1967, before the Radio and Television News Association of Southern California in Los Angeles, he accused LBJ of exerting pressure on state officials not to extradite witnesses in Garrison's investigation and of concealing evidence from the American people. The fact, Garrison said, that Johnson "has profited from the assassination more than any other man makes it imperative that he see that the evidence is released so that we can know that he is not involved."¹⁵

A contention of some conspiracy theorists is that Johnson "lured" Kennedy into coming to Texas, the implication being that he was part of a conspiracy to kill Kennedy. But U.S. News & World Report, whose comprehensive coverage of the assassination through the years has stood out, investigated this issue by interviewing several witnesses who would know, and found that actually Johnson was "against" JFK's trip to Texas.¹⁶

Although conspiracy theorists never require any evidence as a condition precedent to their imputing guilt to some person or group in Kennedy's murder—motive or cui bono (who gained?) is always enough—they obviously are overjoyed when they actually come up with evidence that supports their theory. But as is the situation with every other conspiracy theory, the LBJ-did-it devotees are hard-pressed to come up with anything. However, they do have some arrows in their quiver. How about Jean Hill (the witness, the reader will recall from earlier in the book, who, after twenty-three years, suddenly remembered seeing a gunman behind the picket fence firing at Kennedy) telling conspiracy researchers, “Isn’t it odd that the Vice President crouched down before the first shot?”¹⁷ Not only is there no evidence that Johnson had crouched down, but if Johnson had, he must not have had too much confidence in the hit man he and his group allegedly hired to kill Kennedy, since Johnson’s limousine was two cars behind the president’s car.

Then we have in many conspiracy books a statement like the following from Craig Zirbel’s Texas Connection: “Before Kennedy was buried, Johnson ordered the assassination limousine...to be shipped to Detroit for complete refurbishing.” Zirbel, an Arizona lawyer, says that this is “the deliberate destruction of evidence” by the “prime suspect.”¹⁸ What citation of authority does Zirbel give for Johnson’s alleged order? As is perhaps the favorite tradition of the conspiracy community, he simply cites another conspiracy theorist as his authority, in this case, Jim Marrs and his book Crossfire. Marrs says, “Within seventy-two hours of Kennedy’s death—at Johnson’s order—the Presidential limousine...was shipped to Detroit where the body was replaced and the interior completely refurbished.”¹⁹ Of course, Marrs doesn’t bother to cite any authority for this information either. Penn Jones Jr., the conspiracy theorist who started the “mysterious deaths” allegation that survives, even though it is pure nonsense, to this very day, was perhaps the first theorist to allege (again, without any citation of authority) that right after the assassination, Johnson ordered that the car be completely refurbished, a “blatant act of destruction of evidence,” he cried.²⁰

This argument by the critics has no demonstrable merit. Not only couldn’t I find any documentation that Johnson personally ordered that the limousine be rebuilt, but before the limousine was sent back to Detroit, where it was manufactured, FBI and Secret Service agents examined and photographed the car in great detail at the White House garage in Washington, D.C., on the evening of November 22 through the early morning hours of November 23, and removed every piece of conceivable evidence from it.²¹ More important, the limousine was not, as the buffs allege without any supporting authority, immediately rebuilt. The rebuilding of the car did not commence until over a year later in Detroit, and it wasn’t complete until May 11, 1964, a year and a half after the assassination.²²

But don’t despair. The theorists have more evidence against LBJ. According to Craig Zirbel in his Texas Connection, Texas senator Ralph Yarborough, who was in LBJ’s car in the motorcade, told someone (Zirbel doesn’t say whom) that at the exact time of the assassination Johnson had his ear up against a small walkie-talkie, listening to the device, which was “turned down real low.” Yarborough had a reputation for sometimes being a little flaky in his observations and positions, but I have been unable to find his saying this in any of the statements he has made about the assassination. And, as before, Zirbel neither quotes a source nor cites a document.^{23*} Nor did Johnson or any of the other occupants of the car ever say this in their testimony or affidavits to the Warren Commission. But if Johnson were, indeed, listening to a walkie-talkie “turned down real low” moments before the assassination, it wouldn’t surprise me. He obviously had to be in last-minute radio contact with his man in the sixth-floor window and the other shooters who were about to get Kennedy in a triangulation of fire. If any reader thinks it’s silly for me to be writing about such silliness, I must remind him or her that this silliness is what all of the conspiracy allegations are about, the same silliness that has caused most of the American people to believe Kennedy was killed as a result of a high-level conspiracy, and the same silliness that has prompted the writing of this book.

Perhaps the crown jewel in the tiara of allegations by conspiracy theorists that LBJ was behind Kennedy's murder is the statement of his alleged mistress, Madeleine Brown, that the night before the assassination, Johnson, in so many words, admitted his guilt. In her 1997 book, Texas in the Morning: The Love Story of Madeleine Brown and President Lyndon Baines Johnson, the attractive redhead, an advertising account executive who associated with a crowd in Austin and Dallas of easy circumstances, and clearly knew most of the political players in the Democratic Party, describes her passionate romance with the then congressman, commencing in 1948 while she was separated from her husband, and continuing on into his presidency. She said she had a son, Steven (who died of lymphatic cancer in 1990), by LBJ, and the son does bear a resemblance to the former president.* Yet she is unable to offer any letter or document to substantiate her claim of a relationship with LBJ, and the one photo she submits in her book as evidence of being in LBJ's presence shows her and her son seated at a party and a man standing nearby with his back to the camera. She claims the man is Johnson, but he does not appear to be, at least to me. In any event, to say that the story Miss Brown comes up with strains credulity is to be much too magnanimous.

Brown says that on the evening before the assassination, she attended a social event at the Dallas home of Texas oil magnate Clint Murchison. "It was my understanding," she said, "that the event was scheduled as a tribute honoring his long time friend, J. Edgar Hoover, whom Murchison had first met decades earlier through President William Howard Taft." Hoover, she says, was at the party, as was John McCloy (who ended up on the Warren Commission), Richard Nixon (who was in town that night, leaving Dallas from Love Field at 10:05 a.m. on American Airlines Flight 82 on the morning of the assassination), H. L. Hunt (the right-wing oil baron), and a host of other Dallas luminaries. Because of his hectic schedule, Johnson, she says, wasn't supposed to be at the party, but he made an unscheduled appearance as the party was breaking up. "I knew how secretively Lyndon operated. Therefore, I said nothing...not even that I was happy to see him. Squeezing my hand so hard it felt crushed from the pressure, he spoke with a grating whisper—a quiet growl into my ear, not a love message, but one I'll always remember: 'After tomorrow those goddamn Kennedys will never embarrass me again—that's no threat—that's a promise.'" The following morning around 11:00 a.m., she says, Jesse Kellam, LBJ's close friend and political operative in Austin who was organizing an Austin fund-raiser for Kennedy that night, which Brown was assisting with, called her to confirm her schedule. He told her, she says, that she probably would not be able to see Lyndon that night for more than fifteen minutes. Recalling that flashes of wild lovemaking danced in her head, she said she responded, "Jesse, for any time I have with Lyndon, I am grateful." But Jesse warned, "Lyndon is in a terrible mood, screaming about the Kennedys. All he can say is, 'Those goddamn Kennedys will never embarrass me again after today.'"²⁴

So if we're to believe Miss Brown, Lyndon Baines Johnson, who by common consensus was one of the most shrewd men ever to ponderously grace (an oxymoron?) this nation's political stage, decided not only to murder President Kennedy, but also to tell others about it. The man whose photograph could be alongside words like sly, wily, and clever in the dictionary was intent on advertising his part in the conspiracy to his girlfriend, to Jesse Kellam, and to God knows how many other people. I wouldn't believe a story like that if you shouted it in my ears for one hundred years. Yet, as one example among many, Craig Zirbel writes in the Texas Connection that it's "crystal clear that Johnson was aware that Kennedy was going to be murdered...He told his girlfriend it was going to happen.”²⁵ In his 1992 book, The Man Who Knew Too Much, which came out five years before Brown’s book, Dick Russell quotes Brown telling him about LBJ’s threat vis-à-vis Kennedy before the assassination, and does not question her veracity at all.²⁶

Brown hardly deserves this rebuttal, but she says that LBJ was at the Murchison party in Dallas the evening before the assassination, but he couldn’t have been if he had wanted to because he was in Houston that night, about 225 miles away. “I was chairman of a huge dinner in Houston honoring Albert Thomas that Thursday night,” LBJ aide Jack Valenti says, and “the two speakers were the vice president and the president. I rode in a car with LBJ to the [Houston] airport and we flew on Air Force Two to Fort Worth, where we talked at the Texas hotel until one in the morning [1 a.m., November 22, 1963].”²⁷

What about Hoover? Hoover would have had a difficult time making it to the party. His daily log shows that he was at his office starting at 8:57 in the morning of November 21, 1963, and left the office at 5:14 p.m. On Friday morning, he was back in his office at 9:00 a.m., leaving at 6:01 p.m.²⁸ If someone wants to believe that on Thursday evening, after leaving his office at 5:14 p.m., Hoover raced to the airport to catch a flight to Dallas for the alleged party with Murchison, Nixon, and others, then took a red-eye (did they have red-eyes back then?) back to Washington, D.C., that night or caught a 4:00 or 5:00 a.m. flight the next morning, I guess there’s nothing I can do to stop him.

And as far as Nixon was concerned (Nixon was a partner in a New York City law firm that represented Pepsi and he was in town attending a soft drink bottler’s convention), if he came to the party he had to be a very late show because on the night before the assassination, he had a “ringside” seat with a group from Pepsi that included actress Joan Crawford, the wife of Pepsi’s CEO, listening to a performance by French singer Robert Clary in the Empire Room of Dallas’s Statler Hilton.²⁹ Tony Zoppi, the entertainment writer for the Dallas Morning News, was there that night, and told Gary Mack, the Sixth Floor Museum’s curator, that when he left the Empire Room around a quarter to eleven to file his story before deadline for the next morning’s edition, Nixon was still there with this group.³⁰

Indeed, Dallas assassination researcher David Perry has conducted a very extensive investigation into all of Brown’s allegations, and there is no question in his mind that not only weren’t LBJ and Hoover at the party, but there was no such party. Perry gathered several pieces of evidence debunking Brown’s “party” story. For one, he learned that Clint Murchison Sr., at whose home the party allegedly took place, was in ill health at the time, dating from a stroke in 1958, and had moved out of his Dallas home four years earlier, turning over the ownership of the home to one of his three sons, John, and John’s wife Lupe. In 2002, Perry interviewed Mrs. Eula Tilley, the wife of Clint Sr.’s chauffeur, Warren Tilly, who could not speak at the time because of throat cancer. She told Perry, “Both Warren and I worked for Mr. Murchison for a long time. He had seven houses, you know... I know he wasn’t at any party when Kennedy was shot. He did not have a home in the Dallas area. He was at his Glad Oaks Ranch between Athens and Palestine [Texas, about 120 miles southeast of Dallas]. I’m not sure how long before the assassination we were at the ranch but it was more than a few days. I remember because I was serving lunch to Mr. Murchison and his neighbor Woffard Cain. One of them said Kennedy had been shot.”³¹

Additionally, a party the likes of which Brown spoke of, with luminaries such as Nixon, LBJ, and Hoover attending, would have automatically made the next morning’s newspapers—at least the entertainment and society sections if not the daily news. Perry therefore scoured the papers (Dallas Morning News and Dallas Times Herald) but found no reference to any such party.³² Perry makes the telling point that after all of his investigation, “The only person I know of who claimed [he or] she was actually at the [alleged] party was the late Madeleine Brown.”³³

Perry, in fact, questions whether Brown even had an affair with Johnson, finding her story of the alleged relationship riddled with fabrications, inconsistencies, and unconfirmed allegations. For instance, the first time Brown went public with her story was nearly twenty years after the assassination, at a Dallas news conference on November 5, 1982, saying she “was the mistress of Lyndon Baines Johnson” and had decided to “clear the record.” And she never said anything about having a child by him.³⁴ That extremely important embellishment would come much later.

Perry also notes that in Brown’s book, she said she first met Johnson at a grand party attended by Dallas’s high and mighty at Dallas’s Adolphus hotel “three weeks” before LBJ’s Senate victory party in Austin on October 29, 1948.^{35*} But Perry checked all the local newspapers for several days on both sides of October 8–9, 1948 (three weeks earlier), and there was no reference to any such high-powered and high-society party. Indeed, Perry confirmed that LBJ was in Washington, D.C., around this time, the first time that LBJ came to Dallas that October being on October 22 to give a luncheon speech to the Dallas Reserve Officers’ Association.³⁶

Apparently, Brown has so little credibility that in the three volumes historian Robert A. Caro has written thus far on LBJ (only the volume on his presidency remains unpublished), Brown wasn’t entitled to a single word of mention. And it’s not because Caro refrained from discussing LBJ’s alleged extramarital affairs—for example, his relationship with Alice Glass.³⁷ It appears Caro found Brown simply too ludicrous and her claims too unfounded to dignify with even one word.

Brown, by the way, has gone far beyond her absurd allegation about LBJ’s supposed admission to being behind Kennedy’s murder, proving beyond all doubt that she is not a person worthy of any belief. Among her incredible pronouncements, she told conspiracy author Harrison Livingstone in 1992 that “Lyndon Johnson did not die naturally.” His own Secret Service killed him, she alleged. “They hated him.” Also, “There were three plots to kill Kennedy, and the other two were backup plots. One of them was LBJ’s plot, which took JFK out with the KGB’s help” “Billie Sol [Estes] knows all three shooters” who killed Kennedy; “Why do you think that John J. McCloy and Richard Nixon were there when Kennedy died?... They put aside their warfare and came together to kill Kennedy” “[H. L.] Hunt called Ruby and ordered him to kill Lee Harvey Oswald.”³⁸

Madeleine Brown, naturally, has been publicly embraced by the conspiracy community, and prior to her death often attended its conventions, such as the November 19–23, 1998, one in Dallas. On November 6, 1992, Brown was convicted of forging a relative’s will back on September 2, 1988. The conviction was reversed on appeal in 1994 on a procedural error. Brown died in 2002.

One question about LBJ for the conspiracy theorists: If he was part of a plot to kill Kennedy, and the Warren Commission thereafter officially concluded there was no plot, wouldn’t he be very happy and likely to keep quiet? Would he be likely to say more than once that, as he told the Atlantic in 1973, “I never believed that Oswald acted alone although I can accept he pulled the trigger”? Indeed, if LBJ were complicit in the assassination, why would he appoint a blue-ribbon commission to investigate the assassination (the Warren Commission)* consisting of seven men of impeccable reputation and unquestioned probity, five of whom were Republicans? Wouldn't he know that the likelihood he could get such a group to protect him and cover up for him would be substantially diminished? I mean, even as to Chief Justice Warren alone, are we to believe that Johnson established the Warren Commission by executive order to "ascertain all the facts relating to the assassination," but then, as I told the jury in London, "took Warren aside and said, 'However, Chief, if you really do find out the facts, you keep those facts under your robe. Okay, Chief?'"

And a final question for Miss Brown, wherever her soul is today: You dedicated your book "in loving memory" of your son and Lyndon Johnson. If accusing Johnson of having Kennedy murdered is a part of your "loving" memory of him, what in the world would you be saying about him if you hated him? That it was he, not Hitler, who was responsible for the Holocaust?

If it is possible to write a sillier book than Madeleine Brown's alleging that LBJ was behind Kennedy's murder, it is Barr McClellan's 2003 book, Blood, Money and Power: How LBJ Killed JFK. After taking us through more than two hundred pages of his dreamy fairy tale, as we saw earlier, the author has LBJ confessing to the murder when he was about to die, thinking that his honesty in admitting to having murdered Kennedy would actually improve (?!?) his poor reputation with the American people.

Cuba

Just as present-day Cuba and Fidel Castro are synonymous with each other, the thinking that Cuba was behind JFK's murder is synonymous with saying that Castro was behind it. And the theory that the Cuban government had Kennedy killed always focuses exclusively on Castro.

Suspicion of Cuban complicity in the assassination reached its high-water mark shortly after the assassination, when the American people learned that Oswald revered Castro and had sought to go to Cuba just two months earlier. Also, there was known hostility between the U.S. and the Cuban leadership, starting with the Cuban cabinet's authorization on July 6, 1960, of the expropriation of all U.S.-owned property in Cuba. President Eisenhower responded that same day by ordering a reduction in the amount of sugar to be imported from Cuba, and then ended diplomatic relations with Cuba on January 2, 1961. Our support of the Bay of Pigs invasion on April 17, 1961, and the Cuban missile crisis in the fall of 1962 contributed to the belief among many that Castro somehow had a hand in the president's murder. Indeed, as an internal memorandum of the supersecret National Security Agency (NSA), the federal intelligence agency charged with the electronic eavesdropping and deciphering of messages to and from foreign adversaries, says, "Immediately after the assassination, NSA initiated a large-scale manual and machine review of SIGINT [Signals Intelligence], including all U.S./Cuba traffic [around the time of the assassination]. A computer search was initiated using Oswald's name as the minimum for research criteria. Additionally, all traffic between Cuba/New Orleans and Cuba/Dallas was manually reviewed." The electronic eavesdropping disclosed that "Cuban military forces went on alert immediately after the assassination." The NSA concluded that "a thorough review has revealed no intelligence material revealing or suggesting Cuban involvement in the assassination of President Kennedy."¹

This conclusion by the NSA is in keeping with the conclusion of every other investigative body that has evaluated the issue. And today, although the belief still persists among some, the overwhelming majority of Americans as well as most conspiracy theorists have discarded the theory that Cuba was behind the assassination. It should be noted, however, that as late as 1978, fifteen years after the assassination, the question of Cuban complicity in Kennedy's murder was apparently of sufficient concern for three members of the HSCA and three staff members to make two trips to Cuba to investigate the issue, which included a four-hour, tape-recorded interview with Castro on April 3, 1978, in Havana.

The few conspiracy theorists who still cling to the theory of Cuban complicity in the assassination always cite as one of their principal authorities former president Lyndon Johnson, who told many people that he believed Castro had Kennedy murdered. Joseph Califano Jr., an LBJ aide from 1965 to 1969, told the Wall Street Journal, "Johnson believed, as he said to me, that Fidel Castro was responsible for Kennedy's assassination. In a reference to attempts by the Kennedy brothers to assassinate Castro, Johnson told me, 'Kennedy tried to kill Castro, but Castro got Kennedy first.'"² But unless a president, because of his position, was privy to information about Castro's having Kennedy killed—which Johnson never claimed or intimated he was—his reasoning and opinion on the matter are no more apt to be authoritative than anyone else's. And Johnson's belief is bereft not only of evidence but of common sense.*

One of the chief proponents of LBJ's reasoning was Italian-born mobster Johnny Roselli (real name, Filippo Sacco). When the CIA first decided to assassinate Castro in August of 1960, it gave the assignment to former FBI agent Robert Maheu, at the time a top aide in Las Vegas to Howard Hughes. Maheu, in turn, passed the contract on to Roselli, who in turn enlisted Mafia kingpins Santo Trafficante Jr. and Sam Giancana to carry it out.^{3†}

The HSCA noted that it was significant that public revelations by Roselli (through his Washington lawyer, Edward P. Morgan, contacting syndicated columnists Drew Pearson and Jack Anderson) about the plots to kill Castro "corresponded with his efforts to avoid deportation in 1966 and 1971 and to escape prosecution for illegal gambling activities in 1967. It was Roselli who managed the release of information about the plots and who proposed the so-called turnaround theory of the Kennedy assassination (Cuban exiles hired by the Mafia as hit men, captured by Castro, were forced to 'turnaround' and murder President Kennedy). The committee found it quite plausible that Roselli would have manipulated public perception of the facts of the plots, then tried to get the CIA to intervene in his legal problems as the price for his agreeing to make no further disclosures."⁴

The first two articles alluding to the turnaround theory, a syndicated column by Jack Anderson on March 3, 1967, and one by Drew Pearson on March 7, 1967, did not mention Roselli by name and did not attract too much attention. But an article by Anderson and Les Whitten on September 7, 1976, in the Washington Post did attract attention because of the recent Church Committee revelations of the CIA-mob plot to kill Castro and because of the discovery of Roselli's dismembered body on August 7, just one month before the article was printed. And it did mention Roselli by name, saying that "before he died, Roselli hinted to associates that he knew who had arranged President Kennedy's murder. It was the same conspirators, he suggested, whom he had recruited earlier to kill Cuban Premier Fidel Castro. By Roselli's cryptic account, Castro learned the identity of the underworld contacts in Havana who had been trying to knock him off. He [Castro] believed, not altogether without basis, that President Kennedy was behind the plot." Castro then "enlisted the same underworld elements" to kill Kennedy.⁵

In addition to the fact that there is no evidence that Castro ever learned the identity of the Cubans supposedly enlisted by the mob between 1961 and 1963 to kill him, Roselli's turnaround theory is irrational on its face. Even if Castro had decided to kill Kennedy, how could Castro, from his base in Cuba, force hit men for the mob to come back to this country (where he'd immediately lose physical control of them) to kill Kennedy? And even if Castro, an intelligent person by all accounts, had the irrational thought he could do this, he would still have to know that they would never be as dependable to carry out such an assignment as his own agents would be. Needless to say, the HSCA did not find Roselli's turnaround theory credible.⁶

Also, there is a predicate for the turnaround theory that has never been proved. There's no evidence that hit men for the mob were ever captured by Castro. Further, Jimmy "The Weasel" Fratiano, a West Coast organized-crime figure, said that Roselli told him there was no truth to his theory, and Roselli acknowledged in his testimony before the Church Committee on April 23, 1976, that he had "no facts" to support it.⁷

On July 28, 1976, Roselli disappeared in Miami. On August 7, three fishermen found his butchered body, with his legs sawed off, inside an oil drum on the edge of a sandbar in Dumfoundling Bay, Key Biscayne, Florida. The drum had been weighted down by chains but gases created by the decomposition of Roselli's body gave the drum enough buoyancy for it to rise to the surface. An unnamed Mafia figure told the New York Times that two men, one an old friend, the other a visitor from Chicago, had lured Roselli aboard a private boat at a nearby marina. Out on the water, while Roselli sipped a vodka, the man from Chicago grabbed him from behind and held his hand tightly over Roselli's nose and mouth until he was asphyxiated, not a difficult feat since the seventy-year-old Roselli had emphysema.⁸ Though conspiracy theorists claim he was silenced because of his knowledge of a conspiracy to assassinate President Kennedy, there simply is no evidence, anywhere, that he was a part of or had any knowledge of any such conspiracy, and the Justice Department concluded that Roselli's murder and the murder of Sam Giancana* were unrelated to the CIA-mob plots to kill Castro.⁹ Such a conclusion makes sense. If Roselli's or Giancana's killers were trying to silence them because of their knowledge of the CIA-mob plots to kill Castro, why not also kill Florida mob boss Santo Trafficante, to whom both went to actually carry out the job? And why not kill Roselli before he testified before the Church Committee, which he first did on June 24, 1975 (the first of three times, the last time being on April 23, 1976, a little over three months before his murder), at which time he spilled all the beans there were to spill about the CIA-mob plot to kill Castro?

Purported support for the belief that Castro was of a mind to kill Kennedy was an informal discussion Castro had with two American reporters following a reception at the Brazilian embassy in Havana on the evening of September 7, 1963. Castro spoke, per usual for him, on a wide range of subjects, one of which was Kennedy. The UPI reporter, whose article was published in the New York Times, quoted Castro as saying that "Kennedy is a cretin," the "Batista of his time and the most opportunistic American president of all time. Kennedy is thinking more about re-election than the American people."¹⁰ The AP reporter, Daniel Harker, took something far more explosive away from the three-hour meeting. He wrote, "Bitterly denouncing what he called recent U.S.-prompted raids on Cuban territory, Castro said: 'United States leaders should think that if they are aiding terrorist plans to eliminate Cuban leaders, they themselves will not be safe.'"¹¹ Did Castro thereby suggest, as Harker says, that if there were such plots, he would retaliate in kind? Even if he did, it would most likely be only loose swagger on his part, in no way negating the fact that there's no evidence he had Kennedy killed, and that he was well aware that such an act would be the most reckless, unwise, and suicidal action he could ever take. (See later text.)

But I personally doubt that Castro said specifically what Harker quotes him as saying. I learned many years ago the truth of the observation that "quotation marks don't make a quote," as most lay people assume they do. I myself have often been quoted incorrectly, several times substantially so. In the first place, if Castro had threatened a retaliatory assassination, it is very hard to believe that the UPI reporter who was present would not have found such a statement sufficiently important to include in his fourteen-paragraph story on the meeting, which he did not do. Just as important was Castro's response when the HSCA interviewed him in Havana on April 3, 1978. If Castro had been involved in the assassination and had told Harker what Harker quoted him as saying, the likelihood that Castro would have admitted telling Harker anything remotely close to what Harker wrote would obviously have been nil. We could have expected Castro to say that Harker either was a liar or had grossly misquoted him. The fact he said neither at least goes in the direction of his recollection of the incident having credibility. Castro said, "I don't remember literally what I said, but I remember my intention in saying what I said and it was to...let the United States government know that we knew about the existence of...plots against our lives...I said something like those plots start to set a very bad precedent, a very serious one...that could become a boomerang against the authors of those actions. That to set those precedents of plotting the assassination of leaders of other countries would be...very negative” (i.e., it could result in one or more of the victim nations retaliating in kind). Castro added that “I didn’t say it as a threat. I did not mean by that that we were going to take measures, similar measures, like a retaliation for that.” Castro said he would say the same thing today as he said back then “because I didn’t mean a threat by that.”¹² I, for one, believe Castro.

Another related story that Castro flatly denies, and with good reason, was the one told by British tabloid journalist Comer Clark. In an October 1967 edition of the National Enquirer, he wrote that on July 15, 1967, he had an exclusive interview with Castro late one night in a Havana pizzeria. He quotes Castro as saying, “Lee Oswald came to the Cuban Embassy in Mexico City twice. The first time, I was told, he wanted to work for us. He was asked to explain, but he wouldn’t. He wouldn’t go into details. The second time he said something like: ‘Someone ought to shoot that President Kennedy.’ Then Oswald said—and this was exactly how it was reported to me—‘Maybe I’ll try to do it.’ This was less than two months before the U.S. President was assassinated... Yes, I heard of Lee Harvey Oswald’s plan to kill President Kennedy. It’s possible I could have saved him. I might have been able to, but I didn’t. I never believed the plan would be put into effect.”¹³ The HSCA learned that Clark, who died in 1972, “wrote extensively for the sensationalist press in England. His articles include such items as ‘British Girls as Nazi Sex Slaves’ [and] ‘I Was Hitler’s Secret Love.’”¹⁴ When the HSCA asked Castro on April 3, 1978, about Clark’s allegation, he responded in a blizzard of denunciatory words. Among them: “This is absurd. I didn’t say that... It has been invented from the beginning until the end... It’s a lie from head to toe. If this man [Oswald] would have done something like that, it would have been our moral duty to inform the United States.” Denying that he had ever met Clark or been interviewed by him, he said, “How could [this man] interview me in a pizzeria? I never go to public restaurants... I would never have given a journalist an interview in a pizzeria... What is the job of that journalist? What is he engaged in?... You should... find [out] who he is and why he wrote it.”¹⁵

In yet another example of good investigative journalism on his part, conspiracy theorist Anthony Summers interviewed Clark’s widow and assistant. The widow told Summers that Clark had never mentioned interviewing Castro. Most importantly, Summers writes that the assistant, Nina Gadd, said that “she generated the story, without even going to Havana, on the basis of allegations made to her” by an unnamed Latin American foreign minister.¹⁶

As it turns out, though Clark’s story was a fabrication in that he had never spoken to Castro, an earlier source told the FBI essentially the same story. In a June 17, 1964, letter to Warren Commission general counsel J. Lee Rankin, J. Edgar Hoover said a “confidential source” who had “furnished reliable information in the past” reported that Castro had “recently said” that “our people in Mexico gave us the details” of Oswald’s visit to the Mexican consulate, and when his request for a visa “was refused him, he headed out saying ‘I’m going to kill Kennedy for this.’”¹⁷ The story doesn’t make sense. Why would Oswald threaten to kill Kennedy because the Cuban consulate turned down his request for a visa? What’s the connection? Silvia Duran, the secretary at the consulate who dealt with Oswald and was present at the time of Oswald’s outburst when his request for a visa was denied, said she heard no such threat by Oswald against Kennedy.¹⁸ And the Cuban consul, Eusebio Azcue, who was also present, also said no such threat by Oswald was made, adding that if it had, he would “have passed this information on to Fidel.”¹⁹ It should be noted that the Warren Commission should have included in its report Oswald’s alleged threat to kill Kennedy at the Cuban consulate in Mexico City, but it did not, and I have not been able to find Hoover’s letter to Rankin in any of the Commission’s volumes of exhibits.

The story was given a fillip by a secretary at the Cuban consulate whose office was on the second floor, Luisa Calderon Carralero. In a CIA-intercepted telephone call several hours after the assassination, when a male called Calderon at the consulate and asked her if she had heard the news of the president’s death, she replied, in a joking manner, “Yes, of course, I knew it almost before Kennedy...Imagine, one, two, three and now, that makes three [she laughs], what barbarians!”²⁰ The HSCA construed Calderon’s remark, if true, as indicating either “foreknowledge or mere braggadocio. The preponderance of the evidence led the committee to find that it was braggadocio.” When the committee sought to interview Calderon in Cuba, she declined based on illness. However, she did respond to the HSCA’s written interrogatories, denying any foreknowledge of the assassination. Because the HSCA sensed from the demeanor of many other employees at the Cuban consulate that they were telling the truth when they denied having any foreknowledge of the assassination, the committee concluded that Oswald had not “voiced a threat [to kill Kennedy] to Cuban officials.” With respect to the “confidential, reliable source” who said he did, the HSCA said, “However reliable the confidential source may be, the committee found it to be in error in this instance.”²¹

How did this story, which arguably connected Castro with Kennedy’s assassination, get started? A few days after the assassination (November 26), Gilberto Alvarado Ugarte, a twenty-three-year-old Nicaraguan secret agent purporting to be working against the Cuban Communists for his country’s security service, went to the American embassy in Mexico City and claimed that on September 18, 1963, he was at the Cuban consulate seeking to get to Cuba with the intent to infiltrate Castro’s forces. While standing by the bathroom door, he said he saw three men conversing on an adjacent patio. One was a black man, tall and thin, with reddish hair. The second was a Canadian with blonde hair, and the third man was Lee Harvey Oswald. A tall Cuban joined the group only long enough to pass some currency to the black man. Alvarado said he then overheard the black man say to Oswald, “I want to kill the man,” whereupon Oswald replied, “You’re not man enough, I can do it.” The black man then said, “I can’t go with you, I have a lot to do.” He then gave Oswald $6,500 in large-denomination American bills (he doesn’t say how he knew it was $6,500—did he see and bother to count the denominations adding up to $6,500?), $5,000 as compensation to kill Kennedy and $1,500 as expense money, saying, “This isn’t much.”²² Could anyone with an IQ above 50 possibly believe that this was Oswald’s recruitment into the conspiracy to kill Kennedy, and his payment for being the triggerman? Well, Thomas Mann, the U.S. ambassador to Mexico at the time, did believe it. He cabled his superiors at the State Department in Washington that “Castro is the kind of person who would avenge himself in this way. He is the Latin type of extremist who reacts viscerally rather than intellectually.” Mann added that “the unprofessional, almost lackadaisical way in which the money is alleged by Alvarado to have been passed to Oswald fits the way Cubans would be expected to act if the Russians were not guiding them.” Mann requested, in his cable, that the aforementioned Luisa Calderon be arrested because she may have been present when Oswald was given the money.²³ Mann didn’t have his fill. Though only the ambassador to Mexico, not a member of U.S. intelligence, he requested through the State Department that the FBI send a knowledgeable agent from Washington down to Mexico City to investigate Alvarado's claim,²⁴ and he himself wanted to get actively involved in investigating whether Oswald killed Kennedy for Castro. Hoover, who referred to Mann as "one of the pseudo-investigators, a Sherlock Holmes," was opposed to sending anyone to Mexico City, feeling the FBI agent assigned to the American embassy in Mexico City, Clark Anderson, could do whatever was necessary, and besides, this was a matter for the CIA in Mexico City to handle. Mann was so persistent, however, that Hoover, mostly to pacify Mann, ultimately did send an agent to Mexico City for a few days, but the agent didn't even get to interrogate Alvarado and was sent home.²⁵

Apart from the fact that Oswald was in New Orleans, not Mexico City, on September 18, 1963 (the day Alvarado said the incident took place), when Mexico police interrogated Alvarado, he admitted, in writing, that he had made up the whole matter. His motive, he said, was that he hated Castro and hoped his story would cause the United States to "take action" against him. When reinterrogated by the CIA, he first claimed the Mexico police had pressured him into retracting his story, and that his retraction, not his first statement, was false. He was then given a polygraph test by a CIA polygraph expert assisted by an FBI agent. The test indicated he was probably lying, prompting Alvarado to say, "I know such machines are accurate, and therefore, I suppose I must be mistaken."²⁶

On December 1, 1963, less than a week after Alvarado's claim, another Mexican, Pedro Gutierrez Valencia, a credit investigator for a large Mexico City department store, wrote a letter to President Johnson, making a claim analogous to but not corroborative of Alvarado's: The date (September 30 or October 1, 1963) was different from Alvarado's; there were two men, not three; and the location was in front of the Cuban embassy, not on a patio to the rear of the consulate. Gutierrez, leaving the embassy after conducting a credit investigation of one of its employees, claims he heard a heated discussion, in English, between a Cuban and an American in which he could understand only the words "Castro," "Cuba," and "Kennedy." The Cuban counted out American dollars and gave them to the American, at which time they got into the Cuban's car and drove off. Gutierrez said the American was Oswald.²⁷

Again, the extreme improbability that any agreement and payment for Kennedy's murder would take place not in private, but literally out in the open in view of others, and under the other circumstances Gutierrez described, is alone enough to discount the story. But other facts that undermine Gutierrez's credibility emerged. It turns out that Gutierrez, like Alvarado, was a zealous anti-Castro activist and thus had a motive similar to Alvarado's for lying: to convince the United States that Castro was behind the assassination, thus inducing this nation to remove Castro from power. But even if Gutierrez did see two men and heard the three words, Gutierrez conceded he saw "Oswald" face-to-face for only a "split second," at all other times during the incident only seeing the backs of "Oswald" and the other man.²⁸

On June 5, 1978, HSCA staff member Edwin Lopez interviewed Gutierrez on tape, and all Gutierrez would say is that he bumped into Oswald at the Cuban consulate but "I don't remember him [Oswald] being accompanied by another person." When Lopez pressed Gutierrez about the fact that he told President Johnson that he saw Oswald with, Lopez incorrectly says, a Cuban-American (Gutierrez had only said the man was Cuban, not Cuban-American), Gutierrez replied, "That is an enigma to me. I do not remember him being accompanied by a Cuban-American." When Lopez asked Gutierrez about his assertion that the Cuban handed money to Oswald, Gutierrez said, "I do not ever remember that occurring."²⁹ So much for Pedro Gutierrez.

So there is no credible evidence connecting Castro, by way of the alleged incidents outside the Cuban embassy, with the assassination. It should be added that even if Castro were able to kill Kennedy without being discovered, he was aware, as he said, “that the death of the leader does not change the system. It has never done that.”³⁰ In other words, what reason would Castro have had to believe that the U.S. posture toward him would be better under LBJ? None. He apparently knew very little about LBJ. According to French journalist Jean Daniel, who was with Castro on the day of the assassination, Castro had a series of questions for him after Kennedy’s death was finally confirmed: “What is [Johnson’s] reputation? What were his relations with Kennedy? With Khrushchev? What was his position at the time of the attempted invasion of Cuba?”³¹

In a two-hour radio and television address to his people on the evening following the assassination, the Cuban leader said that the assassination of Kennedy was “grave and bad news... from the political point of view” because it could change U.S. foreign policy “from bad to worse.”³² And it wasn’t just Castro who felt this way. An NSA intercept picked up a message on November 27, 1963 (just four days after the assassination), from the Brazilian ambassador to Cuba to his foreign office, stating that Cuban officials “were unanimous in believing that any other president would be even worse” than Kennedy.³³

Perhaps the most direct accusation that Castro was behind Kennedy’s death came from someone whose story was so lacking in credibility that a member of the HSCA, during open proceedings, accused the accuser of blatant perjury.

On May 1, 1961, Antulio Ramirez Ortiz, a U.S. citizen of Puerto Rican origin, boarded a National Airlines flight out of Miami destined for Key West and, using a knife and a gun, hijacked the plane to Cuba. In testimony before the HSCA, Ramirez said that once the plane landed in Havana, Cuba’s secret service police took him to their headquarters but didn’t bother to question him for three or four months. (He claimed that in 1959 he had delivered a phony message for the Cuban secret service to the Dominican Republican consulate in New York City, so Havana knew him.) During that period, he lived at the headquarters and worked in the kitchen. He said a female coworker told him one day that in the room where the secret service stored its files, she had seen a file on him with photos in it. Why she would be looking through those secret files and have access to them he did not know. Out of curiosity, one day he walked into the room (apparently the Cuban secret police had no security and even kitchen employees could peruse their files) and while looking for his file he noticed one labeled “Oswald-Kennedy.” Looking inside, he saw a photo of Oswald and a report written in Russian, in which, he testified, Oswald’s wife was described as “belonging to the Soviet secret police,” and he told the HSCA that “the Russian secret police were recommending this person [Oswald] to the Cuban government.” One big problem is that when HSCA counsel asked Ramirez if he was able to “read Russian,” Ramirez answered, “No,” adding he could recognize some of the Russian characters, however.

But Ramirez’s story gets, as Lewis Carroll said, “curiouser and curiouser,” or, more aptly, sillier and sillier. Ramirez said that from the moment he landed in Havana, the Cuban secret service “thought I was working for the CIA.” Yet not only did the secret service police apparently allow him free run of their headquarters in 1961, but after they arrested him for espionage in September of 1963, instead of imprisoning him, they merely “detained” him for a month. The following month they freed him on condition that he would start working for them. Though he was drawing a “full salary” and they were paying his hotel expenses, when HSCA counsel asked what he was doing in return for this, he replied, “Absolutely nothing.” But wait. The Cuban secret service at least had something important they wanted to share with him. One of the Cuban secret service agents named Martin (Ramirez didn’t know his last name) confided in him over drinks at the Hotel Saratoga in Havana in early November of 1963 that the Cubans intended to kill Kennedy “in this very month of November. Read the papers.”

With the exception of a brief period when he was hospitalized in a mental institution and received psychiatric care, Ramirez continued to float around Havana, leaving in 1975 for the United States. When asked by HSCA counsel how the Cuban government allowed him to leave knowing he possessed information that it had Kennedy killed, Ramirez responded, “Because I had something more valuable than all that. If I were dead, they would have a problem,” though he didn’t elaborate on this. In other words, the Cubans didn’t think they’d have much of a problem if they killed the president of the United States, but thought they’d have real problems killing Ramirez. You don’t say.

When Ramirez arrived in Miami in 1975, the FBI arrested him. He said he never told the FBI what he knew because he was saving the material for a book he intended to write about his experiences. (The five-hundred-page manuscript he eventually wrote, titled “Castro’s Red Hot Hell,” was never published.) After being convicted of hijacking the National Airlines plane, Ramirez was sentenced to twenty years and sent to the federal penitentiary at McNeil Island in Washington State. In April of 1978, he contacted the HSCA with a plan to capture Kennedy’s killers. What Ramirez wanted was to be let out of prison and “set up in a nice cozy place, easy to watch from a distance. If possible, in a not too populated area of California, close to the beach.” From there, he said, he could lure Cuban agent Martin and other fellow agents to where he was for the purpose of killing him (you see, they couldn’t kill him in Cuba, they had to sneak into this country to do so) at which time they could be arrested by the FBI.

Needless to say, the HSCA did not go along with the ludicrous Ramirez. The acting HSCA chairman, Congressman Floyd Fithian, told Ramirez, “I believe you have been lying to me. I believe you have not told the truth...Frankly, I have lost patience with you...and I do not want a continuation of [your] cock and bull story before this committee of the Congress.”³⁴

The HSCA found that some of Ramirez’s allegations, such as the identities of Cuban officials he named, could be corroborated, but said that “the essential aspects of his allegations were incredible,” and hence, rejected his story.³⁵

Yet another preposterous allegation that Castro ordered Kennedy’s death came from one Pascual Enrique Ruedolo Gongora, a fifty-year-old Cuban living in New York City who wanted to be deported back to Cuba. Shortly after the assassination, he told Gregory Banon, the Spanish consul in New York City, that he was in one of five or six groups that Castro sent to the United States to assassinate President Kennedy. There was one problem with Gongora’s story, in addition to the complete implausibility of it. Gongora, who had been living in a twelve-dollar-per-week apartment paid by New York City’s Department of Welfare from October 4 to November 28, 1963, when he was deported back to Cuba via Madrid, happened to be crazy, severely so. In an October 18, 1963, letter to Robert Kennedy from New York City, Gongora wrote, “I feel very ill,” and added that he needed to be deported because a particular heroin trafficker who was being protected by the U.S. government was out to harm him, and in Cuba he (the trafficker) “even set set dogs on women...”

Eighteen thousand women [were] killed by dogs for the pleasure of sadistic neurotics, scoundrels and vice addicts.” After Gongora returned to Cuba in late November of 1963, he somehow managed to return to the United States (Castro apparently wasn’t interested in silencing one of the “talking” killers he sent to assassinate Kennedy), where he was admitted to Bellevue Psychiatric Hospital in New York City and diagnosed as a paranoid schizophrenic. Gongora, who had been arrested on two narcotic charges in the United States, admitted to past psychiatric care in Cuba.³⁶

The search for any thread or whisper of a conspiracy in the Kennedy assassination has been endless. One such whisper, which, if true, conspiracy theorists thought connected Castro with the events in Dealey Plaza, was an allegation that first surfaced in the 1976 Church Committee Report. The CIA received information from some unidentified source that on the night of the assassination a Cubana Airlines flight from Mexico City (not Dallas, mind you) to Cuba was delayed some five hours, from 6:00 to 11:00 p.m. EST, awaiting an unidentified passenger. This passenger reportedly arrived at the airport in a twin-engine aircraft at 10:30 p.m. and boarded the Cubana Airlines plane without passing through customs, where he would have needed to show his passport. He traveled in the cockpit, the source said, thereby avoiding identification by the passengers.³⁷ The HSCA investigated the matter and found that the Cubana flight departed for Havana at 8:30 p.m., two hours before the arrival of the private aircraft carrying the mysterious passenger, so he could not have taken the subject flight.³⁸ So much for the Cubana Airlines mysterious passenger rumor, or so one would think.

Author Henry Hurt asserts that “the mystery passenger is believed to have been one Miguel Casas Saez.” He quotes CIA documents released under the Freedom of Information Act which say that Casas’s aunt in Remedios, Las Villas, Cuba, told a source (her dentist) that Casas was in Dallas on the day of the assassination and returned to Cuba that day on “a...plane” from “Mexico,” that he was one of Raul Castro’s men, and “very brave.” Another Cuban source said Casas had left Remedios for the United States on a “sabotage and espionage mission,” and two other sources said that Casas was a “poor person” and “poorly dressed” before he disappeared from Remedios for several weeks (though not stated, supposedly in the fall of 1963), but upon returning had “much money,” and owned “large amounts of T-shirts, jackets and shoes, all American made.” (Hurt doesn’t tell his readers that another source from the same CIA documents he quotes from said that Casas, who left Cuba for the United States on September 26, 1963, on a small boat, was caught in a hurricane and ended up in Puerto Rico temporarily, came back from the states, and was seen in Remedios on November 18, 1963, four days before the assassination.) None of the sources in the CIA documents connect Casas in any way with the assassination, or even allege such a connection. But from this, Hurt, trying to establish a Castro connection to the assassination, remarkably and amusingly concludes that Casas was the Cubana Airlines mystery passenger—that is, the passenger who we know could not have existed, or the passenger who really did exist and had the supernatural power to be in two places at the same time, taking off from Mexico City to Havana at 8:30 p.m. on November 22, 1963, even though he did not arrive at the Mexico City airport until 10:30 p.m.³⁹

Fidel Castro told several members of the HSCA during their visit with him in Havana on April 3, 1978, something that is almost too obvious (to rational people, that is) to state:

Who here could have operated and planned something so delicate as the death of the United States president? That [is] insane. From the ideological point of view, it [would be] insane. And from the political point of view, it [would be] a tremendous insanity. I am going to tell you here that nobody, nobody ever had the idea of such things... Anyone who subscribed to that idea would have been judged insane, absolutely sick. Never, in twenty years of revolution, I never heard anyone suggest nor even speculate about a measure of that sort, because who could think about the idea of organizing the death of the president of the United States? That would have been the most perfect pretext for the United States to invade our country, which is what I have tried to prevent for all these years, in every possible sense. Since the United States is much more powerful than we are, what could we gain by a war with the United States? The United States would lose nothing. The destruction would have been here.⁴⁰

Former CIA director Richard Helms said that if the United States had learned that Castro had Kennedy killed, “We would have bombed Cuba back into the Middle Ages.”⁴¹

Along these lines, and as indicated earlier, NSA documents of eavesdropping intercepts released by the ARRB on August 19, 1997, revealed that immediately after the assassination, an “emotional and uneasy” Fidel Castro mobilized his armed forces out of fear the United States would blame him for Kennedy’s murder and launch an invasion in retaliation.⁴² One intercept of a cable sent from a foreign ambassador in Havana back home contained these words: “I got the immediate impression that Castro was frightened, if not terrified.”⁴³

In Castro’s statement to the HSCA, he could have added that even if he had been insane enough to try and kill Kennedy, since there’s normally an “internal logic” within the realm of insanity, why would he select as his triggerman someone like Oswald who was a known Castro sympathizer? This would only increase the suspicion that it was he who was behind the assassination. Say what you want about Castro’s politics, but no one has ever accused him of being simpleminded. To the contrary, he is regarded by virtually everyone to be a highly intelligent and pragmatic person.

With respect to Castro’s intelligence and pragmatism, Frank Mankiewicz, who was RFK’s press secretary, and spent many hours in Havana interviewing Castro for a book he coauthored in 1975, With Fidel, said he was “very impressed” with Castro, that he was “smart as hell, enormously well-read and very eloquent.” Indeed, Mankiewicz, who has met several world leaders, said, “It’s unfortunate Castro grew up in Cuba, where the highest office he could achieve was the head of Cuba. Wherever he was, like a nation in Europe, he absolutely would have been a leader.” Mankiewicz laughed off the notion that Castro would have tried to kill Kennedy. “He is an ultimate survivor, and when it comes to anything that would jeopardize his security, he was quite conservative and careful.” About Castro’s legendary charisma, he said Castro “would suck up all the oxygen in the room” when he entered. Mankiewicz gave an example of Castro’s well-honed sense of humor (which itself requires intelligence). “When I asked him why he was so popular with the Cuban people, Castro [who is well over six feet tall] said, ‘It helps if you are 6 inches taller than anyone else in the country.’”⁴⁴

Before we go on, there is another source whom some conspiracy theorists rely on for the idea that

Castro had JFK killed, and it is none other than JFK's brother RFK. As previously noted, Bobby Kennedy believed that if there had been a conspiracy to murder JFK, he, Bobby, may have been responsible because the murder may have been in retaliation for the aggressive and unrelenting war he waged against organized crime and Castro. In one of his heavily quoted post-assassination remarks, he told Bill Moyers in the spring of 1968, "I have...wondered at times if we did not pay a very great price for being more energetic than wise about a lot of things, especially Cuba."⁴⁵ This, of course, was just speculative rumination on RFK's part, and all the available credible evidence shows that neither Cuba (Castro) nor organized crime was behind JFK's death. But in a sense (a sense that he probably was not alluding to in his remark), his speculation was probably accurate. Though we can rest assured Castro did not have Oswald kill Kennedy, we have seen in considerable detail in the Oswald biography in this book that JFK and RFK's war against Castro's Cuba almost for certain played some role in Oswald's decision to kill the president.

One argument used by anti-conspiracy people against Castro's complicity, the merit of which is unclear, is based on the fact that in the fall of 1963, as Richard Goodwin, White House assistant to Kennedy, wrote, "Kennedy dispatched an emissary [William Attwood, a special adviser to the American delegation to the United Nations] to talk with the Cuban delegate to the United Nations in hopes of laying the groundwork for some rapprochement."⁴⁶ Though the HSCA, in 1978, confirmed this,⁴⁷ there is no question that right up to the day of the assassination, Cuban-American relations were raw, bitter, and volatile. Indeed, on November 18, 1963, just days before the assassination, Kennedy, in a major foreign policy speech before the Inter-American Press Association in Miami Beach, Florida, all but invited the Cuban people to overthrow Castro's Communist regime and promised prompt U.S. aid if they did.⁴⁸

But that very same day, November 18, Attwood called Havana and spoke by phone with a member of Castro's staff, believed to be Major Rene Vallejo. Pursuant to White House instructions, Attwood informed Castro's staff member what he had previously told Carlos Lechuga, Cuba's ambassador to the United Nations, on September 23, 1963, in New York City—that the United States favored preliminary negotiations with Cuba on the issue of accommodation between the two countries at the United Nations (rather than Cuba, as the Cubans wanted), and that the United States desired to work out an agenda for these talks.⁴⁹

In addition, the French journalist who had a series of interviews with Castro during the week leading up to and including the assassination, Jean Daniel, said that at his meeting with Castro in Havana the following day, November 19, Castro, right after a relentless indictment of U.S. policy toward Cuba for the CIA's training, equipping, and organizing of Cuban exiles for a counterrevolution, suddenly took a less hostile position. He quotes Castro as saying, "Kennedy could still be the man" who could perhaps understand the explosive realities of Cuba and meet them halfway. "He [Kennedy] still has the possibility of becoming in the eyes of history the greatest President of the United States, the leader who may at last understand that there can be co-existence between capitalists and socialists...I know, for example, that for Khrushchev, Kennedy is a man you can talk with. I have gotten this impression from all my conversations with Khrushchev. Other leaders have assured me that to attain this goal, we must first await his re-election. Personally, I consider him responsible for everything, but I will say this: He has come to understand many things over the past few months; and then too, in the last analysis, I'm convinced that anyone else would be worse...If you see him again [Daniel had interviewed the president on October 24], you can tell him that I'm willing to declare Goldwater my friend if that will guarantee [his] re-election.”^{50*}

Castro, it appears, had (as is so common in human relations) ambivalent, schizophrenic feelings about Kennedy. Journalist Frank Mankiewicz and the coauthor of his book on Castro, Kirby Jones, had several recorded conversations with Castro during three visits to Cuba in 1974 and 1975. In one conversation, while Castro spoke of Kennedy’s responsibility for approving (though, Castro believed, not enthusiastically) the already existing plans to invade Cuba (which Castro said originated with Vice President Nixon during the Eisenhower administration), and saying he was already responsible for other acts “of aggression” toward Cuba which prevented him from being called a friend of Cuba, he nonetheless had some good things to say about Kennedy. Referring to Kennedy as an “intelligent” and “brilliant man,” he felt his most affirmative virtue was that “he was a courageous man,” a man (unlike Lyndon Johnson, he said) who was “capable of revising a policy because he had the courage to do so,” and Castro had “interpreted” the Jean Daniel visit “as a definite gesture on Kennedy’s part” toward detente. “I have no doubts,” Castro said, “that Kennedy would someday have reconsidered his policy towards Cuba.” Castro went on to say that although he and his people “must take into consideration [Kennedy’s] responsibility for measures that were taken against us, we did not hold personal grudges against him, nor did we have reason to wish for his death, and least of all the tragic death he suffered. I say this in all honesty, in all sincerity, that we were grieved, it was very unpleasant to learn of his death, and we would have preferred that he continue in the presidency of the United States.”⁵¹

And Daniel was having lunch with Castro at Castro’s modest summer home in the resort town of Varadero Beach at one-thirty (Cuban time) on the afternoon of the assassination. When the telephone rang thereafter and a secretary in guerrilla garb informed Castro that Mr. Dortico, president of the Cuban Republic, had an urgent communication for him, “Fidel picked up the phone,” Daniel writes, “and I heard him say: ‘Como? Um a tentado?’ (‘What’s that? An attempted assassination?’) He then turned to us to say that Kennedy had just been struck down in Dallas. Then he went back to the telephone and exclaimed in a loud voice ‘Herido? Muy gravemente?’ (‘Wounded? Very seriously?’) He came back, sat down and repeated three times the words: ‘Es uno mala noticia.’ (‘This is bad news.’)” When the news finally came in of Kennedy’s death, Castro lamented to Daniel, “At least Kennedy was an enemy to whom we had become accustomed. This is a serious matter, an extremely serious matter.”⁵²

In his televised speech to the Cuban people on the evening of November 23, the night following the assassination, Castro suggested that “ultra-conservative circles” were behind the assassination, and that these circles were responsible for seeking to put the blame on him. “The information about Lee H. Oswald is a Machiavellian plan against Cuba. Oswald never had contacts with us. We have never heard of him. [He would later learn about Oswald coming to the Cuban consulate in Mexico City.] But in the dispatches he’s always presented as a Castro Communist.”⁵³

Three separate, independent bodies investigated the possibility of Cuban complicity in Kennedy’s murder. In 1964, the Warren Commission concluded it could find “no evidence” that Cuba was “involved in the assassination of President Kennedy.”⁵⁴ In 1976, the Church Committee said it had “seen no evidence that Fidel Castro or others in the Cuban Government plotted Kennedy’s assassination in retaliation for U.S. operations against Cuba.”⁵⁵ And in 1979, the HSCA concluded that “the Cuban Government was not involved in the assassination of President Kennedy.”⁵⁶ Wherever President Johnson is today, he should defer to this collective judgment.

The Odio Incident and Anti-Castro Cuban Exiles

It has been my experience in the prosecution of criminal cases that in virtually every complex murder case, there is at least one event or the testimony of one witness that does not fit comfortably into the mosaic of the known facts. Such is the case with the Sylvia Odio incident in the Kennedy assassination, in which Miss Odio said Oswald and two Cubans visited her at her apartment in Dallas in late September of 1963, and one of the Cubans told her the following day of Oswald's reference to the desirability of Kennedy being assassinated. Conspiracy theorists have long pointed to the Odio incident as powerful evidence of a conspiracy in the assassination. Indeed, Warren Commission assistant counsel Wesley Liebeler said that at the time the Warren Commission submitted its final report in September of 1964, "I did not have any other...line of investigation that I wanted to pursue and I don't know that anyone else on the staff did either" except for the Sylvia Odio incident.

HSCA deputy chief counsel Gary Cornwell: "The Sylvia Odio incident was never resolved to your satisfaction, was it?"

Liebeler: "No, not really."¹

I had learned that before defense attorney Gerry Spence and I got involved in the London documentary, Mark Redhead had visited Odio, who was living in Washington, D.C., seeking to have her testify at the trial, and she was disinclined to do so. However, he intended to make a further effort. I knew, of course, that even if she eventually agreed (which she did not), as with all witnesses the final determination of whether she would be called to the stand would be made by Spence or me.

When I first read about the Odio incident during my preparation for trial, I was deeply troubled. As previously pointed out, whether Oswald was or was not a part of a conspiracy would not be an issue for the jury to resolve at the trial, and Spence would be presenting evidence against his own client to suggest that Oswald was. Judge Lucius Bunton had agreed to give my offered instruction that if the jurors, though it was not their burden, nonetheless concluded that Oswald was part of a conspiracy, under the law they must (even if they believed he was not the actual killer) return a verdict of guilty. This is so because of the vicarious liability theory of conspiracy, which holds that each member of a conspiracy is criminally responsible for all crimes committed by his co-conspirators in pursuance of the objective of the conspiracy. However, any belief by the jury in the existence of a conspiracy could only spell problems for me, because all the evidence I intended to present to prove Oswald's guilt, without exception, showed Oswald always acting alone in his deadly mission. Therefore, if, for whatever reason, the jury smelled a conspiracy, this could only serve to diminish my credibility in their eyes. More importantly, the complicity of others was incompatible with the thrust of my case, and could reasonably cause the jury to question the validity of all or at least some of the evidence I was presenting against Oswald. In other words, if the jurors ultimately came to conclude that there was a conspiracy, it might raise a reasonable doubt in their mind as to whether Oswald had, in fact, killed Kennedy, since it may have been another member of the conspiracy who had pulled the trigger. So the Odio incident took on great importance in my eyes. And despite the countless claims of conspiracy by the conspiracy theorists throughout the years, it remains a fact that the Odio incident, if true, was, and continues to be, the only event where Oswald is put allegedly in the company of a mysterious companion (here, two) shortly before the assassination, and where he allegedly uttered the desirability of Kennedy's murder in the presence of at least one other person.

The Cuban regime that preceded Fidel Castro was that of Cuban dictator Fulgencio Batista, which the United States had supported for years. It was widely reviled for its corruption, enabling Castro to rise to power with the support of not only the poor* and the nation's youth but also most of the middle class and even many of the rich, including Sylvia Odio's family. Perhaps no one has captured, in a few words, the essence of why Castro was so popular better than President Dwight D. Eisenhower. In his book Waging Peace, after noting that during Castro's revolution against Batista, "sentimental support for Castro was widespread" in the United States, he writes,

Castro's struggle had been going on for years. On the 26th of July 1953, a date which gave his movement its name, he and a little band of followers had unsuccessfully attacked the Moncada Barracks in Santiago de Cuba. After a tempestuous 3½ years of fighting, imprisonment, and exile in Mexico [where he met and joined hands with Argentinian revolutionary Ernesto "Che" Guevara], Castro returned to Cuba, where he hid out in the Sierra Maestra mountains, conducting intermittent guerrilla forays. Herbert L. Matthews of the New York Times, having held exclusive talks with Castro in his mountain hideout, proclaimed him "the most remarkable and romantic figure to arise in Cuban history since José Martí [1853–1895, Cuban patriot and writer], the hero of the Wars of Independence." And in the absence of reports to the contrary, and the universal revulsion against the Batista government, it is not surprising that large numbers of his readers should have echoed Matthews' views. Castro promised free elections, social reform, schools, housing, and an end to corruption. Though some individuals, in and out of government, voiced suspicions that the Castro movement was Communist inspired and supported, these rumblings were drowned out by the chorus of plaudits encouraging the "liberator."²

Castro's overthrow of Batista in early January of 1959 was initially heralded in the United States by a majority of Americans.³ Indeed, Senator John F. Kennedy himself, just a year and a half before he tried to depose him, sang Castro's praise. In his 1960 book, The Strategy of Peace, he writes that "we should now reread the life of Simón Bolívar, the great 'Liberator'...of South America in order to comprehend the new contagion for liberty and reform now spreading south of our borders...Fidel Castro is part of the legacy of Bolívar,* who led his men over the Andes Mountains vowing 'war to the death' against Spanish rule." (Kennedy's editor writes in a footnote that "the regime of Batista and his army had been highly repressive; it had arrested many thousands of people, jailed them, tortured and executed them. Since he had ousted President Carlos Prío Socarras in 1952, civil liberty had been without a home in Cuba.")⁴ The telling point is that Kennedy wrote these words after he had been fully aware, as his editor writes in another footnote, that Castro had "ruthlessly executed many of his enemies, publicly asserted that Cuba would not align itself with the West in the Cold War, and placed Communists in some key posts of government." Kennedy writes that "whether Castro would have taken a more rational course after his victory had the United States Government not backed the dictator Batista so long† and so uncritically, and had it given the fiery young rebel [Castro] a warmer welcome in his hour of triumph, especially on his trip to this country [Eisenhower didn't meet with Castro, palming him off on Nixon, who reportedly was chilly toward the bearded Fidel], we cannot be sure.”⁵

The Batista regime was known mostly for its corruption, but he was also a brutal dictator, his intelligence arm BRAC (Buro para Represión de las Actividades Comunistas, “Bureau for Repression of the Communist Activities”) visiting torture and often murder on his political opposition.⁶ Indeed, the denunciation of Castro’s firing squads, in which 150 ex-Batista officials were publicly executed within two weeks of Castro’s assuming power in early January 1959, and at least 506 within three months,⁷ has to be tempered with the acknowledgment that at least some (and perhaps many) of those killed had themselves committed murder, and hence, their execution was no different from a death penalty being carried out against a convicted murderer here in the states—absent due process, of course. For instance, one of Batista’s henchmen, Ramón Calvinio, who worked under Colonel Esteban Ventura, a top police chief in Batista’s regime, got away but resurfaced allegedly as part of the rebel invasion at the Bay of Pigs in 1961. In nationally televised interrogations of some of the captured rebels, Calvinio was confronted by a woman who screamed that he had killed her husband before her eyes. Weeping, the woman shouted at Calvinio, “Do you remember me, Calvinio, do you remember my husband? I hope I can be on the firing squad that will shoot you.” Another accuser was a man who charged Calvinio with having assassinated his friends in the Castro underground movement.^{8*}

For months after Castro took over the reign of power, there were “mutual expressions of friendship and cooperation” between the United States and Castro’s revolutionary government. Additionally, President Eisenhower’s appointment of Philip Bonsal as U.S. ambassador to Cuba to replace Ambassador Earl E. T. Smith, “who was known to be personally suspicious of Castro, was a clear signal to the new Cuban leader that the United States was interested in amicable relations” with his new government.⁹

In any event, to the great dismay of the United States and many in Cuba, Castro soon drifted more and more toward repression, and under the influence of his brother Raul and Che Guevara, who were more ideological Communists than the pragmatic Fidel,¹⁰ toward a Communistic society. But the “outing” was not as swift and clear as many now believe. The strongest message didn’t occur until May 17, 1959, over four and a half months after Castro came to power, with the passage of the Agrarian Reform Law, which limited private ownership of land to one thousand acres, the government confiscating and distributing the remaining land to peasants. At the time, approximately 75 percent of Cuba’s arable land was owned by foreign interests.^{11†} And actually, it wasn’t until October 19 that an incident occurred which precipitated the formation of the first organized anti-Castro opposition within Cuba. Major Huber Matos, one of the principal heroes of Castro’s revolution and one of Castro’s highest-ranking officers, resigned from Castro’s army in declared protest against Castro’s increasingly demonstrated favoritism toward known Communists. Matos was arrested two days later, tried and convicted of treason, and sentenced to twenty years in prison.

The cat almost out of the bag, Castro met secretly shortly thereafter with his National Agrarian Reform Institute (INRA) managers from the various provinces of Cuba and outlined a plan to communize Cuba within three years. Manuel Artime Buesa, a first lieutenant in Castro’s “Red Army,” and Castro's manager in Oriente province who would later be one of the leaders of the Bay of Pigs invasion, was present at the meeting and would later say, "I realized that I was a democratic infiltrator in a Communist government." Artime went back to his province and on October 29, 1959, penned what would become a famous letter to "Dr. Fidel Castro Ruz, Sierra Maestra," in which he resigned his post in the Red Army and his INRA command and defended Huber Matos as a "patriot." The letter was a strong indictment of Castro's Cuban government on the ground that it was heavily infiltrated with Communists, and it accused Castro of, in effect, outlining a plan at the INRA meeting to communize Cuba. Artime immediately went into hiding and started to organize students and peasants to fight against Castro and Communism. By early November, the counterrevolutionary Artime had cells of his underground movement in each province in Cuba, and had published his manifesto, Comunismo, para qué? (Communism, What For?). His movement was called Movimiento de Recuperacion Revolucionaria (MRR), the first anti-Castro group inside Cuba and one originating from within Castro's own ranks.¹²

On the same day that Matos came out against Castro, October 19, 1959, the U.S. government began its embargo on U.S. goods to Cuba. Five days later, in response to the embargo, Castro nationalized all remaining* U.S. properties in Cuba.¹³ This was extremely significant since the United States virtually "owned" Cuba before this. As Senator John F. Kennedy said, "At the beginning of 1959, U.S. companies owned about 40 percent of the Cuban sugar lands, almost all of the cattle ranches, 90 percent of the mines and mineral concessions, 80 percent of the utilities and practically all the oil industry, and supplied two-thirds of Cuba's imports."¹⁴

But it wasn't until January 2, 1961, that the U.S. government broke off all diplomatic relations with Cuba. By April of 1961, more than a hundred thousand Cubans had fled Castro's revolution, nearly all to the United States, where, to this very day, they and most of their progeny have been living in anticipation of Castro's overthrow.¹⁵

Sylvia Odio was born in Havana, Cuba, in 1937, one of ten children and the oldest daughter of Amador and Sarah Odio. In Batista's Cuba, the Odios were members of the wealthy aristocracy, Amador being the owner of the country's largest trucking company. Time magazine described him as the "transport tycoon" of Latin America.

Sylvia's parents, from their youth, had been idealistic and active opponents of a succession of tyrants who ruled Cuba, going back to the reign of General Gerardo Machado in the 1930s. In fact, twice during the dictatorship of Batista, the Odios were forced into exile for their dissident activity. Their nationalistic fervor and desire for democracy caused them to be early supporters of Castro (despite the fact that Castro's whole 26th of July Movement was to bring about land reform and secure a bigger share of the country's wealth for the working class), and the trucks of Amador Odio's company, bearing arms and medical supplies, helped sustain Castro's insurgency movement in the Sierra Maestra mountains, the mountain range in Cuba's Oriente province from which Castro launched his guerilla revolution against Batista.

But when the Odios subsequently learned, as did most Cubans, that the promise of the revolution to restore democracy in Cuba was illusory—that it had merely replaced one dictator (Batista) with another (Castro) and that Castro had betrayed the revolution and was in fact a Marxist who apparently had concealed this fact to further his revolutionary goals—they became founding members, with Manuel “Manolo” Ray and others, of Movimiento Revolucionario del Pueblo (MRP), an anti-Castro organization. Members of the MRP frequently utilized the Odios’ home in Havana and their small farm near Havana to conduct MRP activities. This led to the arrest and imprisonment of Amador and Sarah by the Castro regime in 1961, the two receiving long prison terms.¹⁶

As a teenager, Sylvia had been sent to the Eden Hall Convent of the Sacred Heart in Philadelphia for high school and graduated in 1954. She returned to Cuba to enter the University of Villanova, where she studied law. On the side she wrote stories published in Latin American literary magazines. She abandoned her studies after three years in 1957 to marry Guillermo Herrera, son of a Havana family that other Cuban exiles described as “cultured, old, extremely wealthy, and socially well-known.” Soon after the wedding, the young couple lived for nine months in New Orleans.¹⁷ At the time of her parents’ arrest, Sylvia was twenty-four and living in Ponce, Puerto Rico, with her husband and four children. The following year, her husband deserted her and the children. The imprisonment of her parents and the sudden transformation of her life from one of privilege and wealth to that of deprivation, causing her to be left alone to fend for herself and her children, induced emotional problems.¹⁸ Mrs. Lucille Connell, a close friend of Sylvia’s, said that Sylvia had a condition much more common in Latin than in American women—when “conscious reality” got “too painful to bear” for Sylvia, she sometimes would go “completely unconscious.”¹⁹

Annie and Sarita, Sylvia’s younger sisters, had settled in Dallas before Sylvia. Sarita, a student at the University of Dallas, had become friendly with Connell, a Dallas society matron who provided financial and social assistance to the Dallas Cuban Refugee Center. Connell was also active in the Mental Health Association of Dallas, and her son was a psychiatrist. Talking about Dallas’s conservatism, she said that in Dallas, being active in mental health activities “would [alone] make you a part of the Communist plot.” When she learned of Sylvia’s plight from Sarita, Connell sent Sylvia part of her airfare to come to Dallas for a visit with her sister in March 1963. She also made efforts to find an appropriate psychiatrist for Sylvia, and they eventually settled on Dr. Burton C. Einspruch at the Southwestern Medical School, who started treating her in April with some success. Connell, with whom Sylvia was staying, noticed that the fainting tapered off and eventually ended.²⁰ At the end of June, Sylvia went back to Puerto Rico to collect her four young children and settle them in her new apartment at 1084 Magellan Circle in Dallas.²¹

Bright and pretty, well educated, charming, and imbued with the social graces imparted to her by the sisters of the Sacred Heart, whose mission was to provide superior education for “the daughters of gentlefolk,” Sylvia, through Connell’s introductions, became acquainted with and accepted by the highest strata of Dallas society, including the family of John Rogers, who owned Texas Industries (she stayed with the Rogers family for a period after her hospitalization following JFK’s death). For a time she dated Lawrence Marcus, one of the owners of the exclusive department store Neiman Marcus, where she worked for a while. In fact, her psychiatrist, Dr. Einspruch, who got to know Sylvia well, said that Miss Odio had unquestionably passed Mrs. Connell on the social ladder and was “at the very top” in Dallas.²² By September, when she was working at the National Chemsearch Company in Irving, her emotional problems had subsided, and she was planning to move to a better apartment closer to her work. The last week of September, her seventeen-year-old sister, Annie, came to the Magellan Circle apartment to help Sylvia pack for the move on October 1, and to tend to

Sylvia's children.²³

As alluded to briefly in the Oswald biography in this book, Sylvia Odio testified before the Warren Commission that the week prior to the October 1 moving date, as she was getting dressed to go out to a friend's house just before 9:00 p.m., the doorbell rang and her sister Annie went to the door. When Annie came back and said, "Sylvia, there are three men at the door," Sylvia put on her housecoat and went to the door. With October 1, 1963, as a reference date, she said the visit was either the previous Thursday (September 26) or Friday (September 27) evening.

Two of the men at the door, she testified, appeared to be Cubans. The third was an American. The Cubans, she said, told her they were very good friends of Sylvia's father (about whom, she testified, they knew "almost incredible details," including where he was imprisoned on the Isle of Pines, Fidel Castro's Devil's Island in Cuba) and members of JURE (the Cuban Revolutionary Junta), the anti-Castro organization that succeeded MRP and of which Sylvia herself was a member in Dallas. JURE was headed by Manolo Ray, who in the earlier MRP years had often hidden from Castro in the Odios' Havana residence. She testified that the two Cubans identified themselves only by their fictitious underground "war names." She recalls one of the Cubans' names as being "Leopoldo." He was the taller of the two Cubans and did most of the talking. The other one's name was "something like Angelo." She said "they both looked very greasy, like the kind of low Cubans, not educated at all." Leopoldo said, "We wanted you to meet this American. His name is Leon Oswald," mentioning his name twice. For the most part, the American kept quiet, saying "just a few little words in Spanish, trying to be cute...like 'Hola.'" When Sylvia asked him if he had ever been to Cuba, he said he had not.²⁴

She described the American as being around five feet ten inches tall and "kind of a skinny man, a description that generally fits Oswald." For those who believe Odio might have fabricated her whole story from media accounts, she apparently wasn't aware of something that had been widely published—Oswald's age of twenty-four. In her testimony to the Warren Commission, nearly a year after the assassination, she said she guessed that "Leon" was about thirty-four or thirty-five at the time she met him.

"Have you," Warren Commission counsel asked, "read the newspapers and watched television since the assassination and observed Oswald?"

"I read some of it," Sylvia answered.

"Did you read how old he was?"

"I don't even know what age he is."²⁵

If this was fabrication, it was clever indeed.

Odio testified that Leopoldo told her they had just come from New Orleans. One of the Cubans took out a letter written in Spanish asking for donations to help fund JURE activities. The Cubans wanted Sylvia to translate the petition into English and to send it out seeking funds. Not only had other small groups of Cubans come to her door asking her to help with JURE, but Antonio Alentado, the head of JURE in Dallas, had earlier shown her the same petition and made the same request. Because she was very busy with her job and four children, she had declined to become that actively involved in the Dallas chapter of JURE. When she asked the Cubans if they had been sent by Alentado and they said no, that they were trying to organize the Dallas area on their own, she told them she would be unable to help them. (Odio told FBI agent James Hosty in her first interview with the authorities on December 18, 1963, that she declined to help because her parents were still in prison in Cuba and she fearful they would possibly be harmed.) Watching the three men drive off through the window of her apartment, she noticed that Leopoldo was driving. The next day, Odio testified, Leopoldo called her after she got home from work. She felt he was trying to get “fresh” with her, “trying to be too nice, telling me that I was pretty.” He then asked her what she thought of the American. When she replied she “didn’t think anything,” he proceeded to tell her they wanted to introduce Leon (over the telephone Leopoldo never mentioned the name Oswald) to the underground because “he is great, he is kind of nuts. He told us we don’t have any guts...because President Kennedy should have been assassinated after the Bay of Pigs and some Cubans should have done that because he was the one that was holding the freedom of Cuba, actually.” Killing the president, the American had said, would be “so easy to do.” Leopoldo said that Leon was a former marine and an “expert shotman,” and told Odio the American was the type who might be able to go underground in Cuba and kill Castro.²⁶

Three days after the three men visited her, Sylvia said she wrote to her father at the Nueva Gerona prison on the Isle of Pines in Cuba asking him if he knew the two Cuban visitors who came to her door purporting to be his friends. She recalls giving him the war names of one or two of the Cubans, but said she probably only referred to the third man as an “American.”²⁷ It was Christmas Day 1963 before Amador was allowed to write back. In his letter to “My children” (his ten sons and daughters, all of whom he and Sarah had removed from Cuba to safety and who now lived in Miami and Dallas, the younger ones in orphanages), the words were meticulously printed in very tiny letters on one sheet with no margins, making the most of the single page he was allowed to write on. It is a letter of a man struggling hard to keep his family together spiritually in spite of the circumstances that had scattered them in exile, and it is full of praise, exhortations, admonitions, and hope for the future. Eventually he speaks directly to Sylvia about her mysterious visitors, and underlines his words. “Tell me who this is who says he is my friend,” he writes. “Be careful. I do not have any friend who might be here, through Dallas, so reject his friendship until you give me his name.”^{28*}

It was no doubt good advice. Refugees whose friends and relatives were held prisoner in Cuba were preyed on by scam artists who claimed they could help secure release of prisoners in much the way people with incurable diseases are preyed on by quacks. Moreover, the security problems of the anti-Castro underground in America were great. No one knew which of their friends and colleagues might be spies for the Castro regime.

Although Odio testified she may have told Lucille Connell about the visit from the three men, the only other person she is certain she told before the assassination was her psychiatrist, Dr. Einspruch.²⁹ Einspruch confirmed in a deposition given to the HSCA on July 11, 1978, that Odio had told him, prior to the assassination, of the visit from the three men. He said she told him two of the men were “Cubans or Latins” and the third man was an “Anglo,” though he did not recall whether or not she mentioned his name was Leon at that time. He said she did, however, after the assassination, when she identified Leon as Oswald to him. Einspruch did not recall Odio ever telling him that Leopoldo had called her a day later and told her about Leon saying that Kennedy should be assassinated.³⁰

At the time of the assassination, Sylvia was still working at National Chemsearch. The company manufactured and sold products like soap and cleanser to large companies and institutions, not retail stores, and because she was bilingual, she worked in its International Department taking orders from Latin countries.³¹

When Sylvia returned to work from lunch on November 22, 1963, and learned the president had been assassinated, she passed out and was taken by ambulance to a hospital in Irving. Though there had been no mention of Oswald on the news yet, she “established a connection” in her mind between the assassination and the visit of the three men, particularly the reference to the fact that “the Cubans should have killed President Kennedy...I was so upset about it. So probably the lunch had something to do with it, too, and I was so upset, that that is why I probably passed out.”^{32*} Because the two non-Anglos at her door were anti-Castro Cubans, Odio would later say that her immediate fear that Cuban exiles might be accused of the president’s death may have contributed to her fainting.³³

Odio said that when she saw Oswald on television later that day from her hospital room, she immediately recognized him as the Anglo Leon. “I kept saying it can’t be to myself; it just can’t be. I mean it couldn’t be, but when my sister walked into the hospital [room] and she said, ‘Sylvia, have you seen the man?’ ...I said, yes, and she said, ‘That was the man that was at the door’ ...so I had no doubts then.” When asked by Warren Commission counsel if she had any doubts that Leon was Oswald, she replied, “I don’t have any doubt.”³⁴

Odio did not contact the authorities about the visit from the two Cubans and the man she was now certain was Oswald. She told an HSCA investigator in 1976 that she and her sister were extremely frightened and worried about the welfare of their parents in Cuba and of their brothers and sisters, not knowing if others were involved in the assassination and what the consequences to them and their family would be if they came forward. “I never wanted to go to the [authorities]. I was afraid. I was young at the time, I was recently divorced, I had young children, I was going through hell. Besides, it was such a responsibility to get involved because who is going to believe you? Who is going to believe that I had Oswald in my house? I was scared and my sister Annie was very scared at the time.”^{35†}

On August 28, 1964, the Warren Commission’s chief counsel, J. Lee Rankin, wrote to FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, stating that “it is a matter of some importance to the Commission that Mrs. Odio’s allegations either be proved or disproved.”³⁶

The two questions, of course, that bedeviled and concerned the Warren Commission (as well as the HSCA) were whether or not two Cubans and an American did in fact visit Odio in September of 1963, and much more importantly, if they did, whether the American was Oswald. Although not explicitly stating it, the Warren Report implies that the Commission did believe there was such a visit,³⁷ never once seeming to question her story about the two Latin men and one American man coming to her door. However, the Commission concluded that Oswald was not the American man because he could not have been in Dallas on the dates and time given by Miss Odio, around 9:00 p.m. on September 26 or 27, 1963, and, indeed, “Oswald was not at Miss Odio’s apartment in September of 1963.”³⁸

If, indeed, as Odio testified before the Warren Commission, the visit from the two Cubans and one American took place around 9:00 p.m. on the evening of September 26 or 27, 1963,^{39*} it would clearly appear that Oswald could not have been present. The Warren Commission, as a result of a very thorough and meticulous investigation by the FBI as well as the Secret Service, replete with extensive documentary evidence in addition to eyewitness testimony, proved that he was in Mexico on the evenings of both of these days (see later text).

The FBI investigation concluded that Oswald was in New Orleans from April 24, 1963, when he left Dallas for New Orleans, until at least 8:00 a.m. on September 25, 1963. Ruth Paine and Marina Oswald left Oswald behind when they departed New Orleans for Dallas on September 23.⁴⁰ On September 24, Oswald went to the office of the Louisiana Division of Employment Security in New Orleans to sign for his Texas unemployment compensation for that week.⁴¹ He received $33 per week in unemployment compensation.⁴² That week's check, dated September 23, 1963, was picked up by the U.S. Postal Department from the Texas Employment Commission in Austin, Texas, at 5:15 that evening.⁴³ The Warren Commission concluded that the earliest time Oswald could have obtained the Texas check from his post office box in New Orleans was 5:00 a.m. on September 25, 1963.⁴⁴ Although the date Oswald cashed this check at the Winn-Dixie Store in New Orleans is not indicated on the check, it is believed he must have cashed it sometime between 8:00 a.m. (when the store opened for the day) and 1:00 p.m. on September 25. Store records show that the cashier who cashed the check, Mrs. Thelma Fisher, left work at 1:00 p.m. on September 25.⁴⁵ So Oswald's presence in New Orleans until at least the morning (8:00 a.m.) of September 25 seems to have been firmly established by the Warren Commission. The Commission noted, however, that "between the morning of September 25th and 2:35 a.m. on September 26th" Oswald's whereabouts were "not strictly accounted for."⁴⁶

The FBI and Secret Service established that the following day, September 26, Oswald, whose ultimate destination was Mexico City, was traveling on Continental Trailways bus number 5133, which left Houston at 2:35 a.m. for Laredo, Texas. The 5133 passengers, en route to Laredo, were transferred to bus number 304 at Corpus Christi, which arrived in Laredo about 1:20 p.m. that day.⁴⁷

As indicated previously, a young couple from Liverpool, England, Mr. and Mrs. John McFarland, gave an affidavit to the American consulate in Liverpool that they first became aware of Oswald, whom they thereafter recognized from pictures in the newspapers at the time of the assassination, on the Houston-to-Laredo bus "probably about 6:00 a.m., after it became light."⁴⁸

After he departed Laredo, Texas, on bus number 516 of the Flecha Roja bus line for Mexico City at 1:45 p.m. on September 26, 1963, witnesses and Mexican immigration records reflect that Oswald crossed the border to Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, sometime before 2:00 p.m. on September 26.⁴⁹

The reason the exact time of day is not known is that Helio Tuexi Maydon, the Mexican immigration inspector (Maydon worked on September 26 from 6:00 a.m. to 2:00 p.m.) who stamped Oswald's tourist card, FM-8 No. 240085, failed to record the precise time of day.⁵⁰

Since the evidence is overwhelming that Oswald could not, as Sylvia Odio alleges, have been at her apartment in Dallas on the evenings of either September 26 or 27 (since on the evening of September 26 he was on a bus in Mexico traveling to Mexico City, and on the evening of September 27 he was in Mexico City), can we therefore discard her story as being unfactual? In an infrequently cited second interview with the FBI on September 10, 1964, a month and a half after her Warren Commission testimony, Odio acknowledged that the visit by the three men could possibly have been on Wednesday night, September 25, 1963.⁵¹ Although the FBI agents had made every effort possible to confirm Oswald's whereabouts during the day and evening of September 25, they were unable to do so.⁵²

However, the premise that Oswald visited Odio on the evening of the twenty-fifth creates its own set of problems, though not, as we have seen with the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh, of a prohibitory nature. The Warren Commission established that the only bus out of Dallas on the evening of September 25 after 9:00 p.m. (the time of the visit, per Odio) that Oswald could have taken and would have enabled him to connect with the Houston bus to Laredo was a Continental Trailways bus departing Dallas at 11:00 p.m. However, that bus, traveling through San Antonio, did not connect with the Houston-to-Laredo bus until 10:35 (in Alice, Texas) on the morning of the twenty-sixth, more than four hours after the McFarlands first reported seeing Oswald on their bus.⁵³ Moreover, no tickets were sold during the period September 23–26, 1963, for travel between Dallas and Laredo by the Dallas office of Continental Trailways.⁵⁴

There is a further problem that circumstantially militates against Oswald being at Odio's door with his two Cuban friends at around 9:00 on the evening of September 25. Mrs. Estelle Twiford of Houston, Texas, said that one evening "during the week prior to the weekend that my husband flew home to visit me from New Orleans," she received a telephone call sometime between seven and ten o'clock from Oswald requesting to speak to her husband, Horace. (Estelle and Horace distributed literature in Texas for the Socialist Labor Party, and Horace had routinely mailed Oswald literature in Dallas, and Oswald's address book contained the name Horace Twiford with Twiford's address and phone number.)⁵⁵ As discussed earlier in this book, when Oswald was told that Twiford's husband, a merchant seaman, was at sea, Oswald said he had hoped to discuss ideas with him for a few hours before he left for Mexico. Horace Twiford was able to fix the week of the Oswald call because he said he had flown home from New Orleans to visit his wife on September 27 (a Friday) and was told by his wife that Oswald had called "during the week preceding my visit home. I had been home on the previous weekend, and neither at that time nor prior thereto had my wife said anything about a call from Oswald." Since we know Oswald was in New Orleans on September 23 and 24 (see earlier text), and Mexico on September 26 and 27, it appears the call was on the evening of the twenty-fifth. Mrs. Twiford assumed the call from Oswald was a local (Houston) one because, she said, no operator was involved and because of Oswald's remark that he wanted to "discuss ideas" with her husband "for a few hours." However, Oswald did not specifically tell her he was in Houston at the time of the call.⁵⁶ If Oswald, in fact, was in Houston sometime between 7:00 and 10:00 p.m. on the evening of September 25, wanting to meet with Horace Twiford for a few hours, this would essentially rule out his being at Sylvia Odio's residence at nine o'clock that same evening.

If Oswald was not the American who visited Odio on the evening of September 25, 26, or 27, 1963, who was? And who were the two Cubans? Based on the description of the three men given by Miss Odio, and the two war names of Leopoldo and possibly Angelo, the Warren Commission had the FBI conduct a far-reaching canvass of the anti-Castro community in the United States to locate them. On September 16, 1964, the FBI located one Loran Eugene Hall in Johnsandale, California. Loran Hall (whose name bears a phonetic resemblance to Odio's "Leon Oswald") had been involved in anti-Castro paramilitary activities in Florida. He told the bureau that he, a Mexican-American from East Los Angeles named Lawrence Howard, and William Seymour from Arizona (who, Hall said, resembled Oswald) had visited Odio in Dallas in September of 1963 to solicit funds for the anti-Castro movement.⁵⁷ The FBI had not completed its investigation of this matter by the time the Warren Report, published on September 24, 1964, was submitted for publication, and the Report informed its readers of this fact.⁵⁸ Within a week of Hall's statement, and with the Warren Commission no longer in existence, Howard and Seymour were interviewed by the FBI and denied ever having met Odio. Howard said Hall was a "scatter-brain, unreliable, emotionally disturbed, and an egotistical liar." On September 20, 1964, Hall himself recanted his story.⁵⁹ Nonetheless, on October 1, 1964, in Miami, Florida (where Odio had just moved to from Dallas), the FBI showed photos of Hall, Howard, and Seymour to Odio, who said none of them were among the men who had visited her. Her sister Annie was also shown the three photos and she too failed to recognize any of the men.⁶⁰ Additionally, an examination of the payroll records of the Beach Welding Supplies Company of Miami Beach, Florida, revealed that Seymour, the one who allegedly looked like Oswald, was employed with the company and worked forty-hour weeks during the period September 5 to October 10, 1963.⁶¹

The HSCA reinterviewed Hall, Howard, and Seymour, and again searched the anti-Castro community for the three men who had visited Odio, extending their search to even include pro-Castro activists. The search produced three men who may have been in Dallas in September 1963. Photographs of the men were shown to Odio, who could not identify them as the men who had visited her.⁶²

Assuming Sylvia Odio is telling the truth, the identity of Leopoldo and Angelo remains unknown to this day. From their appearance, the things they said, their detailed knowledge of Odio's father, the fact they had the identical petition in their possession that Dallas JURE leader Antonio Alentado had—indeed, from the fact they had Sylvia Odio's home address—one can reasonably conclude they were, in fact, anti-Castro Cuban exiles. Certainly, no one has suggested they were pro-Castro Cubans, nor is there any evidence to warrant this conclusion.

It's not even known where they were from. The assumption has always been New Orleans, simply because Leopoldo told Odio, "We have just come from New Orleans." But they could have been from Miami, the headquarters for all of the anti-Castro groups⁶³ and the city where the overwhelming majority of anti-Castro Cubans have always lived. New Orleans may simply have been a city where they had been for awhile, and the city from which they departed on their trip to Dallas. Indeed, although they never expressly said so, Sylvia Odio got the impression from the two Cubans at her door that after Dallas "they were leaving for Puerto Rico or Miami."⁶⁴

Even if they were from New Orleans, however, we cannot automatically assume that they would have been aware of Oswald's confrontation with anti-Castro Cubans the very previous month, and hence, have known of Oswald's real identity as being pro-Castro and most likely anti-Kennedy. Although there was mention of the confrontation in the media,⁶⁵ it was a very minor story, and therefore the two Cubans may not have heard the news account. And since the anti-Castro movement was disorganized and fractured, we also cannot assume that word of the minor confrontation would have spread quickly in New Orleans's anti-Castro community. For instance, Bringuier, who was very active in the anti-Castro movement in New Orleans, didn't even know that there was an anti-Castro training camp in New Orleans across from Lake Pontchartrain.⁶⁶

Whether Leopoldo and Angelo were from New Orleans, Miami, or elsewhere, if Leon was in fact Oswald, and they in fact knew he was actually pro-Castro, then the visit to Odio's house makes little sense. Neither would Leopoldo's words to Odio the following day. He would know that Castro was the last person in the world Oswald would want to harm.

Although we have seen that the evidence of time and place compels the conclusion that Oswald could not have visited Odio on September 26 or 27, 1963, and most probably did not do so on September 25, there nevertheless are countervailing reasons why we cannot automatically dismiss Odio's allegations—namely, her credibility and corroborating evidence. As stated, we can infer from the Warren Report (and the fact that the Commission had the FBI conduct an extremely detailed and comprehensive investigation of Odio's story) that the Warren Commission staff did not write Odio's story off and believed her to be truthful, though mistaken, in her relation of the events to which she testified. Among others, Wesley Liebeler, who examined her for the Warren Commission, said, "I think [Odio] believes that Oswald was there. I do not think she would lie about something like that."⁶⁷ Assistant Counsel W. David Slawson, whose area of investigation for the Warren Commission was the possibility of a conspiracy in the assassination, wrote in his report to the Commission that "Mrs. Odio has been checked out thoroughly through her psychiatrist and friends, and, with one exception—a layman [not identified] who speculates that she may have subconscious tendencies to over-dramatize or exaggerate—the evidence is unanimously favorable, both as to her character and reliability and as to her intelligence."⁶⁸ Moreover, the problems that caused Odio to seek psychiatric assistance were not those that could affect her perception or credibility, and Odio was not hallucinatory.⁶⁹ A Warren Commission staff report noted that "Doctor [Burton] Einspruch [Odio's psychiatrist] stated that he had great faith in Miss Odio's story of having met Lee Harvey Oswald," believing the story to be "completely true." Einspruch, who had been seeing Odio on the average of once a week since April of 1963, said that while Odio was "given to exaggeration, all the basic facts which she provides are true." He stated her tendency to exaggerate is that of an emotional type, characteristic of many Latin-American people, and being one of degree rather than basic fact.⁷⁰ Manolo Ray, who had known Sylvia Odio and her family for years, told the FBI that Odio was an intelligent person of good character who would not have fabricated or been delusional about the incident at her door.⁷¹

Dr. Einspruch told the HSCA he felt Odio's emotional problems were "situational." In addition to the obvious problem of her husband leaving her to fend for herself and four children, Einspruch said Odio was not doing well economically, "she was an immigrant, her parents were imprisoned... she had all the difficulties one might anticipate a displaced person would have."⁷²

The HSCA, after a thorough evaluation of all the evidence, stated that "the committee was inclined to believe Sylvia Odio" to the extent that "three men did visit her apartment in Dallas prior to the Kennedy assassination and identified themselves as members of an anti-Castro organization," and that "one of these men at least looked like Lee Harvey Oswald and was introduced to Mrs. Odio as Leon Oswald."⁷³ As is normally not the case with those who are lying, the HSCA noted that Odio was consistent with her story over a period of many years, with only minor details changing.⁷⁴

The most important question, of course, is the following: Even if we make the assumption that Odio is being truthful, as the HSCA concluded and the Warren Commission implied, did she mistakenly believe the Anglo among the three men was Oswald? As discussed earlier in this book, there is something phenomenally distinctive about each human's physiognomy. So much so that, as mentioned earlier, no two people (other than identical twins) look almost exactly like each other. So much so that even animals recognize people they've seen before. Though there are factors that militate against identification, such as poor vision, distance, darkness and shadows, obstructions, oblique views, and so on, after you see and talk to someone close-up for several minutes, when you see that person again, particularly within a short period of time, a bell of recognition immediately goes off. This is why, if Odio is being truthful, it is extremely difficult to disregard her identification of Oswald.

The Warren Commission showed Odio several photos of Oswald. With two, she pointed out differences between the photo and Oswald. In one, Oswald looked shaven, she said, and on the night at her apartment, Oswald had a “little mustache” and he “did not look shaved.” In another, she said that although everything else was the same, the lips “did not look like the same man.” Also, “I am not too sure of that picture. He didn’t look like this...he was more smiling than in this picture.” Yet, even with these two photos of Oswald, she identified him as being the one in her apartment that night. And with other photos of Oswald, she made an unqualified identification. Asked whether one photograph of Oswald “was the man who was in your apartment,” she jocularly stated that “if it is not [Oswald], it is his twin.” Also, when shown New Orleans television (WDSU) footage of street scenes of Oswald in August of 1963, she identified Oswald, and added that “he had the same mustache.” When asked, “When did you first become aware of the fact that this man who had been at your apartment was the man who had been arrested in connection with the assassination?” she replied, “It was immediately.” “As soon as you saw his picture?” “Immediately, I was so sure.” When asked once again by Warren Commission counsel, “Do you have any doubts in your mind after looking at these pictures that the man that was in your apartment was...Lee Harvey Oswald?” she again replied, “I don’t have any doubts.”^{75*}

No one examining the evidence in the Odio matter can feel too sanguine about the conclusion he reaches, yet I feel that the slight preponderance of evidence is that Oswald was, in fact, the American among the three men who visited Odio. I say that for several reasons. One is that there is, as trial lawyers like to say, that unmistakable “ring of truth” to Odio’s testimony. An imperfect analogy is a U.S. Supreme Court justice’s observation about obscenity, that he couldn’t define it but he knew it when he saw it. Most of all, of course, is her positive identification of Oswald from photos and film. Moreover, her physical description of height and weight matches Oswald. The men telling her that they had “just come from New Orleans” and Leopoldo telling Odio that the American had been a marine, and that he was “kind of nuts,” all fit Oswald precisely. And the name Leon Oswald is clearly too close to be a coincidence. Unless Odio had fabricated this entire story, and had gotten these identifying details on Oswald through media accounts, these details speak loudly for the fact that the American was indeed Oswald.

The hypothesis of fabrication is difficult to square with the facts here. Odio certainly can’t be accused, for instance, of wanting to attach herself, for publicity purposes—as so many people do—to a high-visibility public event. To the contrary, she contacted neither the authorities nor the media about her belief that Oswald had visited her. Rather, she deeply feared her being associated with the incident. The only person she is sure she told, when he called her on the day after the assassination, was her psychiatrist.⁷⁶ In this vein, when CBS’s Martin Phillips contacted her to be on a Dan Rather CBS television special on the assassination, she refused.⁷⁷ It should be further noted parenthetically that Odio subsequently declined Mark Redhead’s further entreaties that she testify at the London trial, even though she was aware that the trial would be shown on national television in the United States and in many foreign countries, including England, France, Germany, and Australia. It simply stands to reason that if Odio had fabricated the aforementioned details about her visits that evening, this would be the work of someone who was intent on getting the story out. But, as we have seen, Odio did not do this. Nor has she ever attempted to profit, in any way, from her story, the first time she even granted a television interview being for a PBS Frontline special thirty years later.

Also, and perhaps most importantly, if Odio had fabricated her story, it is almost inconceivable that she would have said that before the assassination that Oswald was in the presence of two Cuban members of JURE, the anti-Castro group formed in Miami whose founder, Manolo Ray, had very close ties to Odio's parents. In fact, as indicated earlier, the parents cofounded, with Ray, the MRP, some of whose members became the original nucleus for JURE.⁷⁸ Indeed, Odio, herself a member of JURE, was actively involved in the anti-Castro movement and "desperate" to do anything she could to free her mother and father from their imprisonment in Cuba under Castro. She would never have thought that putting the presidential assassin in the company of JURE members before the assassination would be helpful to any of her dreams. In fact, why would Odio be trying to implicate any anti-Castro group in Kennedy's assassination? Only by Odio saying that Oswald appeared at her door with pro-Castro Cubans would Odio or any other Cuban exile have any hope of igniting a U.S. response that would topple the Cuban dictator. The fact that the story she told could only, if at all, be prejudicial to her interests is circumstantial evidence she was telling the truth. Adding further credibility to Odio's story is her telling her father and psychiatrist, prior to the assassination, of the visit by the three men. The fact that she did not mention the name Leon to her father, and may or may not have to her psychiatrist, is inconsequential, since prior to the assassination the name of the American who visited her that night had no significance. When her psychiatrist, Dr. Einspruch, called her on the day of or the day after the assassination, he recalls she did mention "Leon" to him as being Oswald.⁷⁹

Finally, there is corroboration for Sylvia Odio's story in the form of her younger sister, Annie, who answered the door when the three men came to the apartment. Annie Odio, without the emotional and psychiatric baggage that some feel corrodes the credibility of Sylvia Odio, also positively identified Oswald as being the American and one of the three men. When she first saw Oswald on television on the afternoon of the assassination, her first thought, she said, was, "My God. I know this guy, and I don't know from where! But I'm not going to tell anybody because they're going to think I'm crazy." When Annie spoke to Sylvia later that day and Sylvia reminded her of the three men at the door, Annie then remembered where she had seen Oswald.⁸⁰

My belief in Odio's story, though I'm not prepared to take it to the bank, and though it admittedly does not rise to the status of certainty or even beyond a reasonable doubt, necessarily constitutes a rejection of the Warren Commission's conclusion that Odio's story is not believable because Oswald could not have been at her door when she said he was. The distinction between literary fiction and nonfiction comes to mind. It is said that one advantage an author of fiction has is that he can give wings to his imagination, whereas in nonfiction one is restricted to the facts. However, to be good fiction a story should be somewhat believable. But nonfiction doesn't have to be believable. If it happened, whether it is believable or not is irrelevant. The likelihood is that the event Odio described did, in fact, take place, most probably on the evening of September 24 or 25, 1963. In an April 28, 1964, letter to J. Edgar Hoover, Rankin, general counsel for the Warren Commission, wrote that "the only time [Oswald] could have been in Odio's apartment appears to be the nights of

September 24 or 25, 1963, most likely the latter.”⁸¹

With respect to September 24, the Warren Commission concluded⁸² that “under normal procedures” Oswald could not have received his Texas unemployment compensation check in New Orleans, which was dated and mailed on Monday, September 23, 1963,⁸³ before 5:00 a.m. on September 25, 1963, a Wednesday (see earlier text). However, Marina told the FBI that Oswald received his unemployment check every Tuesday.⁸⁴ In fact, the Warren Commission itself said that Oswald cashed the previous week’s check at the Winn-Dixie Store in New Orleans on Tuesday, September 17, 1963.⁸⁵ If, then, Oswald had received his next check on Tuesday, September 24, it’s possible he cashed it at the Winn-Dixie Store between 8:00 a.m. and 1:00 p.m. on that day, not, as believed, the following day, Wednesday, September 25.

If that happened, Oswald and his two Cuban friends could have departed New Orleans by automobile during the daytime on September 24 and reached Sylvia Odio’s door in Dallas, 530 miles away (approximately an eight-hour drive at 65 mph), by nine o’clock that evening, September 24. In fact, Marina told the Warren Commission that Oswald told her he intended to leave New Orleans the very next day after her departure on September 23, 1963, that is, September 24.⁸⁶ (There was a conflicting story, however, that Oswald was seen leaving his apartment in New Orleans on the evening of September 24 carrying two suitcases,⁸⁷ which, if true, would have made it impossible for him to have been in Dallas that evening.)

Odio testified that “they kept mentioning they had come to visit me at such a time of night... because they were leaving on a trip.” She said they added, “We may stay until tomorrow, or we might leave tomorrow night.”⁸⁸ As we know, the next day Leopoldo called Odio after she returned from work (late afternoon or early evening) and they had the conversation about Oswald, Kennedy, and Castro. If this was the late afternoon or early evening of September 25, and Oswald was still with the Cubans, this would have given Oswald adequate time to drive thereafter with the Cubans from Dallas to Houston (at 240 miles away, approximately a three-and-a-half-hour drive at 65 mph), where Oswald could have then caught Continental Trailways bus number 5133 at 2:35 a.m. on September 26 bound for Laredo, Texas. This September 24, 1963, scenario would also be compatible with Mrs. Twiford’s belief that she sensed Oswald was calling her “from the Houston area,” somewhere “between seven and ten o’clock” in the evening. (If Oswald and the Cubans were at Odio’s door on September 25, however, since the incident took place at 9:00 p.m. in Dallas, he could not have called Twiford from the Houston area that evening.)

It’s pure speculation, but since we know the purpose of Oswald’s trip to Mexico was to reach Cuba, he could have easily conned the Cubans into believing that he was seeking to go to Cuba to further the Cubans’ goals, which they erroneously believed were the same as his. Believing Oswald was furthering their interests, they may have agreed to drive him as far as Houston. If they did drive Oswald to Houston, almost due south from Dallas, and if they were going to return to New Orleans, New Orleans would have virtually been straight east from Houston for them. Driving Oswald from Houston to Laredo, however, would have been completely out of the Cubans’ way.

The meeting at the door could also have happened on the evening of September 25. If it did, when Leopoldo called Odio after she came home from work on the day after the meeting at the door—which would be the early evening of September 26—Oswald couldn’t have still been in Dallas with his two Cuban friends (we know that on the evening of September 26 Oswald was on a bus, in Mexico, traveling to Mexico City), and would have had to have gotten to Houston on the evening of September 25 without their assistance.

Since the weight of the evidence in the Odio case is that the event Odio described did, in fact, take place, the countervailing evidence prompting the inference that her story is not believable should yield. It yields in this case, in my view, by accepting the probability that the seemingly airtight case the Warren Commission fairly and effectively constructed against Odio's story is somewhere defective, be it in the documentary evidence (e.g., as to the earliest time Oswald could have received his unemployment check in New Orleans) or the recollection of witnesses as to the dates and times they saw or spoke to Oswald (e.g., the affidavit of Mr. and Mrs. McFarland and Mrs. Twiford, etc.), which would not be uncommon at all.

It bears repeating that the Warren Commission conceded that "between the morning of September 25 and 2:35 a.m. on September 26" Oswald's whereabouts were "not strictly accounted for."

If Oswald did not leave Dallas for Houston with his two Cuban friends on the evening of September 25, or get there by some other means earlier in the day, then how did he get to Houston from New Orleans in time for him to board the Houston-to-Laredo bus at 2:35 on the morning of September 26? The Warren Commission believed that on September 25, Oswald probably took the 12:30 p.m. bus out of New Orleans, arriving in Houston at 10:50 p.m.⁸⁹ However, as indicated, although the Warren Commission checked all public modes of transportation from New Orleans to Houston on September 25, it could not come up with any evidence from witnesses or records (passenger manifest, ticket reservation or sale, listing Oswald's name or any alias of his) of his being on any plane, train, or bus from New Orleans to Houston that day.⁹⁰ The relevance of this (at least with respect to buses, the most likely mode of transportation Oswald would have used given the sorry state of his finances, and the mode we know he did use from Houston to Mexico City) is that, as author Jean Davison points out in her book, Oswald's Game, this is "an unusual circumstance, since there were passengers who had seen [Oswald] on every other leg of his bus trip to Mexico City and back to Dallas."⁹¹ The very absence of any witness or record that Oswald used commercial transportation out of New Orleans is itself at least some circumstantial evidence that he did not do so and goes in the direction of supporting the conclusion that Oswald left New Orleans with the two Latins, and was at Odio's door on the evening of September 24 or 25, 1963.

If, as I believe it appears, Oswald did visit Odio with the two Cubans, what conclusion should be drawn from the incident? The HSCA candidly stated that "it was unable to reach firm conclusions as to the meaning or significance of the Odio incident to the President's assassination."⁹² A few have suggested that the American at Odio's door was an Oswald imposter. This whole question of identification gives rise to the so-called Second Oswald issue so popular among conspiracy theorists, which was discussed earlier in this book. If it was not Oswald at Odio's door, says Warren Commission critic and conspiracy theorist Mark Lane, "few alternatives present themselves save that someone impersonated him—perhaps in an effort to frame him nearly two months before the assassination."⁹³ There is no limit on the scenarios imagined by conspiracy theorists. The Second Oswald theory is but an example of their fecund imagination.

The theory of an Oswald imposter at Odio's door (a theory that neither the Warren Commission nor the HSCA considered) is based on the argument that it was the anti-Castro movement that was seeking to frame Oswald by the Odio incident, Leopoldo introducing the American with him as Leon Oswald and telling Odio the following day that he was an ex-marine.⁹⁴ Since Oswald's pro-Castro sentiments were out in the open and known to many, the thinking goes that if the assassination could be blamed on anyone associated with Castro, this might very well induce a U.S. invasion to overthrow him, the never-ending dream of anti-Castro Cuban exiles. This theory seems wholly implausible. If we're to ascribe such a sophisticated conspiracy to the two Cubans (and any who were behind them), since they were aware of many details about Odio's father, we can assume they made it their business to know about Odio's substantial emotional problems and her recourse to psychiatric help. Why would they choose Odio, of all people, to be the best person they could find whom the authorities would believe?

Indeed, why would they even think Odio would inform the authorities? As we have seen, she did not. Odio's friend Lucille Connell told the FBI about the incident. Not being able to foresee the action of someone like Lucille Connell, the conspirators would have to realize that if Odio didn't notify the authorities, their whole plan to frame Oswald would die, since the Odio incident is the only one that has ever surfaced where Oswald allegedly mentioned the name Kennedy and the word assassination in the same sentence. But why in the world would the conspirators put all their eggs in Sylvia Odio's flimsy basket? It doesn't make sense.*

Moreover, even if anti-Castro conspirators foresaw Odio coming forward with the information Leopoldo gave her,[†] as Jean Davison points out in her insightful book, although Oswald might be implicated in the president's assassination, wouldn't the Cubans automatically fear that the anti-Castro movement might also be, since two supposed representatives of the movement were with Oswald? Such a result, obviously, would never serve any purpose of theirs.⁹⁵

Finally, and most conclusively, the intent to frame Oswald would presuppose that it was the framers (anti-Castro Cuban exiles) who ultimately killed Kennedy. Since we know, beyond all doubt, that it was Oswald who killed Kennedy, this eliminates the possibility of a frame-up as the motivation for the Odio incident. As stated earlier, you frame innocent people, not guilty ones.

Some have suggested it was Oswald who was seeking to do the framing for the assassination of Kennedy he himself intended to commit. But this theory also seems entirely implausible. Although Oswald may have uttered statements that Kennedy should have been assassinated for the Bay of Pigs invasion (an idle observation undoubtedly made by many), there is no compelling evidence or reason to believe that as early as September 25, 1963, he was already actually planning to kill the president. And the theory that he was seeking to frame anti-Castro Cuban exiles for the assassination at the time of the Odio incident necessarily presupposes that his decision to kill Kennedy had already been made. But if that were true, why would he be in Mexico City just a few days later desperately seeking a visa to go to Cuba? Second, Oswald never made any reference to the assassination to Odio, and would have had no way of knowing that Leopoldo would do so the following day.

Since we know Oswald's Marxist pedigree is beyond dispute, and his infiltration of anti-Communist groups had already been established by the Carlos Bringuier incident in New Orleans just the previous month, it should be noted that his association with anti-Castro Cubans in the Odio incident, if it indeed took place, would therefore not be remarkable. And there are similarities to the two incidents beyond mere infiltration. In both cases, Oswald made much of his experience in the Marines: in the Bringuier incident speaking of his training in guerrilla warfare which would enable him to train anti-Castro forces; in the Odio situation, telling Leopoldo he was an expert rifleman in the Marines and willing to kill Kennedy because of the Bay of Pigs. The similarity of the incidents even extends to the fact that Oswald was apparently not too convincing in his effort to portray himself as anti-Castro. Odio told FBI agent Hosty that Leopoldo told her Oswald did not appear sincere to him.⁹⁶ And Bringuier told the Warren Commission that after his first meeting with Oswald in the retail clothing store where Bringuier was a salesman, “I didn’t know what was inside of me, but I had some feeling that I could not trust him.”⁹⁷

If Oswald, by posing as an anti-Castroite, had any motivation beyond infiltration, what it was is impossible to say. However, his motive for infiltration may not have been any more arcane than the obvious—to report to Castro or his people (whom we know he was on his way to try to meet with within a matter of days by way of Mexico City) what the anti-Castro movement was up to in this country, including, if he were lucky enough to become privy to it, the extremely important information of specific death plots against Castro, which would make his contribution to Castro immense. In fact, this pedestrian motivation to tell the political Left what the political Right was up to was demonstrated by Oswald in late October of 1963, the very next month, when he stood up at an ACLU meeting he attended with Ruth Paine’s husband, Michael, and, per Michael, “reported what had happened at the meeting of the Far Right which had occurred at Convention Hall the day before, U.N. Day.”⁹⁸

As to the ostensible motivation behind the visit by the two Cubans—to solicit Odio’s help, by way of a written petition, in raising funds for the anti-Castro movement—as referred to earlier, other anti-Castro Cuban exiles had previously come to her door seeking the identical help from her.⁹⁹ And as to what was said, although Leopoldo told Odio about Oswald’s assertion that Kennedy should have been assassinated by anti-Castro Cubans after the Bay of Pigs debacle, Odio’s recollection of the conversation contains no indication that Leopoldo was sympathetic to this thought. Indeed, when it came to the subject of assassination, Leopoldo’s interest seemed to be in Castro’s death, not Kennedy’s. Odio testified that Leopoldo “wanted me to introduce this man [Oswald]. He thought that I had something to do with the underground...and I could get men into Cuba.” Leopoldo went on to tell Odio that Oswald would be “the kind of man” to enter Cuba by way of the underground and kill Castro.¹⁰⁰

But even if Leopoldo did in fact have an interest in murdering Kennedy (and there’s no evidence of this), we still are left with his statement to Odio that “we probably won’t have anything to do with him. He is kind of loco,” a statement which obviously goes in a direction away from a conspiracy.

In addition to the allegation by some conspiracy theorists that one side was trying to frame the other in the Odio incident, many conspiracy theorists have simply asserted that the incident proves the existence of a conspiracy in the assassination between Oswald and others. Conspiracy doyenne Sylvia Meagher says that the Odio incident is “Proof of the Plot” and that it demolishes the “proposition that Oswald was a lone assassin.” It poses, she said, “the outlines of a plot implicating Cubans of some denomination, perhaps with non-Cuban backers, joined in a conspiracy against the life of the President of the United States.”¹⁰¹ In Conspiracy, author Anthony Summers refers to the Odio affair as “the most compelling human evidence of conspiracy” in the JFK assassination.¹⁰² While admittedly the incident does raise suspicions that go in that direction, the suspicions seem to be spontaneous and visceral in nature. A more sober analysis of what actually transpired and what was said would seem to substantially diminish the virility of the conspiracy conclusion.

However, although the Odio incident certainly is no proof, nor even significant evidence of a conspiracy to kill the president, it cannot be treated dismissively either. Leopoldo and Angelo are shadowy (never having been identified) figures whose personal agenda, if we are to believe Odio, included murder (of Castro). Their association with Oswald, the known killer of Kennedy, less than two months before the assassination emits a troubling aroma of possible conspiratorial intrigue. A reasonable possibility of the scope and nature of this possible intrigue was set forth by W. David Slawson and William Coleman, assistant counsels for the Warren Commission whose area of investigation was foreign conspiracy. In a June 1964 memorandum to the Commission titled “Oswald’s Foreign Activities: Summary of Evidence Which Might Be Said to Show That There Was Foreign Involvement in the Assassination of President Kennedy,” they postulated a scenario that might constitute a conspiracy in a law school examination, but might fall short of a chargeable conspiracy in the real world. They wrote that anti-Castro Cubans in New Orleans, aware of Oswald’s pro-Castro sympathies, and realizing that if anything happened the public at large would also learn of them, and perhaps sensing Oswald’s penchant for violence, “encouraged” Oswald to kill the president when he came to Dallas, perhaps even deceiving him into believing they might assist him afterward in his escape. As with those who would have framed Oswald, the motive, Slawson and Coleman point out, would be the expectation that the public “would then blame the assassination on the Castro Government, and the call for its forceful overthrow would be irresistible. A second Bay of Pigs invasion would begin; this time, hopefully, to end successfully.” Slawson and Coleman acknowledged that this scenario was only “wild speculation” on their part, but one that warranted additional investigation.¹⁰³

It is important to note that as opposed to all the other fantastic (as in fantasy) and preposterous conspiracy theories, which are irrational on their face, with anti-Castro Cuban exiles we’re talking about men whose fathers, children, and brothers, members of Brigade 2506 (the invasion force), were slaughtered on the sands of the Bay of Pigs, with many of the exiles blaming Kennedy for what happened to their loved ones. The CIA-sponsored invasion of Cuba on April 17–19, 1961, was originally scheduled to take place at Trinidad on the southern coast of Cuba. The invasion site was changed to the Bay of Pigs a few weeks before April 17. Its original code name, Operation Pluto, was later changed to Operation Zapata, the Bay of Pigs being on the Zapata Peninsula. Of the 1,390 Cuban exiles who constituted the invasion force, 114 were killed, 97 escaped,* and 1,179 were captured, including José Miro Torra, the son of Dr. José Miro Cardona, the president of the Cuban Revolutionary Council, the main Cuban exile group. After a four-day trial in their prison courtyard in late March and early April of 1962, in which even their defense attorney denounced them as traitors and cowards, they were convicted of treason and sentenced by a Cuban tribunal to thirty years of hard labor. Castro told José (Pepe) Pérez San Román, the Brigade 2506 commander, “To prove that we are truly generous, we are not going to kill you.”¹⁰⁴ This decision had been made by Castro a year earlier. During a long harangue against the captured brigade prisoners in Havana’s Sports Palace that started at 11:30 p.m. on April 26, 1961, and continued to 3:00 the next morning, he told them he had every reason to shoot them all, but his revolution would be kind to them and would spare their lives.

Some in the brigade “cheered him wildly.”¹⁰⁵ Just three days earlier, speaking on Havana TV in his customary green fatigues, Castro had said he would not consider clemency for the captured rebels unless the United States halted aid to all anti-Cuban rebels.¹⁰⁶

The historian Theodore Draper referred to the invasion as “a perfect failure.” Though many Cuban defenders also lost their lives on and around the beaches known in Cuba as Playa Girón (the main beachhead) and Playa Larga, the battle was a rout. So much so that in documents declassified by Cuba commemorating the fortieth anniversary of the invasion, Castro, who barked out orders to his defenders by telephone from a position near the beach, is recorded as telling his brother, Raul, who was far from the fighting, “You have been missing the party.”¹⁰⁷

The members of the invading force blamed what happened on Kennedy’s supposed decision (see later text) to withdraw promised air support at the last moment. With the blood of their loved ones, they believed, on Kennedy’s hands, the realistic and not fantastic desire for revenge makes sense. As Warren Commission critic Harold Weisberg has put it, “If any men capable of murdering the President had a motive,” it was the Cuban exiles.¹⁰⁸

As indicated, Slawson and Coleman called their aforementioned theory “wild speculation,” and there is no evidence to support their theory and scenario. It should be noted, however, that if the Odio incident in fact occurred, neither Oswald (pretending to be anti-Castro) nor the anti-Castro Cubans (pretending to Oswald that if he killed Kennedy they would be of assistance to him) would have to pretend about one thing—their mutual contempt for the president arising out of the botched Bay of Pigs attack, but for different reasons: for Oswald, that Kennedy had authorized the invasion; for the Cubans, that he failed to furnish the air support they believed he had promised them.

Or had he? The brigade of Cuban exiles (mostly recruited from the large Cuban population in Miami) who invaded Cuba, as well as their leaders, have said many times that the failure of the plan was, as previously indicated, a result of the lack of promised air support, and for that they directly blamed President Kennedy. Barry Sklar, a Latin American affairs specialist for the U.S. government’s Foreign Affairs and National Defense Division, writes that “exile leaders believed that the United States promised air and sea cover for the invasion force and that its failure to materialize was a major reason for the invasion’s defeat.”¹⁰⁹ But Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr., who was a special assistant to the president throughout the entire period, not only participating in most of the administration’s meetings on the invasion but writing a white paper for the president in which he inveighed against the invasion, disagrees. He writes in his book A Thousand Days, a friendly but incisive biography of JFK in the White House, that “mythologists have...talked about a supposed presidential decision to ‘withdraw United States air cover.’ There was never, of course, any plan for United States air cover, and no air cover for the landing forces was withdrawn.”¹¹⁰

Indeed, on April 12, 1961, just five days before the invasion, President Kennedy was asked at a press conference, “Mr. President, has a decision been reached on how far this country would be willing to go in helping an anti-Castro uprising or invasion of Cuba?” (It was public knowledge that an invasion of the island was imminent. What started out as a covert operation had long since become known. Only the date of the invasion—April 17—was unknown.) The president was unambiguous in his reply: “I want to say that there will not be, under any conditions, an intervention in Cuba by United States armed forces.” He went on to say that the U.S. government would do everything possible “to make sure that there are no Americans involved”^{*} in such an action, adding that “as I understand it, this Administration’s attitude is...understood and shared by the anti-Castro exiles from Cuba in this country.” And it’s not as if this statement by Kennedy was buried in the media’s coverage of the conference. A front-page headline the following day in the New York Times read, “President Bars Using U.S. Force to Oust Castro.” The Times reported that elsewhere in the press conference, “the President indicated by indirection that he would continue the Eisenhower policy of supplying aid and military training to refugee groups” seeking to overthrow Castro.¹¹¹ This, of course, was substantially misleading. More than just “aid and training” was involved. The invasion was CIA-organized, and hence U.S. government-sponsored. But Kennedy made it clear that U.S. military forces would not physically participate in the invasion.

The innocuous “Eisenhower policy” referred to by Kennedy was much more muscular than he had indicated. Indeed, the institutional stem for the eventual Bay of Pigs invasion goes back to the Eisenhower administration. What Eisenhower authorized and approved of on March 17, 1960, was a March 16, 1960, “Top Secret” CIA document drafted by CIA wunderkind Richard Bissell and titled “A Program of Covert Action against the Castro Regime.” The very first words of the document read, “Objective: The purpose of the program outlined herein is to bring about the replacement of the Castro regime with one more devoted to the true interests of the Cuban people and more acceptable to the U.S. in such a manner as to avoid any appearance of U.S. intervention. Essentially, the method of accomplishing this end will be to induce, support, and so far as possible, direct action, both inside and outside of Cuba, by selected groups of Cubans,” the type who could be expected to undertake such a mission “on their own initiative.” Paragraph d provides that “preparations have already been made for the development of an adequate paramilitary force outside of Cuba... A number of paramilitary cadres will be trained at secure locations outside of the United States so as to be available for immediate deployment into Cuba.”

Although invasion plans under the auspices of the CIA and the U.S. government gained speed, momentum, and force under the Kennedy administration, culminating in the Bay of Pigs invasion on April 17, 1961, there is no question that not only did it all start under Eisenhower, but Eisenhower was not just a passive signatory to the plans. Eisenhower was arguably almost as obsessed as the Kennedys with removing Castro from power.† So committed that he called a meeting in the Oval Office on January 3, 1961 (a little over two weeks before he left office), attended by, among others, the CIA chief, Allen Dulles; chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Lyman Lemnitzer; and the secretary of defense, Thomas Gates. The main topic was Cuba, and when to sever diplomatic relations with Castro. Eisenhower opened the meeting by saying he was “constantly bombarded by people outside of government as to the situation in Cuba.” So committed that although the record of the long meeting doesn’t indicate there was any serious follow-up to his seemingly offhanded remark, Eisenhower said that he “would move against Castro before the 20th” (when he would be leaving office) if he were provided a really good excuse by Castro (note this would not appear to be referring to the upcoming Bay of Pigs invasion by Cuban exiles in April—since the exile force, on January 3, was in no operational position to invade in less than three weeks—but to an invasion by U.S. forces), and then actually adding that “failing that, perhaps we could think of manufacturing something that would be generally acceptable.” Later in the meeting Eisenhower spoke knowledgeably about the training of the exile force and how to make it stronger, as well as whom to recognize as the new leader of Cuba if the invasion by the exiles was successful.¹¹²

Although Kennedy made it clear that the U.S. military would not actually participate in the invasion itself, he did authorize a preinvasion air strike on Cuba’s air force. In the early morning hours of April 15, two days before the invasion, CIA-directed Cuban exile pilots flew eight U.S. planes (war surplus B-26s, light bombers) to attack three Cuban airfields (one on the outskirts of Havana, one at San Antonio de los Baños, thirty miles south of Havana, and one at Santiago de Cuba, over four hundred miles southeast of Havana). Why only eight of the twenty-two B-26s available at the brigade's Puerto Cabezas, Nicaragua, air base (code-named "Happy Valley") were used has never been satisfactorily answered. One aircraft was shot down, one lost an engine from ground fire and landed at Key West, and another, low on fuel on the return flight, was forced to land at Grand Cayman Island. The rest returned to Puerto Cabezas.¹¹³ The returning exile pilots estimated that they had destroyed twenty-two to twenty-four of Castro's planes, believed to be over half of Castro's air force. The estimate was inflated. Based on all sources, including aerial photography, Cuba's air force prior to D-day consisted of thirty-six planes, eighteen of which were believed to be operational. During the Bay of Pigs invasion, Castro had seven aircraft in the air, the conclusion being that eleven operational aircraft had been taken out by the U.S. air strike on April 15.¹¹⁴

Kennedy originally had authorized a second air strike on Castro's planes at Cuban airfields (this is not to be confused with air support and cover for the invading forces at the time of the invasion), hoping to finish the job of neutralizing the Cuban air force, thereby greatly enhancing the invading brigade's chance of success by eliminating air assaults on the landing force. The strike was to occur at dawn on April 17, 1961, coinciding with the landing of the exile invasion force on the three beaches (denominated Red, Blue, and Green, though landing on Green was canceled at the last moment) at the Bay of Pigs.* Late in the day on April 16, Kennedy did, in fact, withdraw this second air strike after Secretary of State Dean Rusk advised him that a second strike would put the United States in an untenable position internationally.¹¹⁵

What makes the withdrawal of the second air strike difficult to understand is the question of how much worse could a second air strike (which might have finished off Castro's remaining air force) be in the eyes of the international community than the one that had already taken place?

Because of Kennedy's withdrawal of a second strike, Castro still had enough planes (T-33 jets, B-26s—given to Batista by the U.S. government—and British Sea Furies) to strafe the beachhead and offshore supply ships, raising deadly havoc with the invading brigade as well as some of its ships. One ship, the Houston (which had transported troops and supplies and still had 180 troops aboard), was hit and went aground on the west shore of the Bay of Pigs, five miles from Red Beach. The Rio Escondido, carrying ten days of ammunition and other important supplies, was sunk.¹¹⁶

Haynes Johnson, in his book Bay of Pigs, written with four of the brigade civilian and military leaders (Manuel Artime, the civilian exile leader, who was the CIA favorite among all the rebel leaders; José [Pepe] Pérez San Román, brigade commander; Erneido Oliva, second in command; and Enrique Ruiz-Williams, a lower brigade officer), mentions only one lone brigade B-26 (piloted by a Cuban) attempting to provide air cover for the troops landing on the beaches at daybreak on the first day of the invasion. But facing Castro's faster T-33 jets and Sea Furies, "the slower Brigade plane didn't have a chance" and was quickly shot down.¹¹⁷ Without air cover from American jets, which were available on the aircraft carrier Essex just fifteen miles from shore, the brigade landing force was essentially at the unchallenged mercy of Castro's air force, and the fate of the invasion was sealed.

On this very key issue of whether the landing forces had air cover from their own B-26s (not U.S. jets) on D-day, there is some ambiguity. As indicated, Haynes Johnson, speaking from the authority of those who were there, says only one B-26 provided air support and was quickly shot down. Peter Wyden's very authoritative book Bay of Pigs only mentions two brigade B-26s providing air cover four hours after large numbers of troops had already started landing at sunup, both of which, after dropping bombs on an enemy column, were quickly shot down by a T-33 and a Sea Fury, and one B-26 providing cover later in the day, which was also shot down. Wyden never explicitly says how many B-26s supplied air cover during D-day, but the implication is very few, and they were not very effective.

The next day, D+1 (April 18), six brigade B-26s piloted by Cuban exiles (and two American CIA contract men known as "Peters" and "Seig," who were authorized by the CIA's Richard Bissell without knowledge or approval from the Kennedy administration) successfully bombed a column of Cuban trucks and tanks approaching the beach, destroying seven tanks and inflicting an estimated eighteen hundred casualties, an unrealistically high number. But the efforts of the slower B-26s during the three days of war were virtual suicide missions, with nine of the sixteen being shot down, most by the surprisingly effective Cuban T-33 jets. Here and there over a period of three days, the brigade, ashore and with makeshift command posts established, achieved small tactical successes. But it was clear early on that it was only a matter of time before the brigade, without American air support and outnumbered fifteen to one by Castro's twenty thousand troops, would succumb. Nonetheless, during most of the battle, the brigade leaders still felt, as Johnson wrote, "that victory was inevitable. [They felt] it was inconceivable that they would be stranded" by the American military.¹¹⁸

To save the invasion on the second day, April 18, the CIA and Joint Chiefs of Staff had beseeched Kennedy to reverse his publicly stated position and allow U.S. planes and ships to come to the rescue of the brigade on the two beaches. Kennedy wavered for a moment but refused the request. U.S. military forces would not physically participate in the invasion. In the hope that Kennedy just might change his mind, Admiral Arleigh Burke, chief of naval operations, had placed two Marine battalions on ships in his fleet of destroyers and carriers that had accompanied the brigade to the Bay of Pigs and remained offshore to lend logistical support. Later on April 18, Burke made one last plea to Kennedy, who reiterated he did not "want the United States involved in this."

"Hell, Mr. President," Burke said, "we are involved... Can we send a few planes [U.S. Navy jets aboard the carrier Essex]?"

"No, because they could be identified as United States," Kennedy retorted.

"Can we paint out their numbers?"

"No."

"Can we get something in there?"

"No."

"If you'll let me have two destroyers, we'll give gunfire support and we can hold the beachhead with two ships forever."

"No."

"One destroyer, Mr. President?"

"No," Kennedy said.¹¹⁹ In speaking of the pilots of the U.S. jets aboard the Essex, Wyden writes that their "inability to help the brigade moved them to tears."¹²⁰ Robert Kennedy would later say that "D plus one" (April 18, the second day of the invasion), when "the CIA asked for air cover, Jack [JFK] was in favor of giving it. However, Dean Rusk was strongly against it. He said that we had made a commitment that no American forces would be used and the President shouldn't appear in the light of being a liar.”¹²¹

What follows is just one of many desperate pleas for American military help before the invasion ended in defeat on April 19. At 11:52 p.m. on April 18, the Cuban exile brigade commander, Pepe San Román, radioed from the beach, “Do you people realize how desperate the situation is? Do you back us up or quit? All we want is low jet cover and jet close support. I need it badly or cannot survive. Please don’t desert us. Am out of tank and bazooka ammo. Tanks will hit me at dawn. I will not be evacuated. Will fight to the end if we have to. Need medical supplies urgently.”¹²²

The Cuban exile community is virtually unanimous in its belief that American jets could have saved the invasion. Exile leader Dr. José Miro Cardona, in testimony on May 25, 1961, before a committee appointed by Kennedy and headed by General Maxwell Taylor to determine the cause of the invasion’s failure, said that “in talking with the refugees and everyone who has come back [from the invasion], it seems apparent that but for three jets, the invasion force would have won the fight.”¹²³ A “Mr. Betancourt,” the air liaison officer for the second brigade battalion that landed at Red Beach, testified, “We know the success of the Brigade depended on the success of the air strikes. Otherwise, it’s just like sending a bunch of human beings to get killed. There’s no point in asking why the American jet planes didn’t help us. They could have very well. They could have been our planes as far as we were concerned. We could have arranged to take all the insignia off.”¹²⁴ Exile leader Manuel Antonio (Tony) de Varona told the committee on May 18, “I would just like to state that we would be in Cuba today if it was not for the lack of air support that our forces suffered. All those who’ve returned said that [with] three airplanes, they would have been successful in their invasion attempt.”^{125*}

Kennedy felt enormous sorrow over the failed invasion and the fate of the captured rebels, and encouraged and authorized the formation of a group of citizens to raise millions of dollars from private Americans to pay ransom for the prisoners’ release. In December of 1962 Castro was paid $2,925,000 in cash and given $53 million worth of medicine and baby food, meeting his conditions for the release of the brigade prisoners. “As a Christmas bonus,” Castro also allowed one thousand Cuban relatives of the prisoners to leave Cuba by ship.¹²⁶

Richard Bissell, who was the perspicacious brainchild behind the invasion and who, with CIA Director Allen Dulles in tow, had sold the merits of it to President Kennedy and the Departments of State and Defense, would later write sourly that Kennedy’s cancellation of the second air strike was “certainly the gravest contributing factor in the operation’s failure.”¹²⁷

As deputy director of plans, Bissell was in charge of all covert and clandestine operations of the CIA at the time of the invasion. There are those who maintain that Bissell, of all people, had no right to complain. The nature of the invasion was ill advised to begin with. Also, when Rusk was speaking to the president over the phone from Rusk’s office close to 9:00 p.m. on Sunday evening, April 16, Charles Cabell (Dulles’s deputy), Bissell, and Bissell’s deputy, C. Tracy Barnes (whom Bissell, back in March of 1960, had delegated the operational responsibility of “putting together a team to overthrow Castro”), were there too. At one point in Rusk’s conversation with the president, Rusk held the phone out to Bissell, giving him an opportunity to repeat his arguments in favor of a second air strike (which he and Cabell had made to Rusk to no avail) to the president himself. But after starting to reach for the phone, Bissell withdrew his hand and shook his head, apparently feeling no further argument would succeed. In a later report on the episode by the presidential committee,

Bissell's failure to press his case with the president was severely criticized. If Bissell had spoken to the president, who apparently, along with everyone else, had great respect for Bissell's intellect, just maybe the president would have reversed his order canceling the second air strike, and this might have changed the outcome of the invasion.¹²⁸

In any event, when we're talking about motive on the question of who killed President Kennedy, the issue is not whether the exiles were correct in their belief that air support and cover was promised, but whether they had that belief, which they clearly did. One cannot read Schlesinger's account of the Bay of Pigs debacle as well as Haynes Johnson's without concluding that what the Kennedy administration was telling the exile leaders in the United States, and what the CIA and American military advisers were telling the brigade force of 1,390 men,* were two very different things. The latter—mostly in training at the main invasion training camp at Trax in the Guatemala mountains, but also in Nicaragua, Panama, Miami, New Orleans, Phoenix, Camp Peary (a CIA training base near Williamsburg, Virginia), and even Fort Knox—were told that U.S. military and air support would be involved in the invasion.¹²⁹ Pepe San Román, the brigade commander, said that at Camp Trax, “Frank,” the American leader of the camp, told him that there would be more than air support. “He assured us,” San Román said, “that we were going to have protection by sea, by air, and even from under the sea.”¹³⁰ Peter Wyden, in Bay of Pigs, writes that “Colonel Frank and other CIA briefers” used one word to reassure the brigade leaders more than any other. There would be an “umbrella” above, they said, to guard the entire operation against Castro's planes.¹³¹

It may not have been intentional misrepresentation on the part of those like “Frank” who were dealing directly with the brigade. Virtually no one, including the exiled leaders, believed that an operation organized and directed by the CIA, and sponsored and almost completely funded by the U.S. government, one that had been originally approved by President Eisenhower and then by President Kennedy, would not have American military might behind it. This is why, notwithstanding Kennedy's press conference statement on April 12 that the United States would not be involved militarily, he nonetheless dispatched a contingent the very next day to meet with Miro Cardona, the president of the Cuban Revolutionary Council, to make sure he understood. But even that wasn't enough. Schlesinger writes that Cardona “displayed resistance and incredulity at the statement that no United States troops would be used. He waved the President's news conference disclaimer aside as an understandable piece of psychological warfare... ‘Everyone knows,’ Miro said, ‘that the United States is behind the expedition.’”¹³² The exiles were not the only ones who did not believe the president. CIA agent Howard Hunt, who worked at the operational level of the Bay of Pigs project, spending much time with exile leaders at his safe house in Miami, and also visited the brigade at the training camps in Guatemala, said that when the president made his April 12 declaration, “my project colleagues and I did not take him seriously. The statement was, we thought, a superb effort in misdirection.”¹³³

In Bay of Pigs, Haynes Johnson writes,

From the beginning, the Cuban counter-revolutionists viewed their new American friends with blind trust... Virtually all of the Cubans involved believed [so] much in the Americans—or wanted so desperately to believe—that they never questioned what was happening or expressed doubts about the plans. Looking back on it, they agree now their naivete was partly genuine and partly reluctance to turn down any offer of help in liberating their country. In fact, they had little choice; there was no other place to turn...To Cubans, the United States was more than the colossus of the north, for the two countries were bound closely by attitudes, by history, by geography and by economics. The United States was great and powerful, the master not only of the hemisphere but perhaps of the world, and it was Cuba's friend. One really didn't question such a belief. It was a fact; everyone knew it. And the mysterious, anonymous, ubiquitous American agents who dealt with the Cubans managed to strengthen that belief.¹³⁴

Johnson quotes Pepe San Román, the brigade military commander, as saying that “most of the Cubans [in the brigade] were there because they knew the whole operation was going to be conducted by the Americans, not by me or anyone else. They did not trust me or anyone else. They just trusted the Americans. So they were going to fight because the United States was backing them.”¹³⁵

In Dagger in the Heart, Cuban attorney Mario Lazo writes, “The Bay of Pigs defeat was wholly self-inflicted in Washington. Kennedy told the truth when he publicly accepted responsibility...The heroism of the beleaguered Cuban Brigade had been rewarded by betrayal, defeat, death for many of them, long and cruel imprisonment for the rest. The Cuban people...were left with feelings of astonishment and disillusionment, and in many cases despair. They had always admired the United States as strong, rich, generous—but where was its sense of honor and the capacity of its leaders? The mistake of the Cuban fighters for liberation was that they thought too highly of the United States. They believed to the end that it would not let them down. But it did.”¹³⁶

Lest there be any doubts that the invasion brigade expected U.S. military help, the anguished cry of Pepe San Román at the Bay of Pigs to the American military, “Do you back us up or quit?...Please don't desert us,” should dispel all of them. So the motive to kill Kennedy would seem to be there. But there is more to the story (see later text).

In a June 1, 1961, memorandum, RFK said that his brother “felt very strongly that the Cuba operation had materially affected...his standing as president and the standing of the United States in public opinion throughout the world...The United States couldn't be trusted. The United States had blundered.”¹³⁷

Though it is stated in all the books that Kennedy publicly acknowledged full responsibility for the failure of the invasion (e.g., “In the orgy of national self-recrimination that followed the Bay of Pigs operation, President Kennedy took the full blame”),¹³⁸ considered by many to be the most humiliating incident during the Kennedy presidency, the authors¹³⁹ normally give Kennedy's remark to the press on April 21 that “victory has a hundred fathers and defeat is an orphan” as their support for this. But this remark could just as well be construed as a reference to an unfortunate fact of public life than as an acknowledgment of responsibility or blame. However, on April 24, Kennedy removed all ambiguity about responsibility for the Bay of Pigs by authorizing the release of a White House statement that said, “President Kennedy has stated from the beginning that as President he bears sole responsibility...and he restates it now...The President is strongly opposed to anyone within or without the administration attempting to shift the responsibility.”¹⁴⁰

But privately Kennedy was incensed at the CIA for misleading him by its gross miscalculation that the invasion would succeed, even without U.S. military participation, and at himself for being naive enough to believe the spy agency. One of the elements in the CIA's calculus that was sold to Kennedy was that the invasion would trigger an insurrection by the Cuban people against Castro that would aid and coalesce with the invading force. That didn't, of course, happen. Was CIA intelligence unaware of the popularity Castro enjoyed at the time among the Cuban masses?

The defeat at the Bay of Pigs had another consequence. In August 1961, four months after the invasion, Richard Goodwin, assistant special counsel to the president, reported back to President Kennedy on his return from a meeting of the Organization of American States in Punta del Este, Uruguay, on August 17, that he had spoken to Castro's chief lieutenant, Ernesto "Che" Guevara, and the latter "wanted to thank us very much for the invasion... It had been a great political victory for them, enabled them to consolidate, and transformed them from an aggrieved little country to an equal."¹⁴¹ Apparently unwittingly, the invasion had succeeded in transforming a revolution merely to overthrow Batista and capitalism into one now identified with Cuban nationalism.

Though Kennedy did not want to make his displeasure with the CIA a public matter, it was clear that the CIA leadership behind the disastrous invasion would have to go. Shortly after the Bay of Pigs he called CIA Director Allen Dulles, Lieutenant General Charles Cabell, the deputy director of the CIA, and Richard Bissell, the CIA deputy director for plans, into his office. (Bissell was the brainy former professor of economics at Yale who developed the U-2 spy plane, was one of the key formulators and implementers of the Marshall Plan, and, as indicated, the architect behind the Bay of Pigs invasion.) "Under the British system," he told them with a smile, "I would have to go. But under our system, I'm afraid it's got to be you."¹⁴² After the intentional passage of a decent amount of time following the failure at the Bay of Pigs, Kennedy accepted the resignation of Dulles on September 27, 1961, the retirement of Cabell on January 31, 1962, and the resignation of Bissell on February 17, 1962.

Kennedy redeemed himself, in part, with the exiled Cuban community by eventually giving more support, in every way, to the anti-Castro movement than ever before, though again, there was no promise that U.S. forces would fight Castro. "Before the invasion when we asked for arms it was difficult to get them, but now it's easier," said Cuban exile leader Manolo Ray.¹⁴³ "Cuba must not be abandoned to the Communists," Kennedy told the American Society of Newspaper Editors on April 20, the day after the Bay of Pigs debacle, adding that with respect to his administration's policy of nonintervention, "Our restraint is not inexhaustible." He spoke of the "new and deeper struggle."^{144*} The exiles, still wanting to believe that Kennedy's heart was in the right place, dug in even harder.

In the latter part of 1961, the Special Group (formally called NSC 5412, the secret, informal, National Security Council subcommittee that approved or disapproved of all proposed CIA covert activities) was augmented by two new members, Attorney General Robert Kennedy and General Maxwell Taylor, for the express purpose of overseeing Operation Mongoose, the government's plan established after the Bay of Pigs to remove Castro from power.¹⁴⁵ That the new group, called "Special Group (Augmented)," and Operation Mongoose were a presidential initiative was made clear by the creating document, a November 22, 1961, memorandum from presidential assistant Richard Goodwin to the secretaries of state and defense, the director of the CIA, attorney general, General Edward Lansdale, and chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Paragraph one of the memorandum stated that the object was “to help Cuba overthrow the Communist regime and establish a free Cuba. All available assets will be directed to this and as a matter of urgent national priority.” The effort was to be “under the general guidance of the Attorney General [RFK], with [Air Force] General [Edward] Lansdale as his chief of operations. The NSC 5412 group will be kept informed of activities.” Though the CIA would be more heavily involved in carrying out the mission than any other federal agency, JFK had shifted the primary supervision of the effort away from the CIA, which had failed him so badly in the Bay of Pigs, to the Department of Defense at the Pentagon, a clear slap in the face to the CIA.

Lansdale was a counterinsurgency specialist in the Office of Special Operations of the Defense Department who had worked in U.S. covert operations in the Philippines (where he successfully helped put down a growing Communist insurgency with what some felt were “brilliant” counterrevolutionary tactics) and Vietnam, and became the model for the hero in the best-selling novel The Ugly American who courageously fought against Communist guerillas in these two nations. President Kennedy once called Lansdale America’s answer to James Bond. Although raids on Cuban installations by exile groups were to continue vigorously under Mongoose, the main part of Lansdale’s plan to overthrow Castro, which he presented on January 18, 1962, was to organize anti-Castro Cubans (both exiles and those still living in Cuba) into “a movement within Cuba to the point where it could mount an insurrection” against Castro’s regime. A plan, by the way, that the CIA felt was unrealistic from the beginning.¹⁴⁶ As Lansdale told the Church Committee, he wanted “the [Cuban] people themselves [to] overthrow the Castro regime.”¹⁴⁷ Severely disrupting the Cuban economy (by an economic embargo, commando raids blowing up oil refineries, chemical plants, etc., and sabotaging cargo to Cuba from other countries) would supposedly incite discontent by the Cuban people with Castro.¹⁴⁸ †

The next day, January 19, at a meeting of principal Mongoose participants held in Robert Kennedy’s office, Kennedy said that the solution to the Cuban problem was a “top priority,” and that “no time, money, effort or manpower is to be spared.”¹⁴⁹ Robert Kennedy was, by all accounts, not just a figurehead in the administration’s efforts to overthrow Castro. “Bobby Kennedy was running it, hour by hour,” Alexander Haig says. “I was a part of it, as deputy to Joe Califano and military assistant to General Vance. We were conducting two raids a week at the height of that program against mainland Cuba... Weekly reports were rendered to Bobby Kennedy. He had a very tight hand on the operation.”¹⁵⁰ Sergio Arcacha, an anti-Castro Cuban exile heavily involved in the effort to overthrow Castro, told Life magazine reporter Holland McCombs, “We used to call Bobby Kennedy and he would take care of it.”¹⁵¹ Richard Helms, who as the CIA’s deputy director of plans had overall supervision of the CIA’s Mongoose effort, told the Church Committee that he and RFK “were constantly in touch with each other” with respect to Mongoose, even down to details like RFK asking him if a particular land sabotage effort was organized yet and had it left. “The Attorney General was on the phone to me, he was on the phone to Mr. Harvey [operational head of Mongoose]... He was on the phone even to people on Harvey’s staff, as I recall it.”¹⁵² An October 4, 1962, “Memorandum for Record” of the minutes of a meeting of the Special Group (Augmented) on that day starts by saying, “The Attorney General opened the meeting by saying that higher authority [presumably the president] is concerned about progress on the Mongoose program and feels that more priority should be given to trying to mount sabotage operations...He urged that ‘massive activity’ be mounted within the entire Mongoose framework.”^{153*}

Called by many the “secret war” to overthrow Castro, Mongoose, which it should be repeated commenced after the Bay of Pigs invasion, was the best example of the CIA becoming a paramilitary organization. Buying its own fleet of ships and boats, even planes, the CIA registered its ownership under fictitious companies, altered them for combat, and employed civilian mercenaries and Cuban exiles to operate them.¹⁵⁴

The HSCA wrote that the nerve center of Operation Mongoose, the United States’ new and deeper struggle against Castro, was established in the heartland of exile activity, Miami. There, on a secluded, heavily wooded 1,571 acre tract that was part of the University of Miami’s south campus, the CIA set up a front operation, an electronics firm called Zenith Technological Services. Its code name was JM/WAVE and it soon became the largest CIA installation anywhere in the world outside of its headquarters in Langley, Virginia. The JM/WAVE station[†] had, at the height of its activities in 1962, a staff of more than 300 Americans, mostly case officers. Each case officer employed from four to ten Cuban “principal agents” who, in turn, would be responsible for between ten and thirty regular agents...It was the JM/WAVE station that monitored, more or less controlled, and in most cases funded the anti-Castro groups. It was responsible for the great upsurge in anti-Castro activity and the lifted spirits of the Cuban exiles as American arms and weapons flowed freely through the training camps and guerilla bases spotted around South Florida. Anti-Castro raiding parties that left from small secret islands in the Florida Keys were given the “green light” by agents of the JM/WAVE station. The result of it all was that there grew in the Cuban exile community a renewed confidence in the U.S. Government’s sincerity and loyalty to its cause.¹⁵⁵

And from February of 1962 on, JM/WAVE and the Cuban exiles it managed conducted a great number of missions against mainland Cuba with varying degrees of success.^{156*}

But a second betrayal awaited the Cuban exiles. As the major U.S. concession in the agreement between Kennedy and Soviet premier Nikita Khrushchev to resolve the Cuban missile crisis (and in return for the Soviets’ withdrawing from Cuban soil their missiles with nuclear warheads targeted on U.S. cities), in late October of 1962 Kennedy, in addition to secretly agreeing to withdraw fifteen Jupiter missiles of ours from Turkey, made a “no invasion” pledge regarding Cuba.¹⁵⁷ The missile crisis started at 9:00 a.m. on October 14, 1962, when a CIA U-2 spy plane and low-level reconnaissance flights confirmed what CIA informants in Cuba had been reporting: the existence of launching pads and Soviet nuclear missiles in Cuba, installed that summer, as well as medium-range ballistic missile (MRBM) bases under construction. (Later, two intercontinental-range ballistic missile [IRBM] bases were found to be under construction.) At the time, the CIA estimated that ten thousand Soviet troops were in Cuba. The actual number, the Soviets would later admit, was forty thousand.

The first major meeting of the Kennedy administration on the ominous missile sightings was in the Cabinet Room on the morning of October 16, when the CIA made a formal presentation, with photographs and charts, of its findings to the president and eleven key advisers, including several members of his cabinet, who would meet regularly with him or RFK throughout the crisis as an ad hoc group called “Ex Comm” (the Executive Committee of the National Security Council). The group consisted of Vice President Johnson, Secretary of State Dean Rusk, Secretary of the Treasury C. Douglas Dillon, RFK, CIA Director John McCone, Undersecretary of State George Ball, Deputy Secretary of Defense Roswell Gilpatric, Ambassador-at-Large Llewellyn Thompson, special presidential counsel Ted Sorensen, special assistant to the president for national security affairs McGeorge Bundy, and chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Maxwell Taylor. The group, which lived and worked together almost around the clock during the crisis, heard the advice of others and was sometimes joined in its deliberations by people like former secretary of state Dean Acheson and UN Ambassador Adlai Stevenson.¹⁵⁸ No corresponding special policy group was created by the Kremlin to deal with the crisis, Khrushchev relying on his existing foreign policy advisers.¹⁵⁹

For thirteen tense days and nights thereafter, Kennedy and his top advisers deliberated on how to handle the world’s closest brush with a nuclear holocaust, the group predictably breaking down into hawks and doves. Would it be a blockade, or air strikes to knock out the missile sites, or an outright invasion of Cuba—air strikes or an invasion carrying a possible risk of the Soviets retaliating militarily and triggering an eventual nuclear war? “I guess this is the week I earn my salary,” JFK would say.¹⁶⁰

With World War III hanging in the balance, not all of “the President’s men” were urging a peaceful resolution. In an October 19, 1962, exchange with the president, General Curtis LeMay, air force chief of staff, said, “This [proposed] blockade and political action, I see leading into war... This is almost as bad as the appeasement at Munich... I just don’t see any other solution except direct military action right now.”¹⁶¹ Indeed, the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff unanimously agreed that a military invasion, not a blockade, was called for.^{162*} Not only called for, but, per JFK assistant Arthur Schlesinger, desired. “Some of them [members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff] were quite disappointed when a... peaceful settlement came about.”¹⁶³

Bobby Kennedy told the New York Times in 1964 that the Ex Comm group was split 7 to 5 on whether to bomb or blockade, though he did not say which course the majority preferred. In his later book, Thirteen Days, he says the majority favored a blockade, and that he and McNamara were on the side of a blockade, but that Acheson joined the military in advocating bombing. RFK told the Times that when his brother asked his intelligence officers to estimate how many innocent civilians would be killed in Cuba by bombing the missile sites and they reported back twenty-five thousand, he ruled this military option out.¹⁶⁴

In a televised speech to the nation on the evening of October 22, 1962, in which he told Americans in a fair amount of detail what had transpired to that point and his decision to initiate a “strict quarantine on all offensive military equipment under shipment to Cuba,” Kennedy called on Premier Khrushchev to immediately “halt and eliminate this clandestine, reckless, and provocative threat to world peace,” by “withdrawing these weapons from Cuba.” Kennedy said, “It shall be the policy of this nation to regard any nuclear missile launched from Cuba against any nation in the Western Hemisphere as an attack by the Soviet Union on the United States requiring a full retaliatory response upon the Soviet Union.” Kennedy signed a “proclamation of interdiction” the following day which went into effect on October 24 at 10:00 a.m., the order imposing a naval blockade halting all Soviet ships carrying weapons and warheads to Cuba. That same day, Soviet ships that were heading for Cuba altered course and avoided contact with U.S. ships blockading the island.

A flurry of diplomatic exchanges followed for several days and Khrushchev eventually backed down and acceded to Kennedy’s demands, messaging Kennedy on October 28, 1962, “I regard with great understanding your concern and the concern of the United States people in connection with the fact that the weapons you describe as ‘offensive’* are formidable weapons indeed. Both you and we understand what kind of weapons these are. In order to eliminate as rapidly as possible the conflict which endangers the cause of peace...the Soviet Government...has given a new order to dismantle [these] arms...and to crate and return them to the Soviet Union.” Kennedy messaged Khrushchev back that same day, praising the latter’s “statesmanlike decision” as an “important and constructive contribution to peace.”¹⁶⁵ The crisis was over. It had been a crisis “that historians have called the most dangerous moment in recorded time.”¹⁶⁶ Secretary of Defense McNamara would later recall that a Saturday night during the crisis was a “beautiful fall evening,” and “as I left President Kennedy’s office to return to the Pentagon, I thought I might never live to see another Saturday night.”¹⁶⁷ †

Kennedy’s no-invasion pledge caused rage in the exile community. Wrote one prominent exile, “For hundreds of thousands of exiles eager to stake their lives to liberate their native land, it was a soul-shattering blow.”¹⁶⁸ “Suddenly,” the HSCA observed, “there was a crackdown on the very training camps and guerilla bases which had been originally established and funded by the United States, and the exile raids which once had the government’s ‘green light’ were now promptly disavowed and condemned.” In some cases, the Kennedy administration went beyond this, U.S. Customs and the Coast Guard, respectively, arresting members of an anti-Castro force in training in the Florida Keys and anti-Castro raiders on four exile ships off the Florida coast. The U.S. crackdown on the exiles caused Dr. José Miro Cardona, the head of the Cuban Revolutionary Council, an umbrella group that had been receiving an estimated $2.4 million annually in U.S. support, to resign. And Cardona had been looked upon by many of the exiles as a mouthpiece for the Americans. Cardona accused Kennedy of “breaking promises and agreements” to support another invasion of Cuba, and declared that Kennedy had become “the victim of a master play by the Russians.” Other voices were heard in the chorus alleging betrayal. Captain Eddie Rickenbacker, the ace World War II pilot, said that “the Kennedy administration has committed the final betrayal of Cuban hopes for freedom by its order to block the activities of exile Cuban freedom fighters to liberate their nation from Communism.”¹⁶⁹

Although the Church Committee stated categorically that “the Mongoose Operation was disbanded following the Cuban Missile Crisis...and the SGA [Special Group (Augmented)] was abolished,”¹⁷⁰ it would be wrong to infer that Kennedy’s no-invasion pledge in the missile crisis ended Mongoose, because it did not. Though the Special Group (Augmented) was, indeed, terminated, and at least protocol dictated that, as the Church Committee said, “the Special Group, chaired by McGeorge Bundy, re-assumed responsibility for reviewing and approving covert actions in Cuba,” Mongoose, if not in name, continued. And RFK, who was not a member of the Special Group, continued to ride herd on the effort to overthrow Castro. Richard Helms, the CIA deputy director of plans at the time who was heading up the CIA effort in Mongoose, says in his memoir, A Look over My Shoulder, that the only thing that changed with the Mongoose operation was the cessation of support, ever again, of any future effort by the exiles to invade Cuba. Other than that, he said, the Mongoose operation continued and “[President Kennedy] and his brother remained absolutely determined to trounce Castro once and forever.”¹⁷¹ (This makes sense since Mongoose, though never explicitly rejecting the invasion possibility, never contemplated it as its plan for overthrowing Castro anyway. So as with the Bay of Pigs, this may be another instance where the exiles were misled.) And the HSCA itself, after suggesting, in so many words, that the United States ended all exile raids on Cuba after the no-invasion pledge, goes on to say on a succeeding page that “some extremely significant Cuban exile raids and anti-Castro operations... took place, despite the crackdown, between the time of the missile crisis and the assassination of President Kennedy,” though it was unclear, the committee said, “to what extent, if any, the military activities of the anti-Castro exile groups were sanctioned or supported by the Kennedy administration or by the CIA or both.”^{172*}

Indeed, on December 29, 1962, two months after the missile crisis ended, Kennedy and the First Lady flew to Miami to personally welcome the returning Bay of Pigs prisoners in a huge, emotional ceremony at the Orange Bowl that brought many to tears. Holding the brigade’s flag (depicting a rifleman with a fixed bayonet moving forward) handed to him by Brigade Commander Pepe San Román (with brigade leaders Manuel Artime and Erneida Oliva standing nearby) “for temporary safekeeping,” Kennedy proclaimed to the survivors, “I can assure you that this flag will be returned to this Brigade in a free Havana.” The throng of forty thousand Cuban exiles, many shouting “Guerra, Guerra” (“War, War”) and “Libertad, Libertad” (“Liberty, Liberty”) erupted in tumultuous applause.^{173†}

Though this was not an invasion pledge (again, Kennedy had promised Khrushchev just two months earlier that the United States would not invade Cuba), this clearly reflected the U.S. government’s continued support—I would think not just as cheer-leaders—of the plan to overthrow Castro. Indeed, one of the Cuban exile pilots who had flown in the Bay of Pigs invasion, Eduardo Ferrer—a Cubana Airlines pilot who hijacked his own commercial flight to Miami to join up with the brigade—told author Peter Wyden that when Kennedy made his way down to the field after his speech to shake hands with more brigade leaders, exchanging words here and there, he said to Ferrer, “You didn’t get any help from us.”

“No, Mr. President,” Ferrer replied, “but I expect it the next time.”

“You better believe there’s going to be a next time,” Kennedy told him, suggesting that next time would be different. Ferrer beamed and told Wyden “I believed in him again.”¹⁷⁴

There were over one hundred anti-Castro exile groups (some formed in Cuba, others in the United States) during the immediate years following the Cuban Revolution.

The first prominent group in the United States was the Frente Revolucionario Democrático (“Democratic Revolutionary Front,” or FRD). The revolutionary frente, or front, consisted of five exile groups and was the first large anti-Castro group formed on American soil, one that was literally put together by the CIA (when it hosted Cuban exile leaders in New York City on May 11–12, 1960) to implement President Eisenhower’s March 17, 1960, directive to the CIA to recruit and train a guerilla force of Cuban exiles to overthrow Castro. On March 18, 1961, in Miami, the CIA put pressure on the FRD and the MRP (the Cuban anti-Castro group, Movimiento Revolucionario del Pueblo, “People’s Revolutionary Movement”) to join forces with the FRD into a new group, the Cuban Revolutionary Council (CRC), which the United States would treat as the Cuban provisional government if Castro were overthrown. On March 22, the two groups agreed and the CRC was formed, with various anti-Castro leaders sitting on the council. However, the FRD and the CRC continued to function as separate entities until October of 1961, when the FRD was completely absorbed by the CRC in order to avoid the confusion resulting from duplication of personnel, activities, and funding. Lest there be any doubt as to the involvement of the CIA in these two anti-Castro groups, CIA documents themselves confirm this fact. “The FRD was created with Agency [CIA] assistance, guidance and financial support,” and was “the front organization for recruiting the members of the Bay of Pigs invasion force.”¹⁷⁵ “The CRC had direct access to and support from the White House as well as CIA.”¹⁷⁶

Among the other prominent exile groups were the following: Cuban Revolutionary Junta (JURE); Movimiento de Recuperacion Revolucionaria (the “Movement for the Recovery of the Revolution,” or MRR), the group whose members were the original nucleus for Brigade 2506; Alpha 66, one of the most militant and organized of all anti-Castro groups; Second National Front of Escambray (SNFE, a group closely affiliated with Alpha 66); Directorio Revolucionario Estudiantil (“Student Revolutionary Directorate,” or DRE), which was a militant as well as a psychological warfare outfit that published its own newspaper, Trenchera (Trenches), and was an outgrowth of an activist student group started on the campus of the University of Havana; 30th of November Movement; International Penetration Forces (InterPen); Christian Democratic Movement of Cuba (MDC); Junta of the Government of Cuba in Exile (JGCE); Movimiento Insurreccional de Recuperacion Revolucionaria (MIRR); Ejercito Invasor Cubano (EIC); United Organization for the Liberation of Cuba; Cuban Constitutional Crusade (CCC); and Commandos L-66. Many of these groups, of course, worked together, and their members frequently left one group to join another, since all had the same objective: the overthrow of Castro.

Virtually all militant anti-Castro groups were headquartered in Miami, the center of the exile community, where over one hundred thousand Cubans had arrived by small boats and planes to plot their counterrevolution against Castro so they could return to their homeland. Over their small cups of café cubano (a strong espresso coffee so popular among the exiles) in the many little restaurants of Little Havana (southwest Miami), thousands of exiles mapped their strategies on table napkins. As already alluded to, many of the members of the anti-Castro groups, including some of appreciable wealth, had been supportive of Castro’s revolution against the corrupt Batista regime but became greatly disillusioned with and eventually violently opposed to Castro when he confiscated their property, and renounced the country’s long affiliation with the United States and embraced Marxism.¹⁷⁷ Others were hard-core “Batistianos” who had fled Cuba around the same time their leader, Fulgencio Batista, did, on New Year’s Day 1959, or stayed for awhile in Cuba working in the underground against Castro. It should be reiterated that Castro’s broken pledges of free elections and a free press, and the more than five hundred public executions of ex-Batista officials within three months after he assumed power, convinced many Cubans on both sides of the revolution that Castro was a dictator, not the political savior he had held himself out to be.¹⁷⁸

Although it is not implausible that anti-Castro Cuban exiles angry at Kennedy over the Bay of Pigs* might encourage Oswald, or some other likely candidate, to kill Kennedy as an act of revenge on their part, it is highly implausible that anyone in the anti-Castro movement, other than an uneducated, unintelligent group of street warriors, would think there was even the smallest of possibilities that the assassination would precipitate a U.S. invasion of Castro's Cuba. The leadership of the various anti-Castro groups would have to know that even if a pro-Castro Cuban national killed Kennedy, the expectation of our invading Cuba would be very remote, since how could we know Castro was behind it? Even more improbably, how could any group of conspirators with any respectable level of intelligence believe that if an American like Oswald—who was simply a supporter of Castro, and who had never been to Cuba, and had absolutely no connection with the Castro regime—killed Kennedy, that the American government would decide to invade Cuba? When, in fact, Oswald was arrested for Kennedy's murder and was believed by Americans to be the president's assassin, and his pro-Castro sympathies had become known, there was no cry from any segment of our society to launch a military attack on Cuba.

And the leaders of the many anti-Castro counterrevolutionary groups, almost without exception, were intelligent and educated. Manuel Antonio de Varona, the leader of the FRD, had been president of the Cuban Senate and then prime minister in the administration of President Carlos Prío. Manuel Artime, the nephew of a popular poet, José Angel, and the head of the MRR, had a bachelor of science degree and completed most of his studies to become a doctor in Cuba. Justo Carrillo, one of the original leaders of the FRD, was president of the Bank for Industrial and Agricultural Development under Castro. José Ignacio, head of the MDC, was a history professor in Cuba. Manuel “Manolo” Ray, head of JURE (and before that in Cuba, the MRP), had been an engineer in Cuba who became the minister of public works under Castro.¹⁷⁹ Miro Cardona, the head of the CRC, had been a lawyer and professor at the University of Havana and was Castro's first prime minister and then his ambassador to the United Nations.¹⁸⁰ And so on. Indeed, even the “delegates” (leaders in their respective communities) of the anti-Castro groups were normally intelligent and educated. For instance, Carlos Bringuier, the New Orleans delegate of the DRE who had the street confrontation with Oswald in New Orleans in the summer of 1963, had been an attorney in Cuba.

So not only were the anti-Castro leaders men of intelligence and stature, but they were not criminals or murderers, a prerequisite, I would think, for anyone deciding to murder the president of the United States out of revenge.

Moreover, at least the brigade leaders (the men who, along with the members of their brigade, risked their lives to free Cuba) were not antagonistic toward Kennedy at the time of his death.* In writing The Bay of Pigs with the main brigade leaders, Haynes Johnson obviously had to get to know them fairly well, and they confided in him. For instance, Pepe San Román, the brigade commander, admitted that while in prison following his capture at the Bay of Pigs, he ruminated that “I hated the United States, and I felt I had been betrayed. Every day it became worse and then I was getting madder and madder and I wanted to get a rifle and come and fight against the United States.” But San Román, Artime, and Oliva, all of whom were at the Bay of Pigs and felt deep betrayal, welcomed Kennedy with open arms at the Orange Bowl. Why? It's clear that on reflection they knew that although Kennedy had not come through for them at that point in time, his heart was always in the right place.

Johnson writes, “For all of them [referring to the brigade members, most likely an overstatement by Johnson], and especially the leaders, the death of Kennedy came with shattering impact... They believed in President Kennedy and he gave them reason to hope for the future. They believed, no matter what mistakes he personally made during their invasion, that he had saved their lives with his strong warning to Castro immediately upon their defeat [i.e., they believed it was Kennedy's words in a speech the day after the invasion ended, that "our restraint is not inexhaustible" and the U.S. "must take an even closer and more realistic look at the menace of external Communist intervention and domination in Cuba," not Castro's humanity, that were responsible for Castro's not risking the possible consequences of executing them];...that he had liberated them from prison; and that he meant what he said in the Orange Bowl—that he wanted them to return at the head of the column to a free Havana, and he wanted to be there on that day."¹⁸¹

I would imagine that virtually the entire activist anti-Castro community in Miami showed up at the Orange Bowl on December 29, 1962, less than eleven months before the assassination. And for those who weren't there, they undoubtedly knew everything about the event from Cuban-American radio and newspapers. They had to know, then, that brigade leaders San Román, Artime, and Oliva—who landed on the treacherous beaches of the Bay of Pigs, saw their comrades killed before their eyes, and were eventually captured (after hiding in the swamps for days, with little food or water) and imprisoned for a year and a half in Castro's prisons—had made peace with Kennedy and stood by his side as the American and Cuban national anthems were played, even giving him the brigade flag for safekeeping. Knowing this, any anti-Castro militant, or militants, thinking about killing Kennedy would have had to realize that such an act would be going against their brigade leaders, who, along with their troops, were the legendary heroes and soul of the anti-Castro movement. For the thought of assassination to have gone beyond the above realization is not a likely thing.¹⁸²

There is a piece of significant circumstantial evidence, in addition to the common sense of it all, that no anti-Castro group, or even individual members thereof, was complicit in the assassination. It is well known that both the anti- and the pro-Castro groups were heavily infiltrated by the other side. Bill Kelly, a retired FBI agent who worked in the Internal Security-Cuba section of the Miami field office, which investigated and monitored the two groups full-time during the early 1960s, told me that "half the anti-Castro groups were pro-Castro informants." When I told him that sounded awfully high, he said, "Put it this way. A lot, a lot of pro-Castro informants infiltrated the anti-Castro groups. They were called 'G-2 Agents.' G-2 was the Cuban Intelligence Service. When we'd identify them, we'd arrest them for being in violation of the Foreign Agents Registration Act, which required them to register, which they never did, with the State Department. Because these were crimes committed on American soil, the FBI, not the CIA, had jurisdiction." Kelly noted that "if pro-Castro agents were operating in any other country against the interests of the United States, then it would be CIA jurisdiction. However, not all of these informants were actually G-2 people being paid by Castro. There also were volunteers."

I asked Kelly to estimate the likelihood that Castro, because of this infiltration, would know if any of the anti-Castro groups were behind the assassination. "With the level of infiltration he had, I can say he would have known with almost 100 percent metaphysical certitude," he responded.¹⁸³ In fact, FBI headquarters said it believed that there were "more than two hundred agents of Cuban G-2 in the Miami area, all targeted against the exile movement."¹⁸⁴ We know that when it was learned after the assassination that Oswald had a reverence for Castro and his revolution and even had a Fair Play for Cuba chapter in New Orleans, much suspicion focused on Castro's possible involvement in the assassination. To a much lesser degree, that suspicion continues to this very day. As the HSCA said, if Castro learned that anti-Castro groups had killed Kennedy, he "would have had the highest incentive to report” this to American authorities “since it would have dispelled suspicions” of his involvement in the assassination.¹⁸⁵ Yet no such information ever came from Castro, information he would almost undoubtedly have possessed if, indeed, anti-Castro Cuban exiles had been behind Kennedy’s assassination.

Sergio Arcacha, a New Orleans Cuban exile leader, told author Gus Russo, “Castro knew everything we were doing. He had people everywhere.” Russo goes on to write, “In truth, Castro didn’t need ‘people everywhere’ because the Cuban exiles were notorious for being their own worst enemies. Justin Gleichauf, the former chief of the CIA’s Miami office, has put it this way: ‘To a Cuban, a secret is something you tell to only a hundred people.’”¹⁸⁶ Arcacha himself, just one week before the invasion, told a reporter in New Orleans that the invasion “could begin this afternoon, tomorrow, anytime. We are just waiting for the signal.”¹⁸⁷ Cuban intelligence and infiltration of the exiles was such that, according to a January 12, 1961, report, which was among the documents declassified by the Cuban government in March of 2001, the Cubans had detailed knowledge of the CIA camps in Guatemala and Florida, where most of the anti-Castro invasion forces were being trained.¹⁸⁸

As highly speculative as any possible umbilical cord was between anti-Castro Cubans and Oswald’s act of murder, I would come to believe after the London trial that the very remote possibility of anti-Castro Cuban exiles being involved with Oswald in the assassination, even if in the most tangential of ways, was the only conspiracy possibility in the entire case that had any merit. A possibility, I might add, that would never be capable of exciting conspiracy theorists and supporting a thriving cottage industry dealing with the facts and mythology of the assassination. It is not only more “sexy” for the CIA, organized crime, or the military-industrial complex, et cetera, to be involved in the assassination, as opposed to comparatively impotent anti-Castro Cuban exiles, but it is infinitely more grave and momentous if leading agencies of our own government, or powerful groups in our society, who felt Kennedy was implementing policies antithetical to their interests, decided to alter the course of American history by a bullet rather than the ballot box.

I should underline that the aforementioned possibility is only a possibility. There is no evidence that the anti-Castro leadership, or even rogue members of any anti-Castro exile group, ever participated, in any way, in the assassination, and three separate investigations have so concluded. The Warren Commission found that the allegation of anti-Castro Cuban involvement in the assassination was “without any factual basis”¹⁸⁹ the HSCA, though saying it could “not preclude the possibility” (how could this ever be done?) that individual members of an anti-Castro group were involved, reported that “the evidence was sufficient to support the conclusion that anti-Castro groups...were not involved in the assassination”¹⁹⁰ and the Senate’s Church Committee said there was “no evidence” that any anti-Castro group was involved in Kennedy’s murder.¹⁹¹

Cover-Up by the CIA and FBI in the Warren Commission's Investigation of the Assassination

A refrain one constantly hears from the conspiracy theorists is that the CIA and FBI kept critical information from the Warren Commission. The unmistakable inference is that these two agencies withheld many things from the Commission, probably because one or both of them (particularly the CIA) were complicit in the assassination. But when the conspiracy theorists finally get around to setting forth just what was withheld, they only come up with the same, old, tired matters about the CIA not informing the Warren Commission about its plot to kill Castro, and the FBI tearing up Oswald's note allegedly threatening to blow up the FBI building. Nothing more of any substance.

With respect to the FBI tearing up the note from Oswald (discussed earlier in book), it couldn't be more obvious that this was just an attempt by the Dallas office of the FBI to protect itself from J. Edgar Hoover's wrath. If the note surfaced, Hoover would know that many in the nation would blame him and the FBI's negligence for not alerting the Secret Service or anyone else about Oswald before the president came to Dallas.* As J. Gordon Shanklin, the head of the Dallas FBI office who eventually had FBI agent James Hosty (to whom Oswald addressed the note) destroy the note, told Hosty when Hosty told him the note was "just your typical guff," "What do you mean, 'typical guff'?" This note was written by Oswald, the probable assassin of the President, and Oswald brought this note into this office just ten days ago. What the hell do you think Hoover's going to do if he finds out about this note?...He's going to lose it." Hosty, though having been opposed to destroying the note, went along with its destruction thereafter to the extent that he never brought it up in his testimony before the Warren Commission, relying on the explanation that the Commission hadn't "asked me about the note."¹ As Bill Alexander, the Dallas assistant DA at the time, told author Gerald Posner, "I worked with those fellows at the FBI over many years. What they were doing with the Hosty situation is covering their asses...People like Shanklin were running for cover to make sure no one could point a finger and say, 'You failed to spot Oswald as a threat.'"²

Some have said that agents in the Dallas field office of the FBI also deleted Oswald's reference to Hosty in his address book when the Dallas Police Department turned the book over to the field office, but they did not. The Hosty reference—his name, FBI address, phone number, license plate number—remained in the address book for the Warren Commission to see.³ However, the Dallas office, in its December 23, 1963, report to the Warren Commission, made no reference to the entry in the address book,⁴ though it referred to other entries of less significance. Why? Dallas FBI special agent Robert P. Gemberling, who was the Dallas field office's "coordinator" of the investigation into the assassination of Kennedy, instructed Special Agent John T. Kesler to submit to him a list of all names and items in Oswald's address book that were "leads" requiring "investigation attention." Virtually all of the names and matters referred to in Kesler's thirty-page report to Gemberling were previously "unknown" to the FBI. Inasmuch as the identity of Special Agent Hosty was known to both Kesler and himself, Gemberling did not consider the Hosty information a "lead" and hence did not include it in his own report of December 23, 1963, to the Warren Commission.⁵

It should be noted, however, that the February 11, 1964, report from FBI headquarters to the

Warren Commission that included nonleads as well as leads did specifically refer to the Hosty entry, and in an even earlier January 27, 1964, letter to the Warren Commission, the FBI notified the Commission of the Hosty reference in Oswald's address book. The HSCA "concluded that there was no plan by the FBI to withhold the Hosty entry in Oswald's address book for sinister reasons."⁶

Another alleged FBI cover-up ("The whole thing cries cover-up from the very outset," conspiracy theorist Bernard Fensterwald wrote Congressman Thomas Downing of the HSCA on March 8, 1976) turned out to be much to do about nothing when the FBI documents pertaining to the allegation were subsequently declassified. On November 26, 1963, Captain Paul Barger of the Irving Police Department told FBI special agent Robert C. Lish that an informant told him that on November 23, 1963, he had overheard a telephone conversation between telephone number BL-31628 in Irving, Texas (Ruth Paine's residence, though the phone number was still listed in the name of her husband, Michael), and CR-55211 in Arlington (Bell Helicopter, Michael Paine's workplace) in which the male voice said that he felt sure Lee Harvey Oswald had killed the president but he did not feel Oswald was responsible, adding, "We both know who is responsible." Barger said he was extremely busy at the time and could not remember who his informant had been. But the real problem is that when Lish asked Barger for his written record of the conversation he had with his informant and Barger furnished the notes, there was no reference to the words "We both know who is responsible." The only words on the notes were "Oswald wouldn't have any reason to do it, but when you get right down to it, the only guilty person it [is?] that bastard himself." So obviously, Barger had orally given Agent Lish incorrect information, and he conceded as much when he said that when he told Lish what his informant told him, he did not have his notes on hand and was speaking from memory.⁷

In any event, both Michael Paine and Ruth Paine were interviewed by the FBI, and though each acknowledged speaking over the phone about Oswald on the day after the assassination, Michael Paine said he never made the statement "We both know who is responsible" at any place, at any time, or under any circumstances. With respect to the other remark, he said he stated on numerous occasions that Oswald "wouldn't have had any reason" to do it; however, although he believed Oswald did, in fact, kill Kennedy, the words "the only guilty person [is] that bastard himself" did not sound to him like his statement.⁸ Ruth Paine also told the FBI that her husband never told her, "We both know who is responsible." About the other ("bastard") remark, she said she could not recall her husband using those exact words, but the meaning of the words would be "compatible" with his feelings on November 23, 1963.⁹ Regarding this alleged November 23, 1963, telephone conversation with her husband while he allegedly was at his place of work, Paine added to me, "Michael never worked on Saturdays."¹⁰ November 23 was a Saturday.

The 1976 Church Committee Report said, "The evidence suggests that during the Warren Commission investigation, top FBI officials were continually concerned with protecting the Bureau's reputation and avoiding any criticism for not fulfilling investigative responsibilities." This paranoia primarily originated with the FBI director himself who, the Senate Select Committee said, had a "known hostility to criticism or embarrassment of the Bureau."¹¹ Indeed, even without Hoover knowing of Oswald's threatening note to Hosty, the day after the assassination Hoover ordered an internal investigation to determine whether the FBI had adequately investigated Oswald's potential for subversive actions or violence and whether he should have been listed on the FBI's security index.¹² On December 10, 1963, the report by the bureau's Inspection Division found numerous deficiencies in the pre-assassination investigation and recommended various forms of discipline, such as censure, probation, and transfer for seventeen members of the FBI, including four supervisors at headquarters and one assistant director.¹³ A representative example of a cited deficiency: “Special Agent [name deleted] advised that New York [field office of FBI] did not report Oswald’s 4-21-63 Fair Play For Cuba contact to Dallas [field office] until letter sent 6-27-63, and Dallas did not feel it necessary to report it to Bureau [headquarters] until 9-10-63. [Deleted agent’s name] admits it ‘possibly’ would have been better to have reported on the matter earlier.”¹⁴ Hoover subsequently carried out most of the disciplinary actions recommended.¹⁵ One could only imagine what the bureau’s Inspection Division and particularly Hoover would have done to Shanklin, even Hosty, if they had learned about Oswald’s note and the destruction of it.

One other alleged attempt on the part of the FBI to withhold key information from the Warren Commission comes not so much from the conspiracy theorists but from a quasi-conspiracy soul mate of theirs, former FBI agent James Hosty himself. In his book Assignment: Oswald, Hosty says that shortly before his testimony before the Warren Commission, someone removed “two key items” (both had been sent from FBI headquarters) from his file on Oswald in his Dallas office. One was an October 18, 1963, communiqué from the CIA to the FBI stating that while Oswald was in Mexico City he was in contact with the Russian embassy and had probably spoken to one Valeriy Kostikov at the embassy. The second document contained a reference to the November 9, 1963, letter Oswald had written to the Soviet embassy in Washington, D.C., in which he refers to speaking to a “Comrade Kostin” (believed to be Kostikov) at the Russian embassy in Mexico City. Based on these two documents, Hosty said he figured Kostikov “was just a simple administrative officer at the Embassy.”

But Hosty says he later learned that Kostikov was a KGB agent in Department 13, the department of the KGB that dealt in sabotage and assassination. Hosty suggests that the reason the FBI (who he correctly presumes knew this fact)* kept this information from him is that the bureau, in league with the CIA, the Warren Commission, and President Johnson himself, didn’t want him to introduce this information into the public record when he testified before the Warren Commission, for fear, Hosty says, that it could precipitate a nuclear war with the Soviet Union.¹⁶

One immediate problem with Hosty’s thinking is this: Hosty said he read both documents before they disappeared from his files. Obviously, neither contained a reference to Kostikov being a KGB agent. Indeed, this is the predicate for Hosty’s whole argument. Since the documents did not contain a reference to Kostikov being a KGB agent, how in the world would their removal from his file, which he felt was highly suspicious, prevent him from knowing Kostikov was a KGB agent? It obviously makes no sense at all. Moreover, if the documents had contained a reference to Kostikov’s KGB status, since Hosty had already read both documents, he could have testified to their essential content before the Warren Commission even if he did not have them in his physical possession.

It is also noteworthy that unlike his published book, his earlier 1986 manuscript of the book pointed out (page 20) that right after the assassination, when he located his Oswald file, the two subject documents were “right on top” of the file. Obviously, they were important, and just as obviously, his supervising agents had a right, without his permission, to look into the file (and remove any documents they deemed important) on someone who had just been identified as the president’s assassin. Indeed, one such supervising agent, Kenneth Howe, testified to this being routine procedure in any case.¹⁷ Hosty goes on to say in his published book, however, that when he returned to Dallas after testifying before the Warren Commission in Washington, the two subject documents had been placed back in the file, suggesting again, he says, that his superiors didn’t want him to have access to these documents prior to his testimony.¹⁸ But this is ludicrous since his superiors would have to assume that since these two documents had been in his file, he had read them and knew the contents anyway.

Hosty asserts that when he referred to the two documents in a pre-testimony session with a Warren Commission staffer in May of 1964, Assistant FBI Director Alan Belmont muttered in Hosty's ear, "Damn it, I thought I told them not to let you see that one from the Washington field office" (he was referring to the October 18, 1963, CIA communiqué to FBI headquarters advising the FBI of Oswald's probable contact in Mexico City with Kostikov at the Soviet embassy).¹⁹ This incident seems highly unlikely to have occurred. What could possibly have been in that document that the FBI did not want Hosty to see? Nothing. All the good stuff—about Kostikov being a KGB agent—was never, per Hosty himself, in either document.

It should be mentioned that the Warren Commission, before Hosty's testimony on May 5, 1964, already knew that Kostikov was a KGB agent who was a member of Department 13. In a memo to the Warren Commission on January 31, 1964, the CIA informed the Commission that "Kostikov is believed to work for Department Thirteen of the First Chief Directorate of the KGB. It is the Department responsible for executive action, including sabotage and assassination. These functions of the KGB are known within the Service itself as 'Wet Affairs' (mokryye dela)."²⁰

Though not directly relevant to the Hosty issue, on December 20, 1963, before the CIA sent its memo to the Warren Commission, a CIA report titled "CIA Work on Lee Oswald and the Assassination of President Kennedy" said that "Kostikov is believed to work for Department 13 of the KGB, the department responsible for sabotage and assassination. This belief is based on the fact that Kostikov once was responsible for a Soviet agent whose mission was sabotage and whom Kostikov passed on to another KGB officer who was positively known to work for Department 13. Almost invariably, sabotage agents are handled only by Department 13 officers...The files of our Mexico City station were reviewed in the three or four days after the assassination to see if anything in Kostikov's past activities incriminated him. No clue was found linking him to the assassination or to anything remotely related to it." The report said that even on the day of the assassination, nothing suspicious was noted at the Russian embassy in Mexico City, with Soviet officials, including Kostikov, coming and going "as usual."^{21*}

An earlier draft of the CIA report, dated December 13, 1963, noted that Oswald's dealing with KGB men like Obyedkov [a guard at the Soviet embassy Oswald spoke to on October 1, 1963] and Kostikov was nothing more than a grim coincidence, a coincidence due in part to the Soviet habit of placing intelligence men [KGB] in the Embassies in positions where they receive a large portion of the visitors and phone calls. All of the five Consular Officers in the Soviet Embassy [in Mexico City] are known or suspected intelligence officers. Certainly, if Oswald had been a Soviet agent in training for an assassination assignment or even for sabotage work, the Soviets would have stopped him from making open visits and phone calls to the Soviet Embassy in Mexico City after he tried it a couple of times. Our experience in Mexico, studying the Soviet intelligence service at close range, indicates that they do make some mistakes and are sometime insecure in their methods, but that they do not persist in such glaring errors.²²

In other words, if the KGB was preparing Oswald to be its assassin of Kennedy, it is virtually inconceivable that it would have him meet its agents at the Russian embassy, a place it had to know was under CIA surveillance.

Hosty has always believed that he, along with several other agents, should not have been disciplined by Hoover for their pre-assassination investigative failures. After all, the evidence seems to support Hosty's position that he did not know of Kostikov's true identity before the assassination, and he was not aware of anything Oswald did that should have led him to believe Oswald was a possible candidate to kill the president. Most of the agents merely got letters of censure. Hosty got that along with a thirty-day suspension of pay (which the bureau paid him when he retired in 1979) and was transferred to the Kansas City field office. He feels Hoover tried to make him the scapegoat for the assassination, and this is why he has an animus for his old boss, calling him an "SOB." In the process of trying to settle a score with the bureau, Hosty, a good man but perhaps a little paranoid (understandably so) because of this incident, and perhaps because he unconsciously tried to increase the marketability of his book, ended up engaging in some groundless and sometimes wild speculation. He also regurgitated rumors that were not only improbable on their face but for which there was no credible evidence or support—for instance, that Oswald, in Mexico City, had told the Cuban consulate that he was "going to kill Kennedy" that he had a "clandestine meeting with the KGB hit man Kostikov" in Mexico City; and that Oswald had maintained contact with one Vitaliy Gerosimov, an official at the Soviet embassy in Washington who Hosty says was the contact "for deep-cover Soviet espionage agents in the United States."²³

Although in his book Hosty made a great deal of who Kostikov allegedly was ("I find it more than disturbing that the day after Oswald offered to kill the president for the Cubans, he was seen meeting with the KGB's chief assassination expert for the Western Hemisphere"),²⁴ and testified for the defense at the London trial that Kostikov was in charge of assassinations for the KGB in the Western Hemisphere, he was much more subdued and realistic under my cross-examination of him. Among other things he said it was "my understanding" that Kostikov did not know who Oswald was when Oswald came to the Soviet embassy. In answer to my question as to whether it was "reasonably inferable" that Oswald only spoke to Kostikov about securing a visa, he answered, "Yes. It was concerning his request for he and his family to return to the Soviet Union." When I asked him, "You're certainly not suggesting to this jury that Kostikov—who at one time may or may not have been a member of any KGB assassination unit—you're not suggesting that he had anything to do with the assassination. Is that correct?" Hosty responded, "There is no evidence to that effect." Indeed, when I asked him why would the FBI or J. Edgar Hoover want to keep it "a secret from you that Kostikov was in the KGB?" he answered that "J. Edgar Hoover was not directly responsible. This was the Russian espionage section [of the FBI] who did that. We have an awful lot of special regulations...in counterintelligence, there are a lot of provisions that say don't say this, don't say that." When I asked Hosty, "But you don't know why FBI headquarters would not want you to know Kostikov was a member of the KGB?" he replied, "I don't know why." Ten years later, in his book, he claimed he did know why.

I tried to summarize my feeling about the entire Kostikov matter for the jury in London by asking

Hosty, “The charge has been made...that Oswald was a dangerous enough person for you to have alerted the Secret Service about him before President Kennedy came to Dallas?”

“That charge has been made,” Hosty answered.

Question: “I know this is going to be a hard question for you to answer, Mr. Hosty, but since you have been criticized for your handling of the case...isn’t this the main reason you place so much emphasis on Kostikov and your not knowing he was a KGB agent, because the Kostikov matter enables you to make the argument that if you had known, you would have handled the Oswald matter differently?”

Hosty: “I would have handled it differently.”²⁵

With respect to the CIA, during testimony before the HSCA on September 22, 1978, House Representative Christopher J. Dodd asked former CIA director Richard Helms, “Other than the anti-Castro assassination plots, was there any other information pertaining to [the assassination of] the president that you are aware of and that the Warren Commission was not told about?*. . . Are there other things that you can recall that might have had relevancy—things of importance to the Warren Commission’s investigation of the assassination of [Kennedy]?”

Helms: “Well, I don’t know of any others. I can’t think of what they might have been. . . None come readily to mind.”²⁶

The 1976 Church Committee found that “between 1960 and early 1963 the CIA attempted to use underworld figures for [Castro’s] assassination. By May 1962, the FBI knew of such plots and in June 1963 learned of their termination. . . Neither the CIA nor the FBI told the Warren Commission about the CIA attempts to assassinate Fidel Castro.”²⁷ † The CIA itself has admitted its plot to assassinate Castro. When Helms was asked in his testimony before the Church Committee if he had been part of the CIA’s “assassination plot against Castro,” he responded, “I was aware that there had been efforts made to get rid of him.”²⁸ The CIA has also acknowledged that it involved the Mafia in its goal of killing Castro. When G. Robert Blakey, the HSCA chief counsel, asked Helms during his September 22, 1978, appearance before the committee, “Let me ask you a moral question. . . Would you tell me and the members of this committee and. . . the American people what possibly could have been the moral justification for the CIA entering into an alliance with the Mafia to execute the president of a foreign country?” Helms could only respond, “There was none. I have apologized for this. I can’t do any more than apologize on public television that it was an error in judgment. . . For my part in this and to the extent I had anything to do with it, I am heart sorry.”²⁹

During the Church Committee hearings in 1975, Helms gave several reasons for his not telling the Warren Commission about these plots. He testified, “I was instructed to reply to inquiries from the Warren Commission for information from the Agency. I was not asked to initiate any particular thing.”

Question: “In other words, if you weren’t asked for it, you didn’t give it?”

Helms: “That’s right, sir.”³⁰ Helms also told the committee, “My recollection at the time was that it was public knowledge that the United States was trying to get rid of Castro.”³¹ Further deflecting responsibility from himself, he pointed out that “Mr. Allen Dulles was a member of the Warren Commission. And the first [CIA-mob] assassination plot happened during his time as director

[Dulles was the CIA director from February 26, 1953 to November 29, 1961, when he was succeeded by John McCone]...He was sitting right there in [the Warren Commission's] deliberations and knew about this."³²†

Though Helms spoke categorically of Dulles's knowledge, it is not clear whether Helms assumed this or he was speaking from personal knowledge. The pipe-smoking Dulles, who was the longest-serving CIA director ever, certainly had never acknowledged that he knew of the CIA-mob plot to kill Castro, and the available record is not entirely clear that he did, though one could draw that inference. The Church Committee and the HSCA learned that in September of 1960, Richard Bissell, CIA deputy director for plans, and Colonel Sheffield Edwards, chief of the CIA's Office of Security, briefed Dulles and his deputy, General Charles Cabell, "on the existence of a plan involving members of the syndicate. The discussion was circumspect; Edwards deliberately avoided the use of any 'bad words.' The descriptive term used was 'an intelligence operation.' Edwards is quite sure that [Dulles and Cabell] clearly understood the nature of the operation he was discussing...Edwards recalls that Mr. Dulles merely nodded, presumably in understanding and approval."³³ And Bissell testified before the Church Committee, "I can only say that I am quite sure I came away from that meeting...convinced that he knew the nature of the operation."³⁴ Not overly convincing at all.

More so is the December 11, 1959, memorandum by J. C. King, head of the CIA's Western Hemisphere Division, to Dulles that contained four "Recommended Actions," one of which was that "thorough consideration be given to the elimination of Fidel Castro," which Dulles approved of in writing.³⁵ But again, the word elimination is not unequivocal, nor could the HSCA uncover any evidence that Dulles became aware that steps were later taken to actually carry out (though unsuccessfully) the subject "recommended" action. And the Church Committee was equally confused, saying, "Certain...evidence before the Committee suggests that Dulles and Cabell did know about the assassination plots; other evidence suggests they did not."³⁶

One piece of evidence indicating that Dulles did not know that an actual decision had been made to kill Castro, and if he did, he did not approve, is a cable sent on July 21, 1960, from CIA headquarters to its Havana station stating that "possible removal of top three [Cuban] leaders is receiving serious consideration at HQ'S." But the duty officer (not identified by name by the Church Committee) testified that the very next day he sent a countermanding cable to the Havana station, and that "to the best of my knowledge, my memory is that the director [Dulles], not the deputy director [Bissell]...had countermanded the cable and had directed that—had indicated that assassination was not to be considered."³⁷ Although the Church Committee said that "the evidence as to whether Allen Dulles, CIA Director during the Eisenhower Administration, was informed of the Castro assassination operation is not clear," it ultimately concluded that it was "likely" that "Dulles knew about and authorized the actual plots [to kill Castro] that occurred during his tenure."³⁸ The committee could not take Dulles's testimony on the matter, Dulles being deceased.

When Helms testified before the Rockefeller Commission and was asked about the possibility that Castro had retaliated against Kennedy because of CIA attempts against him, I somehow believe Helms when he answered, "I don't recall the thought ever having occurred to me at the time. The first time I ever heard such a theory...was in a peculiar way by President Johnson."³⁹ But whether the thought occurred to Helms or not, surely someone at the CIA had to know that even if there was no known connection between the Castro plots and Kennedy's assassination, they had a duty to inform the Warren Commission of these plots. This is particularly true when the CIA knew that the Commission was investigating the possible involvement of Castro in Kennedy's death. Certainly the plots against Castro would be relevant to the issue of Castro's motive.

As opposed to the Bay of Pigs invasion, Robert Kennedy was deeply involved in Operation Mongoose, the U.S. effort to remove Castro from power. In a June 11, 1964, letter from Chief Justice Earl Warren to RFK, Warren asked if RFK was "aware of any additional information relating to the assassination of President John F. Kennedy" that his Justice Department had not made available to the Commission, particularly in the area of a "foreign conspiracy." Although one can see why RFK would not, in response, mention the U.S. effort to oust Castro, since this was common knowledge and he could rightfully assume the Warren Commission already knew about it, he also had learned (see endnote discussion) of the CIA's attempt to murder Castro, which was not a matter of common knowledge and which, in terms of a motive by a foreign country to kill President Kennedy, would be information "relating to the assassination." Yet in RFK's August 4, 1964, response (seven weeks after Warren's request, which, in terms of protocol alone, was an improper delay), RFK, who never testified before the Warren Commission though he volunteered to do so, said his Department of Justice had furnished the Commission "all information relating in any way to the assassination of President John F. Kennedy."⁴⁰ So if Allen Dulles knew of the CIA plot to murder Castro and kept this fact from the Warren Commission, it clearly appears that RFK was also covering up this nation's effort to murder Castro.* Exposure of the effort would have been damaging to his and his brother's reputation and legacy (even though it has never been established that either Kennedy brother had approved of the assassination effort [see endnote discussion]), and the Kennedy family, not surprisingly, was always protective of the aura of Camelot.

Before we go any further, however, I must note that the failure of the CIA and RFK to inform the Commission of the plots against Castro did not in any way stop the Commission from investigating the possibility of Castro's involvement. The argument by Warren Commission critics goes like this: because the Commission did not know of the plots against Castro, it did not explore the possibility that Castro may have had Kennedy killed to retaliate or to preempt further attempts on his life. But that argument has wobbly legs, because even without knowledge of the plots, as indicated, the Commission certainly did have knowledge of Kennedy's attempt to remove Castro from power by his support of the Bay of Pigs invasion, and arguably this would give Castro a similar motive to retaliate. In light of this, the Commission undertook an intensive investigation of any possible connection between Oswald and Cuba (which is synonymous with Castro). "Literally dozens of allegations of a conspiratorial contact between Oswald and agents of the Cuban Government have been investigated by the Commission," the Warren Report noted, and it did not uncover any "evidence that the Cuban Government had any involvement in the assassination," or "that the Cuban Government had [any] relationship with Lee Harvey Oswald" other than his attempt to get a visa at the Cuban consulate.⁴¹

Not only the FBI, the Warren Commission's chief investigative arm, but the Secret Service investigated every conceivable known contact Oswald had that could lead to Cuba's involvement in the assassination. Indeed, the Secret Service's investigation "dealt almost entirely with the Cuban angle."⁴² And if Castro was behind Oswald's act, these investigations would very probably have discovered it. If not, how would knowledge of the CIA plots to kill Castro have helped the Warren Commission discover it? In other words, how would the Commission's investigation of Oswald's ties to Cuba have been measurably different if it had known of the U.S. plot to kill Castro? Warren Commission assistant counsel Burt W. Griffin says, "If we had known that the CIA wanted to assassinate Castro, then all of the Cuban motivations [to kill Kennedy] that we were exploring...made much, much more sense."⁴³ Translation: we would have suspected Castro as a possible conspirator behind the assassination more than we did. But again, how would the Commission's investigation of Castro have been significantly, if at all, different?

When HSCA counsel asked John Scelso, who originally headed up the CIA investigation of the assassination (which was far less comprehensive than the Warren Commission's and FBI's, even the Secret Service's), "Is there anything else that you would have done differently [if you had known about the CIA plots to kill Castro]?" his answer, though containing many words, came down to not much more than finding out more about the CIA plots and whether Castro knew of them. "If Helms had disclosed the Cuban assassination plots, we would have gone at that hot and heavy. We would have queried the agent [he didn't clarify whom he meant here, but presumably an agent involved in the plot] about it [the plots] in great detail. I would have had him polygraphed...to see if he had a double-agent informing Castro about our poison pen things...I would have had all our Cuban sources queried about it."⁴⁴ The assertion of Raymond Rocca, the CIA's chief of research and analysis for counterintelligence, is no more satisfying. He says that had he known of the anti-Castro plots, "a completely different procedural approach probably would and should have been taken."⁴⁵ But he didn't say what different approach he would have taken. Moreover, Rocca's superiors at the CIA did know of the plots on Castro. (I mean, they were behind the plots.) How did it change their approach to investigating the assassination?

Parenthetically, the Warren Commission shouldn't feel bad about not knowing of the CIA's attempt to murder Castro. If we're to believe Scelso, the CIA veteran whom Richard Helms originally put in charge of the CIA's investigation of the assassination, he didn't know about it either.⁴⁶

It bears repeating that even without knowledge of the CIA's attempt on Castro's life, the Warren Commission certainly knew of the Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba in April of 1961. And although no U.S. military personnel actually fought on Cuban soil, as the HSCA said, "U.S. sponsorship of the landing was readily apparent. President Kennedy [even] publicly acknowledged 'sole responsibility' for the U.S. role in the aborted invasion."⁴⁷ And as far as the issue of relevance to Castro's possible motive is concerned, the CIA's plot to murder him would hardly have changed his thinking vis-à-vis the United States. We can assume he knew that if the separate and distinct Bay of Pigs invasion had succeeded, the U.S. plans for him did not include expatriating him to the United States and supporting his run for Congress.

Although the CIA's failure to inform the Warren Commission of its plots against Castro's life was obviously wrong and a serious violation of responsibility and trust, it did not seem to inhibit the Warren Commission's investigation, as conspiracy theorists would want us to believe. Also, two important considerations have to have been at play here. One is too obvious to state—that the CIA, for purposes of national security and geopolitical considerations, didn't want it to be known to the outside world, or even internally in the United States, that it was involved to the sordid business of trying to murder a foreign leader. Second, the CIA and FBI, like all rational people, knew almost within hours that Oswald had killed Kennedy. And from the realization of who Oswald was as well as the surrounding circumstances (for instance, no one assisting Oswald to escape or driving him to his death), they became very confident early on that he acted alone. So concealing the collateral truth of the plot to kill Castro would not invalidate the central truth that Oswald acted alone.

No one has put the reason for the CIA's (and FBI's) failure to inform the Warren Commission of the Castro plots any better than writer and assassination researcher Max Holland. Concerning those members of the CIA (and FBI, attorney general's office, etc.) who were confronted with the issue of whether to inform the Warren Commission about the plots or not, he writes,

Officials in the know faced a genuine dilemma only if they had information pointing [to the Cuban government's involvement with Oswald in the assassination]. The Warren Commission could not [be allowed to] deliver to the American people and the world a false conclusion—that might well affect the stability of the government or shake important institutions to their foundations. But there was every reason not to spill secrets that merely echoed the finding that Oswald acted alone. The Commission, though denied important supporting information, would still publish the correct conclusion, and the U.S. Government could keep its deepest secrets. It was a convenient act of denial and dismissal, but also one perceived as necessary in the midst of the cold war. Complete candor would not have changed the Report's two essential conclusions at all—though it might have done a great deal to prevent its slide into disrepute later.⁴⁸

The bottom line is that the CIA withheld the information from the Warren Commission solely to protect its reputation, as sullied as many people believe it already was, not to conceal its involvement with Oswald in the assassination. The CIA's dirty laundry not only handcuffed it from telling the truth, but also deterred the U.S. Department of Justice from prosecuting a member of organized crime. In a May 10, 1962, memo about a meeting he had had with RFK the previous day, Hoover, talking about mobster Sam Giancana's unlawful organized-crime activities, wrote, "He [Kennedy] stated of course it would be very difficult to initiate any prosecution against [Giancana] because Giancana could immediately bring out the fact that the United States Government had approached him to arrange for the assassination of Castro."⁴⁹

The conspiracy theorists have tried to convert the FBI's attempt (in destroying Oswald's note to Hosty) to avoid the accusation it could have prevented the assassination, and the CIA's attempt to cover up its misdeeds on another matter (plot to kill Castro), into an attempt by both agencies to cover up their participation in the assassination of President Kennedy. This is the world of non sequiturs and enormous broad jumps in which the conspiracy theorists dwell and for which they are justifiably famous.

Jim Garrison's Prosecution of Clay Shaw and Oliver Stone's Movie JFK

Oliver Stone's 1991 movie, JFK, was inspired by and primarily based on New Orleans district attorney Jim Garrison's 1988 book, On the Trail of the Assassins, which chronicles Garrison's investigation and unsuccessful 1969 prosecution of New Orleans businessman Clay Shaw for conspiring, the March 22, 1967, indictment said, "with David W. Ferrie, Lee Harvey Oswald and others to murder John F. Kennedy." It is, to this day, the only prosecution ever arising out of Kennedy's murder.

Clay Shaw was an urbane, accomplished, cultured man and a very respected figure in New Orleans's civil and social life. Indeed, in the March 1967 issue of New Orleans' Town and Country Magazine, he was listed, along with Garrison, as one of the thirty-five "most important men in New Orleans." After serving in the Second World War, reaching the rank of major and being awarded the Croix de Guerre (the French military award for heroism in battle) and the Bronze Star, Shaw was one of the founders of the New Orleans International Trade Mart, where he served as managing director from 1946 to 1965. He was the moving force behind the eventual construction of a thirty-three-story headquarters for the Mart on Canal Street. The Mart, credited with substantially increasing trade at the port of New Orleans, was a model for cities around the world.

Shaw was also an integral force in the restoration of the historic French Quarter, one of the sixteen homes he restored being the 1821 residence of the noted naturalist John James Audubon. Shaw's work was of such quality that it caught the attention of such publications as House & Garden, House & Home, and Town & Country. The six-foot four-inch, silver-haired, distinguished-looking man was fluent in four languages, traveled widely, reportedly once dined with Churchill, read the great books of literature, regularly attended the symphony, opera, and ballet, and became an accomplished playwright (Submerged, The Idol's Eye, and others). He lived in a showplace home in the French Quarter with a brass-knocker red door, and his circle of friends included the likes of Tennessee Williams. It was not publicly known that he was also a homosexual. (Garrison, of course, subtly exploited this fact to give more credibility to his allegation that Shaw conspired with Ferrie, another homosexual.) Above all, Shaw was a gentleman, one who could hardly muster up more than a sense of pity for the sick man who was, without any justification, destroying his life. As someone once described Shaw, he was "the unlikeliest villain since Oscar Wilde."

Indeed, the immediate reaction to the charges against Shaw among the great many in New Orleans who knew him was of stunned disbelief. "Garrison can't be serious," "Clay Shaw? Incredible," "Impossible," "The most ridiculous thing I've ever heard," and similar responses were heard throughout the Crescent City. Many even found it humorous that the DA actually thought a man like Shaw would be involved in a plot to assassinate "anyone, let alone a President of the United States."¹ But these responses were only from those who knew him personally. Most of the people of New Orleans didn't, and like citizens of any city, they made the normal assumption that Garrison, the district attorney of their parish, wouldn't bring such serious charges against anyone unless he thought he had something substantial.

As for Shaw's politics, two New Orleans reporters at the time who were very familiar with him, said, “Those closest to him identify him as a liberal, and many say he was an ardent admirer of President Kennedy...Shaw described himself as a liberal of the old-fashioned Wilson-Roosevelt breed.”² Indeed, Shaw said he voted for Kennedy in 1960 and felt Kennedy was an excellent president, “in the same tradition” of Wilson and Roosevelt.³

When Shaw learned from Assistant DA Andrew Sciambra on March 1, 1967, that Garrison actually intended to charge him that day with conspiracy to murder Kennedy, he exclaimed to Sciambra, “You’ve got to be kidding, you’ve got to be kidding.” Sciambra said he wasn’t and asked Shaw to take a polygraph test, which Shaw indignantly refused to do.* In his lawyer’s office the next day after being charged, Shaw told a large throng of reporters that he did not know Oswald or Ferrie, had never been to Ferrie’s apartment, and had not “conspired with anyone at any time or at any place to murder our late and esteemed president,” adding that he had “only the highest and utmost respect and admiration” for Kennedy.^{4†}

David Ferrie was a manic-depressive, cartoonish figure who wore a scruffy, red homemade wig and fake oversized eyebrows (he was hairless due to the disease alopecia praecox)—in short, someone not normally seen outside a carnival tent. The son of a Cleveland police captain, and a Roman Catholic by birth, Ferrie, in his frenetic existence, was, among other things, a seminary student in Cleveland for two years in his early twenties, a commercial pilot for Eastern Airlines, a flying instructor, high school aeronautical science teacher, private investigator, accomplished pianist, service station proprietor, psychologist without credentials, hypnotist, self-styled clergyman of the Orthodox Old Catholic Church of North America, and searcher for a cure for cancer, at one time sharing his book-strewn apartment in New Orleans with white mice he kept for research purposes. He was, by virtually all accounts, a “brilliant” but tormented man. Ferrie had ambivalent feelings about Kennedy in general but was highly condemnatory of the president for allegedly withdrawing air support to the anti-Castro invading force at the Bay of Pigs, and became actively involved in the anti-Castro movement in New Orleans. His anti-Communism was such that he made the irrational charge that the Roosevelt and Truman administrations had been “driving us to communism.”⁵ Garrison at one time believed that Ferrie, who had been fired as an Eastern Airlines pilot in 1961 because of charges pending against him that he had sexual relations with a fifteen-year-old boy, was supposed to have flown Kennedy’s real killers (not Oswald) away from Dallas after the assassination.

With respect to the third member of Garrison’s alleged conspiracy, Garrison believed that “not one” shot “was fired by Lee Harvey Oswald.”⁶ Oswald’s supposed role in the conspiracy was to present himself to the world as a pro-Castro Marxist, though, per Garrison, his “political orientation was extreme right wing.” Garrison maintained that Oswald was manipulated by his co-conspirators into unwittingly setting himself up as a decoy and patsy so that the real killers of Kennedy could escape. Kennedy was murdered, per Garrison, “by a precision guerrilla team of at least seven men” located at the grassy knoll, the Book Depository Building, and the Dal-Tex Building. One man fired from each location, a separate one picking up the shells. One member of the team feigned an epileptic seizure as a diversionary tactic just before the motorcade reached the ambush point.⁷

In Garrison’s mind, lurking behind the scenes and pulling the strings on the three marionettes—Shaw, Ferrie, and Oswald—were rogue elements of the CIA. “The Central Intelligence Agency was deeply involved in the assassination,” Garrison announced on January 31, 1968, on national television (Johnny Carson’s Tonight Show). Three weeks later he fine-tuned it. “President Kennedy was killed by elements of the Central Intelligence Agency of the United States Government,” he told

TV reporter Willem L. Oltmans on February 22, 1968. Ferrie, Garrison told Oltmans, was a “CIA employee” and Oswald “worked for the CIA.”⁸ Indeed, in Garrison’s book on the assassination he goes so far as to say that Shaw’s connection with the CIA may actually have been high enough “to request that I be eliminated.”⁹ In a July 19, 1967, television interview with station WKBW in Buffalo, Garrison said, “The CIA knows the names of every man involved in the assassination, including the names of the individuals who pulled the triggers from the grassy knoll.”

Although Garrison, before the trial, told anyone who would listen that the CIA was behind the assassination, he produced no evidence at the trial of CIA involvement and presented no evidence that Oswald, Ferrie, or Shaw was ever associated, in any way, with the CIA or any other agency of U.S. intelligence. Remarkably, not once at the trial did Garrison or his team even mention the CIA.

Jim Garrison,* a former pilot who flew thirty-five reconnaissance missions in France and Germany during World War II and a former FBI agent (for four months), ran successfully for New Orleans DA in 1962 as a fiercely independent “reform” candidate with the image of an honest loner taking on a corrupt and entrenched establishment. Though he had little money, he used it judiciously, hoarding it until the last moment, then saturating the television screens in New Orleans with commercials during the final twenty-four hours of the campaign. (He had lost two previous political races, for assessor in 1957 and criminal district judge in 1960.) Once elected, the flamboyant, bright, and articulate forty-one-year-old immediately initiated a blitzkrieg campaign against vice on Bourbon Street by personally—with the cameras clicking—padlocking or raiding honky-tonks, striptease joints, and gay bars. He also attacked the city’s bail bond system as corrupt and assailed the New Orleans Police Department as being soft on crime.¹⁰ But Garrison never went after organized crime in New Orleans, causing some to suspect he was involved with the mob. However, almost invariably in major U.S. cities, organized-crime prosecutions are brought by federal authorities (Department of Justice, FBI, and U.S. attorneys), not state or local law enforcement.

In any event, in October of 1966, when Garrison seriously commenced his investigation into the assassination of Kennedy (he had first made a preliminary inquiry immediately following the president’s death into Oswald’s alleged connection with Ferrie, but it went nowhere), he was a popular DA among the electorate. In a city and state where corruption among oftentimes colorful public officials was so common it was accepted with bemused tolerance by the people,* Garrison, appearing incorruptible, was to many a breath of fresh air. The six-foot six-inch (some said six-foot seven-inch) prosecutor, who carried an equally outsized ego and was called the “Jolly Green Giant,” had a charismatic, populist aura, and deep mellifluous voice that even charmed some of his adversaries. As a reporter would later write, “New Orleans fell in love with him. He looked like Perry Mason and sounded like Eliot Ness,”¹¹ and his lovely blonde wife, Leah, the mother of his five children, was considered a political asset by the city’s denizens.

When news of Garrison’s investigation became known in the conspiracy community, the buffs flocked to New Orleans like swallows to San Juan Capistrano. Though they had been screaming their conspiracy blather before the Warren Commission’s report even came off the presses in 1964, they were on the outside looking in, and no one in authority on the inside was paying any attention to them. Now someone on the inside—though not the federal government—with an institutional base and the power of subpoena was saying the same thing they were, and they were excited and delighted. The office of the New Orleans district attorney gave an immediate cachet to their allegations. Down to New Orleans came Mark Lane and Penn Jones, Richard Popkin, Tom Katen and Vincent Salandria, Edward Jay Epstein, William Turner and Jones Harris, Harold Weisberg and David Lifton, Mary Ferrell, Mae Brussel, Richard E. Sprague, Raymond Marcus, Allan Chapman and social satirist Mort Sahl, among others, to volunteer their services in aid of the investigation.

These people couldn't have been more dedicated. Sahl, to give you one illustrative example, was at the top of his game as the premier intellectual stand-up comic of his time, an intimate of Frank Sinatra and Marilyn Monroe who dined with the likes of President Nixon, shared the cover of Time magazine with Nixon and JFK (August 8, 1960), and made hundreds of thousands of dollars a year. Enduring the ridicule of his peers for identifying himself with someone as unpopular with the mainstream media as Garrison, he worked with Garrison off and on for four years without a cent of salary, even expense money, his yearly income dipping to as low as $13,000 during this period. But the cause (a "responsibility to America" as Sahl put it) transcended everything else for Sahl and his colleagues. Upon arriving in New Orleans, Sahl had taken a cab to Garrison's home at 4600 Owens Boulevard in the city. "I walked to the door," Sahl would later write, "and a man emerged, all six foot seven inches of him, wearing a bathrobe. I said, 'I'm Mort Sahl, and I came down here to shake your hand.' 'I hope you're available to do a lot more than that,'" Garrison replied. Sahl said he got "a desk in the DA's office, took an apartment in New Orleans, and went out to do college concerts when I needed money to buy groceries and pay the rent." Sahl would later tell Johnny Carson on his show that Garrison was "the most important man in America."¹²

Perhaps with a bit of hyperbole, William Gurvich, a private investigator who assisted Garrison's office in the initial phases of the investigation, told Edward Wegmann, Shaw's civil attorney for years who helped put together the criminal defense team that represented Shaw at his trial, that much of the early investigative work was done, not by Garrison's office, but by Warren Commission critics like Sahl who had descended on New Orleans. In fact, as with Sahl, Garrison actually gave several of them, who had come to be known as the "Dealey Plaza Irregulars," DA investigator credentials. But other than Bill Turner, a former FBI agent and perhaps the only Dealey Plaza Irregular whom Garrison called to help out, not one of them had one day of experience in investigating a crime. Thomas Bethell, a member of Garrison's regular staff, said at the time that the trouble with these conspiracy theorists "is that the only way they can make a strong impression on Garrison is by coming up with flamboyant nonsense... They, therefore, represent a serious threat to the sanity of the investigation."¹³

But long before a New Orleans jury, after thirty-four days of trial testimony and argument, returned a swift verdict of not guilty against Shaw on March 1, 1969, two years to the day after Garrison had charged Shaw with conspiracy to murder Kennedy, most of the conspiracy theorists had departed from New Orleans, totally disenchanted with Garrison and his investigation (Mark Lane and Mort Sahl were among the few who stayed to the bitter end). What they had found in Garrison, to their dismay, was the embodiment of an overzealous prosecutor who wanted to get a conviction at any cost, one totally devoid of all prosecutorial ethics. The buffs may believe in crazy conspiracy theories, but they do not believe in prosecuting an innocent man (which Clay Shaw unquestionably was) for murder with perjurious testimony. Garrison had crossed the line, even with the buffs, and they denounced him. Respected assassination researcher Paul Hoch, who leans toward the conspiracy theory, said that Garrison had prosecuted someone "I believe was innocent."¹⁴ Referring to the "persecution" of Shaw by Garrison, he said that though Shaw may have had some connections to the CIA, this in no way justified Oliver Stone "ignoring what Garrison did to him."¹⁵ Leading Warren Commission critic and conspiracy maven Sylvia Meagher wrote that “as the Garrison investigation continued to unfold, it gave cause for increasingly serious misgivings about the validity of his evidence, the credibility of his witnesses, and the scrupulousness of his methods.”¹⁶ There is no better or substantive book on the assassination attacking the findings of the Warren Commission than Josiah Thompson’s Six Seconds in Dallas. Thompson’s assessment of Garrison’s investigation and prosecution of Shaw? “Completely without merit.”¹⁷ Even David Lifton, who took a solitary journey into dementia with his book Best Evidence, found Garrison, after only a few days’ exposure to him, to be “a reckless, irrational, even paranoid demagogue” who might, he wrote, “seriously hurt innocent people.”¹⁸

The belief among many in the conspiracy community is that Garrison’s fiasco in New Orleans actually set their movement back several years. Up until the HSCA reinvestigated the assassination in the late 1970s, conspiracy theorists, trying to peddle their theories, more often than not had Garrison’s misadventure thrown in their face. If Garrison turned up nothing, the thinking went, why would we believe your theory has any more merit? This was particularly true since Garrison had already incorporated so many of their theories (e.g., Kennedy was shot from the grassy knoll; Oswald was a patsy; the CIA, anti-Castro Cuban exiles, military-industrial complex, Dallas Police Department, organized crime, and just about every other major group you can think of, were involved in the assassination) into his position. “The New Orleans fiasco,” wrote conspiracy author Howard Roffman, “caused the virtual destruction of whatever foundation for credibility [that] had previously been established by the critics of the Warren Report.”¹⁹ Garrison’s case against Shaw was a “grotesque charade,” conspiracy author Robert Sam Anson wrote. “Years would pass before anyone... would take the notion of conspiracy seriously again.”²⁰ Meagher added to her earlier observation, saying that “Garrison was a dangerous charlatan.” Calling Shaw “an innocent man” (but still reiterating her belief that Oswald was likewise “totally innocent” of Kennedy’s murder), she said Garrison “did enormous harm not [only] to Clay Shaw and others but to the credibility and standing of all the critics of the Warren Report. It was Garrison’s contemptible antics that put the whole case into cold storage for many years. That some critics still believe and defend him simply astounds me.”²¹

In 1978, the HSCA, with its fourth-bullet conspiracy conclusion, gave a renewed patina of credibility to the notion of conspiracy in the assassination. But Garrison himself remained a pariah to all except those on the jagged margins of the conspiracy community—that is, until maverick Hollywood film producer and director Oliver Stone (Platoon, Wall Street, The Doors, Born on the Fourth of July, etc.), an eleven-time Academy Award nominee, read Garrison’s book, On The Trail of the Assassins (three times, he says), purchased the movie rights (for $250,000), and resurrected Garrison from his legal grave.*

In Stone’s hands, the thoroughly discredited Garrison became a courageous, Capraesque, American patriot fighting for justice and to save the country from dark and sinister forces out to subvert our American way of life. That Garrison’s reputation could not have been much worse before Stone is not a debatable point. Garrison himself told a New Orleans newspaper that his national image had become one of “a fool or a madman.” When he saw Stone’s screenplay, he commented what “a beautiful, magnificent job” it was.²² Yes, indeed.

Stone is an unreconstructed liberal (the word liberal is not a pejorative term to me) who infuses his films with a moral indignation and passion for justice that many understandably find infectious. The only child of a Jewish father and French Catholic mother, Stone grew up in a traditional, conservative home in New York City, where his father did well as a Wall Street stockbroker. In his postadolescent years, Stone, who in his early years looked up to Barry Goldwater, disliked Hubert Humphrey, and disdained Democrats because he says “my father did,” dropped out of Yale in 1964 after his freshman year, taught English in Saigon, and drifted down to Mexico, where he wrote an unpublished novel. He enlisted in the military in 1967 and was wounded twice in Vietnam (receiving the Purple Heart and Bronze Star). He would later say, “I began to distrust the government through my Vietnam experience, when I started to see the degree of lying and corruption that was going on.”²³ So he had a predilection, going in, to believe the conspiracy theorists who have blamed the nation’s power structure for Kennedy’s murder. When you couple this with a hubris that knows no bounds, the mixture was bound to be combustible. And it was.

Stone’s $40 million, three-hour-and-eight-minute Warner Bros. production, JFK, was launched by the studio with a $15 million publicity campaign that included television spots in the fifty major markets and full-page ads in the nation’s major dailies. The movie,* released on December 20, 1991, was a box office success, 25 million people viewing it, with a domestic gross alone of $70,405,498. (The worldwide gross was $205.4 million.) Shot on location in Dallas, New Orleans, and Washington, D.C., the film stirred passions and interest in the assassination by the American people more than any other event since November 22, 1963. Those who saw it who already believed in a conspiracy had their myths about the case not only confirmed, but expanded and fortified. Those who knew nothing about the case and had formed no opinion (i.e., the nation’s youth) overwhelmingly bought Stone’s cinematic fantasy—hook, line, and sinker. At the public tennis courts where I play when I can find time, a teen who had seen JFK overheard me telling a third party that there was no evidence of a conspiracy in the Kennedy assassination. “Mr. Bugliosi,” he said, “I’m surprised you don’t think there was a conspiracy. They even made a movie about it.”

The old aphorism that “a picture is worth a thousand words” not only manifests itself in a movie, but is magnified because of the emotional thrust (generated by the context, live motion as opposed to a still frame, and background music that subliminally “tells” the viewer how to feel) that drives a motion picture. Vincent Canby, film critic for the New York Times, writes that “anything shown in a movie tends to be taken as truth.” In fact, the mind and heart of the viewer are so totally captured that entire audiences of law-abiding citizens routinely and tensely hope that the protagonists on the screen are able to successfully pull off major bank robberies and other heists (e.g., the 2001 movies Ocean’s Eleven and The Score).*

So the visual message in most instances is certainly more powerful than the written one. With respect to the latter, as I say in the introduction to this book about the misleading books on the assassination, you only know if someone is lying to you if you know what the truth is. If you don’t, and make a natural assumption that the writer is honorable and telling you the truth, you normally accept it. Obviously, that reality is even more pronounced when the purveyors of the propaganda are popular movie favorites of the audience whom they implicitly believe, like Kevin Costner (Stone’s Jim Garrison in JFK), Jack Lemmon, and Donald Sutherland. I mean, would Kevin Costner lie to his adoring public? Rejecting the message of the clean-cut, wholesome-looking Costner (Garrison) is like rejecting motherhood, apple pie, and the American flag.

Stone, obviously, knew this, and eagerly sought Costner, believed to be a conservative Republican who would be expected to accept the establishment view of no conspiracy, as his first choice to play Garrison from the very beginning. Speaking as euphemistically as he could to veil the banality of his objective in having the audience unconsciously conclude, “I like Kevin Costner, so what he’s portraying must be true,” Stone said, “Kevin was the perfect choice for Jim Garrison because he reminds me of those Gary Cooper, Jimmy Stewart qualities—a moral simplicity and a quiet understatement... He anchors the movie in a very strong way... You empathize with him, and his discoveries become yours.” Costner’s agent was Creative Artists Agency president Michael Ovitz, and it helped, in getting Costner, that Ovitz, Stone said, “was a strong fan” of the projected movie and urged Costner to take the role.

The strong supporting cast of Sissy Spacek, Joe Pesci, Jack Lemmon, Walter Matthau, Ed Asner, Donald Sutherland, and Tommy Lee Jones, among others, served to achieve the same purpose. “Familiar, comfortable faces,” Stone said, that walk the audience “through a winding path in the dark woods. Warner [Bros.] thought it was too costly to have them but those actors all waived their normal fees to help the picture.”²⁴ As political columnist Charles Krauthammer (who nonetheless, because of the trivialization of our political culture, isn’t convinced that Stone’s propaganda will stick) puts it, “In one corner: a $40 million Hollywood film, featuring the nation’s number one heartthrob, endowed with a publicity budget of millions, showing in 900 movie theaters. In the other corner: perhaps a dozen scribblers writing in various magazines and op-ed pages [attacking the movie and its message]. You don’t need Marshall McLuhan to figure out who’s got more clout.”²⁵

Garrison’s prosecution of Clay Shaw had no pernicious influence in stifling the truth about the assassination. To the contrary, as indicated, it hurt the conspiracy movement. But JFK, the movie about Garrison’s prosecution of Shaw, has caused far more damage to the truth about the case than perhaps any single event other than Ruby’s killing of Oswald, which the American people widely view as an act by Ruby to “silence” Oswald. U.S. Senator Arlen Specter, an assistant counsel for the Warren Commission, says that “Stone’s film has done more than any other single effort to distort history and the Commission’s work.”²⁶ This may be true for the simple reason that more people (many of whom had never, and would have never, read a conspiracy book in their life) have seen Stone’s movie than have read all the conspiracy books put together. There were far more national magazine cover stories as well as editorials and articles in the nation’s press following the release of JFK than at any time since the assassination. There were several prime-time television shows that did specials on the movie, and talk radio brimmed with comments about it. Stone’s movie had such an impact and stirred such a national debate that Congress even launched hearings (at which Stone testified) resulting in the enactment of the President John F. Kennedy Assassination Records Collection Act of 1992, which mandated the release to the public of all previously sealed documents on the assassination. “In the few short months since JFK came out,” the Los Angeles Times reported, “Congress, the White House, and the National Archives have been deluged with letters, calls and visitors all demanding that the documents be made public.”

Today in America, no name is associated in the public mind with the position that there was a conspiracy in the assassination as much as that of Oliver Stone. An example, among many, of this fact is the statement of former president Gerald Ford, the last surviving member of the Warren Commission, on his eighty-seventh birthday, that “there has been no new evidence that could undercut” the two conclusions of the Commission that Oswald killed Kennedy and acted alone, “Oliver Stone notwithstanding.”²⁷ The most famous conspiracy theorist before Stone was Mark Lane. But for every person who knows of Mark Lane’s opposition to the Warren Commission, five know of Oliver Stone’s. And surveys have shown (see later text) that the vast majority of Stone’s audience accepted the movie’s message as holy writ. Writing in the Washington Post, Senator Patrick Moynihan feared that the movie “is what citizens under thirty or forty are going to be thinking soon.”²⁸ The London Times observed that “Mr. Stone is certain to ingrain his version on the fertile minds of millions.”²⁹ Newsweek quickly got to the kernel of the problem, writing that “more people believe the... CIA-LBJ-Pentagon plot cooked up by movie producer Oliver Stone than they do the Warren Commission.”³⁰

Indeed, though this may be a slightly extravagant claim, Michael L. Kurtz, professor of history at Southeastern Louisiana University, writes that “with the exception of Uncle Tom’s Cabin, Harriet Beecher Stowe’s explosive novel dramatizing the horrors of the institution of slavery, JFK probably had a greater direct impact on public opinion than any other work of art in American history.”³¹ This is the precise reason why I want to spend a good deal of time on the film. In doing so, the problem I have is this: Am I elevating Oliver Stone’s movie by holding it to be worthy of denigration? Only theoretically. The denigration will be so complete that to say Stone and his movie have been elevated would be a contradiction. The better question, perhaps, is whether by even bothering to denigrate Stone and his movie, am I thereby diminishing, in however small a way, what I hope to be the stature of this book? I believe so. Serious nonfiction books don’t stoop to the discussion of wild fairy tales, which the movie JFK is. But I’m not sure I have a choice. Because of the enormous impact JFK has had on the views of millions of people about the assassination, on balance I’d rather descend a level in this book if the book and the contemplated television documentary based thereon can substantially, if not totally, reverse the damage JFK has done.

Though Stone’s audience accepted JFK, the establishment media for the most part excoriated it. The movie created such a furor that full-blown, critical reviews came out before the movie was even in the theaters. That decent rascal Harold Weisberg, the dean of all assassination researchers, somehow got a pirated copy of the first draft (conspiracy theorist David Lifton is convinced Weisberg got the copy from his friend Robert Groden, who was on Stone’s payroll) of the script and furnished it to George Lardner, the national security writer for the Washington Post who covered the Shaw trial. When Lardner learned that the movie was going to “closely follow” Garrison’s investigation and book, he wrote in the Post, “What that means is that Oliver Stone is chasing fiction. Garrison’s investigation was a fraud.”³² Looking at the script, Lardner observed that there wasn’t space “to list all the errors and absurdities” in the film. Syndicated columnist George Will said, “Stone is forty-five going on eight. In his three hour lie, Stone falsifies so much he may be an intellectual sociopath.”³³ Nicholas Lemann wrote in GQ, “I know life is supposed to be full of surprises, but... I never thought I’d see someone make an all-out effort to rehabilitate Jim Garrison... There are enough good journalists around today who covered Garrison back in his heyday to guarantee that Stone will be called on this... Garrison was a pernicious figure, an abuser of government power and the public trust.”³⁴ Dan Rather, on CBS Evening News, rhetorically lamented, “What happens when Hollywood mixes facts, half-baked theories, and sheer fiction into a big budget film and then tries to sell it as, quote, ‘truth’ and ‘history’?” The Wall Street Journal: “What Mr.

Stone is basically selling is political grotesquery itself. Thus, former New Orleans D.A. Jim Garrison...becomes a relentless truth seeker. We have to say we admire Mr. Stone's brass." Newsweek magazine called Stone's movie, "twisted history."³⁵

Even some former allies of Garrison's weren't kind to Stone. In the Atlantic, Edward Jay Epstein, a Garrison foot soldier who became very disillusioned with him, wrote that the movie was a "journey from fact to fantasy," with Garrison, to prove his point, "deliberately falsifying reality and depicting events that never happened." The caption of the article describes the movie as "a distortion that...threatens to become the story we accept."³⁶ Even the inimitable Mark Lane, while saluting Stone for putting the issue of a conspiracy before the public, commented that "it was bad that he did so by falsifying the record."³⁷ "It would have been better had he stuck to the facts."³⁸

Though I am never elliptical and always state the obvious (since so often in life things are only obvious once they are stated), the point I am about to make may seem so obvious it doesn't have to be stated. But I'm going to state it anyway. The problem with Stone is not, really, that he egregiously fictionalized the Kennedy assassination. It's that he tried to convince everyone he was telling the truth. I believe that for the most part writers and filmmakers have an obligation to never tamper with the important facts of historical events. But if they do, they unquestionably (it's not arguable) have the obligation to let their audience know this. Stone didn't, and this is the only reason why I believe he deserves all the scalding invective he has received in his attempt to rewrite history. Don DeLillo decided to fictionalize the Kennedy assassination like Stone. But unlike Stone, he had the common decency to acknowledge that his apparently fine book (I don't read fiction), Libra, was fiction, and it appeared on best-seller fiction lists. That's why there are two booklists, fiction and nonfiction. Although a certain amount of dramatic license in a film or book about a historical event can be excused for narrative purposes, there is never any justification for distorting the essence of what happened. Stone, minute after minute in JFK, dressed up his fiction (frequently in grainy black-and-white simulated scenes shot on 8-or 16-millimeter film to project a sense of authenticity)* as historical fact, virtually the only significant accuracies in his film being actual excerpts of the Zapruder film (for which Stone reportedly paid the Zapruder family $40,000 to license) and other archival footage that he cannily and seamlessly interspersed—without the audience being able to tell which was real and which was not—with the reenactment footage.³⁹

When Stone was met with an unexpected avalanche of media criticism for the distortions and inventions in his movie around the time of its release, some of which he was forced to acknowledge, he retreated by saying that the Warren Commission was a myth and JFK was a "counter-myth,"⁴⁰ but, obviously, he said this just to get him past the moment.

To be fair, in his interviews Stone has never expressly said that what is depicted in JFK is unquestionably the truth (although he has said exactly that in every other way), and when he said in a December 23, 1991, Time interview that he wanted his audience to "consider the possibility that there was a coup d'etat that removed President Kennedy,"⁴¹ one could, if not vigilant, be seduced into thinking that Stone, in his movie, was just tossing out an alternative scenario of the assassination for his audience's consideration. But to do so would be to completely ignore the movie itself as well as the overall thrust of Stone's remarks and interviews. When he says, "There is a saying: 'A lie is like a snowball—the longer it is rolled, the larger it is.' The Warren Commission...is that lie," and therefore not entitled to be believed, and that his movie, on the other hand, is "a seamless jig-saw puzzle that will allow the audience for the first time, to understand what happened and why," and that he “had to take the assassination out of Dallas and the conspiracy out of New Orleans and bring it all back to Washington, where it really began,” and that “the assassination was America’s first coup d’etat, and it worked,”⁴² by definition he is not saying that he is merely offering an alternative view. He is saying his view is the correct view, the only view. You can’t tell one major lie about the assassination after another for three consecutive hours, and with full knowledge that, as Vincent Canby says, “anything shown in a movie tends to be taken as the truth,” and escape responsibility for your monstrous hoax by suggesting you are only presenting an alternative view for the audience’s consideration.

Did, indeed, Stone want his audience to believe his fiction was reality? About that there can be no dispute. † In addition to the aforementioned remarks he made, Stone told Newsweek, “I think people are more on my side than the government’s. If they don’t believe me this go-round, they’ll believe me when another shocking thing happens.”⁴³ Stone lamented to USA Today that “instead of [the media] spending so much energy saying ‘Stone’s interpretation of history is fiction,’ which it is not, why don’t they devote the same energy to asking why Kennedy was killed?”⁴⁴ He told the Dallas Morning News before the shooting of the film commenced in Dallas that he was a “cinematic historian,” his movie would be “a history lesson,” and he was confident he would be remembered as “a good historian as well as a good dramatist.”⁴⁵ In fact, in newspaper advertisements for the film throughout the country were these words in bold letters: “The Truth Is the Most Important Value We Have.” As Edward Epstein wrote in the Atlantic, “From the moment [JFK] was released, its Director, Oliver Stone, so passionately defended its factual accuracy that he became, for all practical purposes, the new Garrison.”⁴⁶ Unbelievably, Stone told Time magazine, “I think this movie, hopefully, if it’s accepted by the public, will at least move people away from the Warren Commission.”⁴⁷ He wanted his movie, he wrote with towering arrogance in the January 1992 edition of Premiere, to “replace the Warren Commission Report.”⁴⁸ Can you imagine that? A Hollywood producer wants his movie to replace the official and most comprehensive investigation of a crime in history. It’s a measure of Stone’s sense of self that such a thought, even if a vagrant one, would even enter his head. Arrogance thought it already had a bad name. That was before it met Oliver Stone. Taking his movie very, very seriously, Stone frequently praised his twelve researchers for all the arduous work they had done. He told Richard Bernstein of the New York Times that “every point, every argument, every detail in the movie...has been researched, can be documented, and is justified.”⁴⁹ (Stone hardly ever uses the word speculate in the film, and when he does, it is invariably lost and forgotten by the context, the torrent of “factual” words that follow, and most of all by the acting out of the thought on screen by the evil conspirators.)

Stone has compared his movie to the film Rashômon, the 1950 Japanese classic in which the same event is seen from several points of view as opposed to an unequivocal defense of any particular theory. Nonsense. JFK has one theme and one theme only that runs throughout: that Kennedy’s murder was the result of a massive conspiracy emanating from the highest corridors of power in America, that all we stand for as a nation is being attacked and taken over by these sinister forces, and that his fearless prosecutor, and inferentially, Stone, who has the moral courage to tell his story, are the only ones manning the ramparts—the last angry and courageous men. Shedding all pretenses and Rashômon allusions, in his commentary to the book Oliver Stone’s USA, Stone writes that his movie is “about a conspiracy to kill President Kennedy.”⁵⁰

Because Stone continuously misrepresented the facts throughout his film, is he therefore an unmitigated fraud? Yes and no. As crazy as all the nuts, rumors, and speculation are that Stone managed to shoehorn into his movie, I sense that he, like a great number of other people, honestly believes much of this nonsense.* But as we shall see, where we know that Stone is a fraud is in those critical situations in his movie where he flat-out invented scenes and characters to help him prove the point he was trying to make.

Even in the areas of the film that I sense Stone believes to be true, I cannot exonerate him of willful duplicity without thereby convicting him of reckless stupidity—reckless in that instead of balancing out his advisers with reputable anti-conspiracy scholars, or even respectable conspiracy theorists, he had to know he was relying almost exclusively on the extreme fanatical fringe of the conspiracy community. As indicated, Stone primarily based his movie on Jim Garrison's On the Trail of the Assassins. But, as noted, this is a book whose author has been completely discredited and is even an embarrassment to the conspiracy community. The second book, per the screen credits, that Stone based his movie on is Jim Marrs's Crossfire. But Marrs is a conspiracy theorist who has rarely met a conspiracy theory he didn't like. In his only other book, Alien Agenda, Marrs tells us that we have “non-human visitors” among us, and that our government, with full knowledge of these aliens in our midst, has conspired, with a “wall of silence,” to “hide away the alien presence” and keep the truth from the American people.⁵¹ Sound familiar? Garrison and Marrs also served as advisers to Stone on his movie.

These were Stone's other principal advisers: Robert Groden, the photographic expert for the conspiracy community, served as the reenactment coordinator. As pointed out earlier in this book, few, if any, have less credibility than he. Among other things, he is the fellow who insists that the backyard photos Marina took of Oswald holding a Carcano rifle are fake, and that Oswald's head was superimposed by the authorities on someone else's body. Larry Howard was the late, gadfly cofounder of the JFK Assassination Research Center in Dallas that became a repository for assassination memorabilia and every kooky conspiracy book that had ever been written. Howard always use to boast that he had never read any book on the assassination himself, but faxed Stone that he and his people had “uncovered the real truth behind the assassination. JFK was murdered by the people who control the power base in the United States. In their minds he was a threat to national security and had to be eliminated.” That's all that Stone had to hear, bringing Howard aboard with a payment of $80,000 to the latter's research center.⁵² L. Fletcher Prouty, a former air force colonel who worked in the Pentagon's Office of Special Operations (which provided support for covert operations), convinced Stone, without a shred of evidence to support him, that the military-industrial complex had Kennedy killed because Kennedy wanted to withdraw American troops from Vietnam and it wanted war. Unbelievably, Prouty even flirted with the possibility that McGeorge Bundy, Kennedy's national security adviser and former Harvard dean and Ford Foundation president, was part of the conspiracy to kill Kennedy.⁵³

Prouty (since deceased) was a right-wing zany who was a member of the Liberty Lobby, the middle-of-the-road, sensible group that supported neo-Nazi David Duke's 1988 candidacy for president and embraces the notion that the Holocaust is really a Jewish hoax. He also served as a consultant to Lyndon LaRouche's right-wing National Democratic Policy Committee “at a conference of which he provided a presentation comparing the U.S. Government's prosecution of LaRouche (for conspiracy and mail fraud) to the prosecution of Socrates.”⁵⁴ Prouty is clearly someone with both feet planted firmly in the air. But Prouty, who served as an editorial adviser on publications of the Church of Scientology, makes up for his perverse right-wing beliefs by apparently, per author Edward Epstein, having no personal credibility. Epstein interviewed Prouty for his book Legend, and said that the Reader's Digest staff fact-checked Prouty and wouldn't publish the part of Legend involving Prouty's assertions because they found he had "falsified" so much of his military career. "He will say almost anything that someone wants to hear...He's extremely accommodating," Epstein said.⁵⁵

With Garrison and the rest of the aforementioned motley crew,* Stone obviously was in good hands, and JFK's audience had every reason to take everything in the movie as the equivalent of inspired scripture.

Because, to my knowledge, the well-earned vilification of Stone by the establishment media has never been supported by an in-depth analysis of his film,† such analysis for the most part being limited to newspaper columns and short magazine articles with only a few examples here and there of the lies in the film, and because of the film's enormous adverse effect on millions of unknowledgeable Americans who innocently drank Stone's moonshine and, inebriated, passed it on to countless others in their circle, as indicated, I decided to give the film a fairly thorough treatment in this book. My first step was to rent the video of the long movie and spend nine hours and twenty-four painful minutes watching it (three times) to enable me to set forth a goodly number of Stone's lies and fabrications. Inasmuch as the movie is virtually a continuous lie, to set forth all the lies would take a book in itself.‡ But what follows, in numbered form, is an adequate list (a few other major lies in Stone's film appear in other sections of this book):

1.* In the movie, Garrison is depicted as a scrupulously honest DA of unimpeachable probity and morality who is only interested in the truth and unwilling to cut any corners to get it. We know, of course, that this was not the real Garrison, who, as it was said about a later, well-known prosecutor, Ken Starr, "violated every prosecutorial rule in the book" in relentless pursuit of his quarry. Even Stone has allowed, in interviews, how there was a dark side to the garrulous Garrison, but he never even hinted at it in the movie, instead rationalizing that the movie was about the assassination, not Garrison, and he didn't want to divert the audience's attention by getting into a "biography" of Garrison.‡ However, Garrison and the assassination are inseparable in the movie since Stone is presenting Garrison's view of it. If Garrison is shown to be corrupt in his conduct during his investigation, this would inevitably compromise, in any audience's mind, the arguments he makes and the conclusions he reaches. I mean, for most people it's rather difficult to separate the credibility of a charge someone is making from the credibility of the person making it. Stone lied about Garrison in his movie because he had a message to give his viewers and he wouldn't give them any truth, anywhere in the movie, that might militate against that message. So right from the start, Stone deliberately misled his audience about who the hero of his movie really was.

Garrison's conduct was so egregiously bad that several important members of his staff resigned in disgust when they saw that Garrison was pursuing an innocent man by having his staff bribe, intimidate, and even hypnotize witnesses. One of them, William Gurchich, ran and owned with his two brothers the Gurchich Brothers Detective Agency in New Orleans, a very prominent and reputable firm. Garrison had asked him to lead the investigation of Clay Shaw, which Gurchich did, for "$1 a year" his real compensation was heading up a potentially historic investigation. Though one of Garrison's strongest supporters at the start of the investigation, Gurchich became disillusioned when he saw there was no real evidence against Shaw. So troubled was he that on June 8, 1967, he flew to Washington, D.C., to meet privately with Robert Kennedy and told Kennedy that the Garrison inquiry in New Orleans had “no basis in fact” and that “we can’t shed any light on the death of your brother so you should not hope for such.” Gurvich said that after hearing this, RFK “appeared to be rather disgusted to think that someone was exploiting his brother’s death.”⁵⁶ The private meeting with RFK leaked when a Kennedy spokesman said Kennedy was “extremely grateful” that Gurvich had come to see him. When a Newsday reporter asked Gurvich to comment, Gurvich allowed that “I think Mr. Garrison believes in what he is doing. He is sincere.”⁵⁷ Gurvich’s disenchantment with Garrison’s probe went downhill even further from there as he became more and more aware of the unscrupulous methods Garrison and his staff were employing to develop a nonexistent case.

At a press conference in New Orleans on June 26, 1967, Gurvich announced his resignation from Garrison’s staff and said there was “no truth” to Mr. Garrison’s contention that he had found a conspiracy in the assassination of Kennedy, and that there was “no case” against Mr. Shaw. He also urged the Orleans Parish grand jury to start an immediate investigation into the way Garrison was conducting his inquiry, and sent a telegram to the grand jury stating he was prepared “to give evidence of travesties of justice on the part of the District Attorney in the case of Louisiana vs. Clay Shaw.”⁵⁸ The following evening on CBS, he said, “I was very dissatisfied with the way the investigation was being conducted...and decided that if the job of an investigator is to find the truth, then I was to find it. I found it. And this led to my resignation.”

“Well, what then is the truth?” CBS news reporter Edward Rabel asked.

“The truth, as I see it, is that Mr. Shaw should never have been arrested.”⁵⁹

Garrison, stung by Gurvich’s public attacks, struck back by saying Gurvich, the long-time New Orleans resident, was linked with the “Eastern Establishment,” which was trying to destroy his case. Further, he claimed that Gurvich had asked to help in the investigation, and foolishly asserted that Gurvich owned a “night-watchman service” and only played a very minor role in the investigation, mostly as a photographic expert and chauffeur. But much evidence rebuts Garrison’s assertion. For instance, the New Orleans States-Item, whose February 17, 1967, article first brought worldwide attention to what Garrison was doing in New Orleans, could be expected to know just who was who on Garrison’s staff, and it referred to Gurvich as Garrison’s “chief investigator.”⁶⁰ Indeed, it was Gurvich who had announced to the world at a packed press conference on March 1, 1967, that Clay Shaw had been arrested for Kennedy’s murder.⁶¹

Gurvich went in front of the Orleans Parish grand jury on June 28, urging it not to indict Shaw (which it ultimately did), and spoke of Garrison’s unconscionable investigation, which included putting pressure on a well-known New Orleans burglar to break into Shaw’s home and place something there.⁶² The burglar, John Cancler (“John the Baptist”), told a national NBC audience on June 19 that while incarcerated in the Parish prison, a DA investigator asked him to “do a job for us.” The investigator drove him to a home in the 1300 block of Dauphine Street. “What am I supposed to take out of the house?” he asked. “Nothing,” he was told. He was supposed to put something in the house. “What was it all about?” he asked. When he was told it had something to do with the assassination of President Kennedy, he became frightened and declined.⁶³

In addition to the above (as well as hypnotizing and intimidating Perry Russo, his main witness against Shaw, into testifying that he was present when Shaw, Ferrie, and Oswald conspired to murder Kennedy—see later text and endnote), the following is one more of the many examples of the highly improper practices that Garrison and his staff engaged in to get Shaw. Al Beauboeuf was a homosexual lover of David Ferrie's. Garrison wanted him to testify to anything he knew about Ferrie's alleged involvement with Shaw and Oswald in a conspiracy to kill Kennedy. At a meeting on March 1, 1967, between Hugh Exnicios (Beauboeuf's lawyer) and Lynn Loisel, a New Orleans police officer on loan to Garrison, that took place in Exnicios's office, Exnicios secretly tape-recorded what Garrison was willing to give for Beauboeuf's testimony. Loisel is careful enough to say, "The only thing we want is the truth." But then, remarkably, he also says, "We can change the story around, you know...to positively beyond a shadow of a doubt eliminate him [Beauboeuf] from any type of conspiracy." In return for his testimony, Loisel says, "I'm, you know, fairly certain we could put $3,000 on him (sound of snapping of fingers) just like that, you know. I'm sure we'd help him financially and I'm sure we'd...get him a job."

Exnicios: "Is this something you have thought up yourself or that Garrison—he knows about the situation?"

Loisel: "That's right."

Exnicios: "And he's [Garrison] agreed that if we could in some way assist you, that you would be able to give...these things?"

Loisel: "That's correct."⁶⁴

Exnicios was convinced the tape was clear evidence that Loisel, acting on Garrison's authority, had offered Beauboeuf a bribe to testify falsely. He proceeded to try to get the DA of nearby Jefferson Parish, where his office was located, to file criminal charges against Loisel and Garrison, but the DA (Frank Langridge) declined and told Garrison about the tape. Conspiracy theorists love to point out that on April 12, 1967, Beauboeuf signed an affidavit at Garrison's office in which he said that Loisel had not offered him a bribe to testify falsely, that all Loisel wanted was the truth. But, of course, the tape ("We can change the story around, you know") speaks for itself. And the conspiracy theorists, predictably, don't mention that Beauboeuf told many people thereafter that he was threatened by Loisel into signing the affidavit, claiming that Loisel and fellow DA investigator Lou Ivon came to his home the previous evening, April 11, and Loisel said they would circulate obscene photos of him seized from Ferrie's apartment if he didn't cooperate and sign the statement they wanted from him. Worse, he claims one of them held him while the other put a gun in his face. While the record isn't clear which one did what, Beauboeuf is very clear that it was Loisel who said to him, "I don't want to get into any s..., and before I do I'll put a hot load of lead up your ass."⁶⁵

The staff at NBC in New York, which was doing an exposé on Garrison, asked Beauboeuf if he'd be willing to take a polygraph test on the truthfulness of his charges. He agreed and took the test on May 9, 1967, from a polygrapher at the offices of Mutual Protective Association in New Orleans. In response to questions, he said he did not know Clay Shaw or Lee Harvey Oswald, and Ferrie never told him anything about being involved in the Kennedy assassination. Also, Loisel did attempt to bribe him (which we already know) and Loisel threatened to circulate compromising pictures of him and also threatened "to put a load of hot lead" up his ass if he accused Loisel of attempting to bribe him. The polygrapher reported to NBC that Beauboeuf had answered all questions truthfully.⁶⁶

Remarkably, the New Orleans Police Department, after an investigation of the matter, concluded that Loisel and Ivon (both of whom denied threatening Beauboeuf) had "not violated any rules of the code of conduct of the New Orleans Police Department."⁶⁷

Equally remarkably, perhaps unprecedented in the annals of the prosecutorial profession in America, within just four months after Garrison filed charges against Shaw for Kennedy's murder, Aaron Kohn, director of the New Orleans Metropolitan Commission, said that citizens and witnesses had made an incredible "22 criminal allegations...against Mr. Garrison and his staff in the course of [Garrison's] investigation of the Kennedy assassination." The charges included "attempts to intimidate and bribe witnesses, inciting such felonies as perjury [and] conspiracy to commit battery... and public bribery." He asked the state attorney general, Jack Gremillion, to look into the allegations.⁶⁸

On May 27, 1968, Shaw brought a civil action against Garrison, petitioning the United States District Court in New Orleans to enjoin Garrison from proceeding with his prosecution. The forty-seven-page complaint alleged that Garrison had conducted a "reign of terror by the misuse and abuse of the powers" of his office, resulting in a denial to Shaw of his constitutional right to a fair trial, that Shaw was "not only innocent, but has no knowledge whatsoever of the alleged crime," and Garrison's prosecution of him was merely to obtain a judicial forum "to discredit the Warren Report and its findings, and not to objectively determine the involvement of plaintiff."⁶⁹ On May 28, U.S. District Judge Frederick Heebe issued a temporary restraining order against Garrison, pending a hearing on the matter, prohibiting him from commencing the trial against Shaw, then scheduled for June 11, and said, "There is a very real likelihood that the plaintiff [Shaw] may prevail on the merits."⁷⁰ In Shaw's amended complaint of June 13, he said that Garrison and his deputies knew they had "no valid or legal evidence to support the charges" against him, and pointed out that the grand jury indictment against him "was based solely and only on...the hypnotically induced testimony [of Perry Russo]." On August 13, a three-judge panel of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana denied Shaw's request for an injunction, holding that if his constitutional rights were violated, he could obtain relief by appealing any conviction against him. The court did, however, order Garrison to postpone the trial of Shaw, now scheduled for September 10, until the U.S. Supreme Court could rule on Shaw's appeal of the lower court's ruling.⁷¹

Since Garrison had always alleged that the Warren Commission had suppressed the truth from the American people and that the federal government was now doing everything to sabotage the trial (e.g., not releasing records he needed from the National Archives, allegedly putting pressure on state governments not to extradite important witnesses—see endnote for discussion on the lack of merit of this charge), the stage was set for Chief Justice Earl Warren's Supreme Court to reverse the lower court's ruling and enjoin Garrison from proceeding against Shaw. At least I would expect Warren to try to convince his brethren on the Court to do this since Warren's reputation could be destroyed if Garrison proved that others, not Oswald, were responsible for Kennedy's death and Warren had orchestrated the cover-up. But on December 9, the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the ruling of the U.S. District Court, thereby allowing Garrison to bring Shaw to trial. The Court's judgment included the statement that "the Chief Justice [Warren] took no part in the consideration or decision of this case," having recused himself.⁷²

At the heart of Garrison's prosecution of Shaw were three operating principles. One, anything that supported his conspiracy theory du jour—no matter how far-fetched and lacking in credibility the story was, no matter how the information was gained—is to be believed. Two, everything is fair in love, war, and a criminal prosecution. And three, "propinquity" (i.e., geographic proximity) suggests an incriminating connection. In False Witness, author Patricia Lambert writes that "Garrison applied this odd notion to almost any situation. He assumed a person was connected to an intelligence agency because he maintained a residence or an office near it. He imagined individuals were cohorts who rented post office boxes in the same building. . . Garrison didn't believe coincidences happened."⁷³ In two memorandums, dated February 10 and April 7, 1967, written for "The Smith File," the code name for his investigation of the assassination before it became known to the public, and titled "Time and Propinquity: Factors in Phase I," Garrison methodically sets forth how the lives and relationships of various people (he believed had some connection to the plot to kill Kennedy or to the plotters) intersected in New Orleans, no matter how tangentially. For instance, he writes in one of the memos that "on August 30, 1961, Layton Martens was arrested for investigation when police found him sitting in [David] Ferrie's car waiting for Ferrie. . . By May, 1963, Lee Harvey Oswald is living in the 4900 block of Magazine [Street]. One block away toward downtown is the 800 block of Lyons Street. On that block lived two uncles of Layton Martens." In other words, this would connect Oswald to Martens, and by necessary extension to Ferrie, Oswald's alleged co-conspirator in the assassination.

Former Garrison aide Tom Bethell, writing that Garrison's time and propinquity theory was completely unhinged, quotes Garrison, who was thumbing through the New Orleans city directory, as saying, "Sooner or later, because people are lazy, you catch them out on propinquity."⁷⁴

So we see that far from the very sensible and level-headed prosecutor Stone depicted for his audience, the real Garrison was anything but.

Garrison's intemperate and irresponsible pronouncements and charges were also mind-boggling. News of his secret investigation first surfaced on February 17, 1967, in the New Orleans States-Item when reporter Rosemary James disclosed that Garrison had spent $8,000 in three months sending members of his staff to Texas, Washington, D.C., and elsewhere, running down leads on the assassination.⁷⁵ On February 24, one week later, Garrison, in a press conference after lunch at the Petroleum Club in New Orleans, and after the expenditure of only the aforementioned $8,000 in investigative travel expenses, announced that "my staff and I solved the case weeks ago. I wouldn't say this if I didn't have evidence beyond a shadow of a doubt. We know the key individuals, the cities involved, and how it was done. . . There were several plots. . . The only way they are going to get away from us is to kill themselves. . . It's a case we will not lose, and anybody that wants to bet against us is invited to, but they will be disappointed." Garrison said, "There is no doubt that the entire thing [alleged plot to kill Kennedy] was planned in New Orleans." For good measure, Garrison told the press, "I have no reason to believe that Lee Harvey Oswald killed anybody in Dallas on November 22, 1963."^{76*} Garrison said that "the key to the whole case is through the looking glass. Black is white. White is black. I don't want to be cryptic, but that's the way it is."⁷⁷ Of course, Garrison was just bluffing. In fact, Perry Russo, Garrison's star witness and the one around whom he virtually built his entire case, hadn't even been interviewed by Garrison's staff yet. That took place the following day, February 25, when they spoke to him for the very first time. Not one scrap of evidence has ever emerged that on February 24, the day Garrison announced that he and his staff had "solved the case," he had any evidence connecting anyone, in any way, with the assassination. If there were nothing else at all, this alone, by definition, would be enough to prove beyond all doubt that Garrison had no personal credibility with respect to this case.

No assassination theory, many originating with the Dealey Plaza Irregulars and bought by Garrison, was too wild or far-out for Garrison's taste, and all this played particularly well locally. Garrison's legal sideshow was tailor-made for the Mardi Gras City, where phantasmal mystery, voodoo, and dark intrigue are treasured commodities. It is said that no other people love fantasy more than the people of New Orleans, and their elected DA intended to give them as much as their girths could hold. Before he finally settled in on elements of the CIA working for “war-oriented elements of the American power structure” as being behind the plot to kill Kennedy,⁷⁸ the fertile-minded Orleans Parish DA saw many other different villains behind the plot and had screwy visions of how it was pulled off.

In her book about Garrison and the Shaw trial, False Witness, the best book on the case, Patricia Lambert chronicles, with citations, Garrison’s progression of fantastic and bizarre theories, all of which he shared with the media. Some additional theories of Garrison’s with citations are also herein included.*

In late February of 1967, Garrison confided to some reporters that the conspirators behind Kennedy’s murder first planned to murder Castro, with Lee Harvey Oswald as the assassin, but when Oswald was denied entry to Cuba, they switched from Castro as the victim to Kennedy.† (To the media at large, he was more circumspect, saying only on February 24 that there was more than one plot, and “a change of course did occur. Now that is more than I wanted to say.”) When Life magazine’s Richard Billings interviewed Garrison two days after police found pieces of leather and rope, whips, chains, and so on, in Shaw’s home (on March 1, 1967), Garrison told Billings the seized articles held the key to the assassination. In Billings’s contemporaneous notes of the interview he wrote that Garrison had told him, “I’m now convinced it [the assassination] was a sadist plot,” that he had read the Marquis de Sade and knew that sadists escalate from whipping to killing. “Shaw is a phi beta kappa sadist,” Garrison told Billings. “I’ll develop expert testimony that a sadist would have motivation for a presidential assassination.”

But a few days later, Garrison, wanting to be democratic, brought more groups into the assassination. Kennedy’s murder, he said, “was a homosexual thrill killing” committed by four homosexuals—Ferrie, Ruby, Oswald, and Shaw. (Ferrie and Shaw were, indeed, homosexuals, and Ruby’s sexual orientation was never clear. When it was pointed out to Garrison that Oswald was married with two children, Garrison responded that Oswald was “a switch-hitter.”) In addition to these four homosexuals seeking thrills, Garrison said that “masochists” were also involved in the assassination, but he did not identify who they were. “If you placed a masochist in a room along with a button that would blow up the White House,” Garrison said, “he probably would press that button for the thrill of it.”

In May of 1967, Garrison said in an interview that the people involved in the conspiracy to kill Kennedy “were all anti-Castro oriented and had been engaged in anti-Castro training.” Also in May, Ray Marcus, one of his Dealey Plaza Irregulars, showed Garrison enlarged photographs of the trees and shadows of the grassy knoll in which Marcus claimed he saw four killers concealed in the bushes, so Garrison, not wanting to rain on anyone’s parade, added four more assassins to his firing squad,⁷⁹ but with one proviso, that he add a fifth one whom Marcus had apparently missed. Garrison told CBS the photos showed “three [assassins] behind the stone wall” on the grassy knoll “and two behind [the fence on] the grassy knoll...before they dropped completely out of sight,” but “you can make an identification from their faces.”⁸⁰ On June 22, he told a Nashville paper that a fourteen-man team of anti-Castro Cubans who had trained, he said, in New Orleans had killed Kennedy.⁸¹ In September, he said that “insanely patriotic oil millionaires” were the ones who were behind the assassination, and “the corroborating evidence is in our files.” Also, “elements of the Dallas police force are clearly involved.” In October 1967 he told Playboy magazine that his office had developed evidence that, as previously indicated, the president was assassinated by a “precision guerrilla team of at least seven men” who had fired “from three directions.” He also said that “former employees” of the CIA “had conspired to assassinate the president.”⁸²

In early December he explained, on television, how the murder took place. There was a sewer opening in front of the president’s car, and the assassin who killed Kennedy shot him with a .45 caliber bullet from there, and then fled through the sewers, evoking images of the persecuted suspect in Les Misérables fleeing through the sewers of Paris to escape the monstrous Ken Starr–like prosecutor.* By the day after Christmas, Garrison said at a press conference that there was “an infinitely larger number [of people involved in the conspiracy] than you would dream.” In Dealey Plaza alone there could have been, he said, as many as fifteen people involved in the assassination.⁸³

Garrison eventually added a sixteenth assassin and concluded that the sixteen were firing from several locations in Dealey Plaza.⁸⁴ With sixteen assassins, surely Oswald had to at least be one of them, right? No, Garrison assured people. “Oswald didn’t shoot at the President,” he declared confidently.⁸⁵

But if Garrison couldn’t find room for Oswald, along the way he did find room in his conspiracy constellation for the “Minutemen,”⁸⁶ “the paramilitary right,”⁸⁷ and elements of “the invisible Nazi substructure.”⁸⁸

With his New Year’s resolution being to find additional assassins, in January of 1968 he revealed three new ones—the three tramps found in a box car near Dealey Plaza shortly after the assassination—on Johnny Carson’s Tonight Show.⁸⁹ But, he said in February, the assassination “operation” was “100% Central Intelligence Agency.”⁹⁰

As Rosemary James, the New Orleans reporter who covered the entire Shaw investigation and trial for the now defunct States-Item newspaper, said, “Every time press interest in the case would start to wane, Garrison would propound a new theory...He went from a highly intelligent eccentric to a lunatic in one year.”⁹¹ But while Garrison, on only one horse, tried to ride off in a great number of different directions, on one point he remained steadfast: “The evidence indicates that Lee Harvey Oswald did not fire a shot.”⁹²

William Gurchich, Garrison’s chief investigator who resigned in disgust when he saw Garrison had no case against Shaw, said that at one point in the investigation, Garrison’s proposed arrest list for the assassination, in addition to Shaw, included “one of the city’s [New Orleans] leading coffee importers, one of the area’s leading doctors of international reputation, an FBI agent assigned to the local office, two leaders of the local Cuban refugee organization, and the owner of one of the largest local hotels.”⁹³

Newsweek magazine reported that “some of [Garrison’s] staff became alarmed about his behavior. He would call meetings, then disappear into the men’s room for awhile, emerge with a new theory and send aides to try to prove it.” Garrison found no problems with this reverse methodology. Charles Ward, who later became a judge on the Louisiana State Court of Appeals, was Garrison’s chief assistant in the DA’s office at the time and helped out in the Shaw case. He told the New Orleans Times-Picayune in 1983 that “most of the time you marshal the facts, then deduce your theories. But Garrison deduced a theory, then marshaled his facts. And if the facts didn’t fit, he’d say they had been altered by the CIA.”⁹⁴

As we saw in an earlier section, at one point Garrison’s aides had to literally talk him out of indicting a dead man (Garrison thought he was alive) and the three tramps on the fifth anniversary of the assassination. But on December 10, 1967, no one succeeded in stopping Garrison from filing a criminal complaint against one Edgar Eugene Bradley, alleging Bradley did “willfully and unlawfully conspire *with others to murder John F. Kennedy.” Garrison’s evidence against Bradley? A young man from Van Nuys, California, lived in the home of a woman who was involved in a lawsuit with Bradley, and when she told him that Bradley looked like one of the three tramps arrested in the railroad yards, he wrote a letter to Garrison to this effect, adding for good measure that Bradley had offered him ten thousand dollars to kill Kennedy when the latter was a U.S. senator, but he had turned Bradley down. Several years later it was determined that the man, a member of the Minutemen, was fourteen years old at the time Bradley allegedly made him the offer. When Dallas deputy sheriff Roger Craig (whose credibility, or severe lack thereof, was discussed earlier in this book) told Garrison that he saw Bradley in Dealey Plaza on November 22, 1963, posing as a Secret Service agent, and Garrison’s star witness, Perry Russo, said Ferrie knew Bradley, that’s all Garrison needed to charge Bradley with Kennedy’s murder.

Bradley (a North Hollywood, California, business representative for right-wing radio evangelist Carl McIntire), who was in Texas on the day of the assassination (but El Paso, not Dallas), said, “I shot who?” when the press notified him of the murder charges against him. He proceeded to say that Garrison “must be nuts. This man is either being highly paid to do this or he’s off his rocker.”⁹⁵ On November 8, 1968, there being no evidence presented by Garrison’s office connecting Bradley to the assassination, California governor Ronald Reagan denied Garrison’s extradition request. Edwin Meese, Reagan’s press secretary, said that Garrison’s office had been given the chance to present witnesses to substantiate the allegation but had not done so.⁹⁶

Garrison even told conspiracy author Paris Flammonde that with respect to the assassinations of President Kennedy, Senator Robert Kennedy, and Martin Luther King, “there is enough data available in all three cases to state, as a probability, that they were all accomplished by the same force and that they were all...[U.S.] intelligence assassinations.”⁹⁷

This is the irrational person who Oliver Stone deliberately misled millions of Americans into believing was the solid, sober-minded, level-headed, and heroic All-American figure portrayed by Kevin Costner. Stone’s Garrison was the personification of an honest and completely responsible public servant.

I personally know of no American prosecutor who has ever abused his office’s power of subpoena and power to file unwarranted criminal charges against perceived adversaries to the degree that Garrison did in the Shaw case, causing fear and intimidation—undoubtedly precisely what Garrison was seeking to accomplish—in the minds of all those who might oppose what he wanted. As Shaw asserted in his May 1968 civil lawsuit against Garrison and two of his top assistants, “All who oppose the defendants or disagree with the theories expounded by them incur their wrath and displeasure, and the defendants misuse and abuse the powers of their office by filing criminal charges of one sort or another against them.”^{98*} Garrison’s unprofessional antics were so notorious in New Orleans at the time that when David Chandler, a Life magazine reporter from New Orleans who wrote a series of articles in April and September of 1967 about organized crime in Louisiana containing unflattering references to Garrison (which Garrison called lies), was subpoenaed by Garrison before the Shaw grand jury to testify on what he had written, the federal district court in New Orleans, on March 11, 1968, enjoined Garrison from enforcing his subpoena. The court said that “Garrison has stated his lack of regard for the truthfulness of the very testimony being sought... Chandler’s fear of prospective prosecution for perjury...is well founded.” Chandler was thereby saved from an almost certain charge of perjury by Garrison.

Little of this, unfortunately, was reaching the masses. Most people were all too willing to believe that a beloved president had been murdered and the authorities were concealing the truth from them. But was Garrison really an intrepid DA who was willing to take on the government to uncover the truth for them? On June 19, 1967, a major national network, NBC, had told Americans, in so many words in its television special on the case, The JFK Conspiracy: The Case of Jim Garrison, that Garrison wasn’t legitimate and that his charges were fraudulent. Garrison knew he had to fight back nationally. Playboy gave Garrison the longest interview in the history of the magazine in its October 1967 issue, thirty-seven pages, and among other radio and TV appearances, Mort Sahl got him on the Johnny Carson show on January 31, 1968. “Johnny” may have been a comedian, but he had a good, solid head on his shoulders, and he could spot a phony, or at least an empty vessel, when he saw one. When Garrison kept hammering away that the truth in the Kennedy assassination was being suppressed from the American people, Carson asked Garrison, “Who’s suppressing all of this information? On whose order?”

“I’ll tell you who’s suppressing it, the federal government is suppressing it.”

“Who in the federal government?” Carson pressed.

“The administration of your government is suppressing it because they know that the Central Intelligence Agency...”

“On whose order?” Carson interrupted, not letting Garrison evade his question.

“On the order of the president of the United States.”

“For what possible reason?”

“Why don’t you ask him, John?” (laughter and applause)

“I know what he’d say. (applause) I think he would say... ‘Mr. Garrison has come up with no credible evidence to support any of his theories.’”

Garrison went on to tell Carson, “I am trying to tell you that there is no question, as a result of our investigation, that an element of the Central Intelligence Agency of our country killed Kennedy, and that the present administration is concealing the facts. There is no question about it at all.”

“That is your opinion.”

“No, it is not. I know it,” Garrison assured Carson.⁹⁹

The lunacy of Garrison and his investigation of Shaw naturally carried over to Shaw’s trial, which commenced with opening statements by Garrison for the prosecution and by Shaw’s chief defense lawyer, Irvin Dymond, for the defense, on February 6, 1969, after fourteen court days of jury selection, which had started on January 21. Most of Garrison’s witnesses were prosecutorial nightmares. For instance, one witness, Vernon Bundy, was a twenty-nine-year-old black heroin addict who in 1967 was in Orleans Parish prison on a parole violation for a theft conviction the previous year. On March 16, 1967, two days after Clay Shaw’s preliminary hearing had commenced, Bundy contacted Garrison’s office with an almost laughably improbable and transparently fabricated story.

Indeed, in the one-hour June 19, 1967, NBC news exposé on Garrison's apparently trumped-up charges against Shaw, and which seven investigative reporters for NBC had spent several weeks working on,¹⁰⁰ two fellow inmates of Bundy's, Miguel Torres and John Cancler, said that Bundy had told them his story was a lie he came up with to get "cut loose" from prison. However, both thereafter pleaded their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination when the Orleans Parish grand jury asked them to repeat their story under oath. It is not known whether they took the Fifth because they didn't want to lie, or because they knew about Garrison's habit of prosecuting people for perjury when their truthful testimony hurt him or his agenda.*

In any event, according to Bundy, he was preparing a heroin injection for himself next to the concrete seawall at Lake Pontchartrain on a Monday morning in June or July of 1963 when he saw Clay Shaw get out of a black sedan, pass by him, and walk fifteen to twenty feet away, where he was approached by Lee Harvey Oswald, who he said was "dirty" and "looked like a real junkie himself." Bundy said he saw Shaw and Oswald talk about "fifteen to twenty" minutes, during which time Shaw handed Oswald a roll of money and also told Oswald, with Bundy standing nearby, "I told you to shut up. You're talking too loud." Why Shaw would want to talk to and pay Oswald—presumably to be involved in the assassination of Kennedy—in public, with someone standing nearby, as opposed to inside his car or someone's home, is not known. Nor is it known why Bundy, instead of taking his fix behind closed doors somewhere, would do so in public, knowing, as he must have, that if he were caught he could be prosecuted as well as be found in violation of his parole.

Oh, yes. Bundy decided to gild the lily by telling the DA that as Oswald walked away, a pamphlet fell out of his pocket onto the ground. Bundy took time out from his heroin injection to retrieve the pamphlet, which he said had "Free Cuba" language on it.¹⁰¹

No one, of course, believed a word Bundy said, and in the more than three years since the assassination, he had never told this story before. In fact, reporter Frank McGee said on the June 19 NBC News special that NBC investigators had learned that Bundy had failed a polygraph test, and because of this, Garrison's first assistant district attorney, Charles Ward, urged Garrison not to call Bundy to the witness stand at Shaw's preliminary hearing in 1967.¹⁰² In fact, the polygrapher, James Kruebbe, had personally told Garrison, in the presence of Ward and fellow prosecutor James Alcock, that Bundy "wasn't telling the truth."¹⁰³ But Garrison, knowing he was possibly presenting perjurious testimony, did, and had Bundy repeat his tale at Shaw's trial in 1969. At the trial, after Shaw, per Bundy's request, walked twice from the back of the courtroom toward him, Bundy testified he was sure Shaw was the man he had seen that day. "I watched his foot the way it twisted that day. This is one way I identified this man the next time I saw him*... That is the foot [Shaw's right foot] that twisted that day. The twisting of his foot had frightened me that day on the seawall when I was about to cook my drugs."¹⁰⁴ Shaw did have a slightly stiff walk from a bad back,¹⁰⁵ but who else had ever said that his foot twisted when he walked? On cross-examination by Shaw's lawyer, Bundy denied telling Torres and Cancler that he had made the Shaw story up.¹⁰⁶

And then there was the New York City accountant, Charles Spiesel, a short and dapper man with an authoritative voice and mien who told the Shaw jury that one evening in June of 1963 he was at La Fitte's Blacksmith Shop, a bar in the French Quarter, when he recognized a man (David Ferrie) he had flown in the air force with during the Second World War. (There is no record of Ferrie having ever served in the air force.) Ferrie was with two women and another man, and they invited him, he said, to a party at a second-floor apartment in the French Quarter. At the party were ten or eleven men, including Shaw, who was the host, though it was not his apartment. The apartment's occupants were out of town and had given Shaw the keys. Spiesel testified that "someone brought up the name of President Kennedy and just about everybody began to criticize him. Then someone said 'somebody ought to kill the son-of-a-b!'" Ferrie expressed the opinion it could be done, and Shaw smiled and agreed. A young man with a beard and a splint said he'd like to be the one to do it "in a couple of weeks" when his splint was removed. Spiesel said the group finally agreed that the killing "would have to be done with a high-powered rifle with a telescopic sight." Shaw, per Spiesel, asked Ferrie if the assassin could be flown away from the assassination site to safety and Ferrie said it could be done.

Spiesel's testimony, naturally, had a stunning effect on the media and the rest of the spectators in the courtroom. But on cross-examination, when Irvin Dymond, Shaw's lead defense attorney, asked Spiesel if he had noticed anything unusual about Ferrie's physical appearance, Spiesel said, "No," which was the equivalent of saying he had never met Ferrie, and his whole story was poppycock. Without exception, everyone who met Ferrie was startled by his bizarre appearance, Ferrie being, as someone once said in a different context, a sight seldom seen in Christendom. What about Ferrie's hair? Spiesel was asked.

"Fairly well-groomed," he said about the grotesque, dime-store wig Ferrie had glued on his head.

"Did he have unusual eyebrows?"

"A little thinner than most men's, not unusual outside of that," Spiesel responded about the inordinately thick, pasted-on eyebrows Ferrie wore.

Spiesel was a nut of the first water, and on Dymond's cross it came out he believed that from 1948 to 1964 a New York psychiatrist, the New York Police Department, the Pinkerton detective agency, the New York Horse Racing Association, and others had conspired to torture him mentally in New York, New Jersey, Washington, D.C., and New Orleans, and that, acting as his own lawyer, he had filed a $16 million lawsuit against them. Dymond read into the record the entire text of the embarrassing complaint filed by Spiesel. The effect of the reading was apparent on Spiesel as he nervously made stroking motions above his head with his right hand, missing his scalp completely. His left hand rested firmly on the arm of the witness chair, his fingers tapping on the wood. Spiesel also said on cross-examination that he had been hypnotized "by possibly fifty or sixty" people "against my will" over the period between 1948 and 1964, including by the New York Police Department, causing him to suffer "hypnotic delusions" and lose the ability to have "normal sexual relations." Others, he said, tried to enter his home disguised as members of his family. Why would all these people and groups want to do this? Shaw's attorney asked. Spiesel said he did not know but suggested it was a Communist conspiracy to spy on him. How, Shaw's attorney asked Spiesel, would he know if he was being hypnotized? "When someone tries to get your attention, catch your eye," Spiesel said, "that's a clue right off." Is it possible, Shaw's attorney asked, that he was under hypnosis at the time he supposedly heard Shaw and Ferrie conspire with others to kill Kennedy?

"I don't really know if it did happen," Spiesel acknowledged.

Spiesel admitted that he currently had fifteen lawsuits against him in New York City for nonpayment of debts and that he had filed for bankruptcy. By this time, Garrison's prosecutors would have mortgaged their homes to get Spiesel off the witness stand, but it was too late, as Spiesel inflicted further punishment on himself and the DA who called him to the stand. His self-administered coup de grace was when he testified that before his daughter had left home in New York City for Louisiana State University, he fingerprinted her, and again fingerprinted her when she returned home because he wanted to make sure she was the same person who had left home, not one of his “enemies” who had taken to impersonating members of his family to destroy him.¹⁰⁷

When Tom Bethell, Garrison’s chief researcher, left Garrison’s office out of disgust over Garrison’s investigation of Shaw, he sent a memo to the defense attorneys setting forth names and addresses of all the prosecution witnesses, including a summary of their expected testimony. This was extremely helpful to the defense since at the time in Louisiana, there was no right of “discovery” of the opposition’s witnesses and statements, meaning the prosecution could present surprise witnesses at the trial without the defense having had an opportunity to prepare for their testimony. Bethell told me that the prosecutor in Garrison’s office who interviewed Spiesel in New York City (and whose name, out of consideration for the prosecutor, he did not want to reveal to me) had reported back to Garrison that Spiesel would make an excellent witness “if it weren’t for the fact that he was crazy.” The prosecutor had learned, among other things, of Spiesel’s fingerprinting his daughter. Although Bethell didn’t furnish the defense attorneys with this information, once they learned of Spiesel’s identity through Bethell, their own investigation uncovered all of Spiesel’s quirkiness and eccentricities, including the fingerprinting, and the prosecution was stunned when all of this came out on cross-examination.¹⁰⁸

The prosecutor whose name Bethell did not want to give me was James Alcock. He had interviewed Spiesel on July 13, 1967, at a restaurant in Greenwich Village. Alcock’s three-page memorandum of the interview to Garrison on July 17 makes no reference to learning of Spiesel’s fingerprinting his daughter, and closes by saying, “Mr. Spiesel is willing to testify and only requests that we attempt to get him some per diem accounting work while he is in the city.”

The FBI had a file on Spiesel, dating back to 1949, that chronicled his bizarre accusations, including the charge that his enemies had placed people in his home disguised as his father and mother. Spiesel’s father, Boris, a New York City fur merchant, told the FBI his son was mentally disturbed.¹⁰⁹

The sad-sack prosecutors couldn’t even put a U.S. postman on the witness stand without evoking smirks and ripples of laughter from the courtroom audience. Garrison was alleging that the name Shaw used as an alias when he conspired with Ferrie and Oswald to murder Kennedy was Clay Bertrand (see later discussion). In the summer of 1966, Shaw executed a change of address form so his mail would be sent to the home of his friend, one Jeff Biddison at 1414 Chartres Street, while Shaw was on vacation. The postal worker, James Hardiman, told the jury that he delivered several letters addressed to Clem (not Clay) Bertrand to Biddison’s house that summer. On cross-examination, he was asked, “Did you ever deliver any mail to that address, that is, 1414 Chartres Street, addressed to a Mr. Cliff Boudreaux?”

Yes, the postal worker answered.

“Now, Mr. Hardiman, if I told you I just made that name up, would your testimony be the same?”

“Maybe you made it up,” Hardiman answered, “but I have delivered Boudreaux mail there, too.”¹¹⁰

One may wonder why Garrison was beset by so many goofy witnesses. But as author James Phelan pointed out, “There are certain sensational cases that have a fascination for unstable people and fetch them forth in droves...Celebrated cases also attract witnesses who are not psychotic, but who falsely identify key figures out of faulty memory or a desire to lift themselves out of dull anonymity into the spotlight.” The difference between Garrison and most responsible prosecutors in these high-visibility cases is that the latter don’t call the kooks to the witness stand. Garrison did. Phelan says, “The Garrison case had a disastrously low threshold, across which trooped a bizarre parade of people eager to bolster his conspiracy scenario.”¹¹¹ And Garrison welcomed them with open arms.

Garrison’s star witness at the Shaw trial, and the one around whom he virtually built his entire case, was Perry Russo (David Ferrie died before the trial—see later text), a twenty-five-year-old Baton Rouge insurance salesman who was a friend of David Ferrie’s. Russo claimed that he was in Ferrie’s apartment in New Orleans in mid-September of 1963 when he heard Ferrie, Shaw (using the alias Clay Bertrand), and Oswald conspire to kill Kennedy.¹¹² The only problem is that cross-examination revealed that the first four times Russo told everything he knew about Ferrie—including to Baton Rouge State-Times reporter Bill Bankston on February 24, 1967 (two days after Ferrie’s death), and later in the day to Jim Kemp of TV station WAFB in Baton Rouge—he never mentioned any such thing, not even bringing up the names Oswald, Shaw, or Bertrand, much less any conspiracy by them. In fact, when Kemp asked him if Ferrie had ever mentioned “Lee Harvey Oswald’s name,” Russo answered, “No. I had never heard of Oswald until the television [coverage] of the assassination.”¹¹³ Russo only spoke about the Shaw-Ferrie-Oswald conspiracy meeting when he was put under sodium pentothal and hypnosis four years later in 1967, and even then, only after being asked leading questions.

But one can see why Russo needed truth serum and hypnosis to recall hearing three people plot to murder President Kennedy four years earlier. Without truth serum and hypnosis, a plot to murder the president of the United States just wasn’t important enough for someone like him to remember. But what about around the time of the alleged incident? Surely he must have remembered the incident at least for a while back then, right? And if so, why, he was asked at Shaw’s preliminary hearing on March 15, 1967, hadn’t he gone to the authorities when, just two months after the meeting of conspirators he claimed he was privy to, the president was murdered? Again, apparently a plot to murder the president of the United States just wasn’t important enough to Russo. He responded casually, “I had an involvement with school, which was more pressing to me.”

If that wasn’t unbelievable enough, when Shaw’s lawyer asked, “You claim you were present at a meeting where the assassination was planned and you say you did not know whether your testimony would be valuable to the Warren Commission?” Russo answered, “Now, they [“Bertrand, Oswald, Ferrie”] did not say anything about [the specific city of] Dallas,” as if their not doing so was some justification for his not coming forward. Russo, who had to know how pathetic his answers were, tried to inject some plausibility into his story by adding some other reasons why he hadn’t come forward back in 1963. One was that even though the man he saw conspire to murder Kennedy was introduced to him as “Leon Oswald,” and over TV the president’s killer was called “Lee Harvey Oswald,” the two men “did not look alike exactly.” Also, he had confidence in the FBI, and “if they wanted me, [to] ask me anything, they could,” not explaining how they could possibly contact him if he never told them he existed.¹¹⁴

On January 26, 1971, close to two years after Clay Shaw’s not-guilty verdict on March 1, 1969, Russo told Edward Wegmann, one of Shaw’s lawyers, that he never saw Clay Shaw in Ferrie’s apartment (“absolutely not”), and Garrison’s office had done “a complete brainwashing job” on him.¹¹⁵ On April 16, 1971, Russo gave a tape-recorded interview to William Gurvich (the former Garrison investigator) and two of Shaw's attorneys, Wegmann and F. Irvin Dymond. Russo told of Garrison and his staff telling him before the trial that they had a contract with Life magazine for twenty-five thousand dollars, and that "after the Shaw conviction" they would "either give that to me or see somehow I got a lot of it for my trouble." Saying, "I guess I always knew [Shaw] had nothing to do with anything," Russo stated that Garrison's staff threatened him: if he went back on what he said under hypnosis, "the courthouse [would be] planted on top of me."^{116*}

Jerry Cohen, a Los Angeles Times reporter I knew who covered the Shaw trial for the Times, told me when he returned to Los Angeles after the not-guilty verdict was reached, "Vince, the trial was the most unbelievable joke you could ever imagine. Though no one was confident of what the New Orleans jury would do, nearly everyone in the courtroom, including the media, knew that Shaw was innocent and Garrison had no evidence against him. The jury returned with their verdict in forty-five minutes or so [actually, fifty-four minutes]. The consensus was that they had a cup of coffee, chose their foreman, and could have returned in ten minutes, but they sat it out a few more minutes for appearance purposes.† I tell you, Garrison should be in jail for what he did. This is a sick, dangerous man." Salvatore Panzeca, Shaw's original defense attorney who remained on his team throughout the trial, told me, "Garrison knowingly prosecuted an innocent man. In my forty-one years as a criminal defense attorney, I have never had a client more cooperative, intelligent and innocent than Clay Shaw."¹¹⁷ Milton Brener, who was a prosecutor in Garrison's office before the Shaw case and ended up writing a book about the case, told me, "Of course Shaw was innocent. The entire case against him was a figment of Garrison's imagination. He pulled it completely out of thin air."¹¹⁸ Indeed, Garrison's case against Shaw was so outrageous and so lacking in any credible evidence against Shaw that even Garrison's own wife, as Oliver Stone himself acknowledged in an article, didn't believe in his case, and she and Garrison separated right after the trial.¹¹⁹ When a prosecutor's own wife isn't on his side, that's pretty bad, isn't it? I mean, can it get any worse?

The media savaged Garrison, who didn't have the courage to show up in court throughout a good part of the trial (averaging about one day a week), not even when the all-male (nine whites, three blacks) jury returned its verdict of not guilty at one in the morning on March 1, 1969, two years to the day after Shaw had been arrested in the case. In a front-page editorial on March 1, the New Orleans States-Item said, "District Attorney Jim Garrison should resign. He has shown himself unfit to hold the office of District Attorney or any other office. Mr. Garrison has abused the vast powers of his office. He has perverted the law rather than prosecuted it. His persecution of Clay Shaw was a perversion of the legal process such as has not been often seen. Clay Shaw has been vindicated, but the damage to his reputation caused by Mr. Garrison's witch hunt may never be repaired. This travesty of justice is a reproach to the conscience of all good men and must not go unanswered. Mr. Garrison himself should now be brought to the bar to answer for his conduct."¹²⁰ The New York Times opined in an editorial that Garrison's prosecution of Shaw was "one of the most disgraceful chapters in the history of American jurisprudence."¹²¹

The Los Angeles Times editorial observed that "the really frightening thing" is that since Garrison only used Shaw to further his own ends, "Shaw could have been any man." Saying "the processes of justice had been outrageously abused" by Garrison, the Times concluded that "if there is one fact proven beyond all dispute in the Shaw case it is that Jim Garrison is unfit to hold public office.”¹²²

For his part, Shaw would later say, “If a jury could convict me on such shoddy evidence as Garrison presented, I would gladly have gone to jail—it would be the safest place in a world gone mad.”^{123*}

Again, Garrison is the man whom Stone presented to his audience as the most solid and rational of men, one with impeccable ethics who was an intrepid fighter for justice.

Unbelievably, the shameless and unconscionable Garrison, after the irreparably grievous harm he had already inflicted on an innocent man, decided to inflict further harm on Shaw, his model obviously not being common sense and decency, but again, Victor Hugo’s maliciously tenacious Inspector Javert in Les Misérables. On March 3, 1969, the first business day after the not-guilty verdict came down, Garrison, instead of skulking away into the night with his tail between his legs, filed two counts of perjury against Shaw for denying on the witness stand that he knew Lee Harvey Oswald and David Ferrie. (It is extremely rare, almost unheard of, for a defendant, after his criminal trial, to be prosecuted for committing perjury in his defense, whether or not he was convicted of the offense for which he was on trial. It’s just not done, even where there is no doubt in the DA’s mind the defendant committed perjury. It’s a perjury that is almost invariably overlooked and even expected by prosecutors. After all, if the defendant were going to admit having committed the crime, he would have pled guilty and there would not have been any trial.)[†]

On January 18, 1971, Shaw made a motion for a temporary restraining order to prevent Garrison from proceeding against him. Shaw contended that Garrison was acting “in bad faith” and was abusing his prosecutorial powers. The motion was granted, and on January 25, a three-day hearing commenced on the issue of whether Garrison should be permanently enjoined from prosecuting Shaw on the perjury charges. Numerous witnesses testified, including Shaw, who again said he had never met Oswald or Ferrie. Russo was also called to the stand but invoked the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination. U.S. federal district court judge Herbert W. Christenberry ruled on May 27, 1971, that Shaw was entitled to the relief sought, and signed a permanent injunction on June 7.

In his ruling Christenberry scathingly denounced Garrison, using words like “appalling,” “outrageous,” and “inexcusable” to describe Garrison’s conduct in different areas of the case. He said, “Garrison undertook his baseless investigation [of Shaw] with the specific intent to deprive Shaw of his rights under the First, Fifth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.” In one part of his written opinion, he in essence accused Garrison of subornation of perjury, writing that Garrison “resorted to the use of drugs and hypnosis on Russo, purportedly to corroborate, but more likely to concoct his story.”¹²⁴

Garrison appealed, but the U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear the appeal. Garrison had succeeded, however, in torturing Shaw for two years after the not-guilty verdict on the conspiracy-to-commit-murder charge. In his diaries, Shaw referred to the “Kafkaesque horror” Garrison had put him through to further some perceived greater good.

In an address on the Bill of Rights (and its progenitor, the English Magna Carta) at Tulane Law School on October 30, 1964, Garrison had dwelled on the fact that the Bill of Rights, which he properly elevated to sacred status, was adopted “to protect the governed from the men who govern them,” and that attacks on these fundamental rights can invariably be “identified by the great superior virtue which the attackers bear inscribed on their battle flag.” The attacks are always ostensibly “for the good of the state,” some “great virtue of the day.” A twenty-four-hour watch is needed to protect our Bill of Rights, he said, because someone is always trying to deprive us of them “in the interest of justice, of course.” I believe Jim Garrison believed those words when he spoke them, but somewhere down the line, and for whatever reason, he became the precise embodiment of the villains he feared and denounced in his 1964 speech.

Harry Connick Sr. (father of the singer), the New Orleans DA who ran against and defeated Garrison in 1973, told me that the Clay Shaw prosecution was “absolutely the most terrible, gross, abominable prosecution” he has ever encountered in his many years in law enforcement. “Garrison went to extremes to prosecute an innocent man.” Connick, who was an assistant U.S. attorney at the time of the Shaw investigation and trial, said that even before the Shaw case, the legal community in New Orleans viewed Garrison “as a four flusher. He frequently made allegations and charges he couldn’t back up. So there was a suspicion down here from the moment he brought charges against Shaw—and before we learned Garrison had no evidence—that it might turn out to be a phony case.”¹²⁵ Newsweek reporter Hugh Aynesworth said that Jim Garrison was “right,” there was a conspiracy in New Orleans, but it was his “scheme to concoct a fantastic ‘solution’ to the death of John F. Kennedy.”¹²⁶

Can anything positive be said about Garrison in his prosecution of Clay Shaw? Tom Bethell, Garrison’s chief research assistant on the case, said, “When Ferrie died, the office staff was jubilant because we all knew there was no substance to Garrison’s charges, and this gave him a wonderful opportunity to get off the hook and tell the media hordes covering the case who were questioning whether he had anything, ‘Look, I tried to find out the truth, but they silenced my main suspect.’ The public would have thought he had been on to something big, and he would have looked like a hero. Instead, he proceeds to almost immediately charge Shaw with the murder. People in the office were putting their hands to their forehead. The sense was ‘How are we going to handle this now?’” Bethell offers this insight: “If this whole Garrison crusade was only political calculation on his part, he’d have taken the opportune course and ended it when Ferrie died. But there was also madness here.” Bethell said he personally liked Garrison, saying he was “amusing, charming,” but he was “very, very irresponsible, to an extent that was just amazing.”¹²⁷ In a 1991 article, Bethell wrote, “I knew Clay Shaw was innocent; in fact I think everyone in the DA’s office also knew it, except for Garrison himself, who was incapable of thinking straight on the subject.”¹²⁸

John Volz, a prosecutor in Garrison’s office who was a pallbearer at Garrison’s funeral, confirmed Bethell’s rendition of events. “When Ferrie died, we [fellow prosecutors in the office] advised him to get out of all this. But Jim wouldn’t listen. Instead, he said, ‘This is just the beginning.’” Volz also agrees with Bethell that Garrison’s conduct at the time of Ferrie’s death led him to believe that Garrison “actually believed most of this craziness,” and although he believes Garrison was completely wrong in his prosecution of Shaw, he was “well-intentioned.”^{129*}

Is one possibility simply that Stone’s hero, Garrison, had truly gone mad? There are those who think so. Warren Commission critic Harold Weisberg was one of Garrison’s strongest earliest supporters, and he went to New Orleans to help Garrison on his case. Garrison reciprocated by writing the foreword to Weisberg’s 1967 book, Oswald in New Orleans. But months before the trial, he disavowed Garrison. Although he was not inclined to elaborate, Weisberg told me he was a witness in New Orleans to Garrison “making up” a piece of evidence against Shaw, and when he saw this he said, “I knew I had to sever my association with Garrison.” Weisberg said that Garrison the man “was one of the greatest tragedies in the investigation of Kennedy’s assassination. He was highly talented, intelligent, and articulate, but somewhere down the road he lost contact with reality. I just don't understand what he was up to. There just was no evidence of Shaw's guilt."¹³⁰ Clay Shaw, the man whose life Garrison had destroyed, and someone who must have given considerable thought to the matter, also thought Garrison suffered from a psychological illness. "Personally," Shaw said, "I think he's quite ill, mentally. He was, as you know, discharged from the Army after a diagnosis of anxiety and told to take psychotherapy.† I know he has been to a number of analysts. I think, basically, he is getting worse all the time. I think there is a division of his mind. With one-half of his mind he is able to go out and fabricate evidence, and then by some osmosis, he is able to convince the other half that the fabrication is the truth."¹³¹

My view (for whatever it's worth, seeing that I did not know Garrison, and being aware that it conflicts with the views of some people who did know him) is that Garrison eventually came to realize that his suspicions about Shaw were unfounded, yet he persisted in prosecuting an innocent man. My sense is that Edward Wegmann, one of Shaw's attorneys, summed up the entire case and Garrison's motive for bringing it as well as anyone I've heard: "An innocent man has been the victim of a ruthless, unethical and fraudulent public prosecutor... who, with premeditation and full knowledge of the falsity of the charges brought against [Shaw]... used him for the sole purpose of obtaining a judicial forum for [his attack] upon the credibility of the... Warren Commission."¹³² In other words, and pardon the play on words, Clay Shaw was "just a patsy."

There is strong support for the conclusion that Garrison knew Shaw was innocent (hence, the argument that he used Shaw to attack the Warren Commission becomes the most plausible explanation for Garrison's prosecution of Shaw). Although Garrison would have never admitted knowingly prosecuting an innocent man for murder, his conduct speaks quite eloquently for that proposition.

In view of the fact that Garrison had accused Shaw of conspiring to murder the president of the United States, one would expect Garrison himself to face Shaw in court and cross-examine him during his testimony on February 27, 1969. But instead, he let his assistant, James Alcock, do so. And even with Alcock, if one wasn't told that Shaw was on trial for Kennedy's murder, one would hardly have known this from Alcock's cross-examination. Not only was it extremely short (consuming exactly fifty pages of transcript)—one would automatically expect the cross-examination of someone accused of conspiring to murder the president of the United States to go on for several days and take up hundreds of pages of transcript—but it couldn't possibly have been more soft and civil. So much so that it could have been Shaw's own lawyer asking the questions. So soft, civil, and nonconfrontational, in fact, that when Shaw's lawyer was asked if he had any questions to ask on redirect examination, Dymond said no, seeing no need to explain away or mitigate any damage to his client's cause that came out during cross-examination. It couldn't have been more obvious that Alcock never had his heart in what he was doing, and knew further that there was nothing of any substance to cross-examine Shaw about. (For the record, Shaw denied on direct examination knowing or ever having met Oswald, Ferrie, or Perry Russo, ever having conspired with them or anyone else to murder President Kennedy, and ever having worked for the CIA.)^{133*}

If Alcock's cross-examination of Shaw, by itself, didn't clearly demonstrate that Garrison knew Shaw had nothing to do with the assassination, and that he had committed the unpardonable sin of charging an innocent man with conspiracy to commit murder just to give him the opportunity to present evidence challenging the findings of the Warren Commission, then Garrison's final summation to the jury on February 28, 1969, would seem to eliminate all doubt. Instead of referring to Shaw (or

“the defendant”) a great number of times as he tried to connect him to the conspiracy and murder, as any prosecutor would do if he believed the person he was prosecuting was guilty, unbelievably Garrison only referred to Shaw once in his entire summation, and then not to say that the evidence showed he was guilty. Not once did Garrison tell the jury he had proved Shaw’s guilt or that the evidence pointed toward Shaw’s guilt. (Alcock, in his summation, did.)* What he told the jury was, “You are here sitting in judgment of Clay Shaw,”¹³⁴ an absolutely valueless statement since the jury, obviously, already knew why they were there.

Is there any further evidence? Yes.

As indicated earlier, the indictment only charged Shaw, Ferrie, and Oswald with conspiracy to murder Kennedy, not with murdering him. Garrison was thereby sending an important signal. Since under the law of conspiracy Shaw would be responsible for (and hence, guilty of) all crimes committed by his co-conspirators in furtherance of the object of the conspiracy, a charge of conspiracy to commit murder is virtually always accompanied by a separate charge of the murder itself. If Garrison was sincerely convinced Shaw had conspired to murder Kennedy, why not do what 99.9 percent of all DAs would have done—also charge him with Kennedy’s murder? I don’t know the answer to that question, but the only thing that makes any sense to me is that he knew Shaw was innocent or had very serious doubts about his guilt. If Shaw had been convicted of murder, Garrison knew that under Louisiana law, the punishment had to be either life imprisonment or the death penalty. But conspiracy to commit murder was only punishable in Louisiana by imprisonment “at hard labor for not less than one nor more than 20 years.”¹³⁵ So perhaps Garrison, knowing he was up to no good, only wanted to use Shaw up to a certain point. He didn’t want to have Shaw’s death or life imprisonment on his conscience for the rest of his life.†

In his first book on the assassination, Heritage of Stone, published one year after Clay Shaw’s 1969 trial, Garrison, incredibly, never talks about Clay Shaw once in the entire 224 pages. (He does in his book On the Trail of the Assassins in 1988, nineteen years later.) Nor Perry Russo. In fact, Clay Shaw’s name only appears three times in the book, in three separate footnotes at the back, and then only when the source for the testimony of two witnesses at Shaw’s trial is listed as “State of Louisiana v. Clay Shaw.” Since the cover of Heritage of Stone says that the book is Garrison’s “own version of the conspiracy behind the assassination of JFK,” why wasn’t Shaw, the only man Garrison prosecuted for conspiracy to murder Kennedy, mentioned?¹³⁶†

So we see, from all of Garrison’s conduct showing what his motivations probably were for prosecuting Shaw, that Oliver Stone’s movie, at its very core, was one huge lie. Stone himself seems to have sensed what Garrison was up to, and embraced it. Though he tried, in every way he could, to convince the millions who saw his movie that Clay Shaw was an integral part of a conspiracy to kill Kennedy, he told the New Orleans Times-Picayune in 1961, “I have to tell you that I’m not that concerned about whether Shaw was innocent or guilty [say what?]. . . This movie is . . . about a much larger international story.”¹³⁷ Stone became even bolder several months later when he told Esquire magazine, “Garrison was trying to force a break in the case. If he could do that, it was worth the sacrifice of one man [Shaw]. When they went onto the shores of Omaha Beach, they said, ‘We’re going to lose five, ten, fifteen thousand people to reach our objective.’ I think Jim [Garrison, whose strengths and faults, Stone said, made him “like King Lear”] was in that kind of situation.”¹³⁸

2. Near the beginning of Oliver Stone’s film, a woman named Rose Cherami is shown being thrown out of a moving car on a country road, then pleading with her attendants on her hospital bed,

“They’re going to kill Kennedy. Please call somebody.”

To conspiracy theorists, Melba Christine Marcades, aka (along with fourteen other aliases) Rose Cherami,^{*} has been, for years, almost as much a part of the lore and mythology of the assassination as the grassy knoll itself. And most conspiracy theorists have not questioned Cherami’s story and have accepted what Stone depicted on the screen. But what Stone depicted was not quite what happened. The man most familiar with Cherami’s story, the late Francis Fruge, was a Louisiana State Police officer when around 10:00 p.m. on the evening of November 20, 1963 (two days before the assassination), he was called to the emergency ward of the Moosa Memorial Hospital in Eunice, Louisiana, by Mrs. Louise Guillary, the administrator of the hospital. Cherami, age thirty-nine, was under the influence of drugs and had been brought to the hospital by Frank Odom, a longtime resident of the area whom Fruge knew. Cherami had been hitchhiking when she was struck by Odom’s car. It happened on Highway 190, a strip of road “extending from Opelousas, birthplace of Jim Bowie, to the Texas border where a gas station more than likely doubled as a brothel.”¹³⁹ She had sustained no fractures or lacerations, only bruises and abrasions. Fruge said Cherami was “very incoherent,” and after he locked her up at the Eunice jail for safekeeping until she sobered up, he returned to the Eunice Police Department’s annual ball, which he had been attending.

About an hour later, he was summoned to the jail cell. Cherami “had taken all of her clothes off” and was “what we would call ‘climbing the walls,’ scratching herself, and I recognized it right away as withdrawals...from drugs,” Fruge told the HSCA. Fruge had a doctor come to the jail, “and he gave her a shot to sedate her.” The doctor, F. J. De Rouen, advised Fruge to bring her to a hospital. Fruge told the HSCA that during the two-hour ambulance drive to the East Louisiana State Hospital in Jackson, during which Cherami was in a straightjacket, Cherami related to Fruge that “she was coming from Florida to Dallas with two men who she said were Italians, or resembled Italians. They had stopped at this lounge [a house of prostitution called the Silver Slipper]...and they’d had a few drinks and had gotten into an argument or...something. The manager of the lounge threw her out, and she got out on the road and hitchhiked...and this is when she got hit by a vehicle...[So Cherami herself confirmed Odom’s story that she was struck by a passing car, not thrown out of any car as Stone showed his audience.] I asked her what she was going to do in Dallas. She said she was going to pick up some money, pick up her baby, and kill Kennedy.”¹⁴⁰ Fruge’s deposition to the HSCA was on April 18, 1978. In an interview with an HSCA investigator eleven days earlier, on April 7, 1978, Fruge quoted Cherami as telling him, “We’re [referring to herself and the men she was with] going to kill President Kennedy when he comes to Dallas in a few days.”¹⁴¹

Fruge said that he checked Cherami into the hospital at three in the morning on November 21 (Thursday). A 1978 HSCA report of a staff interview of Dr. Victor Weiss said that Weiss “verified that he was employed as a resident physician at the hospital in 1963. He recalled that on Monday, November 25, 1963, he was asked by another physician, Dr. [Don] Bowers, to see a patient who had been committed November 20th or 21st. Dr. Bowers allegedly told Weiss [there’s no reference to the HSCA having interviewed Bowers] that the patient, Rose Cherami, had stated before the assassination that President Kennedy was going to be killed. Weiss questioned Cherami about her statements...She did not have any specific details of a particular assassination plot against Kennedy, but had stated that the ‘word in the underworld’ was that Kennedy would be assassinated. She further stated that she had been traveling from Florida to her home in Texas when the man traveling with her threw her from the automobile in which they were riding.”¹⁴²

Note that as opposed to what Cherami told Fruge, in her new and evolving story neither she, nor she and the two men she was with, were going to kill Kennedy, but some other unidentified person or persons (the “word in the underworld”) were going to do so. Also, contrary to what she told Fruge, which was verified by Frank Odom (who struck the hitchhiking Cherami and brought her to the hospital), Weiss said that Cherami told him she was thrown out of the car by the man she was traveling with.

When Fruge went back to the hospital on Monday, November 25, three days after Kennedy was murdered, Cherami now told Fruge that the two men she was with, not her, were going to Dallas to kill Kennedy. After the killing, she said, the three of them were going to go to a house in Dallas, where she was going to pick up her baby and around eight thousand dollars. From there they were going to drive to Houston, where a seaman was scheduled to arrive on a boat in nearby Galveston with eight kilos of heroin.*

So if we’re to believe Cherami’s last story, the conspirators who plotted to kill Kennedy apparently employed two friends of Cherami’s to do the job, let her be a part of it, even though she was a disoriented drug addict, and then, after killing Kennedy, instead of trying to escape, they had more important things to do, such as pick up her baby and then drive to Houston to meet the heroin smuggler.

Fruge testified that the next day, Tuesday, November 26, on the chance that Cherami might be telling the truth about the heroin pickup, he and several other members of law enforcement flew to Houston with Cherami. On the plane there was a newspaper with the caption of an article to the effect that the authorities in Dallas had not been able to establish any relationship between Jack Ruby and Lee Harvey Oswald. Fruge said that when Cherami saw this, she started laughing and said, “Them two queer son-of-a-bitches. They’ve been shacking up for years.” Cherami said she knew this because she used to work as a stripper for Ruby at a club of his in Dallas called The Pink Door. (There is no record of Ruby ever operating a strip club in Dallas called “The Pink Door.” In fact, it is the consensus of researchers that Ruby’s Carousel Club was the first strip club he had ever operated.) Fruge said that the Houston drug pickup never went down because the seaman never showed up. He said that “the Customs Agent [with whom they were working on the possible heroin pickup] put Cherami back on the street and we came back to Louisiana.”¹⁴³

The HSCA chased some of the flimsiest conspiracy allegations to the ends of the earth during its investigation of the assassination, but it did not do this with Cherami’s allegation, not even bothering, apparently, to interview Dr. Bowers or anyone at the house of prostitution from which Cherami said she was ejected before she went hitchhiking and was struck on the highway. And the reason for the inattention was equally clear. Cherami was a heroin addict who was frequently disoriented. Also, the HSCA learned she had “previously furnished the FBI false information concerning her involvement in prostitution and narcotics matters and that she had been confined to a mental institution in Norman, Oklahoma, on three occasions.”¹⁴⁴ In addition, an FBI rap sheet on her covering the period from February 13, 1941, through October 21, 1964, lists fifty-one arrests ranging from public drunkenness, vagrancy, prostitution, and driving under the influence of narcotics, to larceny, driving a stolen auto across state lines, and arson.¹⁴⁵ Lastly, not only was her story completely improbable, but she kept changing it every time she told it.

But Oliver Stone, naturally, did not give his audience any of this background on Cherami. He showed her being thrown out of a car when we know she was not; he never mentioned the many inconsistent stories she told; and to make her story more credible, he changed her words from “I” and “we’re” to “they’re” going to kill the president, and did not mention her wild allegation that Ruby and Oswald were sexual partners. All the movie audience saw was a woman being thrown out of a car and pleading with hospital attendants to “call somebody” to save the president’s life.

Later in the film, Stone compounds his gross misrepresentation of the facts about Cherami when he conveys to his audience that Cherami was thereafter killed as a result of a “hit and run,” the clear implication being that she was silenced. Indeed, virtually all the conspiracy books that mention Cherami use the same words.¹⁴⁶ But after interviewing, on April 4, 1967, the officer who investigated Cherami’s death, Officer J. A. Andrews of the Texas Highway Patrol, Fruge wrote, “Officer Andrews stated that subject died of injuries received from an automobile accident on Highway No. 155, 1.7 miles east of Big Sandy, Upshur County, Texas, at 3:00 a.m., on September 4, 1965. Subject died at the hospital in Gladewater, Gregg County, Texas. The inquest was held by Justice of the Peace Ross Delay, Precinct No. 3, Gregg County, Texas. The accident was reported to Officer Andrews by the operator of the car [Jerry Don Moore], after he had taken the subject to the hospital. Andrews stated that the operator related that the victim was apparently lying on the roadway with her head and upper part of her body resting on the traffic lane, and although he had attempted to avoid running over her, he ran over the top part of her skull, causing fatal injuries. An investigation of the physical evidence at the scene of the accident was unable to contradict this statement.”¹⁴⁷ Not your usual hit and run.*

3. Unbelievably, Stone depicts Oswald throughout the movie as a right winger posing as a Marxist. (In a scene from the movie, Garrison even tells his staff that “when Oswald went to Russia, he was not a real defector. He was an intelligence agent on some type of mission for our government, and remained one till the day he died.”) But we know from all the evidence that if anyone was ever a committed Marxist—starting from when he began reading Das Kapital in his early teens—it was Oswald. Stone got this perversion of the truth directly from Garrison. To make his theory that the CIA (certainly, if anything, right wing, not left wing) was behind the assassination more believable, Garrison told his readers in On the Trail of the Assassins that Oswald was a right-wing agent provocateur for U.S. intelligence, not a Marxist. To get his readers to swallow this absurdity, he did what he did best—lie. For instance, he tells his readers that “only one man who had been at the [El Toro] Marine Base with [Oswald] testified [before the Warren Commission] that Oswald had exhibited Marxist leanings, . . . Kerry Thornley. . . This made me wonder if any member of the Warren Commission had actually read the other Marines’ affidavits, which overwhelmingly contradicted Thornley’s claims.” Speaking of one marine, Nelson Delgado (who testified for the defense at the London trial), Garrison writes, “I headed straight for his testimony [before the Warren Commission]. I found that Delgado, who bunked next door to Oswald for the better part of eleven months, had no recollection whatever of Oswald’s Marxist leanings.”¹⁴⁸ Any reader not having volume 8 of the Warren Commission volumes, and not knowing what a mountebank Garrison was, would have no reason to disbelieve him. The reality is that Delgado’s testimony is peppered with references to Oswald’s Marxist leanings. For example: “He [Oswald] was for, not the Communist way of life, [but] the Castro way of life.” “He had one book. . . Das Kapital.” “Call [Richard Call, a fellow marine] used to call Oswald ‘Oswaldovich’ . . . We would call him ‘Comrade.’”¹⁴⁹

Additional marines, other than Delgado and Thornley, who give the lie to Garrison’s statement that Thornley was the only marine who told the Warren Commission that Oswald exhibited Marxist leanings: James Botelho: "Oswald referred...to 'American capitalist warmongers'...My impression is that although he believed in pure Marxist theory, he did not believe in the way Communism was practiced by the Russians."¹⁵⁰ Donald Camarata: "I personally observed that Oswald had his name written in Russian on one of his jackets, and played records of Russian songs."¹⁵¹ Paul Murphy: "While at Santa Ana [El Toro Marine Base], Oswald had a subscription to a newspaper printed in English which I believe was titled either 'The Worker' or 'The Socialist Worker.'...I am of the opinion that he was generally in sympathy with Castro."¹⁵² Richard Call: "Many members of the unit kidded him about being a Russian spy."¹⁵³ Erwin Donald Lewis: "I know from personal observation that he read the 'Daily Worker.'"^{154*}

Yet Garrison led his readers to believe that none of these statements existed, and Stone led his audience to believe that Oswald was a member of the right wing.

4. The reader of this book already knows the enormous amount of evidence that points irresistibly to Oswald's guilt. Everything he said, everything he did, all the physical and scientific evidence, points to him as the murderer of Kennedy. Unbelievably, other than alluding to Oswald's connection to the murder weapon, Stone's sense of history and honesty were such that he never mentioned even one piece of this evidence to his audience. (Evidence like Oswald carrying a large brown bag into the Book Depository Building on the morning of the assassination, his fingerprints and palm print being found at the sniper's nest, his being the only employee of the building to flee the building after the shooting, the provable lies he told during his interrogation, etc.—Stone presented none of this to his audience.) And even with this one exception of the murder weapon, Stone proceeded to make one misrepresentation after another not only to completely negate Oswald's connection to it, but to support Stone's own contention of a frame-up. Early in the film, the audience is told that the murder weapon was a Mannlicher-Carcano rifle that records showed had been mailed to Oswald's alias, A. Hidell. Garrison's assistant is shown asking Garrison why someone like Oswald would order a rifle through the mail that could be traced back to him when he could have bought it in Dallas and used a phony name. Garrison suggests, without any evidence to support him, that Oswald didn't order the weapon, that the order was made by others "to frame him, obviously."

But Stone was just getting started. With respect to the background photograph Marina took of Oswald holding the Carcano, Stone shows Oswald telling the Dallas police it was a fake photograph, that his head had been superimposed on someone else's body. He then shows Garrison's assistant telling Garrison that two photographic experts had confirmed it was a fake photo, Oswald's head being "pasted," she tells Garrison, on someone else's body. The audience isn't told that a panel of photographic experts for the House Select Committee on Assassinations confirmed that the photograph was genuine and that "it could find no evidence of fakery,"¹⁵⁵ nor are they told that Marina herself acknowledged that she took the photograph, nor that a copy of the photograph was determined by handwriting experts to have Oswald's handwritten inscription on the back of it, "To my dear friend George [de Mohrenschildt], from Lee." It was dated April 1963 and signed "Lee Harvey Oswald."¹⁵⁶ So apparently the framers of Oswald made the fake photo of him holding the rifle, and when he saw it (those who framed Oswald not only put together the fake photo of Oswald but made sure that he, the person being framed, got a copy of it so he would know what they were up to), he liked it so much that he decided to join in the frame-up of himself by writing an inscription on the back of it.

So Stone, with one falsehood after another, eliminated the Carcano rifle as a piece of evidence that incriminated Oswald.* The bottom line is that although it would be hard to find any criminal defendant, anywhere, against whom there was as much evidence of guilt as there was against Oswald, Stone never presented any of this evidence to his audience. Because nothing else demonstrates so clearly what a prodigious lie Stone's film was, it bears repeating in italics: Oliver Stone, in his movie JFK, never saw fit to present for his audience's consideration one single piece of evidence that Oswald killed Kennedy! So a murder case (the Kennedy assassination) where there is an almost unprecedented amount of evidence of guilt against the killer (Oswald) is presented to millions of moviegoers as one where there wasn't one piece of evidence at all. There oughta be a law against things like this.

As if the above is not outrageous enough, the preternaturally audacious Stone wrote in the January 1992 edition of Premiere magazine that he used his movie "as a forum for presenting all the evidence in the JFK case across the board."¹⁵⁷

5. In a similar vein to the above, several scenes in Stone's film show Dealey Plaza witnesses telling Garrison and his staff that the shots came from behind the picket fence on the grassy knoll. Not one witness is shown telling Garrison and his staff that the shots came from the Book Depository Building, where Oswald was. Stone's unenlightened audience could only assume from this that no witnesses to the assassination thought the shots came from the Book Depository Building, when in fact many witnesses did. Once again, Stone was changing reality for his unsuspecting audience.

6. With respect to the murder of Dallas police officer J. D. Tippit, JFK's audience is told that "one witness constituted the totality of the witness testimony identifying Lee Oswald" as Tippit's killer.

Stone has one scene where Oswald is shooting Tippit, and another where someone else is shown murdering him.† This, of course, is a monstrous deception. The reality is that a total of ten witnesses either saw Oswald kill Tippit or saw him with a gun at the Tippit murder scene or saw him running away—armed with a gun—from the vicinity of the murder scene.¹⁵⁸ Naturally, Stone never told his audience that four cartridge cases found near the Tippit murder scene were conclusively determined to have been fired in Oswald's .38 caliber Smith & Wesson revolver.

7. In the movie, the actor portraying Lee Bowers is shown testifying before the Warren Commission that at the time of the shooting in Dealey Plaza he saw a "flash of light and smoke" coming from behind the area of the picket fence. The audience is not told that in two statements made to the authorities on the day of the assassination, and in his Warren Commission testimony, Bowers said no such thing. Bowers, as we saw earlier in the text, made these claims for the first time more than two years later when he fell into the nimble hands of Mark Lane.

8. Julia Mercer, one of the zanies who emerged to tell their crazy stories about the assassination, is presented in the film as a perfectly believable witness who saw Jack Ruby behind the driver's seat of the truck parked on Elm before the assassination—the truck was holding up traffic—and saw another occupant of the truck take a rifle from the truck up the grassy knoll. (To clean up Mercer for his audience so she wouldn't come across as she was, goofy, Stone didn't have the actress portraying Mercer say, as Mercer did years earlier, that she thought the man with the rifle was Oswald. After all, Oswald was supposed to be inside the Book Depository Building at the time of the assassination, not the gunman behind the picket fence.)

Later in the film, the audience is told that Kennedy was killed by "professional" assassins. But what professional assassins, or any killer for that matter, would draw attention to themselves by parking halfway up on a curb on a street heavy with traffic as Elm was before the assassination? Or would such a “professional,” right in front of three police officers—Stone never told his audience about the officers—and witnesses in many passing cars, take the murder rifle off the truck and carry it up to the grassy knoll in plain view of all these people an hour and a half before Kennedy was scheduled to be driving by? Since this is a story that no one, not even a ten-year-old, would believe, why, Oliver, did you put it in your film? Is it because you subscribe to H. L. Mencken’s observation that no one has ever gone broke overestimating the unintelligence of the American people, and your audience was a microcosm of the American people? Or is it because you knew that your audience’s mind, at that point, would be so anesthetized by the avalanche of conspiracy preachments issuing from the mouths of Costner, Lemmon, Sutherland, and Matthau, all accompanied by seductively sinister and ominous background music, that none of them would see how your professional assassin story and Mercer’s story were absurdly inconsistent? But even if you insisted on having the loony Mercer tell her story to your audience, shouldn’t you have had the decency to also tell them that Dallas police officer Joe Murphy, one of the three officers, identified the stalled truck as belonging to a nearby construction company, that Murphy said there were three construction workers in the truck and none walked up the grassy knoll with a rifle or anything else, and that the truck, with all three men inside, was pushed away by another truck from the construction company?

9. Along with Julia Mercer, the even more pathetic Jean Hill, whom everyone, even her own husband, laughed at, is presented in the film as a totally credible witness. As discussed earlier in this book, she made a statement on the day of the assassination to the Dallas sheriff’s office and later gave testimony to the Warren Commission, and in neither instance did she claim to have seen anything of significance, other than thinking she saw someone who looked like Jack Ruby running from the direction of the Texas School Book Depository Building toward the grassy knoll. Neither did she say that she saw anyone firing a gun from the grassy knoll. Twenty-six years later she told the story, for the first time, that she “saw a man fire from behind the wooden fence” and added that she also saw “a puff of smoke.”¹⁵⁹ But in the movie, Stone has Hill telling all of these things just twenty minutes after the assassination. “I saw a flash of light in the bushes,” Hill’s character, played by Ellen McElduff, tells the movie audience, “and that shot just ripped his head off. I looked up and I saw smoke coming from over there on the knoll.” Stone then shows a scene where Hill is in an office being grilled by an intimidating plainclothes officer, not identified. When she tells him, “I saw a man shooting from over there, behind the fence. Now, what are you going to do about that? You gotta go out there and get him,” he responds loudly, hovering over her in a threatening way, “We have that taken care of.” He goes on to instruct her, almost angrily, “You only heard three shots [all of which, he had told her, “came from the Book Depository Building”], and you’re not to talk about this with anybody. No one. Do you understand me?”

How does Stone get around Hill’s not telling the Dallas sheriff’s office on the day of the assassination or the Warren Commission about seeing a man shoot Kennedy from behind the picket fence on the grassy knoll and seeing the flash of light and smoke there too? Easy. He does not tell the movie audience about the actual statement she made to the sheriff’s office. As far as Hill’s testimony before the Warren Commission is concerned, Stone has Hill tell his audience, “When I read my testimony as published by the Warren Commission, it was a fabrication from start to finish.”

Stone is so bad he makes the Mark Lanes and Robert Grodens of the world look like exemplars of honesty and rectitude.

10. In Stone's movie, U.S. Senator Russell B. Long of Louisiana tells Garrison, while on a plane flight with him, that three experts tried to duplicate what Oswald did, and "not one of them could do it." This, of course, is not true. As we have seen, one of the three not only duplicated what Oswald did, but fired better than Oswald did.

11. In the movie, Garrison's assistant, at the sixth-floor window with Garrison, tells Garrison, "Try to hit a moving target at eighty-eight yards through heavy foliage? No way." But the eighty-eight-yard shot is the fatal shot that hit the president in the head at the time of Zapruder frame 313. And from the window there's absolutely no obstruction, heavy foliage or otherwise, at frame 313. In fact, even as early as frame 210 all obstruction to view is gone.¹⁶⁰

12. Garrison's assistant adds, "There was a tree there blocking the first two shots." Wrong. The oak tree was not an obstruction at all for the shot at around frame 160 (only becoming an obstruction around frame 166), and the consensus of most experts who have studied the Zapruder film is that the second shot, the first shot that struck the president (in the upper right back), was fired between frames 210 and 225. By those frames, the leaves of the oak tree no longer obscured the view from the sixth-floor window.¹⁶¹

13. Garrison's assistant in the movie tells him that Oswald was "at best a medium shot." Senator Russell Long tells Garrison that Oswald was "no good" as a rifleman. Stone, of course, doesn't tell his audience that Oswald qualified as a sharpshooter with a rifle in the Marines.

14. Garrison's assistant also tells Garrison that it "takes a minimum of 2.3 seconds to recycle this thing [the Carcano]," that is, to pull the bolt back to reload, reaim, and fire. Stone does not tell his audience that the HSCA concluded that the 2.3-second minimum was only if a shooter of the Carcano used the telescopic sight on the rifle. "The committee test-fired a Mannlicher-Carcano rifle using the open iron sights. It found that it was possible for two shots to be fired within 1.66 seconds."¹⁶²

Clearly, judging from all of this so far, one has to be impressed with the superb work of the twelve people who Stone said diligently researched the facts and evidence for his film.

15. The audience in JFK is told that there were "three teams" of killers of Kennedy, all "professional riflemen" flown in from out of the country. One team, Garrison says in the movie, was in the Book Depository Building, another in the Dal-Tex Building, and the third team on the grassy knoll. He doesn't make it clear how many members there were for each team but says that there were "ten to twelve men,"* but only "three shooters." In addition, he speaks of "spotters" and men coordinating the shots by radio and by the signal of opening an umbrella. The three shooters, he says, fired six shots in a "triangulation of fire."

As the reader of this book knows, the Warren Commission concluded that the overwhelming evidence was that only three shots were fired in Dealey Plaza. And only three cartridge casings were found in Dealey Plaza. Even Warren Commission critic Josiah Thompson, in a study of 190 persons who were present at the time of the shooting and either testified before the Warren Commission or gave affidavits to the Commission on the number of shots fired, found that of the 172 who said they had an opinion, the overwhelming majority, 136, heard three shots. Do you know how many heard six shots, Oliver? Are you ready? Just one. And that was Jesse Price¹⁶³ (see endnote). But even if Price were as sober thinking as a judge, if 136 people in Dealey Plaza that day heard three shots, and only one heard six, whom is it more reasonable to believe? Everyone (except, apparently you, Oliver) would say the 136 people. How did you come up with your six shots, Oliver? What inside information did you have that no one else has?

Then Stone really outdoes himself. As indicated, Stone, in his movie, maintains that the three shooters were “professional riflemen.” And we know that these shooters would have been firing at relatively short distances—the two shots that hit Kennedy from the Book Depository Building being around only 59 and 88 yards; any corresponding shots from the grassy knoll being around 57 and 35 yards; and any from the Dal-Tex Building, around 80 to 110 yards. When a soldier “qualifies” with his rifle on the range, the shortest distance is 100 yards, and the distances go up to 500 yards. So, as Garrison tells the jury in the film, with the short distances and the limousine only traveling 11 mph, it was a “turkey shoot” to hit the president. In other words, to use another bird metaphor, the president was a “sitting duck.” But Oliver, did you take the time to read your own script? Remember that only the upper part of the president’s body was visible in the limousine, and the shooters would obviously be aiming at the president’s head, the most vulnerable part of his body. Now listen to what, in your movie, your protagonist, Garrison, tells the Clay Shaw jury about how Kennedy’s “professional riflemen” did in their “turkey shoot.” “The first shot misses the car completely.” Not only didn’t the bullet fired by one of the professional hit men hit Kennedy’s head, or even his upper body or torso, it missed the presidential limousine completely! “The second shot hits Kennedy in the throat” (still missing the target head). “The third shot hits Kennedy in the back” (again, missing the target head). “The fourth shot misses Kennedy and hits Connally in the back” (again, missing not only the target head, but even Kennedy’s upper body). “The fifth shot misses the car completely.” What? The professional hit men missed that very big car a second time? “The sixth shot,” which Garrison says was fired from the grassy knoll, was the “fatal shot” that “hits Kennedy in the head.” So Oliver, at a very short distance for any shooter, much less a professional, your “professional riflemen,” firing, as you say, at a very easy target to hit, actually missed the car completely on two out of six of their shots, missed Kennedy’s body three out of six times, and missed the target (Kennedy’s head) five out of six times! And these, Oliver, were the professional assassins hired, you say, by the military-industrial complex and the CIA to kill Kennedy? Oliver, didn’t this make you wonder if all your imaginings were silly beyond belief?*

16. Stone shows his audience a sketch drawn by Robert Groden of Kennedy and Connally in the presidential limousine in which Connally is seen seated directly in front of Kennedy. In the movie, Garrison then ridicules the “magic bullet” passing on a straight line through Kennedy’s body and then making a right turn in midair and left turn to strike Connally. But Oliver, even though Groden probably lied to you as he lied to his readers, if your twelve researchers had bothered to open up their eyes and look at any of the great number of photos of Kennedy and Connally in the presidential limousine, they would have seen that Connally was seated to Kennedy’s left front. And therefore, the “magic bullet” didn’t have to do anything magical at all in midair in order to go on and hit Connally. All it had to do, Oliver, is continue traveling on a straight line.

17. Although, as we know, there is absolutely no evidence that the so-called magic or pristine bullet (Commission Exhibit No. 399) that the Warren Commission concluded struck Kennedy and Connally was planted on Connally’s stretcher at Parkland Hospital, not to worry. Since conspiracy theorists firmly “believe” this, Stone validates their belief for his audience and removes all doubt by simply having a mysterious figure deposit the bullet on what appears to be Connally’s stretcher at the hospital.

18. Louis Witt was standing† on the edge of the grass next to the sidewalk on the north side of Elm Street close to the Stemmons Freeway sign at the time of the shooting in Dealey Plaza. As the president rode by, Witt opened his black umbrella and held it up over his head.¹⁶⁴† Even though Witt, the “umbrella man,” was located by the HSCA in 1978 and identified as a supervisor for a nearby insurance company who was on a lunch break waiting to heckle the president, Stone does not disclose this to his audience. Instead, Stone depicts the umbrella man as a member of the conspiracy who was never identified and who opens his umbrella as a signal to the assassins for them to start shooting at the president. In a statement to HSCA investigators and in testimony before the HSCA Witt said that he was a “very conservative Republican” who “never liked the Kennedys,” and the whole purpose of the umbrella incident was “to heckle the president’s motorcade... I just knew it [umbrella] was a sore spot with the Kennedys.” Witt explained that when JFK’s father was the ambassador to England, he and the prime minister (Neville Chamberlain, whose position at Munich Joe Kennedy had supported) were accused of appeasing Hitler, and the umbrella the prime minister brought back to England from Germany came to be a symbol, in Britain, of that appeasement. Witt had heard that people in Tucson or Phoenix had brandished umbrellas when “some members of the Kennedy family came through.”^{165*}

19. The movie audience is told that while William S. Walter, an FBI security clerk at the New Orleans field office, was on duty on the evening of November 17, 1963, five days before the assassination, he received a Teletype from FBI headquarters addressed to all special agents in charge of FBI field offices around the country, warning of a possible assassination attempt against President Kennedy during his trip to Dallas, and instructing them to contact criminal, racial, and hate-group informants in order to determine whether there was any basis for the threat. But, Garrison tells his staff in the film, Walter said that “nothing was done.” The audience isn’t told that Walter never came forward with his story about a Teletype until five years after the assassination, or that the FBI instituted an investigation at each of its fifty-nine field offices, which yielded no evidence indicating the existence of such a Teletype. Nor is the audience told that none of the more than fifty FBI employees of the New Orleans FBI field office stated they had any knowledge of the Teletype. Nor are they told that when Walter came up with an alleged replica of the Teletype, the FBI determined it was fraudulent because it varied in format and wording from the standard Teletype used at the time. The audience also was not told that the HSCA asked Walter in a March 23, 1978, deposition if he knew of anyone who could substantiate his allegation, and he mentioned his former wife, Sharon Covert, who worked at the New Orleans office with him at the time, but when the HSCA contacted her she said that Walter had never mentioned any such allegation to her. The HSCA concluded “that Walter’s allegations were unfounded.”¹⁶⁶ Unfounded to the FBI and HSCA, but certainly not to Oliver Stone or, for that matter, to the millions in his audience, who only heard Walter’s obviously fabricated and unchallenged story.

20. Students of Jim Garrison’s prosecution of Clay Shaw know that one of the key elements of Garrison’s case against Shaw, which was emphasized in Stone’s film, was Garrison’s allegation that Shaw’s homosexual alias around New Orleans was Clay Bertrand,† the name Shaw used when he allegedly conspired with Oswald and David Ferrie to assassinate Kennedy, and the name he used when he allegedly contacted New Orleans attorney Dean Andrews the day after the assassination to ask Andrews, who was in a hospital bed with pneumonia at the time, to represent Oswald. Garrison tried desperately to prove, during his investigation of Shaw and at Shaw’s trial, that Shaw, indeed, was Bertrand, but he failed miserably, not presenting one witness other than the completely discredited Perry Russo to testify that Shaw was Bertrand.

Dean Andrews was a very colorful, rotund, New Orleans attorney with a penchant for dark glasses and jive talk whom everyone liked and no one took too seriously. Andrews's testimony before the Warren Commission was what started the entire speculation that Clay Shaw was Clay Bertrand. Andrews told the Warren Commission he represented Oswald in the summer of 1963 in Oswald's effort to get rid of his "dishonorable discharge" from the Marines, adding that Oswald discussed with him his status as a citizen (since he had renounced his citizenship in Russia), as well as his wife's status in America. He said Oswald came into his office "accompanied by some gay kids... Mexicanos." Andrews said he assumed that Clay Bertrand had sent Oswald to him since Bertrand regularly called him on behalf of gay kids "either to obtain bond or parole for them," adding that he had done "some legal work" for Bertrand in the past, saying that he was "bisexual, what they call a swinging cat." Andrews, who allowed he had a "pretty vivid imagination," said that he didn't think he'd be able to find Bertrand (even though Bertrand was supposedly a law client of his), that he had last seen him about six weeks earlier in a New Orleans bar (whose name he couldn't recall) where "this rascal [Bertrand] bums out. I was trying to get past him so I could... call the Feebees [FBI]... but he saw me and spooked and ran."¹⁶⁷

The first law enforcement agency Andrews called about the Bertrand story was the Secret Service, on November 25, 1963, from his hospital bed. The Secret Service report of its interview of Andrews says the Andrews "seemed to feel that he had been previously contacted by Clay Bertrand with another case, but he could not place him or furnish any information to assist in identifying or locating him."¹⁶⁸ This was considerably different from what he told the Warren Commission eight months later, on July 21, 1964. And later in the day on November 25, he told the FBI agents who interviewed him at the hospital about Bertrand calling him to represent Oswald, but dramatically changed who Bertrand was, saying that Bertrand himself was a young man between the ages of twenty-two and twenty-three, and that the only time he had seen Bertrand was when "Clay Bertrand accompanied Oswald" to his office when Oswald was seeking Andrews's representation. There was no mention of having represented Bertrand in the past or having called him regularly on behalf of gay kids. And, oh yes, Clay Bertrand had blond hair and a crewcut and was around five feet seven inches tall.¹⁶⁹ A week later, Andrews told the FBI that Bertrand was "approximately six feet one inch to six feet two inches tall,"¹⁷⁰ having grown six or seven inches in eight days. But there were more miracles ahead. Andrews told the Warren Commission on July 21, 1964, that Bertrand was five feet eight inches tall,¹⁷¹ Bertrand somehow managing to shrink five to six inches in only seven months, a not inconsiderable feat.

When the FBI and Secret Service asked Andrews for any records to confirm that Oswald or Bertrand had ever been clients of his, he was unable to locate any pertaining to either of them, later telling the Warren Commission his office had been "rifled," but by whom he did not know.¹⁷²

No one believed Andrews's story—that is, except Jim Garrison, who was absolutely sure that there was a man in the French Quarter using the alias Clay Bertrand. Reportedly, in the fall of 1966 Garrison began to suspect that Bertrand was Shaw because from Andrews's testimony before the Warren Commission, one could infer that Bertrand was a homosexual and, of course, he had the same first name as Shaw—Clay. One of Garrison's assistants, Frank Klein, had noted that Clay Shaw lived in the French Quarter and was gay. With nothing more than this, Garrison was off and running.¹⁷³ And Garrison wouldn't even listen to his own staff. In a February 25, 1967, memorandum to Garrison, DA investigator Louis Ivon wrote, "To ascertain the location of one Clay Bertrand, I put out numerous inquiries and made contact with several sources in the French Quarter area... I'm almost positive from my contacts that they would have known or heard of a Clay Bertrand. The information I received was negative results. On February 22, 1967, I was approached by ‘Bubbie’ Pettingill in the Fountainbleau Motor Hotel...whom I had earlier contacted about Clay Bertrand. He stated that Dean Andrews admitted to him that Clay Bertrand never existed.”

Andrews would later say that he had several meetings about the assassination with Garrison at the old Broussard’s restaurant in New Orleans, the first on October 29, 1966. At a second meeting shortly before Christmas, 1966, and at subsequent ones, Andrews says that Garrison put pressure on him to admit that Clay Shaw was Clay Bertrand, but Andrews said he told Garrison he wasn’t. However, Garrison continued to persist, and Andrews would later tell a national TV audience, “[Garrison] wanted to shuck me like corn, pluck me like a chicken, stew me like an oyster.” Andrews said he “wanted to see if this cat [Garrison] was kosher.” Andrews’s plan? When Garrison wanted to know the identities of the male companions who accompanied Oswald to his office, Andrews only gave him one, a name he fabricated out of thin air—Manuel Garcia Gonzales. Surely enough, Garrison bit, and charged the fictitious Gonzales with selling narcotics so he could pick him up and interrogate him on what he, Garrison, was really concerned with. As New Orleans attorney Milton Brener writes, “Garrison was to become convinced that Manuel Garcia Gonzales was one of the assassins in Dallas and, apparently, for a time believed that he was the leader of the group and the prime culprit. Writing for Tempo magazine, an Italian publication, in April 1967, Garrison stated he would gladly give up Clay Shaw if he could but get hold of the true assassin—Manuel Garcia Gonzales.” When a man with the name Manuel Garcia Gonzales was thereafter arrested in Miami on the narcotics charge, Andrews told Garrison that he was the wrong Gonzales, that Garrison had “the right ha-ha but the wrong ho-ho.”¹⁷⁴

In On the Trail of the Assassins, Garrison only admits to having one meeting with Andrews about the Kennedy case, a lunch “in early 1967” at Broussard’s restaurant, and acknowledged that when he asked Andrews to identify Bertrand, Andrews responded, “I don’t know what he looks like and I don’t know where’s he’s at.” However, when Garrison, disbelieving Andrews, told Andrews he intended to call him before the grand jury and “if you lie to the grand jury as you have been lying to me, I’m going to charge you with perjury,” Andrews allegedly said, “If I answer that question... if I give you that name you keep trying to get, then it’s goodbye Dean Andrews. It’s bon voyage, Deano. I mean like permanent. I mean like a bullet in my head.”¹⁷⁵ One would think that such a statement (which was depicted in Stone’s movie) was powerful and important enough—being an implied admission that Shaw was Bertrand and reflecting Andrews’s belief that Shaw was connected to the assassination—for Garrison to memorialize in a memorandum to the file—that is, if it was actually made. But Steve Tilley, the chief archivist at the National Archives for the Kennedy assassination, said that no such record of the alleged meeting and conversation at Broussard’s appears “among the records of the New Orleans District Attorney or the papers of Jim Garrison” at the archives. In fact, Tilley said, “I was unable to locate any document that pertains to any conversation between Garrison and Andrews in a New Orleans restaurant.”¹⁷⁶

Indeed, the only record I could find of any interview of Andrews by the New Orleans DA’s office was an April 4, 1967, memorandum from DA investigator William Gurchich to Garrison about a March 2, 1967, interview of Andrews by Gurchich and Assistant DAs James Alcock, Richard Burns, and Andrew Sciambra. Andrews told his interviewers that he had seen photos of Clay Shaw but had never met him, and when he was shown several photographs of various persons, including Clay

Shaw, he could not identify any of them as being Clay Bertrand. He told his interviewers that Bertrand, like Shaw, had “grey hair” (in Andrews’s Warren Commission testimony, he said Bertrand’s hair was “sandy”) and he thought he “was bisexual” (Shaw was homosexual).¹⁷⁷

Andrews told the Shaw grand jury on March 16, 1967, that “you all want me to identify Clay Shaw as Clay Bertrand...and I can’t...I can’t connect the two.” But then he said, “I can’t say he is and I can’t say he ain’t.”¹⁷⁸ An angry Garrison, not believing Andrews, secured a five-count perjury indictment against Andrews that same day.¹⁷⁹ “Personally, I like Dean,” Garrison said. “Everyone does. But I have to show him I mean business.”¹⁸⁰ Andrews fought back, filing a $100,000 suit against Garrison for malicious prosecution, alleging that he personally told Garrison “that there was no connection between Clay Shaw and Clay Bertrand.”¹⁸¹

On June 28, Andrews testified again before the Shaw grand jury, this time saying that “I have never seen this man, Shaw, never talked to him. If this case is based on the fact that Clay Shaw is Clay Bertrand, it’s a joke...Clay Shaw is not Clay Bertrand.” Still hanging by a thread to part of his obvious fabrication, however, he added that Bertrand was really a friend of his named Eugene Davis, the owner of Wanda’s Seven Seas bar in the French Quarter, and it was really Davis who called him at the hospital to represent Oswald. How could Davis be Bertrand? The hipster lawyer said a woman “back in the ’50s at a fag reception...introduced me to Davis as Clay Bertrand.”¹⁸² On July 17, that thread finally broke and the pathetic Andrews called a press conference and not only confessed again that “Clay Shaw ain’t Clay Bertrand,” but finally admitted that Clay Bertrand “never existed,” saying he made the whole story up to get attention for himself. The next day, July 18, Garrison proceeded to file an additional perjury charge against Andrews for lying to the Shaw grand jury on June 28 that Bertrand was Eugene Davis.¹⁸³

Not even someone of Garrison’s rascality and deceit could find a way to use Andrews to his benefit at Shaw’s trial. Andrews testified for the defense that Clay Shaw was not Clay Bertrand, that he had never met or known Clay Shaw, and that the first time he had ever seen Shaw was “when I saw his picture in the paper in connection with the investigation” four years after Kennedy’s murder.

What about Andrews’s testimony before the Warren Commission that someone whose voice he recognized as Clay Bertrand’s called him on November 22 or 23, 1963 (“Friday or Saturday” he said), in a New Orleans hospital and asked him to defend Lee Harvey Oswald in Dallas? Andrews told the Shaw jury that he “never received a phone call from Clay Bertrand” when he was at the hospital. Indeed, he added, “No one called me to say that.” Of course, the very notion that Bertrand, whom the conspiracy theorists believe to be Clay Shaw, and whom they further believe conspired with Oswald to kill Kennedy, would hire a joke like Andrews to defend Oswald is crazy. If Bertrand were Shaw, and Shaw and Oswald conspired to kill Kennedy, obviously Shaw could be expected to do anything, including selling all or most of his holdings, to pay for the best possible legal representation for Oswald.

So who, if anyone, did call him at the hospital, and for what? Andrews testified that “the phone call I received was from Gene Davis [a friend] involving two people who were going to sell an automobile and they wanted the title and a bill of sale notarized.” Andrews said he was “under sedation” and “under the influence of opiates” and “using oxygen” at the hospital, and “elected [to take] a course that I have never been able to get away from.” He said, “I don’t know whether I suggested [to Davis after the discussion about the automobile sale], ‘Man, I would be famous if I could go to Dallas and defend Lee Harvey Oswald, or whoever gets that job is going to be a famous lawyer.” He said he never told the FBI or Warren Commission about Gene Davis because he did not want “to implicate an innocent man,” so he said, “I used the name Clay Bertrand as a cover to mentioning Gene Davis.” He had only heard the name Clay Bertrand once before in his life at the “fag wedding reception” thirteen years earlier when he claimed that Gene Davis, whom he already knew, was introduced to him as Clay Bertrand by a woman named Big Jo. But later in his testimony he acknowledged that “Clay Bertrand is a figment of my imagination.”^{184*}

When Garrison’s own chief trial prosecutor, James Alcock, asked Andrews on cross-examination if he remembered telling Warren Commission counsel Wesley Liebeler that he saw Clay Bertrand six weeks prior to his testimony before the Commission, Andrews responded that was just “huffing and puffing.”

“Huffing and puffing under oath?”

“Bull session.”

“Do you recall making that statement under oath?”

“I assume I must have made it.”

“That wasn’t correct, was it?”

“No.”

What about Andrews telling the Warren Commission that he called a fellow lawyer, Sam “Monk” Zelden, from his hospital bed on November 24 and asked Zelden if he wanted to go to Dallas with him to defend Oswald? “No explanation,” Andrews told the Shaw jury. “Don’t forget I am in the hospital sick. I might have believed it myself or thought after a while [that I had been] retained there, so I called Monk. I would like to be famous, too.”

Throughout Andrews’s testimony, the hip-talking lawyer had the courtroom erupting in laughter to the point of the bailiff saying, “Order, please.” A few examples: “Do you speak Spanish?” the judge asked Andrews. “Poco poco, loco, judge,” Andrews deadpanned. Claiming the attorney-client privilege in his alleged representation of Oswald, he said the answer to any question about it “might, may, might, tend, would or could” incriminate him. To his “I would like to be famous, too,” answer, he added, “Other than as a perjurer.” Andrews said he saw Oswald on TV in his hospital room when “he shot this guy Ruby.” (Say what?)

And Andrews is, according to many conspiracy theorists, one of the essential keys to solving the mystery of the Kennedy assassination. Andrews is so lacking in credibility that James Alcock acknowledged before the Shaw jury that Andrews’s entire story was fraudulent. Responding to Andrews’s claim that the reason he lied to the March 16, 1967, grand jury that he had actually met a man named Clay Bertrand on two occasions was that he was “hemmed in with that Warren Commission Report” that the grand jurors “were reading from while they were asking me questions,” and “there was no way I could get off the hook,” Alcock told Andrews, “Dean, the only one that hemmed you in was yourself when you lied under oath to the Warren Commission.”

But Andrews had the last word, and it stung Alcock and Garrison before the Shaw jury. “I told the DA’s office,” Andrews testified, “that Clay Bertrand wasn’t Clay Shaw before I went there [grand jury], but nobody believed me.”^{* 185} Alcock never even attempted a retort to this.

Oliver Stone, having to know full well that Clay Shaw was not Clay Bertrand, and that Andrews’s story was a fabrication, had an easy solution for convincing his audience that Andrews’s admission at the Shaw trial that Shaw wasn’t Bertrand was untrue. He simply invented a scene, during Shaw’s booking for Kennedy’s murder, where he has Shaw say something that Shaw never said—that his alias was Clay Bertrand. “Any aliases?” Stone’s movie audience hears the booking officer ask Shaw. “Clay Bertrand,” Shaw, after a pause, answers resignedly.

21. Garrison, in his book, and Stone, in his movie, depict David Ferrie as a frenzied and erratic Kennedy hater and anti-Communist who worked in New Orleans with a fiercely right-wing former FBI agent named Guy Banister† to train anti-Castro Cuban exiles at a camp just north of Lake Pontchartrain near New Orleans. The camp allegedly operated under the aegis of the CIA. It appears that Ferrie may have done some detective work at times for Banister’s detective agency. And both Ferrie and Banister were, indeed, actively involved in the anti-Castro movement, though the extent of their involvement has never been clearly quantified. However, this is just a diversion from the only matter that counts. There is no credible evidence that Oswald, Ferrie, and Shaw (Garrison’s three co-conspirators, whom Stone shows his audience together on the screen plotting Kennedy’s murder) ever knew each other. And no one, of course, ever asked Oswald if he knew Shaw or Ferrie, Shaw denied at his trial that he knew or ever met Ferrie or Oswald, and Ferrie denied, till the day he died, knowing Oswald or Shaw.^{186*} Granted, the denials would mean nothing if there was any credible evidence to the contrary, but there has never been. A scene in JFK showing Ferrie and Shaw cavorting at a homosexual party dressed in wild, transvestite garb is a Stone fabrication. In False Witness, Patricia Lambert writes that some pictures did surface nearly two years before the trial in a “widely read newsletter [May 12, 1967, issue of Councilor, a right-wing Shreveport, Louisiana, paper] published by a Garrison supporter” showing Shaw and a friend named Jeff Biddison, not Ferrie, “dressed in business suits with ‘mop-strand’ wigs on their heads.” In one of the pictures was “a former radio announcer who resembled Ferrie named Robert Brannon. . . Both Garrison and Shaw’s attorneys investigated the pictures, and Robert Brannon, who died in 1962, was positively identified by Mrs. Lawrence Fischer, who had been at the party, as well as by Robert Cahman of radio station WYES, who knew Brannon well. . . The pictures were taken around 1949 (before David Ferrie had moved to New Orleans) by photographer Miles De Russey at a party given by a Tulane University student.”¹⁸⁷

The proof, of course, that Ferrie and Shaw do not appear together in the subject photograph (or any other photograph) is that if they did, surely Garrison, who feverishly tried to link Ferrie to Shaw at Shaw’s trial, would have introduced it into evidence, but he did not. Nor did he make any reference to such a photo in On the Trail of the Assassins. Yet with Garrison himself serving as a consultant, Stone outrageously depicts Shaw and Ferrie apparently reveling in high badinage at a French Quarter party. And in Stone’s appearance before the National Press Club on January 15, 1992, he told the assembled media, “After the [Shaw] trial we came into possession of a picture that shows that Clay Shaw and David Ferrie were at a party together.”¹⁸⁸

When Garrison assistant John Volz asked Ferrie in a December 15, 1966, interview whether Ferrie would “be willing to submit to a polygraph” on all of his denials, Ferrie responded, “Certainly.” He said he would also “be willing to submit to truth serum. I have no hesitation at all.”¹⁸⁹ But Garrison’s office elected not to give Ferrie a lie detector test or any other kind of test. Not only, as indicated, did Ferrie deny ever having any contact with Oswald or Shaw, but Garrison’s own book, On the Trail of the Assassins, never makes any reference to Ferrie’s telling him or any member of his staff that he was involved in the assassination, had any knowledge of it, or even knew Shaw and Oswald. (That was for Garrison’s witness, Perry Russo, to do.) Yet, unbelievably again, Stone, who says he read On the Trail of the Assassins three times, paid a quarter of a million dollars for it, and based his movie primarily on it, invents a scene in a hotel room where Ferrie, in a highly agitated state, makes—by implication—a confession to Garrison and his assistants that he was a co-conspirator in Kennedy’s assassination. “I knew Oswald. I taught him everything,” Ferrie says. Ferrie goes on that he, Shaw, and Oswald were all members of the CIA, and that Shaw had him “by the balls” because of compromising photos Shaw had of him. Ruby, he says, was “a bagman for the Dallas mob.” Garrison asks Ferrie who killed Kennedy. Ferrie, apparently angry at the naivete of the question, yells out the very incriminating words, indicating he had personal knowledge of a conspiracy to kill Kennedy, “The shooters don’t even know. Don’t you get it?”

Ferrie’s contact at the DA’s office was Louis Ivon, one of Garrison’s investigators. Ivon worked hard to get Ferrie to cooperate with Garrison’s investigation and turn state’s evidence against Shaw. When Ferrie, within days of his death, called Ivon to complain about the media hounding him relentlessly since publication of a front-page article in the February 18, 1967, New Orleans States-Item with a photograph of Ferrie and captioned “Eyed as Pilot of ‘Getaway’ Craft-Flier,” Ivon put Ferrie up for two nights at a New Orleans motor hotel. The only reference to this in Garrison’s book was his writing that Ivon had rented a room for Ferrie at the “Fountainbleau Motel” under an assumed name on two separate nights, and Ivon had told Ferrie, “You call us anytime you need us, and we’ll give you a hand,” and suggested that Ferrie order whatever room service he wanted and that he try to relax. And the only reference in Garrison’s book to Ivon or anyone else in his office talking to Ferrie during this precise period about the assassination is Garrison’s saying that Ivon told Ferrie, “I only wish you were on our side. I can guarantee you that the boss would give his right arm to have your mind working with us.” No response from Ferrie is indicated, obviously meaning that nothing Ferrie said was of any significance.¹⁹⁰ In JFK: The Book of the Film by Stone and coauthor Zachary Sklar, the source for the conversation wherein Ferrie allegedly indicated he had personal knowledge of a conspiracy to kill Kennedy is listed as Louis Ivon. “At times, however, we had to put words in Ferrie’s mouth,” The Book of the Film concedes on page 88 to its very small number of readers. How nice. But Stone, of course, did not acknowledge this to the millions of people who saw his film.

Garrison’s book is close to four hundred pages of fluff and nonsense in which he desperately tries to convince his readers of a conspiracy to murder Kennedy. An implied confession from Ferrie to him and his assistants would have been the very centerpiece of his book. The highly incriminating words of Ferrie in Stone’s movie (“The shooters don’t even know. Don’t you get it?”) are not to be found anywhere in Garrison’s book because apparently even Garrison was unwilling to say that a man admitted complicity in a murder when he did not. But Oliver Stone had no such reservation. As indicated, Stone fabricated, for his audience, this dramatic admission by Ferrie of a conspiracy to kill Kennedy. Since I’m not a student of Hollywood films, I don’t know if JFK is a reflection on Oliver Stone’s other works, some of which, I’m told, are excellent. But if it is, the question has to be asked, Has there ever been a filmmaker who has taken more liberties with the truth? And does Stone have any qualms about what he did? Here’s what he told Newsweek: “Is Clay Shaw violated by my work? Is he going to come haunt me at night, drive me to the edge of madness? I have to live with my conscience and if I have done wrong, it’s going to come back on me. But John Kennedy might be in my dreams, too, saying, ‘Do it, go out there, find my assassins, bring them to justice.’”¹⁹¹

22. David Ferrie was found dead in his second-floor New Orleans apartment on the morning of February 22, 1967. In the movie, Ferrie, shortly after his “confession” to Garrison and his assistants, is shown being murdered by two Latin men who are forcing something down his throat. Suspicious, right? But that's only if you've already forgotten that Ferrie didn't confess to Garrison. Moreover, the coroner's report on the autopsy of Ferrie, conducted by Dr. Ronald A. Welsh, a pathologist for Orleans Parish, at 3:00 p.m. on February 22, 1967, listed the "Classification of Death" as "Natural"—that is, Ferrie had died from natural causes. The cause of death was a "rupture of berry aneurysm of Circle of Willis [a circle of blood vessels located along the undersurface of the brain between the brain and the skull base] with massive hemorrhage." Of course, aneurysms have been known to rupture from severe, blunt trauma, but the report said, "There are no external marks of violence on the body at any point" and "there are no evidences of trauma or contusions to the scalp at any point." Walsh found evidence of "hypertensive cardiovascular disease," indicating high blood pressure.^{192*}

As to Oliver Stone's showing his audience two men forcing something down Ferrie's throat, a sample of Ferrie's blood was taken on February 22 to determine the presence or absence of "alcohol, barbiturates, cyanide, heavy metals," or "caustic agents." The toxicology report dated February 24 from the Orleans Parish toxicologist, Dr. Monroe S. Samuels, and chemist, Angela P. Comstock, said the blood specimen "was negative" as to the presence of these substances.¹⁹³ Oliver Stone, naturally, did not furnish his audience with this information.

Ferrie had been under enormous stress from Garrison's investigation of him, and was angry about Garrison's harassment, which included staking out his apartment. "The DA's men established a 24-hour surveillance in the basement of a house across the street from Ferrie's apartment building where they set up motion picture cameras to record the movements in and out of Ferrie's building."¹⁹⁴ On February 17, Ferrie told Dave Snyder, an investigative reporter for the New Orleans States-Item, in a long interview that he was giving serious thought to filing a lawsuit against Garrison. Snyder noticed that Ferrie's "steps were feeble" and Ferrie said he had encephalitis (inflammation of the brain causing abnormal sleepiness). Ferrie told Snyder of his fear of arrest and his anger and bitterness over Garrison's accusations against him.¹⁹⁵

The following day, four days before Ferrie's death, Andrew Sciambra and Louis Ivon of the New Orleans DA's office went to Ferrie's apartment pursuant to Ferrie's telephone request that they do. Per their memorandum to Garrison of their interview of Ferrie, Ferrie said "that the reason he had called us was that he was getting concerned over our investigation. He had heard all kinds of rumors that he was going to be arrested and that he wanted to find out if these rumors were true." But the memo is silent as to what, if anything, Sciambra and Ivon told Ferrie in response to his question about whether the rumors were true. Sciambra, the writer of the memo, said that Ferrie had greeted him and Ivon at the bottom of the stairs to his apartment and told them he would follow them up the stairs because "it would take him some time to climb up the stairs as he was sick and weak and had not been able to keep anything in his stomach for a couple of days. He moaned and groaned with each step he took up the stairs." Once inside his apartment, Ferrie "laid down on the sofa...with two pillows under him" as they spoke to him. Sciambra went on to say he did not believe Ferrie was "as sick as he pretended to be," but did not spell out why he formed this opinion. During the interview, Ferrie complained that the media was "hounding him to death" and, indeed, a reporter from the New Orleans Times-Picayune called him shortly thereafter while they were there.

Ferrie cursed Jack Martin (true name, Edward Stewart Suggs), a part-time private detective and former friend of his (see later discussion), during the interview, saying Martin started the investigation of him because Martin was jealous of his relationship with attorney G. Wray Gill.*

Martin, he said, was trying to ruin him and was “a screwball who should be locked up.” When Sciambra asked Ferrie, “Dave, who shot the President?” Ferrie answered, “Well, that’s an interesting question and I’ve got my own thoughts about it.” Ferrie then proceeded to sit up and draw a sketch of Dealey Plaza and the Texas School Book Depository Building and “went into a long spiel about the trajectory of bullets in relation to the height and distance.” He then gave a “lecture on anatomy and pathology [and] named every bone in the human body and every hard and soft muscle area” and concluded that one bullet could not have caused all the damage the Warren Commission claimed it did. To the question of whether he knew Clay Shaw, Ferrie responded, “Who’s Clay Shaw?”

“How about Clay Bertrand?”

“Who’s Clay Bertrand?”

“Clay Bertrand and Clay Shaw are the same person,” Sciambra said.

“Who said that?”

“Dean Andrews told us,” Sciambra answered.

“Dean Andrews might tell you guys anything. You know how Dean Andrews is.”¹⁹⁶

Some time that same day, February 18, Ferrie went down to the FBI’s field office in New Orleans and told them he was a sick man, was disgusted with Garrison, intended to sue him for slander, and wanted to know what the bureau could do to help him “with this nut” Garrison.¹⁹⁷ Around that time, Ferrie was also suffering from severe headaches.¹⁹⁸ Carlos Bringuier, the anti-Castro activist with whom Oswald had the street confrontation in August of 1963, told author Gerald Posner he saw Ferrie two days before he died and “he looked real sick. He told me, ‘I feel very sick. I should be in bed. My physician told me to stay in bed. I have a big headache. Garrison is trying to frame me.’”¹⁹⁹ All of this tension—being a suspect in the murder of the president of the United States, particularly when you know the charge is spurious—may very well have contributed to his death. Dr. Ronald A. Welsh, who conducted the autopsy on Ferrie, told author Patricia Lambert that there was “scar tissue indicating that Ferrie had had another bleed, a small one, previously, . . . one or two of them at least two weeks before he died. This is a common occurrence with berry aneurysms. People have one or two before they blow out completely. . . His headaches were from the . . . early bleeds.”²⁰⁰

The last known person who spoke to Ferrie before he died was Washington Post reporter George Lardner Jr., who arrived at Ferrie’s apartment around midnight and stayed until almost 4:00 a.m. on the day Ferrie died. Ferrie told Lardner that he “didn’t know [Oswald] and had no recollection of ever meeting him,” and that Garrison’s investigation was a “witch hunt.”²⁰¹ The forty-eight-year-old Ferrie was found dead in bed around 11:40 a.m. later that morning, lying on his back under a sheet, nude, with two unsigned and undated typewritten notes nearby, one that began, “To leave this life is, for me, a sweet prospect,” and closed, “If this is justice, then justice be damned.” The other was addressed to “Dear Al” and read in part, “When you receive this I will be quite dead. . . I wonder how you are going to justify and rationalize things. . . All I can say is that I offered you love and the best I could. All I got in return, in the end, was a kick in the teeth. Hence, I die alone and unloved. . . I wonder what your last days and hours are going to be like. As you sow, so shall you also reap. Goodby, Dave.” “Al” is believed to be Al Beauboeuf, a homosexual companion of Ferrie’s to whom Ferrie left all his personal property in his will.²⁰²

On the day of Ferrie’s death, February 22, Garrison, calling Ferrie “one of history’s most important individuals,” told the media, “There is no reason to suppose there was anything but suicide involved.”²⁰³ Why, in Garrison’s mind, had Ferrie committed suicide? Garrison told reporters that Ferrie “knew we had the goods on him and he couldn’t take the pressure... A decision had been made earlier today to arrest Ferrie early next week” for being part of the conspiracy to murder Kennedy. “Apparently, we waited too long.”²⁰⁴ But this almost assuredly was not true, just loose talk on Garrison’s part. In his own book, where he discusses the circumstances of Ferrie’s death, he makes not the slightest allusion to having decided to arrest Ferrie. Indeed, he suggests the exact opposite. “With David Ferrie around to lead us, however unconsciously, to Clay Shaw... I knew we could have continued to develop an ever stronger case against Shaw. With Ferrie gone, it would be a lot harder.”²⁰⁵ Garrison’s lead prosecutor against Shaw, James Alcock, told author Patricia Lambert that “to my knowledge, there was no intent to arrest David Ferrie.”²⁰⁶

This is hardly surprising since, although Garrison suspected Ferrie of being somehow involved in the assassination, there was no evidence against Ferrie to base an arrest on. (Perry Russo’s allegation against Ferrie wasn’t made to Garrison’s office until February 25, three days after Ferrie’s death.) Former assistant Warren Commission counsel Wesley Liebler, who helped conduct the New Orleans phase of the investigation into Kennedy’s death, told the New York Times on the day of Ferrie’s death in 1967 that Edward Voebel, a high school classmate of Oswald’s, told local and federal investigators on the day of the assassination back in 1963 that he thought Oswald had served briefly in a New Orleans Civil Air Patrol unit commanded by Ferrie, and three days later they received reports that Ferrie had made a trip to Texas on the day of the assassination. “We checked all of this out, and it just did not lead anywhere,” among other things learning that Ferrie had gone to Houston rather than Dallas on November 22, 1963. “The FBI did a very substantial piece of work on Ferrie. It was so clear that he was not involved that we didn’t mention it in the Report. Garrison has a responsibility to indicate just why he thinks Ferrie might have been involved, and so far as I can determine he has given no reason.”²⁰⁷ But Garrison did not do this because he could not do this. All he could say to the media in a formal statement he issued to the press later on the day of Ferrie’s death was that “evidence developed by our office had long since confirmed that he was involved in events culminating in the assassination of President Kennedy.”²⁰⁸ But what could that evidence have been, particularly since, as indicated, Perry Russo had not yet surfaced with his totally discredited story about Ferrie conspiring with Shaw and Oswald?

Tom Bethell, the researcher and keeper of the files at the New Orleans DA’s office during this period, tells the story about Mark Lane coming into his office one day having been authorized by Garrison to look at Ferrie’s file. “You know, Mark,” Bethell told Lane, “the Ferrie file is embarrassing. There’s absolutely nothing in it of any importance”—by that, he told me, he meant that the DA’s office had “nothing at all connecting Ferrie to the assassination.” Lane responded that if anyone else looked at the file and couldn’t find anything of any value, “just tell them the important stuff is kept in a different file.” Bethell told me that this “convinced me that Lane wasn’t troubled at all by the fact that Garrison was proceeding against Ferrie without any evidence.”²⁰⁹

In fairness to Oliver Stone, just as the New Orleans coroner’s medical conclusion that Ferrie died from a ruptured blood vessel in the brain virtually forecloses his having been murdered, if, indeed, the two notes found in his room were suicide notes, they would likewise virtually* foreclose his having died, as the coroner said, from a ruptured aneurysm in the brain. Whether the notes were, in fact, suicide notes is not completely clear, though the “To leave this life” one obviously goes in that direction. Of course, Ferrie was in very ill health at the time of his death, and he may very well have written the subject notes at some earlier time in possible contemplation of impending death. In any event, there is absolutely no evidence that David Ferrie was murdered. But in Oliver Stone's fine hands, there is no question that he was. Stone shows Ferrie being murdered (which, as we've seen, even Stone's hero, Garrison, didn't believe), obviously to silence him before he elaborated on his incriminating statements to Garrison, statements we know he never made.

23. In the movie, Jack Martin (played by Jack Lemmon), a down-and-out alcoholic private eye sidekick to Guy Banister, 'fesses up to Garrison at a racetrack (and why would any moviegoer disbelieve Jack Lemmon?) that at one time or another he had seen Oswald, Ferrie (whom, as indicated, he actually did know), and Shaw together in Banister's office. Garrison, in On the Trail of the Assassins, says that in late 1966 Martin told him about seeing Ferrie and Oswald in Banister's office in the summer of 1963.²¹⁰ Martin didn't say anything about seeing Clay Shaw there, but no problem. In his movie, Oliver Stone decided to gratuitously toss in Shaw for good measure.

Naturally, Stone doesn't tell his audience that Martin's credibility was so bad that as desperate as Garrison was to show the Shaw jury that his three alleged co-conspirators knew each other, he never called Martin to the stand during Shaw's trial to tell the jury what Stone had Martin (Lemmon) tell his audience. That tells you more than anything just how total Martin's lack of credibility was. In the previously mentioned, secretly taped conversation in the law office of Hugh Exnicios (the lawyer representing Ferrie's friend, Al Beauboeuf, a potential witness at the time in Garrison's investigation of Clay Shaw) with Garrison investigator Lynn Loisel on March 10, 1967, when Loisel mentions an "informer," Exnicios asks, "You're talking about Jack Martin?"

Loisel: "No, no, no. Phew...that sack of roaches...believe you me, anything that he said, 99 percent of it was checked out to be false, you know, made-up, lies, jealousy, everything else. Oh, boy."

Exnicios: "I'm glad to hear that it's not Jack Martin."

Loisel: "Man, we will be torn to pieces, but not like that."²¹¹

So Oliver Stone's own protagonists, Garrison and his staff, didn't believe a word that Martin said, yet Stone presented Martin to his audience, unchallenged, as a highly believable witness who had seen Oswald, Ferrie, and Shaw together. And of course Stone doesn't tell his audience that Martin had been in mental wards in two states, including the psychiatric ward of Charity Hospital in New Orleans in 1957.²¹² When FBI agents went to the hospital on January 17, 1957, to speak to him about his claim he was an FBI agent, his psychiatrist informed them that Martin was suffering from a "character disorder," and that an interview of him by the agents might prolong his hospitalization. Indeed, people like Aaron Kohn, managing director of the Metropolitan Crime Commission in New Orleans, as well as others routinely described Martin as a "mental case."²¹³ Yet Garrison himself implicitly acknowledges that Martin is the person whose information started his aborted investigation of the assassination in November of 1963, and his full-scale investigation in December of 1966.^{214*}

Naturally, Stone also didn't tell his audience that the HSCA thoroughly investigated Martin's allegations and concluded that "in light of Martin's previous contradictory statements to authorities shortly after the assassination in which Martin made no such allegation about having seen Oswald [in Banister's office], it may be argued that credence should not be placed in Martin's statements to the committee."²¹⁵

24. Without having any evidence to support their suspicions, for years conspiracy theorists have believed that the militantly anti-Communist and anti-Castro Guy Banister, who retained his connections to the intelligence community when he retired from the FBI in 1954, played some type of undefined role in the assassination, the various players in the assassination (Oswald, Ferrie, Shaw) being connected to each other through him. Stone tried his best to link Oswald to Banister and hence prove that Oswald was really right wing, not Marxist, and Oswald to the CIA, which undoubtedly had a hand in the paramilitary anti-Castro activities being partly coordinated out of Banister's office. Garrison is shown in the movie taking two of his assistants to the corner of Camp and Lafayette streets one Sunday morning and pointing out that the office address Oswald used on his Fair Play for Cuba leaflets was 544 Camp Street in New Orleans. (Actually, Oswald only used this office address on some of the leaflets. Other addresses he used were his home address and his post office box number. Number 544 Camp Street was a block away from where he worked at the Reily coffee company.) Garrison (Kevin Costner) then notes that 531 Lafayette Street, the address for Banister's office, is around the corner in the same building (Newman Building), and "both addresses go to the same place, Banister's office upstairs." But they didn't. As Joe Newbrough, a private detective in Banister's office, told Frontline in 1993, 544 Camp Street and 531 Lafayette had "totally separate entrances, and [were] probably 60 steps apart." He said that once you entered 544 Camp Street, you could not, from there, get to Banister's office. The Camp Street entrance, he said, "went strictly to the second floor of the building... You had to exit the second floor to the sidewalk, walk around the corner, and go into Banister's office."²¹⁶

The three-story Newman Building on the corner of Camp and Lafayette has long since been replaced by the Federal Courthouse, which takes up the whole block, but in 1996 author Patricia Lambert asked New Orleans Times-Picayune assistant metro editor David Snyder, who covered the Shaw trial and was very familiar with the old Newman Building, if Newbrough was correct, and he verified for her that Banister's Lafayette Street offices were not linked interiorly with those of 544 Camp Street.²¹⁷

Stone's twelve researchers, of course, couldn't find out this information for their audience, even though much of JFK was filmed in New Orleans. In fact, when Garrison, in the film, tells the two members of his staff that both addresses led directly to Banister's office, it is presented as a very important revelation. In any event, the Secret Service interviewed three tenants of 544 Camp Street who were there during the summer of 1963. None had ever seen Oswald at 544 Camp. Also, Sam Newman, the owner of the building, told the FBI that he had never rented an office in his building to Oswald or the Fair Play for Cuba Committee, and never recalled seeing Oswald in his building.²¹⁸ Newman likewise told the Secret Service that not only had he never rented an office in his building to Oswald and had never seen Oswald in the building, but he hadn't even rented space in the building to anyone new since around September 1962, which is before Oswald returned to New Orleans.^{219*} The Warren Commission concluded there was no evidence that either "the Fair Play for Cuba Committee [or] Lee Harvey Oswald ever maintained an office" at 544 Camp Street.²²⁰

25. In a scene from JFK, one Beverly Oliver, who sang in a strip club (the Colony Club) located next to Jack Ruby's Carousel Club in Dallas at the time of the assassination, tells Garrison that she used to go to Ruby's club a lot, and one time at the club Ruby introduced her to Oswald and Ferrie. Very predictably, the Warren Commission heard allegations and rumors that Oswald was seen with Ruby at one or the other of Ruby's two clubs in Dallas, but we have already seen that after a very thorough investigation, which included interviewing employees of Ruby's and going to the sources of the allegations and rumors, the Commission found no merit to any of them and concluded that there was no credible evidence Ruby and Oswald knew each other or had ever had any contact with each other.²²¹ Stone didn't bother, of course, to tell his audience any of this. Nor did he tell them that no one, other than Beverly Oliver, had ever put Ruby and Oswald together at one of Ruby's clubs, never mind in the presence of Ferrie too.

Perhaps more importantly, Stone didn't tell his audience just who Beverly Oliver (portrayed in the movie by actress Lolita Davidovich) is. She is not one of the people the Warren Commission spoke to for the simple reason that she never surfaced in the assassination conspiracy miasma until 1970, when she claimed to be the "Babushka Lady." Around frame 55 of the film taken by Dealey Plaza spectator Mary Muchmore is seen a woman (with her back to Muchmore's camera) standing near the curb on the south side of Elm Street right around the time of the president's fatal head shot. Her arms are raised toward the front of her face, and the impression is that she is holding something in her hands, such as a camera or, more unlikely (since she is so close to the presidential limousine), binoculars.²²² What tantalized conspiracy theorists for years was the possibility that the unidentified lady had additional motion-picture footage of the assassination. Because she was wearing a brown coat and a triangular scarf, the type of scarf popular with Russian women and known as a babushka, she became known as the Babushka Lady. Beverly Oliver met conspiracy theorist Gary Shaw at a church revival in Joshua, Texas, in 1970 and told him she was the Babushka Lady, though she has never proved to most people's satisfaction that she was even in Dealey Plaza that day. Her story was that she was using a new, Super-8 Yashica movie camera that day, and that after the assassination two men who identified themselves as FBI agents came over to the Colony Club and asked for her undeveloped film, which they said they would return to her in ten days. She turned her film over to them without getting a receipt or their names. She said she never saw the film again nor did she make any inquiries about it.²²³ Among other problems with her story, such as her coming forward seven years later, assassination researcher Jerry Ruffner contacted Yashica and learned it "did not put a Super-8 camera on the [U.S.] market until 1969," six years after the assassination.²²⁴

When confronted with this fact, Oliver, who apparently is as elusive as mercury, responded with a written article in 1993 to those who questioned her veracity, by saying the camera "might not have even had a manufacturer's model name on it... Yashica, Fushika, who really cares what kind of camera it was... I had a new camera a friend gave me, saying it was 'experimental,' a camera which no one else in Dallas had at the time." She went on to say that she was seventeen years old at the time, and then proceeded to bury the Babushka Lady controversy by contradicting what she first told Gary Shaw and what she said, as late as 1988, in the British television production The Men Who Killed Kennedy. Oliver said the woman identified by Shaw in his book Cover-Up as the Babushka Lady "is not me." * However, she maintained that she was in Dealey Plaza at the time of the assassination, though conveniently neglecting to say where she was located on Elm Street, and "filmed the entire motorcade sequence in graphic horror as it drove through Dealey Plaza down Elm Street."²²⁵

About the Ruby, Oswald, and Ferrie sighting, Oliver told conspiracy researchers in 1971 that several weeks before the assassination, an acquaintance of hers, a stripper known as Jada (Janet Adams Conforto), was seated at a booth of the Carousel Club with Ruby and another man. When Oliver sat down with them to have a drink, Oliver says Ruby introduced the man as "Lee Harvey Oswald of the CIA."²²⁶ But Jada told the FBI in 1963 that she had never seen Oswald with Ruby at the Carousel Club or anywhere else.²²⁷ Oliver later embellished her story to the conspiracy researchers by saying that David Ferrie, who we know lived in New Orleans, was so frequently at Ruby's club in Dallas in 1962 and 1963 that she took him to be the "Assistant Manager." To my knowledge no one else has ever put Ferrie in Ruby's club.*

Since emerging in 1970, Oliver has been a permanent fixture with the fringe element of the conspiracy community, and when not traveling with her preacher-husband on the itinerant, Southern Baptist revival circuit, she has been a drawing attraction at some buff conventions. Among other things, she claims that she and her first husband, a well-known Texas gangster named George McGann ("a man who earned his living in the mob, killing people," she says) who was gunned down in a gangland killing in Lubbock, Texas, in 1970, had a two-hour private meeting with Richard Nixon in a Miami hotel right in the midst of his 1968 campaign for president.²²⁸ When, on August 6, 1990, a twenty-nine-year-old unemployed Texas salesman named Ricky White called a press conference at the JFK Assassination Information Center in Dallas claiming his father, Roscoe White, a deceased Dallas police officer, was the grassy knoll gunman who had killed Kennedy, the obliging Beverly Oliver stepped forward to claim that, indeed, she had seen Roscoe White, in his uniform, walking away from the grassy knoll after the shooting that day.

Only the lunatic fringe of the conspiracy movement listens to a word Beverly Oliver has to say. Respected and meticulous conspiracy theorist Paul Hoch referred to her as having "very low inherent credibility" in an April 3, 1977, letter he wrote to U.S. Representative Christopher Dodd of the HSCA. The HSCA, which interviewed a considerable number of nuts and kooks in its investigation of the assassination and mentioned them in its volumes, felt that Oliver's credibility was so bad that an interview of her by a staff attorney on March 17, 1977, wasn't worthy of mention.

As indicated, no one had ever put Ruby, Oswald, and Ferrie together. But Beverly Oliver did. The woman who filmed the assassination with a camera that did not exist at the time, who had a two-hour tête-à-tête with Richard Nixon in the middle of his 1968 presidential campaign, who saw a fictitious assassin leaving the grassy knoll after the president was shot, whose credibility is so low that even most mainstream conspiracy theorists totally disregard her, was presented by Oliver Stone to his audience as an unchallenged, unimpeachable witness who had drinks with Ruby, Oswald, and Ferrie in Ruby's club before the assassination. Again, there oughta be a law against this type of thing.

By the way, Beverly Oliver co-wrote, with Coke Buchanan, her autobiography, Nightmare in Dallas, in 1994. Seeing the obvious benefit of being the Babushka Lady, she changed her story, once again maintaining that she was.²²⁹ Though Ms. Oliver is confused as to who she is, I am not. She is someone without one ounce of credibility in the Kennedy case. But not to Oliver Stone. In her book she points out that she was a paid "technical consultant" to Stone in JFK, and proudly displays a smiling Stone warmly embracing her on the Dallas set of the movie.

26. In a JFK movie scene, Jack Ruby tells Chief Justice Earl Warren, "Mr. Chief Justice, do you understand that I cannot tell the truth here, in Dallas? That there are people here who do not want me to tell the truth. My life is in danger. If I am eliminated, there won't be any way of knowing any bit of the truth... And consequently, a whole new form of government is going to take over the country." Ruby begs Warren to take him to Washington, D.C., where he can tell the truth. What is the truth Ruby wants to tell? Well, if you're watching the movie, there can be no doubt what it is. That Ruby was a part of a conspiracy, and that he silenced Oswald for those who got him to do it. And that he can identify these people and expose the conspiracy only if he is taken to Washington. But as we have seen, in his actual testimony before the Warren Commission Ruby clearly and unequivocally told

Warren “there was no conspiracy,” and “I am as innocent regarding any conspiracy as any of you gentlemen in this room,” and “no one else requested me to do anything. I never spoke to anyone about attempting to do anything. No subversive organization gave me any idea. No underworld person made any effort to contact me. It all happened that Sunday morning.” Stone, naturally, didn’t show his audience Ruby telling Warren any of this, deliberately and inexcusably misleading them to further the thrust of his movie. Stone also doesn’t tell his audience, of course, about all of Ruby’s psychotic ramblings in his testimony before the Warren Commission.

If the reader is not already completely disgusted by, and revolted with, Oliver Stone and his movie, I can’t imagine why not. But read on.

27. Stone was confronted with a real dilemma on how to handle Perry Russo, Jim Garrison’s star witness at Clay Shaw’s trial. He very much wanted to include Russo’s testimony that he was present in David Ferrie’s apartment in mid-September of 1963 and heard Ferrie, Shaw (using the alias Clay Bertrand), and Oswald conspire to kill Kennedy. But even as outrageously dishonest about the facts as he was willing to be, Stone knew that he couldn’t present Russo’s testimony without some mention of the fact that, as previously noted, Russo only said this (and then only after leading questions) after he was put under the influence of sodium pentothal and then hypnosis. Even if Stone thought he could get by with not mentioning Russo’s first four interviews, Stone would have to at least mention the sodium pentothal and hypnosis. It just was too well known for even him to ignore. What to do? Not to worry. Stone simply eliminated Perry Russo as a character in his movie and substituted in his place a fictitious homosexual prostitute (which Russo was not) named Willie O’Keefe, who in the movie tells Garrison that Shaw had paid him for sex on several occasions. Through Stone’s device of substituting a fictitious character for Perry Russo, he thereby succeeded in putting on screen his and Garrison’s three co-conspirators together in Ferrie’s apartment in New Orleans talking about killing Kennedy, and with O’Keefe witnessing it all, without having any of the considerable baggage that Perry Russo, who has been completely discredited, would have brought to the movie.

After excoriating the Warren Commission for its fraudulent investigation, Walt Brown, a leading conspiracy theorist, writes, “By the time of [Oliver] Stone’s December 20, 1991, release of ‘JFK,’ the public was ready for a dose of reality, and they got it.” What?! How, one may ask, could an intelligent person like Walt Brown, who has a PhD in American history from the University of Notre Dame, who has written books on the assassination, and who, I believe, does want to know the truth, write something like this? I do not have the answer to that question, except to say that, as Cole Porter lyricized about people in love (and Brown and his fellow travelers are hopelessly in love with the notion of a conspiracy in the Kennedy assassination), “Smoke Gets in Your Eyes.”

28. If there is a high-water mark in Stone’s tapestry of lies about the case, it is perhaps when Garrison goes to Washington, D.C. (Stone probably had in mind Jimmy Stewart’s character in Frank Capra’s Mr. Smith Goes to Washington). There’s a scene on a bench near the Lincoln Memorial in which Garrison has a meeting (with a character who only refers to himself as “X”) that Stone admittedly invented virtually out of whole cloth. “Garrison’s meeting with X did not happen,” Stone acknowledged on Nightline on December 19, 1991. The idea of X and the military-industrial complex’s involvement in the assassination came from one of Stone’s movie advisers, former Air Force Colonel Fletcher Prouty, who is referred to earlier in this book and who never met Garrison in real life. “X is primarily Fletcher Prouty,” Stone told the National Press Club on January 15, 1992. Prouty, indeed, has always claimed to have the same military background that X told Garrison he, X, had. But as we saw earlier in the book, Prouty's credibility about his background is highly suspect.

In the movie, X (played by Donald Sutherland) presents himself as a former member of U.S. military intelligence who tells Garrison he was "one of the secret guys in the Pentagon who supplied military hardware" for, he says, "Black Operations, Black Ops—assassinations, coup d'états, rigged elections" in foreign countries, and tells Garrison, in a fourteen-minute monologue that may be the longest peroration in motion picture history, the "why" of the assassination. X starts by telling Garrison that because of the Bay of Pigs fiasco (the CIA-sponsored invasion of Cuba in 1961 to oust Castro), Kennedy was very upset with the CIA, and shortly thereafter (June 28, 1961) National Security Action Memorandums (NSAMs) numbered 55, 56, and 57 were signed by McGeorge Bundy, Kennedy's foreign affairs adviser. X said the memos provided that from that point on "the Joint Chiefs of Staff would be wholly responsible for all covert, paramilitary action in peacetime. This basically ended the reign of the CIA," he adds, and the agency was outraged and therefore wanted Kennedy eliminated. Apart from X's irrational non sequitur, X's statement in the film is a lie. NSAM 55 doesn't even deal with the issue, and NSAM 56 suggests no such thing, merely saying that "it is important that we anticipate now our possible future requirements in the field of unconventional warfare and paramilitary operations... The President requests that the Secretary of Defense, in coordination with the Department of State, and the CIA, make such an estimate of requirements." Only NSAM 57 specifically deals with the issue, but it says the precise opposite of what Stone has X tell Garrison in the film. It provides in paragraph 2(a) that "the Department of Defense will normally receive responsibility for overt paramilitary operations. Where such an operation is to be wholly covert or disavowable, it may be assigned to CIA, provided it is within the normal capabilities of the agency."

Additionally, though Kennedy was very upset with the CIA over its bungling of the Bay of Pigs invasion, and "allowed" its leaders, including the director himself, Allen Dulles, to resign in the aftermath of the debacle, his animus toward the agency was not long-lived, and his overall relationship with the CIA was good. (See discussion on this issue in the "CIA" section.)*

Then X, with the slight, confident smile of a lunatic, tells Garrison that "the Warren Commission is fiction," and proceeds to go beyond the CIA and lay out the principal reason for the assassination. It coalesces with the opening scene of the movie where President Dwight D. Eisenhower, in his farewell address to the nation on January 17, 1961, warns of the "acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex" in our society. X tells Garrison that the "power structure" was behind Kennedy's assassination and it was a "coup d'état... President Kennedy was murdered by the highest levels of our government." "Who benefitted?" X asks Garrison, the only message being that whoever did must have killed Kennedy. X lectures that "the organizing principle of any society is for war. War is the biggest business in America, and Kennedy wanted to end the cold war... He signed a treaty with the Soviets to ban nuclear testing, he refused to invade Cuba in 1962 [Cuban missile crisis], and he set out to withdraw from Vietnam. All of that ended on November 22, 1963."

There's a fictitious scene in the movie of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in the presence of white-collared business executives, angrily denouncing Kennedy's policies. It is clear, X tells Garrison, that they hate him, as do the captains of industry—"defense contractors, big oil, bankers"—because without war, they'll lose "big money, a hundred billion dollars." In short, the military-industrial complex wanted, needed war, and Kennedy wanted to end the Vietnam War, so they decided to kill him.† Just like that. As I said earlier in this book, that's what we do in America. If the president is pursuing policies that members of a certain segment of our society, like Wall Street, the unions, or the military, don't like, why they simply kill him. Of course.

And of course, not one member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff or one corporate leader would ever think of not going along with this plan to murder the president and instead alert the president or call the authorities. After all, what's the big deal about joining in a conspiracy to murder the president of the United States? If any reader of this book were on the Joint Chiefs of Staff or a corporate leader and the president's policies were going to interfere with your objectives or cut into your profits, you wouldn't think twice about conspiring to murder him, would you? More seriously, even if we imagine the unimaginable, that the Joint Chiefs of Staff and leaders of American industry were crazy enough to be willing to murder Kennedy because of his plan to end the cold war, would they be so crazy as to not at least first try to beat him at the ballot box by putting all their money, power, and influence behind his opponent when he came up for reelection in just one year? Or if not that, where is there any evidence that the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the titans of industry first demanded an audience with the president and tried to talk him out of his expected (in their minds, if we accept Stone's thesis) withdrawal from Vietnam? Instead, Stone simply shows his audience several bemedaled generals in a smoke-hazed room profaning Kennedy and boozing it up as they set in motion the murder of their commander in chief. Stone adopts the military-industrial-complex theory of the assassination as the principal theme of his film, ostensibly superseding the Shaw-Ferrie-Oswald troika, unless there was a connection between the two groups, which Stone never indicates to his audience.

Since we know that the conversation between X and Garrison never took place and was invented by Stone for his movie, and inasmuch as no one has ever produced one single particle of evidence that the military-industrial complex was behind Kennedy's assassination, no further discussion of the issue is really necessary. However, even though the military-industrial-complex-killing-Kennedy theory is offensive to one's intelligence, because of Stone's movie ("What makes Stone so dangerous," a Hollywood producer acquaintance of mine told me, "is that he's a great filmmaker. He makes his films believable"), millions of otherwise intelligent Americans now subscribe to it. A representative example: In a November 1999 Playboy interview, the savvy governor of Minnesota, Jesse Ventura, was asked, "Who do you think killed President Kennedy?" He replied, "The military-industrial complex. I believe Kennedy was going to withdraw us from Vietnam and there were factions that didn't want that."²³⁰ So even though Stone invented the conversation on the bench, and there's no evidence the military-industrial complex had anything to do with the assassination, because the theory has taken hold in the conspiracy community and among many Americans, let's examine the allegation as it was presented in the movie.

X tells Garrison that the objectives of the military-industrial complex in murdering Kennedy worked. He tells Garrison that Kennedy had a "plan for getting all U.S. personnel out of Vietnam by the end of 1965" and that NSAM 263, signed on October 11, 1963, "ordered home the first 1,000 troops" of the 16,500 military advisers then in Vietnam* by the end of 1963. X says that four days after the assassination, "Lyndon Johnson signs National Security [Action] Memo 273, which essentially reverses [Kennedy's] withdrawal policy."

So Stone wanted his audience to believe that the issue was very clear-cut: Kennedy wanted to withdraw from Vietnam (NSAM 263 spelled out his intentions), he was murdered because of it,* and shortly after his murder, LBJ, by NSAM 273, set aside Kennedy's plans. But that doesn't begin to tell the story of what really happened. If Stone had told it, his whole thesis would have crumbled. In the first place, even though NSAM 273 was issued under President Johnson on November 26, 1963, four days after Kennedy's death, the draft, containing the identical language in its relevant clauses, was prepared by McGeorge Bundy, Kennedy's special assistant for national security affairs, on November 21, 1963, while Kennedy was still president.²³¹ † So no inference can be drawn that after Kennedy died, Johnson, by NSAM 273, changed course.

Few question that Kennedy did not want to employ combat troops in Vietnam. "Kennedy had no intention of dispatching ground forces to save Vietnam," says historian and JFK special assistant Arthur Schlesinger Jr. "Having watched the French Army fail in Vietnam. . . , he had no desire to send the American Army into the same quagmire."²³² General James M. Gavin wrote in the Saturday Evening Post that "having discussed military affairs with [Kennedy] often and in detail for fifteen years, I know he was totally opposed to the introduction of combat troops in Southeast Asia."²³³ Roger Hilsman, Kennedy's assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern affairs, says that "on numerous occasions President Kennedy told me that he was determined not to let Vietnam become an American war. He agreed to have Americans serve as advisers. . . but he refused every suggestion to send American combat forces."²³⁴ And the National Security Action Memorandums, all of which had to express his will, clearly show he wanted to withdraw from Vietnam. Indeed, Kennedy's intent to withdraw from Vietnam can be traced as far back as May 8, 1962, when his secretary of defense, Robert McNamara, in Saigon attending the fifth of eight SECDEF (Secretary of Defense) conferences held on the Vietnam War during the Kennedy presidency, ordered General Paul D. Harkins, commander of the Military Advisory Command in Vietnam, to start working on a plan to remove all American military advisers from Vietnam.

None of this, however, is synonymous with saying that irrespective of circumstances, Kennedy would have withdrawn and would never have employed American combat troops as his successor eventually did. Presidents, like all humans, often do things they had hoped they'd never have to do. Lawrence Freedman, professor of war studies at King's College, London, says in his book, Kennedy's Wars, that "to get out of Vietnam was less of a decision" for JFK "than a working assumption" that the South Vietnamese government, whose side we supported, would be able to repel the Vietcong (South Vietnam Communist guerrilla rebels) with U.S. military assistance. But he goes on to say that "it requires something of a leap of faith to assume that Kennedy would have stuck to a predetermined policy come what may. This was, after all, a man who prized flexibility and keeping open all options."²³⁵

It would be nice, one could say, if Kennedy himself had told us if he'd ever be willing to employ American combat troops in Vietnam. Well, he did, on the last day of his life. In the already prepared text of the speech Kennedy was scheduled to give at the Dallas Trade Mart after the motorcade through Dealey Plaza, Kennedy suggests he would have used American combat troops if the situation called for it. In addressing the issue of the wisdom of assisting 3.5 million allied forces in Southeast Asia to repel the advance of Communism, the text reads, "Our assistance. . . can be painful, risky, and costly. . . But we dare not weary of the task. . . We in this country, in this generation, are—by destiny rather than by choice—the watchman on the walls of world freedom. . . A successful Communist breakthrough in these areas [which he said included "Vietnam, free China, Korea, India, Pakistan, Thailand, Greece, Turkey, and Iran"], necessitating direct United States intervention, would cost us several times as much as our entire foreign aid program—and might cost us heavily in American lives as well...Reducing our efforts to train, equip and assist [the allied] armies can only encourage Communist penetration and require in time the increased overseas deployment of American combat forces."²³⁶

Does any reader of this book think that Oliver Stone would have ever dreamed of quoting the above in his travesty of a movie?*

Moreover, NSAM 273 (November 26, 1963) does not, as Stone's audience was told, reverse NSAM 263 (October 11, 1963). In fact, it specifically reaffirms Kennedy's decision to withdraw 1,000 troops by the end of 1963, providing in its second numbered paragraph that "the objectives of the United States with respect to the withdrawal of U.S. military personnel remain as stated in the White House statement of October 2, 1963."* The White House statement of October 2, 1963, became the basis and precursor for NSAM 263, which provided for "the implementation of plans to withdraw 1,000 U.S. military personnel [from Vietnam] by the end of 1963." The October 2 statement was read to the media by Press Secretary Pierre Salinger following a National Security Council meeting convened by Kennedy earlier in the evening. At that meeting the recommendations set forth in a ten-page memorandum of that same date (October 2) from General Maxwell D. Taylor (chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff) and Robert S. McNamara (secretary of defense), based on their one-week fact-finding mission for Kennedy in Vietnam, were discussed. The resulting statement, in part, said that Taylor and McNamara "reported that by the end of this year [1963] the United States program for training Vietnamese should have progressed to the point where one thousand United States military personnel assigned to South Vietnam can be withdrawn," and that "the U.S. military task [in Vietnam] can be completed by the end of 1965."²³⁷

Not only didn't Stone tell his movie audience that NSAM 273, under President Johnson, actually reaffirmed NSAM 263† issued under Kennedy, but also Stone couldn't find thirty seconds in his three-hour-and-eight-minute movie, and Stone's two Vietnam advisers, L. Fletcher Prouty and John M. Newman, couldn't find one paragraph of space in their respective 366-and 506-page books (Prouty's JFK: The CIA, Vietnam, and the Plot to Assassinate John F. Kennedy and Newman's JFK and Vietnam), to point out that there was much more to Taylor and McNamara's memo to the president of October 2, 1963, than withdrawing 1,000 military advisers from Vietnam by the end of 1963 and enunciating the objective of removing the remainder of the U.S. military task force from Vietnam by the end of 1965. But since the main motive for the assassination of Kennedy in Stone's movie was Kennedy's intent to withdraw from Vietnam, this apparently is all that he wanted his audience to know. Other than a single, one-sentence paragraph in Newman's book that had nothing to do with the heart of the October 2 memo, the only two paragraphs of the memo he quotes in his book (on page 402) are the withdrawal paragraphs. That's also all that Prouty talks about (on page 279) in his comments about the memo.

However, the October 2 memo goes on for ten pages, and the main thrust of it is not withdrawal, which is secondary, but how to deal with the very repressive policies of Ngo Dinh Diem (the president of the Republic of Vietnam whose ascension to power in 1955 was largely engineered by our country to promote democracy in Vietnam, but who himself became dictatorial, repressing by imprisonment, torture, and death, dissident members of the Buddhist majority, though we continued to support his regime) and his terrorist brother and political adviser, Ngo Dinh Nhu. The concern was not only humanitarian. "Our policy is to seek to bring about the abandonment of repression because of its effect on the popular will to resist [the Vietcong]." The memo agonizes over whether or not it would “be wise to promote a coup” against Diem by his generals (who eventually murdered Diem and his brother on November 2), but decides against it. Indeed, the paragraph of the memo (number 3) dealing with the withdrawal of 1,000 military advisers is followed by a paragraph (number 4) which reads that the specific purpose for the withdrawal action is “to impress upon Diem our disapproval of his political program [of repression].” Elsewhere the memo refers to “numerous possibilities of applying pressure to Diem in order to incline him to the direction of our policies.” If one reads not only Taylor and McNamara’s October 2, 1963, memo to Kennedy, but McNamara’s book In Retrospect, the main issue being discussed by the president and his advisers during the period of the October 2 memo and the October 11 NSAM 263 was not the withdrawal of troops from Vietnam, but whether to support a coup of Diem.²³⁸ But we learned years later from a Hollywood producer and his daffy adviser, Colonel Prouty, that the real coup being contemplated at the time, and eventually carried out, was not against Diem but against the president of the United States.

This is not to suggest that Kennedy didn’t hope he’d be able to withdraw all U.S. troops by 1965, as recommended in the October 2 McNamara-Taylor memorandum and repeated in the October 2 White House statement that followed. Other than right-wing extremists in our society, any sensible president would have wanted, as Kennedy did, to prevent the flower of America’s youth from shedding its blood on foreign soil.* But the October 2 memo, in conjunction with other statements by the president, made it very clear that Kennedy’s backing out of Vietnam was contingent upon the Vietnamese government being able to successfully resist the Vietcong. For instance, the minutes of the National Security Council meeting on October 11 show that the withdrawal of the 1,000 men “should be carried out routinely as part of our general posture of withdrawing people when they are no longer needed.” And the October 2 Taylor-McNamara memo speaks of the “present favorable military trends”—that is, at the time of the ordered withdrawal of 1,000 troops on October 11, the United States had cause to believe that the South Vietnamese would repel the Vietcong on their own. Indeed, the New York Times headline of October 3, 1963, following the White House statement the previous night about the withdrawal of U.S. forces, read, “Vietnam Victory by the End of ’65 Envisaged by U.S.” Reporting from Saigon on October 2, 1963, New York Times reporter David Halberstam said that “the military [including General Paul D. Harkins, head of the U.S. military mission in Vietnam] believe the war is being won.”²³⁹

Most important, the October 2 memo, like the White House statement later that evening, says (not, of course, mentioned in the film or the two books) that “the security of South Vietnam remains vital to United States security. For this reason, we adhere to the overriding objective of denying this country to Communism and of suppressing the Vietcong insurgency as promptly as possible.... Any long-term reduction of aid cannot but have an eventual adverse affect on the military campaign... Hence, immediate reductions must be selected carefully and be left in effect for short periods.”²⁴⁰ And it was clear that the “overriding objective” set forth by Taylor and McNamara was accepted by Kennedy. The White House statement was almost a carbon copy of the memo. The statement said, in part, that “the security of South Vietnam is a major interest of the United States... We will adhere to our policy of working with the people and government of South Vietnam to deny this country to Communism and to suppress the externally stimulated and supported insurgency of the Viet Cong as promptly as possible. Effective performance in this undertaking is the central object of our policy in South Vietnam.*”²⁴¹ Quite a difference, right, between the above and X telling Garrison in the movie that in effect Kennedy was abandoning South Vietnam to the Communists.

Apart from the fact that NSAM 273, after Kennedy's murder, specifically ratified, by its very language, the 1,000-troop withdrawal of NSAM 263, and that the draft of 273 was written before Kennedy's assassination, there's nothing in 273 that represents a clear departure from 263 and U.S. commitment to help the South Vietnamese repel the Vietcong if the situation demanded it. Kennedy's secretary of defense, Robert McNamara, who remained in his post under LBJ after Kennedy's murder, wrote in his book In Retrospect, "[NSAM] 273 made clear that Johnson's policy remained the same as Kennedy's: 'to assist the people and government of South Vietnam to win their contest against the externally directed and supported Communist conspiracy' through training support and without the application of overt U.S. military force."²⁴²

Much has been made, by the conspiracy theorists who believe Kennedy was murdered by members of the military-industrial complex, of President Johnson's letter of January 1, 1964, to Diem's successor, Major General Duong Van Minh, chairman of South Vietnam's Revolutionary Council, in which he stated that "the United States will continue to furnish you and your people with the fullest measure of support in this bitter fight. We shall maintain in Vietnam American personnel and material as needed to assist you in achieving victory."²⁴³ The fact that Johnson didn't append to his pledge of support that the military advisers aspect of it would terminate at the end of 1965 (something that, diplomatically, Kennedy may not have added either) has been interpreted, in a stretch by the conspiracy theorists, to mean that as early as January 1, 1964, Johnson intended to change Kennedy's 1965 withdrawal plans for his military advisers, those who trained the Vietnamese military, and indeed intended to introduce U.S. combat troops into the Southeast Asian conflict. The theorists maintain that this "fact" about Johnson's intent was somehow known before the assassination by those who ordered Kennedy's death, and indeed was the reason for it. But no one has ever offered any evidence to support this allegation. Moreover, on January 27 and 29, almost a full month after Johnson's letter to Duong Van Minh, Secretary of Defense McNamara all but decimated the inference drawn by conspiracy theorists from the letter when he testified before the House Armed Services Committee that "it is a Vietnamese war. They are going to have to assume the primary responsibility for winning it. Our policy is to limit our support to logistical and training support."²⁴⁴ (This from a man who would later become an advocate of escalation, the Vietnam War becoming known to many as "McNamara's War," a war he would later acknowledge was wrong.) In other words, the policy of nonintervention by combat troops was still extant in the Johnson administration at the time of Johnson's letter to Duong Van Minh.

Some other very relevant points about the October 2 memo: Taylor and McNamara went to Vietnam to assess the military situation accompanied by representatives, per the memo, "of the State Department [and the] CIA," and said that the recommendations in the memo (including the 1,000-troop withdrawal) were "concurred" upon by these representatives, "subject to the exceptions noted," one of which was by William E. Colby, chief of the CIA's Far East division at the time, who really had no objection to the memo's recommendations but added that our relation with Diem "should be supplemented by selected and restricted unofficial and personal relationships with individuals" in Diem's government where "persuasion could be fruitful without derogation of the official U.S. posture."²⁴⁵ But wait. I thought the CIA was a part of this conspiracy to murder Kennedy. And as far as the Joint Chiefs of Staff being behind Kennedy's murder because he wanted to withdraw from Vietnam, although most of them undoubtedly wanted to escalate our involvement in Vietnam, let's not forget that the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Maxwell Taylor, is the person who made the recommendation for withdrawal along with Kennedy's secretary of defense, Robert McNamara. The very language of NSAM 263 couldn't be any clearer: "The President considered the recommendations contained in the report of Secretary McNamara and General Taylor on their mission to South Vietnam. The President approved the military recommendations contained in Section IB (1-3) of the report...to withdraw one-thousand U.S. military personnel by the end of 1963."

In an October 21, 1996, article he wrote for Newsweek, Oliver Stone says, "[Robert] McNamara explains in his book [In Retrospect] that at a 'very important' National Security Council meeting on October 2, 1963, President Kennedy made three decisions: 1) To completely withdraw all U.S. forces from Vietnam by December 31, 1965; 2) To withdraw 1,000 U.S. troops by the end of 1963 to begin the process; and 3) To make a public announcement, in order to put this decision 'in concrete.'"²⁴⁶ There is only one inference to draw from this. That it was all Kennedy's idea to withdraw, and that he was so forceful about it that he wanted to make a public announcement to put his decision "in concrete." But when we turn to pages 79 and 80 of McNamara's book, we learn that it was he who told Kennedy before the meeting, "I think, Mr. President, we must have a means of disengaging from this area." He goes on to say that at the National Security Council meeting that followed, "the President finally agreed...[and] endorsed our recommendation to withdraw 1,000 men by December 31, 1963...Because I suspected others might try to get him to reverse the decision, I urged him to announce it publicly. That would set it in concrete." So although we know that Kennedy did not want to send U.S. troops to Vietnam, it appears he was not enthusiastic at all about withdrawing military advisers.

By the way, if the need for the billions of dollars of profits by the military-industrial complex was so great that its members felt compelled to kill Kennedy when he was merely about to withdraw one-sixteenth of our military advisers in Vietnam, and it could not be known for sure whether he would withdraw all forces, why didn't they kill President Nixon a few years later when he not only wasn't ambiguous about his determination to withdraw from Vietnam, but actually did end our involvement in the war? Didn't they need the money anymore?

Another fatal flaw in the theory that the military-industrial complex was behind the assassination is this: Are the conspirators going to murder Kennedy not even knowing if his successor, Lyndon Johnson, is going to be any better? What assurance, one may ask, would the conspirators have had that LBJ would be more of a hawk on Vietnam? Was their position, “Let’s murder Kennedy, and hope for the best with Johnson”? If so, they must have had some very anxious moments, and wondered whether their murder of Kennedy was a big mistake. In fact, although there had been U.S. air attacks on North Vietnam in 1964 and 1965, it wasn’t until March 6, 1965, almost a full year and a half after the assassination, that Johnson finally decided to send the first U.S. ground combat troops to Vietnam, and then only Marines to provide security for the Da Nang air base, thereby freeing South Vietnamese troops for other tasks. (The 3,500-man 9th Marine Expeditionary Brigade landed at Da Nang, South Vietnam, on March 8, 1965, the first American combat troops to be deployed in the country.) And even then, Johnson was so hesitant, and did it so gingerly, that he asked his secretary of defense, Robert McNamara, if their identity could be disguised by calling them “security battalions similar to MP’s,” and McNamara said the media would see through it.^{247*}

In a February 20, 1964, telephone conversation with McNamara, Johnson had virtually parroted a remark JFK made to Walter Cronkite on September 2, 1963, telling McNamara about the Vietnamese, “It’s their war and it’s their men. And we’re willing to train them. . . Our purpose is to train these people.”²⁴⁸ And in a telephone conversation Johnson had with his national security adviser, McGeorge Bundy, on May 27, 1964 (over half a year after the assassination), LBJ refers to the Vietnam War as “the biggest damn mess that I ever saw,” and added, “I don’t think it’s worth fighting for.” Earlier that same day in a phone conversation with Senator Richard Russell of Georgia, LBJ speaks about the “little old sergeant that works for me. . . and he’s got six children, and I just put him up as the United States Army, Air Force and Navy every time I think about making this decision, and think about sending that father of those six kids in there. And what the hell are we going to get out of his doing it? And it just makes the chills run up my back.” “It does me, [too],” Russell says.²⁴⁹

Former U.S. senator George McGovern writes that even before the assassination, “I knew that both Johnson and Russell opposed American involvement in Vietnam when it was proposed to them as senators by the Eisenhower administration. . . If it had been up to Lyndon Johnson, we would not have gone into Vietnam in the first place.”²⁵⁰ And when, as vice president, Johnson went on a fact-finding mission to Vietnam in May of 1961 for Kennedy, his May 23, 1961, written report to JFK upon his return counseled JFK to make it clear to President Diem that “barring an unmistakable and massive invasion of South Vietnam from without, that we have no intention of employing combat U.S. forces in Vietnam or using even naval or air-support, which is but the first step in that direction.” France’s enormous misadventure in Vietnam, he told JFK, conjured up the terrible specter of American soldiers “bogged down chasing irregulars and guerrillas over the rice fields and jungles of Southeast Asia while our principal enemies China and the Soviet Union stand outside the fray and husband their strength.”²⁵¹

In a 1973 interview, former president Johnson said, “All the time, in 1964, I really hoped we could negotiate our way out of a major war in Vietnam.”^{252*} Indeed, during his 1964 campaign for the presidency, when his Republican opponent, Senator Barry Goldwater, criticized Johnson for not being more militarily aggressive in Vietnam, Johnson told a campaign audience in Manchester, New Hampshire, that while “others are eager to enlarge the conflict by supplying American boys to do the job that Asian boys should do, [that] action would offer no solution at all to the real problems in Vietnam.”²⁵³ And in a September 25, 1964, speech in Texas responding to Goldwater’s charge that he was falling down on the job in repelling the growth of global Communism, LBJ said, “It’s easy to tell the other fellow, ‘Here is our ultimatum and you do as we say or else,’ but that will never be the policy of this country under my leadership... We are not about to start another war.” Johnson said he did not want a “land war” in Asia, adding, however, that “we are not about to run away from where we are.”²⁵⁴

When McGeorge Bundy, a military hawk in his administration, sent a memo to LBJ on January 27, 1965, on behalf of himself and another hawk, Secretary of Defense McNamara, recommending military intervention in Vietnam (“the time has come for harder choices,” Bundy put it), LBJ turned elsewhere for help, asking his secretary of state, Dean Rusk, “to instruct [your] experts once again to consider all possible ways for finding a peaceful solution.”²⁵⁵ Johnson, in an August 19, 1969, tape recording of himself and two aides helping him write his memoir, The Vantage Point, said it about as succinctly as possible: “Until July 1965, I tried to keep from going into Vietnam.”²⁵⁶†

None of this, naturally, is in JFK. The Los Angeles Times, in a review of the January 14, 2002, History Channel special LBJ and Vietnam: In the Eye of the Storm (which was based in large part on the White House tapes of Johnson set forth in Michael Beschloss’s two books, Taking Charge: The Johnson White House Tapes, 1963–1964, and Reaching for Glory: Lyndon Johnson’s Secret White House Tapes, 1964–1965), concluded what was so obvious from the tapes, that rather than “the hawkish brute” eager to escalate our involvement in Vietnam, Johnson was “the most reluctant of warriors.* In recording after recording of late-night phone calls with military and political advisers, Johnson can be heard trying with growing desperation to find a way out of the murky conflict. When he does agree to dramatically ramp up the American troop commitment, he appears to do so after exhausting all other possibilities, and [then] only with the belief it will bring a quick end to the war.”²⁵⁷ And Johnson’s own words on the tapes aren’t the only evidence of his agonizing over what to do. For instance, a March 7, 1965, tape-recorded diary entry by the president’s wife, Lady Bird Johnson, says, “In talking about the Vietnam situation [during dinner] Lyndon summed it up quite simply—‘I can’t get out, and I can’t finish it with what I have got. And I don’t know what the hell to do.’”²⁵⁸ Writing in the New York Times, Michiko Kakutani observes that “the tapes underscore [Johnson’s] own early doubts about the war” and reflect “his agonized decision-making over Vietnam.”²⁵⁹

Yet all that Oliver Stone showed his audience was that LBJ was gung ho for a war in Vietnam,† one scene showing him forcefully telling military leaders on November 26, 1963, the day after they buried Kennedy, “Just get me elected. I’ll give you the damn war.” (He was already president, of course, but would be coming up for election in one year.) The source? Stanley Karnow, in his 1983 book, Vietnam: A History, claims that at a White House reception on Christmas Eve, 1963, a month after Kennedy’s assassination, Johnson told the Joint Chiefs of Staff this.²⁶⁰ That’s what Stone offers against all the evidence and the historical record to the contrary cited above. And even if we were to accept, at full value, this highly suspect entry in Karnow’s book for which Karnow cites no source, but which Stone completely subscribes to, it still poses a big problem for Stone. LBJ’s remark, if indeed it was ever made, was made after, not before, the conspirators supposedly murdered Kennedy. What evidence does Stone offer in his movie that before Kennedy’s murder Johnson told or indicated to the conspirators he wanted war? Nothing. Nothing at all. And, as indicated, he doesn't present to his audience any of the overwhelming and conclusive evidence that once LBJ became president, he did everything possible to avoid war. If Stone had done so (i.e., if he had told the truth), it would have completely contradicted and refuted the main theme of his movie—that Kennedy did not want to go to war in Vietnam and LBJ did, and that's why Kennedy was murdered.

Right to the very end, the Vietnam War weighed more heavily on Johnson than any other chapter in his presidency. Indeed, although he eventually committed himself to the war, because of doubts about the conflict that never left him he was unwilling to commit the United States to an all-out war, prompting General William C. Westmoreland, Johnson's chief of military operations in Vietnam, to later write, "A major problem [in the U.S. prosecution of the war] was that Washington policy decisions forced us to fight with but one hand."²⁶¹ In April of 1967, Westmoreland said in a New York City speech that "in effect, we are fighting a war of attrition." He proceeded to fly to Washington, where he asked the president to increase the number of ground troops from the existing 470,000 to 550,500, the "minimal essential force," or 670,000, the "optimum." Johnson, shocked, asked, "Where does it all end?" When Secretary of Defense McNamara queried Westmoreland as to how long it would take to win the war, the jut-jawed general responded, "With the optimum force about three years; with the minimum force, at least five."²⁶² He got neither.

With the war escalating out of control in 1965–1968, and the Communists' Tet offensive in early 1968 into more than a hundred South Vietnamese towns and villages (elements even fighting their way onto the grounds of the American embassy in Saigon) demonstrating (though the Vietcong sustained tremendous losses) beyond all doubt the resiliency of the Communist forces and that the war was far from over, Johnson lost his stomach for the conflict and elected to not run for reelection.^{263*} But there were contributing factors. "I felt that I was being chased on all sides by a giant stampede coming at me from all directions," he told his biographer, Doris Kearns.

On one side, the American people were stampeding me to do something about Vietnam. On another side, the inflationary economy was booming out of control. Up ahead were dozens of danger signs pointing to another summer of riots in the cities. I was being forced over the edge by rioting blacks, demonstrating [over Vietnam] students, marching welfare mothers, squawking professors, and hysterical reporters. And then the final straw. The thing I feared from the first day of my Presidency was actually coming true. Robert Kennedy had openly announced his intention to reclaim the throne in the memory of his brother. And the American public, swayed by the magic of the name, were dancing in the streets. The whole situation was unbearable to me. After thirty-seven years of public service, I deserved something more than being left alone in the middle of the plain, chased by stampedes on every side.

In a televised address to the nation on the evening of March 31, 1968 (a little over two months before RFK was assassinated in Los Angeles), Johnson began his speech by announcing his decision to stop air and naval attacks on North Vietnam, except in the area of the Demilitarized Zone, in the hope, he said, that "President Ho Chi Minh [will] respond positively and favorably to this new step of peace." He then shocked the nation's viewers by saying, "With America's sons in the fields far away, with America's future under challenge right here at home... I do not believe that I should devote an hour or a day of my time to any personal partisan [political] causes...Accordingly, I shall not seek, and will not accept, the nomination of my party for another term as your President.”²⁶⁴

As seen earlier, the evidence is very conflicting and ambiguous, at best, as to whether or not Kennedy, if he had lived, would have eventually withdrawn from Vietnam.

As previously alluded to, on September 2, 1963, less than three months before his death, he told Walter Cronkite of CBS, “In the final analysis, it is their [South Vietnamese] war. They are the ones who have to win or lose it.” Stone, naturally, put that segment of the Cronkite interview on the screen for his audience. But Stone didn’t show his audience Kennedy thereafter telling Cronkite, “But I don’t agree with those who say we should withdraw. That would be a great mistake...This is a very important struggle even though it is far away. We took all this—made this effort to defend Europe. Now Europe is quite secure. We also have to participate—we may not like it, in the defense of Asia.” Since these additional words by Kennedy would have been in direct opposition to the main point of Stone’s movie, that Kennedy was murdered because he intended to withdraw from Vietnam, Stone, in the finest traditions of the conspiracy profession, simply eliminated these words for his audience.* And a week later, in an interview with David Brinkley on NBC, Kennedy affirmed his belief in the “domino theory,” suggesting that if South Vietnam fell to the Communists, it would have a domino effect, harming American interests throughout Southeast Asia (and, elliptically, the world). Speaking of China, he added, “China is so large, looms so high...that if South Vietnam went, it would...give the impression that the wave of the future in Southeast Asia was China and the Communists.”²⁶⁵ Naturally, these words of Kennedy also are not heard in Stone’s film.

Just like the conflicting evidence, there are, of course, conflicting views on whether or not Kennedy would have withdrawn from Vietnam. McNamara wrote in 1995 that he believed it “highly probable that, had Kennedy lived, he would have pulled us out of Vietnam.”²⁶⁶ And Kennedy biographer Robert Dallek writes that “it was hardly conceivable that Kennedy would have sent tens of thousands more Americans to fight in so inhospitable a place as Vietnam. Reduced commitments, especially of military personnel, during a second Kennedy term were a more likely development.”²⁶⁷ But Nicholas Lemann wrote in GQ magazine, in 1992, “Robert Kennedy, who was probably in a better position than anyone else to know what his brother’s intentions in Vietnam were, had this to say on the subject in an in-depth interview conducted for the historical record in 1964 [by John Barlow Martin for the John F. Kennedy library], the year after his brother’s death: Interviewer: ‘Did the President feel that we would have to go into Vietnam in a big way?’ Kennedy: ‘We certainly considered what would be the result if you abandoned Vietnam, even Southeast Asia, and whether it was worthwhile trying to keep and hold on to.’ Interviewer: ‘What did he say? What did he think?’ Kennedy: ‘He reached the conclusion that probably it was worthwhile.’”^{268*}

McGeorge Bundy, Kennedy’s special assistant for national security matters who signed NSAMs 263 and 273, told Newsweek, “I don’t think we know what he would have done if he’d lived. I don’t know, and I don’t know anyone who does know.”²⁶⁹ Indeed, as Time magazine observed, “Even [Kennedy] may not have known what he really planned to do in Vietnam after the election.”²⁷⁰

Since we are attempting to know the unknowable, those of us who are further handicapped by not knowing Kennedy personally are in no position to weigh in meaningfully on the issue. But based merely on what I have read about John F. Kennedy, I sense that he was a rationalist, even more, in fact, than an intellectual, which he surely was too.† Because he was a rationalist who had personally experienced the horrors of war,† I feel Kennedy would have only sent combat troops to Vietnam if he strongly believed that the Communist (Hanoi and the Vietcong) aggression was a part of Soviet Communism's plan to ultimately conquer the world—that is, if he strongly believed that his failure to fight in Vietnam would imperil this nation's security. Since we know, not just from hindsight but from the absence of evidence to the contrary at the time that the Communist aggression was nothing more than a civil war between North Vietnam (and the Vietcong) and South Vietnam,* my guess is that his rationalism, coupled with his firsthand knowledge that war was hell, would have prevailed. This is why I am inclined to agree with this assessment by Kenneth P. O'Donnell and David F. Powers, next to Bobby Kennedy the president's closest advisers: "All of us who listened to President Kennedy's repeated expressions of his determination to avoid further involvement in Vietnam are sure that if he had lived to serve a second term, the members of American military advisers and technicians in the country would have steadily decreased. He never would have committed U.S. Army combat units and draftees to action against the Viet Cong."²⁷¹ In other words, there would never have been a Vietnam War with its enormous loss of lives and cataclysmic consequences for decades to come.

There is also no question in the minds of two others of his closest aides, Theodore C. Sorensen and Arthur Schlesinger Jr., that Kennedy would not have sent combat troops to Vietnam. In a 2005 op-ed piece in the New York Times, they wrote of their being witnesses to seeing Kennedy, leaning back in his Oval Office rocking chair, "tick off all his options [in Vietnam] and then critique them." They said he concluded "that withdrawal was the viable option," and they point out that his clear predilection was set forth in a November 14, 1963, press conference, just eight days before his death, in which he stated, "That is our object, to bring Americans home."²⁷²

But what Kennedy would have done is a question whose answer is lost to history. No one knows—that is, except Oliver Stone, who knew for sure, proceeded to present it as a fact to his audience, and built a central part of his movie around the proposition that because Kennedy was going to withdraw, he was murdered.

Parenthetically, the larger notion Stone propounded in his film (of which the Vietnam withdrawal, he suggested, was the most important manifestation, the straw that broke the camel's back) was that Kennedy's being "soft on Communism" triggered a deadly response from members of the military-industrial complex. Hating Communism as they did, they were greatly angered by any move by Kennedy toward detente with the Soviet Union (which Kennedy obviously preferred over a nuclear war). As support for Kennedy being soft on Communism, Stone showed an excerpt of Kennedy's speech at American University in Washington, D.C., on June 10, 1963: "We must reexamine our own attitudes toward the Soviet Union... Our most basic, common link is that we all inhabit this small planet. We all breathe the same air. We all cherish our children's future. And we are all mortal." Stone's audience didn't hear the prelude to this statement—the reality that we live "in an age when a single nuclear weapon contains almost ten times the explosive force delivered by all of the allied air forces in the Second World War," where "the deadly poisons produced by a nuclear exchange would be carried by wind and water and soil and seed to the far corners of the globe and to generations yet unborn... I speak of peace, therefore, as the necessary rational end of rational men." The president's remarks, obviously, did not betray any softness toward Communism, only a concern for survival of the human race. Since when is detente and a desire for peace the equivalent of capitulation to the enemy? In a memorandum to Robert Manning, assistant secretary of state, on June 11, 1963, McGeorge Bundy said, “This speech should not be misunderstood as indicating any weakening in the American resolution to resist the pressures for Soviet expansion.” It was “designed to emphasize the positive opportunities for a more constructive and less hostile Soviet policy.”²⁷³

Contrary to Kennedy’s being soft on Communism, the generally accepted view of historians has been that Kennedy, with a nod here and a nod there to political doves, was a moderate. Some even felt he was a cold warrior at heart. We know, for instance, that during his less than three years in office at the height of the cold war, and despite the Nuclear Test-Ban Treaty (between the United States, Soviet Union, and Great Britain) that was agreed on in July of 1963 but not formally ratified until October 7, 1963,* he substantially increased our military capability against Russia as well as the nation’s defense budget. In the president’s speech in Fort Worth on the morning of the assassination, he pointed out that “in the past three years we have increased the defense budget of the United States by over 20 percent, increased the program of acquisition of Polaris submarines from 24 to 41, increased our Minuteman missile-purchase program by more than 75 percent, doubled [i.e., increased by 100 percent] the number of strategic bombers and missiles on alert, doubled the number of nuclear weapons available in the strategic alert forces, increased the tactical nuclear forces deployed in Western Europe by over 60 percent, added five combat-ready divisions to the Armies of the United States and five tactical fighter wings to the Air Force of the United States, increased our strategic airlift capability by 75 percent and increased our special counterinsurgency forces which are engaged now in South Vietnam by 600 percent.”²⁷⁴ Since our sworn enemy at the time was Soviet Communism, and therefore this military buildup was, indeed, against the Communist threat, not the Bolivian civilian militia, certainly the American military couldn’t be too unhappy with the above numbers, could it? Nor could the defense industry (the “industrial” part of Stone’s military-industrial complex), which made billions off building these weapons, have been.

And after all, it was Kennedy who campaigned for president in 1960 arguing that there was a “missile gap” between the Soviet Union and us (citing the launching of the Soviet Sputnik on October 4, 1957, and by a powerful rocket, the Soviet SS-6, that was capable of reaching U.S. soil from Russia) that America had to close and then overcome;* who challenged Russia to an arms race in 1961; and who made Nikita Khrushchev blink during the Cuban missile crisis in 1962. And it was Kennedy who wrote these words to Khrushchev on April 18, 1961: “Mr. Chairman... You should recognize that free people in all parts of the world do not accept the claim of historical inevitability for Communist revolution. What your government believes is its own business; what it does in the world is the world’s business.” In a letter to Khrushchev on October 22, 1962, Kennedy wrote that “the United States could not tolerate any action on your part which in a major way disturbed the existing over-all balance of power in the world.” As Pierre Salinger has written, “If the strength and stridency of Kennedy’s anti-communism have ever been in doubt, they should be dispelled... The theme of anti-communism [was] recurrent” in his administration. In NSAM 132, a memo to Fowler Hamilton, administrator of the Agency for International Development, signed by Kennedy on February 19, 1962, Kennedy said, “As you know, I desire the appropriate agencies of this Government to give utmost attention and emphasis to programs designed to counter Communist indirect aggression, which I regard as a grave threat during the 1960’s. I have already written the Secretary of Defense ‘to move to a new level of increased activity across the board’ in the counter-insurgency field.”²⁷⁵

Conscious, as all presidents are, of their place in history, one can reasonably assume that

Kennedy would have made every effort to prevent a geopolitical tilt toward Communism in the world from taking place “on his watch.”

But all of this is really beside the point. Since X categorically tells Garrison in the film about the military-industrial plot to kill Kennedy, and there are scenes in JFK actually depicting the Joint Chiefs of Staff setting in motion this conspiracy to murder Kennedy, what evidence does Stone have that such a conspiracy actually took place? For starters, as previously indicated, Stone has admitted that he made up the scene in Washington between X and Garrison. Moreover, Stone has no evidence that such a conspiracy ever took place. He simply manufactured the entire conspiracy out of whole cloth for his gullible audience. But he did have a source for the naked allegation that such a conspiracy took place: the redoubtable, aforementioned Fletcher Prouty—you know, the fellow who was an active member of the group that believes the Holocaust is a Jewish hoax. Just who, specifically, did the late Mr. Prouty allege were the members of the military-industrial complex who actually conspired to murder Kennedy? Prouty didn't mention one single name, falling back, instead, on the always available, guilty, and universally maligned “they.”

But let's listen to Prouty tell, in his own words in Lyndon LaRouche's publication, Executive Intelligence Review, what he believed happened. Prouty said that after NSAM 263 was published on October 11, 1963, ordering the withdrawal of 1,000 military advisers from Vietnam, to those working close to the scene in the Pentagon, and to those people who had the prospect of building helicopters and fighter aircraft and guns and tanks and all the rest of it, this was terrible. This was anathema. They had had plenty of orders through World War II. There was a big build-up for the Korean War, and now, for ten years, they had been building up on the prospect that there would be even a bigger war, a consumers' war, for them in Vietnam. Amid all these pressures, it's not too unrealistic [certainly not for someone like you, Mr. Prouty] to see that some of them sat somewhere and said, “Look, we've got to do some planning. We've got to get this guy Kennedy out of office.” And the more they thought about it, and the more they talked about it, they realized that legitimate, honest-to-God...political planning was not going to get him out. Kennedy was going to win. At that point, somewhere, a small voice said, “We're going to get that bastard out right now,” and there are ways to do it. As Lyndon Johnson said, “We have a Murder, Incorporated,”* a professional group—no Lee Harvey Oswald, or other goons like that—a professional group, trained, equipped, salaried, and everything, to do assassinations. They were given a job. They did their job. They killed the President. There was a coup d'etat in this country, and following it, the biggest residual job people have had within that group has been to run this cover story.²⁷⁶

This “small voice” Prouty imagined and speculated that “they,” the conspirators, heard, was heard only by Prouty. And when people start to hear small voices in their head...well, I think you know what I'm about to say.

So this small-voice reverie and naked theorizing of Fletcher Prouty's was converted by Oliver Stone, with full knowledge that he had absolutely nothing to support it, into the motive for Kennedy's murder in his fantasy movie. Stone presented to his audience Prouty's fantasizing about the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the defense industry plotting Kennedy's murder as though it actually happened.

Prouty's small voice, then, became the principal foundation and spin for the whole movie.

Two footnotes to all of this: First, when Robert Kennedy is shown in Stone's movie being murdered in Los Angeles in 1968, Garrison tells his assistants, "They [the same power structure that murdered JFK] killed Robert Kennedy." And it's very clear that Stone wants his audience to believe that "they" also killed Martin Luther King Jr., whose murder is also shown. "And now King," Garrison tells his wife in exasperation over her less-than-total acceptance of his conspiracy theories. "Don't you think this [referring to the Kennedy case by looking at the Warren Commission volume in his hand] has something to do with that [referring to the story on the television screen about King's murder]?" Stone removed all ambiguity as to what he was trying to convey in JFK in a December 23, 1991, Time interview:

Question: "Is it accurate to say that you think the assassinations of John Kennedy, Martin Luther King and Bobby Kennedy are linked?"

Stone: "These three leaders were pulling out of the war in Vietnam and shaking up the country. Civil rights, the cold war itself, everything was in question. There's no doubt that these three killings are linked, and it worked. That's what's amazing. They [the conspirators] pulled it off."²⁷⁷

And when asked by a reporter in his appearance before the National Press Club on January 15, 1992, "Did you mean to imply in JFK that the U.S. government might be implicated in the assassination of both Martin Luther King Jr. and Bobby Kennedy?" Stone answered "Yes."²⁷⁸

Second, as we've seen, Stone has occupants of the highest corridors of power in our national government conspiring with the nation's most powerful business and industrial titans to murder President Kennedy. But as we've also seen, another major part of Stone's JFK depicts the plot to kill the president being hatched by Clay Shaw, David Ferrie, and Lee Harvey Oswald in the presence of a homosexual prostitute. How did each of these two completely disparate groups happen to decide on killing Kennedy at the very same place and time? Did either get in the other's way at Dealey Plaza? Or were they working together? But if so, how in the world would the Joint Chiefs of Staff and presidents of our nation's largest corporations have known of the existence of the shabby, New Orleans conspirators? And how would the latter have possibly known that the former were planning to murder Kennedy? When the Joint Chiefs of Staff, et cetera, decided to kill Kennedy, even if they somehow found out about their soul mates in New Orleans, would they have been likely to entrust the mission to kill the president to such a motley group of losers? Stone isn't troubled by any of these questions and none are dealt with in the movie, Stone not providing his audience with any scene connecting the two groups.

29. Stone used X to dispense other goodies to his audience. X tells Garrison that he was in New Zealand at the time the president was shot and "Oswald was charged at 7:00 p.m. Dallas time with Tippit's murder. That was two in the afternoon the next day, New Zealand time [nineteen-hour time difference between Dallas and New Zealand], but already their papers had the entire history of the unknown, twenty-four-year-old...Oswald—studio pictures, biographical data, Russian information—and were pretty sure he killed the president." This was proof to X that the conspirators had determined before the assassination that Oswald was to be the patsy and they already had information to send out on him before he was even charged. But number one, was X, who supposedly was in Christchurch, New Zealand, at the time (Prouty, allegedly, actually was), the only person in a foreign country who felt the information about Oswald reached him or her (such as an employee at a newspaper, or radio or TV station) earlier than it should have? The information on Oswald went out from Dallas throughout the entire civilized world and there's nothing in the vast literature I have seen on the assassination indicating that anyone in Paris, Rome, Brussels, Berlin, London, or anywhere else, felt they received information on Oswald earlier than they should have. Or was X suggesting that for some unfathomable reason the conspirators were interested in getting out a quick story on Oswald only in Christchurch, New Zealand? What was so important about Christchurch?

In any event, Stone doesn't tell his audience that there was nothing unusual about the New Zealand paper having an "Extra" edition (headlined "Kennedy Shot Dead") out on Oswald and the Tippit killing by 2:00 p.m. on November 23. Without even hearing what the Christchurch newspaper's explanation for all of this is (see later), if the first information on Oswald went out over the wires in Dallas at 7:00 p.m., when Oswald was charged with Tippit's murder, then obviously this would not have given the New Zealand paper enough time to have already published details about Oswald's life at that moment in New Zealand, which would be 2:00 p.m. the next day. But information on Oswald's background started going out over the wires several hours before he was formally charged with Tippit's murder. Though he was charged at 7:00 (actually 7:05) p.m. Dallas time, he was arrested five hours and ten minutes earlier, at 1:50 p.m. Dallas time (8:50 a.m. the next day, New Zealand time), and Captain Glen King, Dallas police chief Jesse Curry's administrative assistant, testified that he had heard that an hour after Oswald's arrest (2:50 p.m. Dallas time, 9:50 a.m. New Zealand time) a member of the media already had a photo of Oswald.²⁷⁹ All indications are that from the moment Oswald arrived, in custody, at the Dallas Police Department around 2:00 p.m. forward, it was the policy of the Dallas Police Department to be very cooperative with the press and to make them privy to the main things happening on the case.²⁸⁰ However, I have been unable to find a record of which media outlet first got the news out about Oswald's arrest and the time it did so. But under no circumstances was it later than 3:54 p.m. Dallas time when Bill Regan of NBC News announced on national television that "Lee Oswald seems to be the prime suspect in the assassination of John F. Kennedy." So wire stories about Oswald's background would have started going out all over the world no later than 3:54 p.m. Dallas time (10:54 a.m. New Zealand time), giving any newspaper in New Zealand over three hours, more than ample time, to publish a brief sketch of Oswald's background before 2:00 p.m.

After Stone's movie was released, the Christchurch Star, responding to conspiracy theorists, reported that the Star "knew of Oswald's being in custody by 10 a.m." and immediately "began gathering information about him." The paper said that

Bob Cotton, Chief Reporter of the Christchurch Star... at the time, can recall clearly the events of November 1963. He says that even in 1963, global communication was fast and effective everywhere and an assassination of a U.S. President meant that everything and everyone on the Star worked doubly quick. News [at that time] came by... various wire services... Photographs were usually wired to Australia, then to Auckland and thence to Christchurch. This time, to get the photographs early, some of the geographical links were by-passed through technical ingenuity at the Star. Even so, the paper would not have been published until 1:30 p.m. or 2:15–2:30 p.m., depending on the edition. Bob Cotton says that the Star was never published in the morning during his time on the newspaper (from 1958). Bob Cotton also... says that Lee Harvey Oswald was not a stranger to the media. Information on him would have been readily available in U.S. newspapers...and would have been sent out quickly. In 1959 there had been much coverage in newspapers about young men defecting to the Soviet Union, and Oswald's defection had been covered in detail in The Washington Post, The Washington Evening Star and The New York Times. Again, it was widely reported when Oswald, now with a Russian wife and child, returned to the United States in 1962.²⁸¹

The particular article in the Christchurch Star that Prouty referred to was an AP wire story that contained absolutely no information about Oswald that wasn't already known before the assassination, such as that he "had defected to the Soviet Union in 1959," that "while in the Soviet Union he worked in a factory in Minsk," that he "returned to the United States in 1962," had a "[Russian] wife and child," that he was the "chairman of the 'Fair Play for Cuba Committee,'" and so on. In fact, the photo of Oswald shown in the Christchurch Star was the photo taken of him at the Hotel Berlin in Moscow on October 16, 1959. It has come to be known as the "Moscow defection photo," and was shown in several American newspapers in 1959, including page two of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram on November 16, 1959.

30. X tells Garrison in JFK, "Many strange things were happening on November 22nd. At 12:34 p.m., the entire telephone system went dead in Washington [D.C.] for a solid hour...to keep the wrong stories from spreading if anything went wrong with the [assassination] plan." But the entire telephone system did not go out for an entire hour in Washington, D.C. As author William Manchester writes in The Death of a President, there was such a mass of phone calls being made in Washington (and, of course, elsewhere) immediately after the assassination that the phone circuits were overloaded. "Lines would go dead, return to normal when a sufficient number of people had hung up, and go dead again and return to life, over and over. The pattern was repeated throughout the country."^{282*} But this wasn't true with all lines in the D.C. area. In a January 1992 interview of Oliver Stone by Sam Donaldson on ABC's Prime Time, Donaldson told Stone, "I made a dozen calls during that time from the Capitol to the White House and elsewhere in Washington. The telephone system wasn't out." Whereupon Stone replied, "I'll have to look into that." So contrary to what Stone told his audience, there was no blackout for an hour in the nation's capital, and no one, other than Oliver Stone and some conspiracy theorists, has ever said that there was.

But telephone lines in New York City did go out for awhile. Per the New York Times, news of the president's murder "spread quickly" and so many "hundreds of thousands [of people] reached for so many telephones that the system blacked out and operators had to refuse calls."²⁸³ Likewise in Boston. Per the Boston Globe, "Boston's telephone communications were virtually paralyzed. Switchboards at newspapers, radio and television stations were clogged...Many waited 20 minutes to get a dial tone because of the overload."²⁸⁴

31. In JFK, Garrison tells his staff that "when Oswald went to Russia, he was not a real defector. He was an intelligence agent on some kind of mission for our government, and remained one until the day he died." As further evidence for his audience that Oswald was a U.S. intelligence agent, one of Garrison's assistants tells him that when Oswald wanted to return to the United States, "the State Department issued Oswald a passport within forty-eight hours." Garrison: "Did Marina have any trouble getting out of Russia?" "No, none, either," she says. We know that both of these statements are absolutely untrue, Oswald and Marina struggling with bureaucratic red tape for several months before their applications were approved by the Soviets.²⁸⁵

But Stone wasn't satisfied with these falsehoods. He wanted more groups involved in the assassination. Remarkably, to show Oswald's connection with the KGB, Garrison's assistant tells him in the movie that when Oswald first arrived in Russia, he "disappears for six weeks, presumably with the KGB," and when he reappears in Minsk, he is given "royal treatment," living "high-on-the-hog" with a good apartment and five thousand rubles per month. Garrison responds that this had to be because he gave the Soviets radar secrets that they used to shoot down U-2 pilot Gary Powers.

So now we have the pathetically disoriented Oswald, just out of his teens, being an agent for the CIA (the principal agency of U.S. intelligence) and the KGB. But Oliver, you don't have any evidence that Oswald was an agent for either the CIA or the KGB, only wild speculation that you passed on to your audience as reality. Not only is your speculation wild, but it's also wildly inconsistent. You say the CIA (and the military-industrial complex) wanted to (and did) kill Kennedy because he was "soft on Communism." But if Kennedy were, indeed, "soft on Communism," wouldn't he be the exact type of president the KGB and Soviets would want to keep? Have you no respect at all for your viewers, who have made you a very rich man? I know you wanted your audience to believe that everyone and their grandmother was involved in the assassination, but didn't you go a little too far in leading your audience to believe that both the CIA and the KGB were behind Oswald's killing Kennedy?

32. Throughout the movie, Stone makes it clear that President Kennedy was a political martyr who was doing wonderful and noble things for this country. He is described as "the slain young king." Garrison says, "John Kennedy was the godfather of my generation," and Kennedy's murder was "one of the most terrible moments in the history of this country." With Stone's and Garrison's reverence for JFK, what more loathsome and reprehensible way is there to honor his memory than to deliberately distort the history of his assassination and attempt to make a kind of hero out of the person who murdered him? Under what conceivable theory would Kennedy have wanted that? Yet that's precisely what the outrageous Stone, in contradiction of all facts and evidence, did in his picture. Throughout JFK, Garrison accepts the notion that Oswald is innocent, someone who was just, as Oswald himself proclaimed, "a patsy." With the exception of when Oswald was resisting arrest and one time when he was physically aggressive with Marina, Stone depicts Oswald in the movie—by his words, body language, and context—as being quiet, passive, meek, never conspiratorial or menacing. (It goes without saying that Stone never showed his audience Oswald's attempted assassination of retired Major General Edwin Walker.) Stone has Garrison saying in the movie that on the day of the assassination Oswald had "handlers" who were manipulating him, but that Oswald's nonchalant conduct in the lunchroom, when he wasn't even out of breath, indicated that he himself never fired a shot at Kennedy. So Oswald, per Stone, was completely innocent.

But Stone had to go even further. He wanted his audience to have sympathy for Oswald, the audience being told that after Oswald's arrest, "false statements about Oswald circulated the globe." Then, to a background of sad music, and with Marina, holding her newborn daughter in her arms, crying at her husband's grave site, Garrison laments to the Shaw jury, "Who grieves for Lee Harvey Oswald, buried in a cheap grave under the name Oswald? Nobody." Worse still, Stone had to try to make Oswald an American patriot and hero risking his own life (if discovered by his "handlers") to save Kennedy's life. Ignoring the evidence of what the essence of the note actually said (see earlier in book), Garrison says in the movie that the note Oswald left for Agent James Hosty at Dallas FBI headquarters about ten days before the assassination probably was “describing the [forthcoming] assassination attempt on JFK” to alert the authorities.

Continuing in his quest to have Oswald be an imperfect hero, Stone has Garrison saying in the movie, “I think we can raise the possibility that Oswald may have been the original source of the [FBI] telex dated November 17th warning of the assassination in Dallas on November 22nd.” In other words, Stone wanted his audience to believe that not only didn’t Oswald murder Kennedy, he tried to prevent his murder.

Stone’s disdain for history led him to cast the real Jim Garrison as Earl Warren, the U.S. chief justice who chaired the Commission named after him, a person whom Garrison vilified in life for his role as the head of the Warren Commission. New York Times columnist Anthony Lewis wrote, “The best insight into Oliver Stone’s character, for me, was his treatment of Chief Justice Warren. Earl Warren no doubt had his faults. But he loved this country with all his heart, and the assassination tore him apart. The notion that he would cover up that assassination is contemptible, a contempt well expressed by Stone’s choice of the real Jim Garrison to play Earl Warren in the film.”²⁸⁶

If one were to conclude that the above is a total recitation of all the lies, distortions, and fabrications in the movie JFK, it is not. There are many others, some of which, as previously indicated, I discuss in other parts of this book. As I said earlier, the movie is virtually one continuous lie in which Stone couldn’t find any level of deception and invention beyond which he was unwilling to go. And yet, the whole thrust of the movie is that what was being depicted on the screen was the truth, and everyone else was lying. In fact, the audience is expressly told this. Garrison tells reporters in one scene, “Is the Government worth preserving when it lies to the people?” In another scene, Garrison says, “The truth is the most important value we have.” Indeed, at the end of the movie these words appear on the screen: “Dedicated to the Young in Whose Spirit the Truth Marches On.” And in his June 1993 foreword to Robert Groden’s book, The Killing of a President, Stone thanks Groden for “ensuring the...accuracy of key scenes in Dealey Plaza” (right—like six shots being fired instead of three; three shooters instead of one; placing Connally directly in front of Kennedy instead of to his left front; etc.),* and closes by saying, “May all the truth be known...soon.” But Oliver, how can the truth be known when you did everything within your power to make sure that your audience never knew what the evidence showed the truth to be? How are you helping the truth to be known when you asked millions of people watching your film (and watching it to this very day on video or DVD) to accept your blatant inventions and falsehoods? In your topsy-turvy, Alice in Wonderland world, how are you spelling your word truth? LIE? You say you want the truth to be known soon. But as former president Gerald Ford put it so well, if it’s the truth that there was a conspiracy in the assassination, and the evidence of it is as strong as Stone and his colleagues say it is, “why would Oliver Stone [have to] resort to ignoring, distorting, and even inventing facts?”²⁸⁷

Without knowing Oliver Stone personally, my sense is that he is a person with humanitarian instincts who identifies with the disadvantaged and aggrieved in our society and has a yearning for justice for all, both very admirable traits. In achieving what he perceives to be, as he says, a “higher truth” in the Kennedy assassination, he was willing to take enormous liberties with the truth, making him a classic example of one who believes that the end justifies the means. But that is only half of it.

The invariable suggestion he has made when confronted with the accusation that his film was not a strictly factual rendition of the assassination is that he never invented anything that would alter the essence of what happened—that is, they were only trivializations that always become necessary when a filmmaker utilizes a narrative to present a historical event.† But this is just continuing the lie. Stone’s lies and fabrications were so serious, so gross, so outrageous, that they did totally change the essence of what happened. Moreover, since all of the evidence shows that Oswald killed Kennedy, and there’s no credible evidence that there was any conspiracy in the assassination, what possible “higher truth” was Stone attempting to serve by his deliberate lies?*

In the process, Stone defamed the character and reputation of completely innocent people and groups by suggesting they were involved in either the conspiracy to murder Kennedy or the cover-up of the murder. I probably missed a few, but at one time or another in his film, Stone has the following people and groups (some of whose interests were the exact opposite of other conspirators’ interests) acting (or being referred to) conspiratorially in the assassination of Kennedy: CIA and KGB (bitter enemies, but they got together on this one), FBI, Secret Service, Castro, anti-Castro Cuban exiles, the Dallas Police Department, the mayor of Dallas (per Stone, the mayor, who was the brother of a CIA official Kennedy had once fired over the Bay of Pigs fiasco, was instrumental [untrue] in changing the parade route to Elm Street so the professional assassins would have a better shot at Kennedy), LBJ, military defense contractors, oilmen, bankers, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Clay Shaw, David Ferrie, Guy Banister, organized crime, the Office of Naval Intelligence, army intelligence, and the right wing of America.†

But as preposterous and full of lies as Stone’s JFK was, surveys showed that the vast majority of the audience believed the movie, implicitly accepting it as the literal truth. The Los Angeles Times conducted a survey of theatergoers in Los Angeles and San Diego after they viewed the film. Some representative responses: “I think it should be required viewing for every person in America.” “In the past, I always felt that it would be a waste of taxpayers’ money—it’s over, leave the family alone. But I no longer feel that way. You see something like this and it makes you think anything is possible.” “Much of it was startling information I just hadn’t known before. To hear that maybe the Dallas Police were involved, the Mafia, the FBI, the CIA... Did the Government think we just wouldn’t care what was happening and that they, above all, were the higher power? I thought, more than anything, the movie was very disturbing.” “It’s certainly changed my opinion. I assumed the Warren Commission was accurate. You come away from a film like this feeling very ignorant, because you assume you knew everything there was from reading all the news accounts, and it turns out you really knew very little.”

The Times said that the foregoing reactions “were repeated in theaters across the country during the weekend” of the film’s release. “Only a few questioned its conclusions.” At AMC’s large Century 14 Theater in Century City (Los Angeles), reporter Deborah Starr Seibel said that “despite the film’s startling premise that some of our highest government officials had decided to eliminate their own Commander-In-Chief, not one person said they were shocked by the conspiracy theory set forth in JFK by co-writer and director Oliver Stone.”²⁸⁸

New York Newsday arranged for a large group of college students to see JFK and then be interviewed. Reporter John Hane wrote that they agreed the government and military “were involved in a massive cover-up.” The only student quoted who had any reservations said, “I believe that there were definitely...shots coming from the grassy knoll. But [Oliver Stone] went a bit overboard. He didn't have the proof to incriminate everybody up to LBJ. The only proof Stone gives us is some guy coming out of the Lincoln Memorial and spilling the beans." So even this student bought Stone's shots from the grassy knoll (and hence, a conspiracy) and accepted Stone's X as really existing and meeting with Garrison. This viewer merely thought that X wasn't enough to implicate everybody.

Some representative remarks from the other students: "I knew nothing about this. I was dumbfounded by the movie. It was mind-blowing." "I was just so taken by this movie. I'm sick of this government. Like, we elect these people?" "Why should I have to wait until 2039 to find out the truth? Why can't something be done?" "There were too many people involved in the assassination and so they'll continue to teach it in a way that doesn't offend. It's like how they teach the history of the Third Reich to students in Germany." "I believe what I saw. I totally believe it." "I always thought Oswald shot him. But now I'm convinced it was a plot." "If Oswald was a patsy, why not Hinckley [referring to John Hinckley Jr., the man who shot President Reagan]?"²⁸⁹

Reporter Robert O'Harrow Jr. wrote in the Washington Post, "In some two dozen interviews at three sets of theaters [in the Washington, D.C. area] yesterday and on New Year's Eve, people coming out of the movie made it clear they believe the film's elaborate theories."²⁹⁰ And so on around the country. As the New York Times's Tom Wicker said, the danger of JFK is that for those "too young to remember November 22, 1963, JFK is all too likely to be taken as the final, unquestioned explanation."²⁹¹ David Ansen at Newsweek went further, saying that "an entire generation of filmgoers is hereafter going to look at these events through Stone's prism."²⁹²

Although, as previously indicated, the mainstream media, for the most part, excoriated Stone's film, how did Hollywood itself treat this abomination? It thought it was just fine. Stone won the 1991 Golden Globe Award for Best Director, and the film was nominated for an Academy Award for Best Picture, Best Director, and Best Screenplay. Writing a historical-drama review in which he gave JFK four stars out of a four-star rating, film critic Roger Ebert gushed that the movie was "a masterpiece...If Garrison's investigation was so pitiful...then where are the better investigations by Stone's attackers?...It's impossible to believe the Warren Report because the physical evidence makes its key conclusion impossible: one man with one rifle could not physically have caused what happened on November 22, 1963, in Dallas."²⁹³ If you say so, Roger.

Since film critics aren't necessarily historians, perhaps Ebert's review shouldn't be considered shocking. But what about Marcus Raskin, writing in the American Historical Review, the prestigious publication of the American Historical Association, an organization founded in 1884 and chartered by Congress in 1889? The Review is so brainy and upper crust it doesn't even have advertisements. Raskin wrote in an issue with erudite companion articles (such as those dealing with the Afroasiatic roots of classical civilization, three middle-class women's organizations in Boston and their evolution from the nineteenth into the twentieth century, and recent rethinking of intellectual history) that "the film JFK...has had an extraordinary effect on the public consciousness." (I agree so far. Indeed, as stated earlier, that's the reason for this very long section on the movie in this book; absent this effect, the film would not be entitled to more than one sentence or two.) But then Raskin goes on to say that "contrary to what some would like to believe, [JFK] is surprisingly accurate. On the complex question of the Kennedy Assassination itself, the film holds its own against the Warren Commission."²⁹⁴

There are few groups, if any, in America who are more elitist than the Eastern literati—that is, except in the presence of Hollywood royalty, where many are as obsequious before Hollywood's luminaries as the rest of America. This was never more clearly on display than at a town hall debate on JFK in New York City on the evening of March 3, 1992, sponsored by the Nation Institute and the Center for American Culture Studies at Columbia University. The moderator was Victor Navasky, the distinguished, longtime editor of the Nation (who, to his credit, did not exalt Stone), and among the participants were Stone and authors Norman Mailer, Nora Ephron, and Edward Epstein. Stone gave no inch or compliments to the other three authors, but they (even Epstein, the only one with the temerity to offer a mild criticism of JFK in Stone's presence, pointing out there is a difference between fiction and nonfiction, and JFK "mixed" the two) couldn't help weaving into their comments a fawning praise for Stone and his film. The sellout audience of fifteen hundred like-minded people gave Stone a thunderous applause when he was introduced and by far the biggest hand after his remarks, whistles and all. Epstein's tepid attack drew little support, whereas Stone's rebuttal to it was met with very robust applause.

But perhaps the highlight of the evening was when Ms. Ephron, defending Stone against attacks by his critics, said that when the press criticizes directors for "trivial inaccuracies" in their films about historical events, such as "breakfast that was actually dinner, a silver fork that was actually stainless steel,...this is all nonsense...There are people, however, who say that maybe there's a special obligation in this area. That, for instance, young people will see JFK and think the Joint Chiefs of Staff killed President Kennedy. But I don't know why they're going to think this way more than I do." What?!! When no one in the audience caught what she had obviously intended to be a serious laugh line—that she also believed the Joint Chiefs of Staff had murdered Kennedy—she paused, waiting for the audience to finally get it before she continued. And when they did and she got the laugh she wanted, she went on to say, "Eventually, they'll grow up and figure it out for themselves. And if they don't, it's not the filmmaker's responsibility." I thought Ms. Ephron, an otherwise gifted intellectual, had already said quite enough, but she had more to say. She added, "The real danger is not that we'll have an inaccurate movie, which never hurt anyone. The real danger is that the wholesale, knee-jerk objection" to these movies "might result in something far worse, which is a chilling effect on works of art." But in view of the reality that people believe and are influenced by what they see on the screen, it's too obvious to state that bad art presented as history can indeed do damage. Consider the hypothetical example of a major, important film that denies the existence of the Holocaust.

One of the people on the panel of questioners at the town hall "debate" that night, Max Holland, said it well: "I cannot accept that facts don't matter and that all facts are equally important. And when a filmmaker invents or ignores facts to support a thesis, he crosses the line."²⁹⁵

It's not enough that Oliver Stone's movie poisoned the minds of millions of Americans about the assassination. Warner Bros., which produced the film, most likely did not know what an enormous falsehood the movie was,* and therefore unwittingly compounded the damage the movie had done by funding a 1991 study guide to the movie for American high school students that was prepared by Learning Enrichment Inc. of New York City. Appallingly, the study guides were sent to thirteen thousand teachers throughout the land to be used in their social studies and history classes.

The guide contains a synopsis of JFK (which the teachers are encouraged to have their students see), including a denigration of the Warren Commission's "magic bullet" by a ridiculous drawing that has the bullet making a right turn in midair, an allegation that four days after the assassination, NSAM 263, calling for the withdrawal of 1,000 troops from Vietnam, was canceled, and so on. "You might want to tell students,” the study guide urges teachers, “about the intensive research Oliver Stone undertook before making the film.” The teachers are told that the guide was assembled to help them “provide both background and context for student viewing [of the film] and discussion.” The guide says, “After viewing JFK...invite students to begin the discussion by saying whatever comes to mind. What did they feel while viewing the movie? What questions did it raise?”

The cover of the guide includes this quote from Stone: “I hope they [the viewers of his movie] become more aware of how politics are played out and how our kings are killed.” The message in Stone’s movie and the study guide is that when the nation’s power structure doesn’t like the policies of an American president, it simply murders him. What a poisonous thought to put into the minds of our nation’s youth about the country they live in.

I could go on condemning the relentless perversion of reality known as JFK. But enough. The reason, as indicated, for all the time I have already devoted to the subject is, as the Chicago Tribune noted, because of “the danger that Stone’s film and the pseudo-history it so effectively portrays” will end up being the “popularly accepted version. After all, what can scholarship avail against Kevin Costner, Sissy Spacek (Garrison’s wife in the movie), Donald Sutherland, et al., on the big screen with Dolby stereo?”

I believe that history is sacred and should not knowingly be tampered with. In imposing a narrative on a historical event, obviously a certain amount of dramatic license and embellishment is unavoidable, but even this device should be used with great caution and economy. Outright fabrications of important matters that necessarily cause viewers or readers to reach a different conclusion is a cultural crime. We can only ensure the past’s future if we respect its truths.

Someone once described history as the thinnest thread of what’s remembered, stretching across an ocean of what’s been forgotten. But the history of the assassination has not been forgotten by Oliver Stone. Except for those instances where ignorance is his only defense, it’s been deliberately ignored or invented. That’s fine. But he had a moral, if not a legal obligation, to tell his audience what he was up to. Pulitzer Prize-winning historian Arthur Schlesinger Jr., writing in the Wall Street Journal, has a more charitable view of Stone and a less menacing view of JFK than I. He writes that Stone “is an artist, and artists are often hopelessly loyal to their fantasies, and their fantasies often hopelessly abuse the truth. History will survive.”²⁹⁶ The eminent historian is most assuredly correct if we define history in the narrow sense of being an exact synonym for the facts—what actually happened. Facts don’t and can’t change. Not even God can change the past. However, if we define history in the broader sense of that which succeeding generations believe and accept as the truth, then Stone, more than any other single American, is responsible for 75 percent of Americans currently believing that a dark and wide-ranging conspiracy involving the highest reaches of our government was responsible for the death of President Kennedy, which is only pseudo-history.

Indeed, it is in this latter sense of perceived history that Stone himself defines history. On the set of JFK, he said, “I’m shaping history, to a degree.”²⁹⁷ And in his introduction to his friend Fletcher Prouty’s book, Stone, alluding to the fact that the victor writes the history of an event, asks, “Who owns reality? Who owns our history? He who makes it up so that most everyone believes it. That person wins.” For once, I agree with Oliver Stone. That is, unless the fabricator is exposed, as I trust I have done in this book.

Conclusion of No Conspiracy

By now it has to be more than obvious to the reader of this book that Oswald acted alone in killing the president. Not only does all of his conduct speak unerringly only to this conclusion, but also, as I believe I have demonstrated, the various conspiracy theories are utterly vapid and bankrupt. Does what you have read prove beyond all doubt that there was no conspiracy in Kennedy's assassination? Probably not, if only because such a degree of proof will perhaps always be unattainable. Why? Because, first, Oswald is dead (and absent a confession from a conspirator, only Oswald could tell us if he acted in concert with anyone), and second, it's normally much more difficult to prove a negative than a positive. However, there is sufficient evidence to satisfy, beyond a reasonable doubt, the world's leading skeptic that Oswald acted alone—that there was no conspiracy. That Oswald, a lone nut, killed Kennedy and was thereafter killed by another lone nut, Ruby. Two small men who wanted to become big, and succeeded. Or, to ennoble their ignoble deeds, as author David Lubin says, “the lethal tussle in the basement of city hall was a fight between two would-be paladins. Each regarded himself as a knight on a mission to avenge wrong and restore right.”¹

If, as is the situation with the conspiracy theorists, there is no evidence to support your allegation, from a legal standpoint you're out of court. But even if you're out of court, if you can at least argue that “well, there's no evidence of this, but logic and common sense tell you it is so,” you still have talking rights and you can still play the game, as it were. But when you not only have no evidence, but logic and common sense tell you it isn't so, it's time to fold your tent. No evidence plus no common sense equals go home, zipper your mouth up, take a walk, forget about it, get a life. Of course, the hard-core conspiracy theorists, who desperately want to cling to their illusions, are not going to do any of these things. If they were to accept the evidence of no conspiracy, those whose lives have been heavily immersed in the assassination for years would also have to accept that they have “wasted” the last twenty or thirty (or however many) years of their lives on something that has no merit. And consciously or subconsciously, it is difficult for anyone to do this. So they are prime candidates for being “in denial” and impervious to the points being made. It should be added that if these conspiracy theorists were to accept the truth, not only would they be invalidating a major part of their past, but many would be forfeiting their future. That's why talking to them about logic and common sense is like talking to a man without ears. The bottom line is that they want there to be a conspiracy and are constitutionally allergic to anything that points away from it. In fact, if Oswald himself appeared in front of them and said, “Hey, guys, knock off all this silliness. I killed Kennedy and acted alone,” they'd probably tell him, “Look, we know a heck of a lot more about this case than you do, so go back to wherever you came from.”

It's essentially become a religious belief with the theorists that there was a conspiracy behind Kennedy's death, and with religious beliefs, the believer knows the truth, so there has to be an explanation for everything that seems to contradict that truth. Their reasoning, then, is to start the debate assuming the very point that has to be proved (Kennedy was killed as a result of a conspiracy), and anything that is at odds with this belief has to have an explanation, no matter how ridiculous and far-out it may be. Nothing you tell the conspiracy theorists can shake their belief in a conspiracy. In situations where even they can't come up with an explanation, they shield themselves from the evidence by either distorting or ignoring it. This type of intellectual carpentry by the buffs allows them to proceed forward with their fantasy, unfazed by the inconvenient interposition of reality.

The example I am about to give illustrates the religious obsession and startling illogic of conspiracy theorists. A very prominent and well-respected medical doctor who is a sincere and eloquent member of the new wave in the conspiracy community wrote me (on August 30, 2001) that “for nearly ten years now, I have slept, jogged, eaten, gone to the bathroom, and dreamed about this case.” This doctor went on to tell me, unbelievably, that it was terribly illogical of me to say that one shouldn’t reject the findings of the Warren Commission without bothering to first read the Warren Report. Such a reading was unnecessary, he said. The profound passion and equally profound irrationality reflected in that way of thinking are the norm, not the exception, in the ethos of the hard-core conspiracy community. The arguments that follow are not just for the conspiracy community, but mostly for the millions of Americans who, not knowing the facts, have been duped by the conspiracy theorists into buying their drivel, misinformation, and flat-out fabrications.*

As with the evidence of Oswald’s guilt, which has already been presented in very abbreviated, summary form, here’s the evidence of no conspiracy. As you are reading this list, I would ask you to take a moment to ask yourself whether the individual point you are reading, all alone and by itself, clearly shows there was no conspiracy. I believe you will find this to be the case with many of the points.

1. Perhaps the most powerful single piece of evidence that there was no conspiracy in the murder of President Kennedy is simply the fact that after all these years there is no credible evidence, direct or circumstantial, that any of the persons or groups suspected by conspiracy theorists (e.g., organized crime, CIA, KGB, FBI, military-industrial complex, Castro, LBJ, etc.) or anyone else conspired with Oswald to kill Kennedy. And when there is no evidence of something, although not conclusive, this itself is very, very persuasive evidence that the alleged “something” does not exist. Particularly here where the search for the “something” (conspiracy) has been the greatest and most comprehensive search for anything in American, perhaps world, history.

I mean, way back in 1965, before over forty additional years of microscopic investigation of the case by governmental groups and thousands of researchers, Dwight Macdonald wrote, “I can’t believe that among the many hundreds of detectives, Federal Bureau of Investigation and Secret Service agents, and [counsel] for the Warren Commission...not one would be bright or lucky enough to discover or stumble across some clue [of a conspiracy] if there were any there.”² But not one clue of a conspiracy has ever surfaced. And this is so despite the fact that the two people the conspirators would have had to rely on the most not to leave a clue, Lee Harvey Oswald and Jack Ruby, were notoriously unreliable.

A conspiracy is nothing more than a criminal partnership. And although conspiracies obviously aren’t proved by the transcript of a stenographer who typed up a conversation between the partners agreeing to commit the crime, there has to be some substantive evidence of the conspiracy or partnership’s existence. And in the conspiracy prosecutions I have conducted, I have always been able to present direct evidence of the co-conspirators acting in concert before, during, or after the crime, and/or circumstantial evidence from which a reasonable inference of concert or meeting of the minds could be made. In the Oswald case, if, for instance, Oswald had disappeared for a few days before the assassination without adequate explanation, or within these few days he was seen in the company of a stranger, or there was evidence he had come into some serious money, or he had made any statement to anyone, such as Marina, suggesting, even vaguely, a conspiratorial relationship, or someone had called him at the Paine residence and he left the room and took the call in another room, or he was seen getting in a car after the shooting in Dealey Plaza, or any of a hundred other possible events or circumstances had occurred, that would be one thing. But here, there is nothing, nothing. Just completely foundationless speculation and conjecture.

Traditionally, the way to reach a conclusion in a criminal case is to draw reasonable inferences from solid evidence. So the evidence is the foundation on which all inferences and conclusions are based. Conspiracy theorists, in contrast, make completely baseless assumptions and then proceed to make further assumptions based on these assumptions. As an example, they assume, without any evidence, that there was a conspiracy in the assassination and that Oswald was an unwitting participant. They then proceed to assume, again without any evidence, that Oswald became aware of this conspiracy at the time of the shooting in Dealey Plaza, and believe that he was being set up to take the fall for the assassination, and this is why he fled the Book Depository Building. *But where is there any evidence to support either of these two assumptions?

This is particularly startling and noteworthy when one stops to realize that those making the allegation of conspiracy necessarily have the burden of proof. I mean, it makes no sense for A to say to B, "I allege that there is a conspiracy here. Now you prove there isn't." The alleege always, by definition, has the burden of proof. To say that those alleging a conspiracy in the Kennedy assassination have not met their burden of proof would be the understatement of the millennium. Here, the absence of any credible evidence of a conspiracy is bad enough for the conspiracy theorists, but, as demonstrated on these pages, there is much, much evidence pointing irresistibly in the direction of no conspiracy.

2. Not only is there no credible evidence that organized crime, the CIA, Castro, LBJ, and so on, conspired with Oswald to murder the president, but such a plan would be incredibly reckless, irrational, and dangerous for any of these persons or groups to even entertain, and hence, unlikely and far-fetched.

3. And if there's no credible evidence that any of the aforementioned persons or groups were behind the assassination, what other person or group in our society would possibly be behind Oswald's act? The Des Moines Rotary Club? The Boston Symphony? Some U.S. senators? The Miami City Council? The United States Department of Indian Affairs? The Southern Baptist Christian Conference? I hope the reader isn't thinking how silly I am. The buffs are silly. I'm a rather serious person.

4. As mentioned in the introduction of this book, we all know from our own experiences in life that it is almost impossible to keep a secret. And that's when only a few people, even two, are involved, and even if the matter that one wishes to remain undisclosed isn't terribly important. Somehow or other the information gets out, and it does so rather quickly, whether induced by one's conscience, as in a death-bed confession, or through a former wife or mistress, or inadvertently, or simply because people can't keep their mouths shut.† As I told the jury in London, "I'll stipulate that three people can keep a secret, but only if two are dead." On a national scale we see this phenomenon at work with one presidential administration after another being unable to control, frequently for even a few days, "leaks" to the media on matters they did not want known. (One example among thousands:

USA Today reported on July 19, 2002, that “recent news leaks [of classified information from a congressional probe of 9-11 intelligence failures] have infuriated the White House and prompted Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld to issue a memo warning that staffers who spill secrets are jeopardizing American lives.”³ In the Kennedy case itself, we saw that although only a few members of the FBI’s Dallas office were involved, they were unable to keep secret their effort to suppress Oswald’s leaving a threatening note at the Dallas office about ten days or so before the assassination.

When we apply this literal rule of life to the alleged massive conspiracy the conspiracy theorists claim existed in the murder of the president of the United States—massive not only in the considerable number of people who would have had to be involved* but also in the great number of details and matters that would have had to be suppressed, any one of which could have exposed the plot or given rise to an inference of its existence, and which allegedly included the doctoring of many photographs and X-rays, even the Zapruder film itself, and the murder of over a hundred people to silence them, and then the cover-up of each of these murders—we can be certain that if such a conspiracy took place, its existence would have broken out of its original shell in a thousand different ways, and relatively quickly. Yet after forty-four long years, not one credible word, not one syllable has ever surfaced about any conspiracy to kill Kennedy. (There have been noncredible confessions of guilt in the Kennedy case, nearly all of which have been discussed in depth in this book—for example, Chicago mobster Sam Giancana allegedly telling his brother Chuck that he was behind the murders of JFK, RFK, and Marilyn Monroe, that he met with LBJ and Richard Nixon in Dallas before the assassination and told them he and the CIA were planning to murder JFK, and that Jack Ruby coordinated the whole assassination for Sam. Because none of these confessions are even remotely credible—indeed, many are downright amusing—no serious person has ever paid any attention to them.) The reason why not the slightest trace of a conspiracy has ever been uncovered, of course, is that no such conspiracy ever existed.

When we add to the above the allegation by conspiracy theorists that a second massive conspiracy existed—by the Warren Commission* and its leading assistant counsels to suppress the truth about the assassination from the American people—and not one word has ever leaked in over forty years of the existence of that conspiracy either, the only reasonable conclusion is that only people who subscribe to rules of absurdity, not rules of life, could possibly believe that a conspiracy to kill Kennedy ever existed. The conspiracy argument in the Kennedy assassination requires the belief that for over forty years a great number of people have been able to keep silent about the plot behind the most important and investigated murder of the twentieth century. In other words, it requires a belief in the impossible. Political columnist Charles Krauthammer, writing in 1992, pointed out the absurdity of the cover-up premise: “That in a country where the fixing of a handful of game shows could not be held secret, a near-universal assassination conspiracy has remained airtight for 28 years.”⁴ How, sensible people ask, could such a vast conspiracy remain leakproof for almost four and a half decades, or even four and a half days? British writer D. M. Thomas marvels at the absurdity of the notion that “a network of conspirators killed Kennedy, corrupted the medical and legal investigations, and buried the truth, all without a hitch.”

In his book, Loving God, former presidential assistant Charles Colson, in writing about Watergate, said, “With the most powerful office in the world at stake, a small band of hand-picked loyalists [of President Richard Nixon]... could not hold a conspiracy together for more than two weeks.”⁵

5. Obviously, the more complicated a plot is, the greater the likelihood that something will go wrong and it won't work. Everyone intuitively knows this, and hence we can assume that if there had been a plot to kill Kennedy, the plotters would have made it as uncomplicated as possible. But the massive conspiracy envisioned by most conspiracy theorists necessarily would be extremely complex, and this fact is greatly exacerbated by the ineptitude of human beings.

I'm talking about the staggering incompetence at every level of our society, one that normally prevents any group, large or small, including the U.S. government and its agencies, from performing at anywhere near optimum capacity? Indeed, on a scale of one to ten, they normally operate below five. Incompetence is so widely prevalent that I expect it, and when I find competence I am always pleasantly surprised. Let's look at just one example among a great many, this one at the CIA, the main federal agency conspiracy theorists suspect of being behind the assassination. In 1994, Aldrich Ames, chief of the CIA's Soviet counterintelligence branch, pleaded guilty to the biggest espionage case in U.S. history. Ames furnished the Soviets U.S. secrets in return for more than $2 million. His perfidy led to the deaths of several Russian undercover agents working for the United States in the Soviet Union. Ames told his interrogators it was "really easy" to obtain the top-secret information even after he was transferred to anti-narcotics work in the early 1990s.

In noting that it took an incredible nine years for Ames's colleagues and superiors at CIA headquarters to catch him, syndicated columnist Mary McGrory wrote that "Ames and his wife did everything they could to arouse suspicion, living it up in the most provocative manner. What G5-14, on a salary of $69,000-plus, pays half a million in cash [$540,000] for a house in Arlington, Virginia, buys a bright red Jaguar [which he drove to work] and runs up Trumplike charges on his credit card?"⁶ A November 1994 report on the Ames case from the Senate Intelligence Committee found "gross negligence" ("negligence" being a euphemism here for incompetence) at CIA headquarters in Langley, Virginia, and reports from both the Senate Intelligence Committee and the House Select Committee on Intelligence "agreed that the agency [CIA] is in deep disarray," a condition, they said, that long predated the Ames case.⁷

I mean, in 1986 the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), with billions of dollars spent, and the finest scientific minds available, and with the space shuttle Challenger right in front of their noses for inspection, and with a defective pressure seal wrongly designed and about which they had been advised and warned on numerous occasions, sent seven astronauts to their death because of their dreadful incompetence. Speaking of NASA, on the first day of the Apollo 8 flight that circumnavigated the moon, when Colonel Frank Borman, the commander of the flight, was sending transmissions back to Cape Kennedy, he referred to the Apollo 8 flight as the Gemini 8 flight, a flight he had participated in three years earlier. That's life in the real world.

While we're talking about incompetence, let's look at an extreme example of it in the Kennedy case itself. Established procedure in the Secret Service during a presidential motorcade is to scan not only the crowds but also the roofs and windows of buildings as the motorcade goes along.⁸ But apparently, and unbelievably, not one of the sixteen Secret Service agents in the motorcade through Dealey Plaza was looking anywhere near the upper floors of the Book Depository Building. If they had, they would have seen (as several Dealey Plaza witnesses who never had any obligation to look for such things did) a figure or a rifle in the window where Oswald was. But there's no evidence, from any of the reports of the agents, that they saw anything in Oswald's window, or even saw the three black Book Depository employees in the two windows beneath Oswald's window. Pardon my pique, but where in the hell were their heads when the president's limousine passed by the Book Depository Building, other than up the proverbial place? Special Agent Roy Kellerman told the Warren Commission that in the Secret Service detail protecting the president, "when you are driving down [the] street...and you have buildings on either side of you, you are going to scan your eyes up and down" the buildings.⁹ Can you imagine that? Thirty-two trained eyes belonging to sixteen men whose duty and responsibility was to protect the president, and not one of these thirty-two eyes saw Oswald, or a rifle, or anything worthy of their attention in the sniper's nest window. But several lay people did, and they were only there to watch the motorcade, not watch over the president's security.

The question is, How could the vast number of conspirators contemplated by the theorists have pulled off this incredibly complex conspiracy to such a degree of skill—never bumbling or slipping in any way that would reveal or even suggest their existence to one outside their group—that eternal secrecy would be guaranteed? Easy. You see, we know human beings are unable to keep their mouths shut and routinely incompetent, frequently stumbling over their own feet. But the conspirators envisioned by the theorists have their mouths permanently zippered and are extraordinarily competent, even prescient, being able to predict faultlessly all of the many uncontrollable variables in their mission to the point where everything worked perfectly, and with mathematical precision.

As Richard White, professor of history at the University of Washington, and speaking in a generic sense, says, "You can't trust the government to do anything right—except, of course, to conspire and cover up. Then it becomes diabolically efficient. The very people who are wildest for government conspiracies are often the same people who believe the government is incapable of delivering the mail efficiently."¹⁰ In other words, the conspiracists believe that Murphy's law (whatever can go wrong will go wrong) doesn't apply to the alleged conspiracy in the assassination and cover-up.

The above deals with the murder and cover-up. But with the many groups supposedly involved in the conspiracy, like the CIA, mob, anti-Castro Cubans, and military-industrial complex, how could they handle all the logistical complexities and inevitable disagreements among themselves over details during the planning phase leading up to November 22, without anything they did out of the ordinary (and by definition, they would have had to do things out of the ordinary) coming to the attention of just one person outside their group?

6. If Oswald conspired with anyone, they waited quite awhile to bring him aboard. The conspiracy couldn't have been hatched before October 1, 1963, when we know Oswald was still in Mexico City desperately trying to get to Cuba. If he had succeeded in getting to Cuba, who believes he would have ended up killing Kennedy? No one I've ever heard of. And how believable is it that a plot to kill the president of the United States, the most powerful man on earth, would be born after October 1, just seven weeks before Kennedy's death? To believe something like that is to be addicted to silliness. The absurdity of the notion that Oswald conspired with others to kill Kennedy can be spotlighted by the fact that on the very day, September 26, 1963, that it was announced in both Dallas newspapers that Kennedy was going to come to Texas on November 21 and 22 and that Dallas would likely be one of the cities he would visit,¹¹ Oswald was on a bus traveling to Mexico City determined to get to Cuba.

Indeed, since Kennedy's motorcade route past the Book Depository Building wasn't selected until November 18,¹² and announced in a paper for the first time on the morning of November 19 in the Dallas Morning News,¹³ we not only thereby know that Oswald getting a job at the Book

Depository Building on October 15 was unrelated to President Kennedy's trip to Dallas and the assassination, but it would seem that any conspiracy involving Oswald as the hit man would have had to be hatched no earlier than November 19, just three days before Kennedy's death (i.e., unless the argument is made—which I have yet to hear even the daffy conspiracy buffs make—that wherever Kennedy went when he came to Dallas, it was Oswald's job to track him down and kill him). Surely no person with an ounce of sense could possibly believe that the CIA, mob, and so on, recruited Oswald to kill Kennedy just three days before the assassination.

7. In the same vein, during the five-week period leading up to the assassination, we know Oswald was taking driving lessons from Ruth Paine and was about to apply for a learner's permit. In fact, we know that as late as November 16, just six days before the assassination, Oswald went to the state's license examination bureau in Dallas to get his driver's permit, only leaving because the line was very long.¹⁴ How likely is it that Oswald would be taking driving lessons and going down to get a learner's permit on November 16 if he was planning on murdering the president six days later? As mentioned earlier in this book, his leaving nearly all his money and his wedding ring behind on the morning of the assassination clearly demonstrated his awareness of what he could expect his life to be like after he pulled the trigger. The mundane exercise of learning to drive and looking forward to one day having a driving license speaks loudly for the proposition that Oswald's intent to murder the president was formed somewhat on the spur of the moment not long before the day of the assassination, and as a necessary corollary and concomitant to this, against the proposition that a group like the CIA or organized crime conspired with Oswald to have him kill Kennedy for them.

Other things Oswald did during the month leading up to the assassination clearly represented a person in the normal, humdrum rhythm of life, not someone preparing, with others, to murder the president of the United States. For example, we already know that on November 1, three weeks before the assassination, he rented a mail box at the Terminal Annex near the Book Depository Building. At $1.50 per month, he paid $3.00 for two months, the rental expiring on December 31, five weeks after the assassination.¹⁵ The relevance of this is clear since we know that Oswald was very tightfisted with his money, what precious little of it he had. And although to you and me $1.50 is nothing, everything in life is relative, and to Oswald it was something. Here's someone who is paying $8.00 a week in rent, can't live with his wife and daughters because he can't afford an apartment for the three of them, and has a net worth of little over $200.00. He never would have just thrown away that extra $1.50 for the second month if he didn't intend to use the mail box for that month of December, particularly, as I say, when he was notorious for literally watching every penny.

Also, on November 1 he sent a letter to Arnold Johnson, the director of information for the American Communist Party in New York City, in which he told Johnson of his being introduced, by a friend, to the local chapter of the ACLU, and asked Johnson to advise him "to what degree, if any" should he "attempt to heighten [the group's] progressive tendencies?"¹⁶ Around that same time, Oswald sent a $2.00 registration fee to the ACLU in New York City to become a new member, the ACLU receiving the $2.00 on November 4.¹⁷ On November 9, Oswald wrote a letter to the Soviet embassy in Washington, D.C., asking it to "please inform us [him and Marina] of the arrival of our Soviet entrance visas as soon as they come [in]," mailing the letter on November 12.¹⁸

Indeed, in the late evening of November 20, just two days before the assassination, Oswald took a load of his clothing to a "washateria" (laundromat) near his home.¹⁹ Though the thought of killing the president had probably already entered his mind, the act of washing a load of his clothing clearly reflects that no final decision (if one at all) had yet been made, and of course it automatically would have been made by this time if he had been the hit man in a conspiracy to murder the president. If by Wednesday evening he had already committed himself to killing Kennedy, his state of mind would have had to be that if he got caught, Dallas County would be doing his laundry at least for awhile, and if he was able to flee to Mexico or where have you, like the title of Billie Holiday's song, he would be "traveling light" while getting there, not carrying a bundle of laundry in his arms.

For all intents and purposes, Oswald's conduct during the month before the assassination alone precludes the notion of a conspiracy.

8. Again in the same vein, if you're the triggerman for the mob, CIA, Castro, or anyone else in the biggest murder case in American history, what's more likely? That on the night before the murder, you're at your home, apartment, or "safe house" preparing for the following day, and are either meeting with or at least available to your "handlers" for last-minute instructions or consultation? Or that you're going to be visiting your wife, who is staying at someone else's home, and begging her to come back home to you? * Common sense, which Voltaire tells us is not that common, dictates that it's the former, not the latter.

It is reasonably clear that when Oswald went to visit his wife and two children the night before Kennedy came to Dallas, it was his intention to get his rifle and assassinate the president the next day—as indicated, what other reason would he have had to go there, for the first time, on a Thursday night? It is equally reasonably clear that this intention of his was not irrevocable but conditional. If Marina was willing to come back to him, a possibility he already knew was faint, he was prepared to forego his plans concerning Kennedy. If Marina, then, had agreed to come back to Oswald on the night before the president came to Dallas, it is almost a certainty the assassination would never have taken place. †

It is interesting to note that as we saw in the Oswald biography section, Marina herself feels this way. In a narrative written in Russian by Marina at the request of the Warren Commission, and translated by the Commission, she said about the night before the assassination, when her husband virtually begged her to come back to him and she refused to do so, "Of course, if I had known what was going to happen, I would have agreed without further thought. Perhaps, if Lee was planning anything, he staked everything on a card. That is, if I agreed to his proposal to go with him to Dallas, he would not do what he had planned, and, if I did not, then he would."²⁰

Oswald's entreaty to Marina to come back to him on the night before the assassination virtually precludes, all by itself, the existence of a conspiracy.

9. This book has proved beyond all doubt that Oswald was a highly unreliable, highly disturbed, and emotionally unhinged political fanatic. His own wife, Marina, described him as "not a very trustworthy [trusting?] person."²¹ At the London trial, when I asked Ruth Paine, who knew Oswald very well, "Do you feel he [Oswald] was the type one would employ to accomplish a serious mission?" she answered, "No. I would not have employed him for any job. I didn't see him as stable enough."

"He was unstable and flighty?"

"Yes...He acted from his emotions primarily...rather than working from a set of logical ideas."²²

To believe that a group of conspirators like the CIA or mob would entrust the biggest murder in American history to Oswald, of all people, is too preposterous a notion for any rational person to harbor in his or her mind for more than a millisecond. How could they possibly have confidence in someone like Oswald to take care of their monumental mission in a way that would involve no problems for them, when he couldn't even adequately take care of himself (he was living in a virtual closet on November 22, 1963), much less his wife and two children?

10. Not only wouldn't any group of conspirators ever dream of putting its entire future into the hands of Oswald, but the evidence is very clear that Oswald himself, being such a loner and someone with a mind of his own who disliked taking orders from anyone, would be highly unlikely to work with anyone else on such a mission.²³ As author Jean Davison points out, the ultimate weakness of the conspiracy theorists' contention that Lee Harvey Oswald was framed is their erroneous conception of Oswald. "In every conspiracy book, Oswald is a piece of chaff blown about by powerful, unseen forces—he's a dumb and compliant puppet with no volition of his own."²⁴ But we know from all the evidence that Oswald was the exact opposite of this, in the extreme, that he was anything but meek and malleable. Here's someone who described himself as having a "mean streak of independence" someone who for awhile in grade school even refused to salute the flag in the morning with his fellow students;²⁵ someone who, during high school, when ordered to jog around the field with the other players during tryouts for the football team, told the coach, "This is a free country, and I don't have to do it"²⁶ someone who, as a fellow marine who was stationed with Oswald in Japan said, "was often in trouble for failure to adhere to rules and regulations and gave the impression of disliking any kind of authority"²⁷ and someone who, as another marine who was stationed with Oswald in San Diego said, "was an argumentative type of person [who] would frequently take the opposite side of an argument just for the sake of a debate."²⁸

There were no exceptions to this perception of Oswald's independence from those who knew him. A member of the Russian emigré community in Dallas said that Oswald wasn't "responsible enough to have...anybody above him really telling him what to do."^{29*} "He resented any type of authority," another said.³⁰ Still another said, "I just thought he was a person that couldn't get along with anybody or anyone."³¹

Yet the conspiracy theorists want us to believe that the man who couldn't get along in school, couldn't get along in the Marines, someone we know couldn't even get along with his own wife, was supposedly selected by a group of conspirators to get along with them in committing the biggest murder in American history.

No one knew Oswald better than Marina, and when she was asked, under oath, by the HSCA, "Can you visualize him working with an accomplice?" she answered, "Personally, I can't," basing this on the fact, she said, that "living with a person for a few years you...have some kind of intuition about what he might do or might not."³² Earlier, before the Warren Commission, when she was asked whether she felt that her husband "acted in concert with someone else," she responded, "No, only alone."

"You are convinced that his action was his action alone, that he was influenced by no one else?"
"Yes, I am convinced."³³

Marina's biographer, Priscilla McMillan, who spent a great number of hours interviewing Marina, writes, "I have often asked Marina whether Lee might have been capable of joining with an accomplice to kill the President. Never, she says. Lee was too secretive ever to have told anyone his plans. Nor could he have acted in concert, accepted orders, or obeyed any plan by anybody else. The reason Marina gives is that Lee had no use for the opinions of anybody but himself. He had only contempt for other people. ‘He was a lonely person,’ she says. ‘He trusted no one. He was too sick. It [killing Kennedy] was the fantasy of a sick person, to get attention only for himself.’” McMillan says that Marina believed that with respect to the assassination, Lee acted on impulse and first thought seriously about killing the President only a day or two before he did it.³⁴

Not that by itself it would carry great weight, but it should be noted that no evidence has ever surfaced that Oswald, either around the time of the assassination or at any prior time, ever hinted, even accidentally, to anyone, including his wife, that he was working for or associated with any agency or group of people, and the Warren Commission, after an exhaustive inquiry, was unable to find any such evidence. And as to Oswald’s connection to any other individual, such as Jack Ruby, Warren Commission assistant counsel Arlen Specter said, “The Commission left no stone unturned to track down Oswald’s background to the maximum extent possible, to see if he had dealings with anyone else who might have been a co-conspirator,” and nothing was found.³⁵

11. As we’ve seen in this book, at the time of the assassination and Ruby’s killing of Oswald, those who knew Oswald and Ruby well, including family members, rejected the likelihood or notion that either had acted in concert with others to carry out their respective deeds. Yet years later, thousands of conspiracy theorists, not one of whom knew or had ever met either Oswald or Ruby, are convinced Oswald (in those cases where they don’t go further and say he was just a patsy) and Ruby were members of a conspiracy. On this one point alone of familiarity with the subject, who is more likely to be correct—those who knew the two men or those who did not?

12. In a similar vein, we know from common sense and the experience of our lives, that more than anything else, survivors of a murder victim want the person or persons who killed their loved one to be brought to justice. What reason do we have for believing that the Kennedy family is any different? (As President Kennedy’s brother Robert said, “Nobody is more interested than I in knowing who is responsible for the death of President Kennedy.”)³⁶ Yet conspiracy theorists, without any evidence to support their position, are apparently convinced that John F. Kennedy’s survivors are an exception. (Indeed, several are so crazy as to believe that RFK actually knew who killed his brother and joined in the conspiracy to cover it up.)³⁷

It is noteworthy, then, that the Kennedy family has been supportive of the Warren Commission’s conclusion that Oswald acted alone. Because of Bobby Kennedy’s fierce opposition to organized crime, which his brother the president supported, and because of JFK’s efforts, with RFK’s help, to remove Castro from power in Cuba, and with the concomitant dissatisfaction with JFK by the CIA and anti-Castro Cuban exiles over the administration’s failure to provide air support during the Bay of Pigs invasion, RFK’s first instinct—there have been too many reports from various sources to deny this—immediately after the assassination was to suspect a possible retaliatory killing by one of the people or groups he went after. However, after the coffee cooled and the FBI and Warren Commission investigated the assassination, he issued the following statement to the media on September 27, 1964: “I am convinced [Lee Harvey] Oswald was solely responsible for what happened and that he did not have any outside help or assistance. I have not read the report, nor do I intend to. But I have been briefed on it and I am completely satisfied that the Commission investigated every lead and examined every piece of evidence. The [Warren] Commission’s inquiry was thorough and conscientious.”³⁸ RFK, who undoubtedly knew every one of the seven Commission members personally, had no doubt about their integrity in this case, while thousands of conspiracy theorists down through the years, 99.9 percent of whom never knew even one, much less all seven, deeply distrust them.

Perhaps one thing speaks louder than any words, however, with respect to RFK's feelings. During the entire Warren Commission period, he was the nation's attorney general, the chief law enforcement officer in the land with jurisdiction over the FBI, the main investigative arm for the Commission. If at any time he had sensed that the Warren Commission and the FBI weren't doing enough or the right things, wouldn't he have automatically put pressure on them to do so? I would think he would do this even if the victim were not his brother—all the more so when it was. But he never did. Does that not speak volumes? Not only did he not do anything, but in a letter to the Warren Commission on August 4, 1964, he affirmatively told the commissioners he could "state definitely that I know of no credible evidence to support the allegations that the assassination of President Kennedy was caused by a domestic or foreign conspiracy," adding that "I have no suggestions to make at this time regarding an additional investigation which should be undertaken by the Commission prior to the publication of its report."

The president's youngest brother, Senator Edward Kennedy, told Time magazine in 1975, "There were things that should have been done differently. There were mistakes made. But I know of no facts that have been brought to light which would call for a reassessment of the conclusion. I'm fundamentally satisfied with the findings of the Warren Commission."³⁹

What about JFK Jr., the slain president's son? Since he literally grew up at the feet of his elders in the Kennedy family, if the sense throughout the years was that his father had been murdered as a result of a conspiracy, surely JFK Jr. would have known about it. And just as surely, the late son of the president would look favorably on someone like Oliver Stone, who ostensibly was trying to do everything he could to uncover that conspiracy. But when JFK Jr.'s staff at his magazine, George, asked him to interview Stone to help get the fledgling magazine off the ground in its second issue in November of 1995, thinking it would be a blockbuster commercial success, JFK Jr. balked. When his aides persisted, he agreed to have dinner with Stone at Rokenwagner, a Santa Monica, California, restaurant, and when Stone asked John Jr. rhetorically whether he really believed Oswald alone had killed his father, adding that there had to be a conspiracy, John excused himself and walked away. After he returned, the dinner was politely brought to a close as soon as possible. John later told his aides, "I just couldn't sit across a table from that man for two hours. I just couldn't," and Stone was not interviewed for the magazine. John's biographer, Richard Blow, who worked with him at the magazine, said that Stone "made John feel like Captain Kirk being stalked by the world's looniest Trekkie."⁴⁰

It's instructive, is it not, that the Warren Commission's conclusion of no conspiracy in the assassination is accepted by the brothers and son of the murdered president, but categorically rejected by thousands of conspiracy theorists who were strangers to the president?

13. If a group like the CIA or organized crime was behind Oswald's murder of Kennedy, is it likely that Oswald was so strapped for money at the time he murdered Kennedy that he never had a pot to grow flowers in, having, per the Warren Report, only $183 to his name at the time of his arrest?^{41*} In addition to the $170 he had left for Marina, at the time of his arrest Oswald had a $5 bill, eight $1 bills, a fifty-cent piece, three dimes, a nickel, and two pennies on his person.⁴² A total of $183.87—a big hit man for the mob or CIA. Right. We know that contract killers get thousands of dollars to eliminate people no one has ever heard of, but to kill the president of the United States the mob or CIA is not going to pay its hit man anything, not even any money up front?

When, on June 22, 1996, I went to the rooming house where Oswald lived at the time of the assassination, Kaye Puckett, who currently runs the place her family has owned since 1939, and was married with three children and living at the rooming house in 1963, showed me where Oswald's room was, right off the living room to the left when you enter the home. I was astonished at how small it was. When I said to Mrs. Puckett, "This looks more like a large closet to me than a room," she responded that at one time it had been used as a telephone room for all the tenants (it had also, at another time, been used as a small library) and was never intended to be a regular room to rent, but it was all that was available to Oswald when he came to the rooming house in October of 1963, the other regular rooms being rented out, and he settled for it. So the CIA or mob or military-industrial-complex conspirators were really taking good care of their hit man, weren't they?

Surely no one believes that Oswald would have agreed to commit the biggest murder in American history as a paid hit man for someone else without getting some real money up front.

Quite apart from Oswald's not receiving any large sum of money around the time of the assassination as a down payment to kill Kennedy, virtually all conspiracy theorists have alleged that Oswald was an agent of U.S. intelligence during the years leading up to the assassination, many claiming he was even a double agent, helping the KGB. But if this is so, unless the theorists want us to believe he was working free for these agencies (completely unrealistic), where is there any evidence that Oswald, at any point in his adult life, was spending more money than he was earning from his various jobs? To the contrary, all the evidence is that Oswald was always very poor. Poor to the point where he had to borrow money to pay for his and Marina's transportation to the United States from Russia. To the point where Oswald owned one suit to his name, a Russian-made, poorly fitting garment of heavy fabric that was unsuitable for the warm climate of Texas and Louisiana.⁴³ To the point where Ruth Paine described the Oswalds as "very poor,"⁴⁴ and Oswald's aunt, Lillian Murret, said the Oswalds "were practically starving" in the summer of 1963 in New Orleans.⁴⁵ To the point where, as indicated, their friend in Dallas, Paul Gregory, told the Warren Commission that he would often take them shopping for groceries and he was "amazed at how little they bought,"⁴⁶ and their friends would bring food and groceries to their apartment.⁴⁷ To the point where Jeanne de Mohrenschildt didn't feel she could really judge whether Marina was the type to make a home out of where they lived because "they had so few things," and you can't "make a home out of nothing... They were so poor."⁴⁸ To the point where near the end Oswald was living in a very tiny 5 × 13½ foot room at a rooming house for which he paid eight dollars a week.

As mentioned in the introduction to this book, no one has studied the assassination more than the late Warren Commission critic Harold Weisberg. And as Weisberg confided to me in a letter three years before his death, he had "not found a shred of evidence" to support the position that Oswald was a paid agent for anyone, adding that Oswald "never had an extra penny, so he had no loot from being an agent."^{49*}

14. The very rifle that Oswald owned and used to murder the president points away from a conspiracy. One thought that almost immediately occurred to me at the beginning of my research for the London trial was this: Why would whatever group (mob, CIA, KGB, etc.) that was allegedly behind Oswald furnish its hit man with a used, surplus, nineteen-dollar mail-order rifle (one that—get this—had a homemade sling)?⁵⁰ Not that Oswald's rifle wasn't able to get the job done. Safely assuming that Kennedy's head was the target of whoever pulled the Carcano trigger, one in three shots from the rifle did directly hit the target. But is it sense or nonsense to believe that members of a group like the CIA or mob or military-industrial complex, needing to make sure that Kennedy was killed, would let their hit man try to carry out the biggest murder ever with anything other than a very high-quality rifle? The fact that Oswald used the type of rifle he did is almost, by itself, prima facie evidence that he acted alone and there was no conspiracy. Oh, by the way, the clip on Oswald's Carcano could hold six live rounds.⁵¹ But we know Oswald fired three rounds, and only one cartridge was found in the chamber,⁵² and the clip was empty.⁵³ So the big group behind the assassination had its assassin set out on the morning of November 22 to kill the president of the United States with a clip that was missing two rounds.

15. Additionally, if some group was behind Oswald's killing of Kennedy, it obviously wouldn't have had him use any rifle that was so easily traceable to him, as the Mannlicher-Carcano was, since he would be a link to the group.

16. If, indeed, groups like the CIA, mob, military-industrial complex, or whatever, were behind the assassination, not only would they have made sure their hit man had the best firearm available, but since they wouldn't want him to be apprehended and questioned, they almost assuredly would have equipped the firearm with a sound suppressor, most commonly known as a silencer. Silencers go all the way back to the turn of the twentieth century, and a firearms expert for the Los Angeles Police Department told me that as of 1963 they were already sophisticated enough to "substantially diminish the report" of the weapon and to "alter or disguise the sound," such as to make it sound like "the hitting of a pile of wood with a hammer" or "the operation of machinery." He said silencers are effective, and shots at Kennedy from a weapon with the best silencer then available "probably wouldn't have even been heard above the background noise of the motorcade and crowd" in Dealey Plaza.⁵⁴

17. A related reality presents itself, which will take a bit more time to explain. The mere fact that Oswald's rifle was a military rifle (the Carcano was the rifle of the Italian military, the Second World War equivalent of our M-1 rifle) also speaks against a conspiracy for the simple reason that only 6.5-millimeter, full metal-jacketed (FMJ), military-type bullets were ever made for that rifle, not soft-point bullets, the most destructive and deadly bullets by far. Soft-point bullets, a term used by firearms people to refer to partially metal-jacketed bullets with an exposed (unjacketed) lead nose, expand or mushroom upon contact with a human body, thereby causing greater destruction to the victim's internal organs. (The FMJ-type bullets that Oswald fired have a "closed" nose of metal.) Having unexposed soft lead, they also are much more likely than FMJ bullets to break up into many fragments when they hit bone inside the body, additionally increasing their killing power. With the objectives of making war as civilized and humane as possible, and wounding and immobilizing the adversary rather than killing him,* the July 29, 1899, Hague Convention's "Declaration Concerning Expanding Bullets" (still adhered to by all armies of the world) specifically prohibited the use in international armed conflict "of bullets which expand or flatten easily in the human body," since they cause much more pain, suffering, and internal hemorrhaging. (And Article 23 [e] of the "Annex to Hague Convention IV Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land" of October 18, 1907, prohibits the employment of "arms, projectiles, or material of a nature to cause superfluous injury.") Only FMJ military bullets are permitted. These bullets (the type Oswald fired) can obviously also kill, but if they encounter only soft tissue, they can be expected, unlike soft-point bullets, to travel right through the body (as the bullet that struck the president in the upper-right back did) and frequently are not fatal.† Indeed, Dr. Malcolm Perry, one of the two principal doctors who attempted to resuscitate the president at Parkland Hospital, thought the president could have survived this wound,⁵⁵ but the head wound was fatal.

What all of this means is that if a group of conspirators, like the CIA, mob, or KGB, sophisticated in the killing of humans, was behind the assassination—as conspiracy theorists postulate as a certitude—they had their triggerman use the least deadly type of bullet, one that was specifically designed to injure, not kill. How nonsensical is that?

It should be noted that, like Oswald, James Earl Ray, the assassin of Martin Luther King Jr. on April 4, 1968, in Memphis, Tennessee, didn't have two nickels to rub together. Yet, unlike the very cheap, old, mail-order rifle Oswald used, the large-bore deer rifle Ray used to kill King, a brand new .30-06 caliber Remington, cost over seven hundred dollars,⁵⁶ the equivalent of about a two-thousand-dollar rifle today, and the bullet that killed King was a soft-point bullet.⁵⁷ It may be interesting to the reader to know that the “frontline” people from the HSCA (firearms, photographic, medical, etc., experts who analyzed the evidence, as opposed to the U.S. congressmen on the House Select Committee) whom I worked very closely with on the London trial were not at all confident there was no conspiracy in the assassination of Martin Luther King, whose murder, along with JFK's, the HSCA also reinvestigated. (The HSCA concluded, “There is a likelihood that James Earl Ray assassinated Doctor Martin Luther King as a result of a conspiracy.”)⁵⁸ All of them, however, felt there was no conspiracy in the assassination of JFK, that the allegations were all foundationless.

18. Another point is that Oswald, though a good shot, qualified as a sharpshooter and a marksman in the Marines, but never as an expert. He certainly was not the professional shooter with sniper-like accuracy any group of conspirators would have automatically employed to kill the president of the United States. The CIA or mob or military-industrial complex would have chosen someone not only from the expert category, but from among the very best within that special category.

19. If, for instance, organized crime (or the CIA, military-industrial complex, etc.) decided to commit the biggest murder in American history, which would result in a retaliation against them of unprecedented proportions if they were discovered to be behind it, they would select a hit man who not only was exceptionally professional and tight-lipped but also had a very successful track record with them. Oswald had no track record with them. Yet they're going to use and rely on someone like him to kill the president of the United States? Really?

20. Without exception, all the pro-conspiracy books arguing that Oswald was a hit man for some powerful group (as we know, most contend he wasn't involved in the assassination at all but was framed) promote the notion that Oswald's relationship with the group went back some time, and for groups like U.S. intelligence and the KGB, at least four to five years. Further, they claim he was being groomed by them as a presidential assassin or for some other very serious mission. But how likely is it that with the biggest murder ever coming up on his plate, Oswald (on his own or with the group's knowledge and consent) would try to murder some other public figure first? (As we know, Oswald attempted to murder Major General Edwin Walker just months earlier, on April 10, 1963.) Would the rationale be that he needed live target practice for the main event? As the expression goes, please.

One footnote to this: Whatever group was allegedly behind Oswald, Walker, a virulent right winger who was one of the leaders of the John Birch Society in Dallas, would represent to their interests the exact opposite of what the moderately liberal JFK would. So there wouldn't have been any commonality between the intended victims.

21. In a similar vein, if Oswald, as part of a conspiracy, was scheduled to murder the president of the United States, how likely is it that his physical, mental, and emotional immersion in, and preparation for, such an extremely important and dangerous mission was so minimal, and his concern about it so little, that just two or so weeks before the scheduled murder, the main thing on his mind was to go into the local office of the FBI in Dallas and threaten to blow up the building if one of the agents didn't stop bothering his wife?

22. Moreover, if Oswald were about to murder the president in two or so weeks, would he do anything at all that had the potential of drawing anyone's attention to him, particularly the attention of the FBI?

23. On October 4, 1963, Oswald applied for a job as a "typesetter trainee" at the Padgett Printing Company in Dallas and was turned down because (the bottom of the application reads) "Bob Stovall [the president of Jagers-Chiles-Stovall, where Oswald previously worked] does not recommend this man. He was released [there] because of his record as a troublemaker." Stovall also informed Padgett that Oswald had "communistic tendencies."⁵⁹

If Oswald was the scheduled hit man in a conspiracy to murder Kennedy, why would those behind him (CIA, mob, FBI, etc.) have him apply for a job just seven weeks before the assassination that wasn't on the presidential motorcade route and would never be? Padgett Printing is located today where it was back in 1963, at 1313 North Industrial Boulevard in Dallas, a boulevard of light industry and no tall office buildings, where large crowds of people would be nonexistent. After the presidential limousine was scheduled to get off Elm Street onto the Stemmons Freeway en route to the Trade Mart, North Industrial Boulevard, to the west of the freeway, would be running roughly parallel to it, including the location at 1313 North Industrial Boulevard. However, per Dave Torok, president of Padgett Printing, the company's building has always been only one story, and the Stemmons Freeway, he said, "is a good half mile away, and you can't see it from our building, even from the roof."⁶⁰

The point, of course, is that if Padgett Printing Company had hired Oswald on October 4, Kennedy would not have been a target for Oswald to shoot and kill on November 22. And if Oswald were scheduled to be the hit man for the conspiracy to murder Kennedy, why would his employers (CIA, mob, etc.) have him apply for a job that, if he were hired, would eliminate him as their chosen assassin?

But there's more bad news for the poor, hapless conspiracy theorists, who would gladly settle for anything real, no matter how small, to keep their hopes alive, instead of getting hit with one haymaker after another to their dreams. On October 8, the Texas Employment Commission (TEC) sent Oswald out for a job interview at the Solid State Electronics Company of Texas. He didn't get the job because the company was looking for a sales clerk, and he had no experience that qualified him for that position. "I sure would like to have the job," he told James Hunter of Solid State, who interviewed him. "Every place I go they want experience."⁶¹ And again, the problem for the theorists is that Solid State was located at 2647 Myrtle Springs in Dallas, out beyond Parkland Hospital and nowhere near the motorcade route.

The next day, October 9, the TEC sent Oswald to the Burton-Dixie Corporation for a job as a clerk trainee. Emmett Hobson at Burton-Dixie knows that the company didn't hire Oswald, but told the FBI he didn't recall why, and could not recall the background information Oswald had given him.

Burton-Dixie was located at 817 Corinth in Dallas, an industrial area near Oak Cliff, which again, unfortunately for the buffs, was nowhere near the motorcade route.⁶²

On October 14, Oswald applied for a job at the Wiener Lumber Company in Dallas. The proprietor, Sam Wiener, was impressed with Oswald as a prospective employee until Oswald was asked to show his Honorable Discharge Card, which Oswald, of course, was unable to do. In the “Remarks” section of Oswald’s application, Wiener typed, “Although this man makes an excellent appearance and seems quite intelligent he seemed unable to understand when I continually and clearly asked him for his honorable discharge card or papers for the latest (just ended) hitch. I believe he does not have [it] and will not get such a card or paper. Do not consider for this reason only.”

The lumber company was at the corner of Inwood Road and Maple Avenue, near Love Field, so was close to the motorcade route, but again, not on it. The closest that the president’s motorcade came to this location was at the intersection of Lemmon Avenue and Inwood Road, a little more than three-quarters of a mile from Wiener Lumber.⁶³

Again, the fact, alone, that Oswald was applying for jobs up through October 14 at locations not on the motorcade route virtually precludes the notion of conspiracy among rational people.

24. In the same vein, although Oswald applied for his job at the Book Depository Building with Roy Truly on October 15, the Depository had two buildings, the one at Houston and Elm that everyone knows about, and another building called the “Warehouse,” located at 1917 Houston, a building that was larger than the one at Houston and Elm but with two fewer stories.* The Warehouse was not on the parade route, being about four blocks north of the Book Depository Building. (Indeed, at that time in 1963, Houston Street became unpaved one block north of Elm.) Truly just as well could have assigned Oswald to work in the building at 1917 Houston as at the building at Houston and Elm. “I might have sent Oswald to work in a warehouse two blocks away,” Truly said. “Oswald and another fellow reported for work on the same day [October 15] and I needed one of them for the depository building. I picked Oswald.” Truly said he “hired” the other “boy” for the Warehouse.⁶⁴ Neither Oswald nor the supposed conspirators behind him could have possibly known or foreseen which building Truly would have assigned Oswald to. And if Truly had sent Oswald to 1917 Houston, Kennedy would not have passed under Oswald’s window and there wouldn’t have been an assassination. What type of massive conspiracy by the CIA, mob, et cetera, to murder Kennedy would be completely dependent on what building Truly assigned the assassin to? I mean, would any group of conspirators choose a location for killing Kennedy that depended on an arbitrary decision such as this one that was wholly beyond its control? Of course, we could make Roy Truly part of the conspiracy to kill Kennedy, something that would be perfectly all right with the conspiracy theorists.

It should be noted further that, as we saw in this book, there is absolutely no evidence that any group such as the CIA or mob had anything to do with Oswald getting a job at the Book Depository Building, the building that literally enabled Oswald to successfully kill Kennedy.

25. Oswald told Marina he didn’t care for his job at the Book Depository Building, and as late as November 9 (Ruth Paine thinks it may have been November 2),⁶⁵ just thirteen days before the assassination, he applied for a job, per Marina, at “some photographic” company but did not get it.⁶⁶ So up to thirteen days before the assassination, or twenty at the most, Oswald sought a job that would have taken him away from his sniper’s nest right above the president’s limousine. Some conspiracy.

26. We know why Oswald shot Kennedy from the Book Depository Building. He worked there. Besides, no better opportunity to kill Kennedy would probably ever come to him. But if a powerful organization like the CIA, KGB, or organized crime, with vast resources at its disposal, decided to kill the president of the United States, obviously it would reconnoiter assassination sites around the country where the president was scheduled to be, searching for the very best one it could find. With this in mind, why in the world would any of these groups have chosen a location for their hit man that had a giant and heavily foliated oak tree obstructing his view of the president during several of the critical seconds in which he would want to be tracking and shooting the president? And why would they choose to shoot the president at a time when at least 80 percent of his body was concealed and protected by the body of his limousine?

27. If a group like the mob or the CIA was behind Oswald's assassination of Kennedy, in the period of time leading up to the assassination they (his "handlers," per conspiracy lore) would obviously have to be in touch with him. But in a telephone conversation, Mrs. Puckett told me that none of the seventeen tenants of the rooming house in 1963 had their own phone. She said they all shared "one communal pay phone on the wall in the hall back near the kitchen, and with all of them having only this one phone, it was in use a lot."⁶⁷

Also, Oswald spent every weekend, except one, with his wife and children at the Paine residence in Irving, and missed no days of work at the Book Depository Building. In the evenings we know he went to the nearby washateria on occasion, and went out on the evenings of October 23, a Wednesday, when he attended a speech by General Walker, and October 25, a Friday night when he was in Irving and attended a meeting of the American Civil Liberties Union. But other than this, according to Mrs. Puckett's mother (Mrs. Johnson) and the housekeeper, Earlene Roberts, in the five weeks prior to the assassination Oswald simply never went out. Mrs. Johnson said that except for watching TV with the other renters sometimes (during which, she said, if they talked to him, he wouldn't answer), "I just really never did see that man leave [his] room. . . 95 percent of the time he would sit in his room."⁶⁸ Earlene Roberts said, "He was always home at night—he never went out."⁶⁹ And Ruth Paine testified at the trial in London that Oswald was a loner who never had a relationship with anyone other than Marina, and never received or made any calls at her house phone while he was in her home. When I asked her, "So you're not aware of any contacts he had with anyone?" she answered, "No."⁷⁰

So it would seem that the biggest murder plot in American history, with the inevitable follow-up conversations, could only have taken place under the following circumstances: Oswald called his mob or CIA contacts from his job at the Book Depository Building, or they called and asked for him. But Roy Truly, the superintendent at the Book Depository, testified before the Warren Commission that there was only one phone (on the first floor) for the employees to use during their lunch hour "for a minute" and they were "supposed to ask permission to use the phone." And Truly said, "I never remember ever seeing him [Oswald] on the telephone" during work hours.⁷¹ Or on the way home from work Oswald got off the bus to call his co-conspirators from a pay phone. Or they called him at the rooming house (Earlene Roberts, the housekeeper, said that Oswald never received any telephone calls),⁷² or he called them with a bunch of change from the busy communal pay phone on the wall in the hall back near the kitchen of the rooming house.⁷³ Just how likely is any of this?

Moreover, Arthur Johnson, the landlord at Oswald's rooming house, told Dallas Morning News reporter Hugh Aynesworth on the afternoon of the assassination that Oswald "always talked in that foreign language when he talked on the phone." Whom was he talking to? Roberts, the housekeeper, told Aynesworth that Oswald "dialed that BL number [Irving, Texas, where Marina was living] a lot.”⁷⁴ As far as receiving phone calls, the landlady, Mrs. Johnson, like Earlene Roberts, said she didn’t recall Oswald ever receiving a call at the rooming house.⁷⁵

28. Part of a criminal’s invariable preparation for any premeditated crime is to contemplate how to pull it off without being caught. Although Oswald may have been disoriented enough not to have considered this part of the venture, we can be more than 100 percent certain that a group like the CIA, mob, or military-industrial complex would have. Since we know this to be true, if a group was behind Oswald’s act, it is absolutely inconceivable that it wouldn’t have done everything possible to avoid having its hit man captured and interrogated by the authorities, which carried the enormous danger of his cracking and implicating the group. No matter how far removed the group personally may have been from his act, he would have to have sufficient knowledge to incriminate whoever approached him to do the job, that person could in turn put the hat on the person or persons above him, and so on up to the architects of the assassination themselves. Since they would know this, at a very minimum they would have tried to provide for Oswald’s escape. But much more probably, a car would have been waiting for him at a prearranged place after he left the Depository Building, not to help him escape, but to drive him to his death.* Yet here we have Oswald, right after the assassination, leaving the Depository Building, completely alone and wandering out on the streets, trying to get back to his home by catching a bus, then deciding to get off and find a cab. This fact alone, and all by itself, tells any sensible person that Oswald acted alone, that there was no conspiracy in the assassination to kill Kennedy.

And as indicated, when Oswald was arrested he only had $13.87 on his person,⁷⁶ not enough to get him far away from Dallas, which, in the unlikely event the mob or CIA didn’t arrange for his immediate death, they would have wanted him to be.

Even if we make the completely unreasonable assumption that a group behind Oswald’s killing Kennedy would not have made every effort to help Oswald escape or kill him after he left the Book Depository Building to ensure he wasn’t captured and interrogated (i.e., apparently the group wanted him to be grilled for hours on end before it killed him), and accept the assumption made by so very many that it decided, instead, to have Ruby silence Oswald for it, let’s see where that takes us. There are two realities to consider. First, by the time Ruby shot Oswald, Oswald had already been interrogated for twelve hours over a three-day period (Friday, Saturday, and Sunday) by investigators from the Dallas Police Department, FBI, and Secret Service, as well as by the U.S. Post Office inspector and U.S. marshall in Dallas.⁷⁷ Second, if it was the group’s plan to get someone to silence Oswald after Oswald killed Kennedy, all rational minds have to agree that the group surely would not have waited until after Oswald killed Kennedy before it started looking for someone to silence Oswald. This would all be worked out, of course, well in advance.

In view of these two realities, the evidence that Ruby did not silence Oswald for any group such as the mob is that if he had been chosen to kill Oswald, he would have done so the first opportunity he had, rather than give the authorities two more days to interrogate Oswald, and that was on Friday evening at the Dallas Police Department. That evening, while Oswald was being grilled in the Homicide and Robbery office by Captain Fritz and others, Ruby, we know, was right outside Fritz’s office talking to reporters. At one point, Fritz brought Oswald out of the office and Oswald walked right past Ruby, coming within two to three feet of him.⁷⁸ And Ruby admitted to the FBI that he had his revolver, the one he used to kill Oswald two days later, in his right front trouser pocket because he had a lot of money from his nightclub on his person.⁷⁹ Ruby’s own attorney, Tom Howard, said

Ruby was armed with his revolver that Friday night.^{80*} Presumably at the request of his lawyers, Ruby wrote his version of the events that led up to his shooting of Oswald on 3 × 5 inch cards, and the cards were given to his lawyers. Some were prepared before his trial, others in advance of a motion for a new trial. On one of the cards, he wrote in his handwriting, “Had I wanted to get him [Oswald] I could have reached in and shot [him] when either Fritz [or] Curry brought him out in the hall, when they told the press that they would bring him down in the basement.”⁸¹

In addition to the fact that if Ruby killed Oswald for the mob (or any other group) he would have done so on Friday night to prevent further interrogation of Oswald, there is another reason why Ruby would have killed Oswald Friday night. The mob and Ruby would necessarily have to believe that Oswald would be extremely well protected by Dallas law enforcement, so Ruby would have no choice but to kill him the first opportunity he had since he would have had no way of knowing that he would ever have another opportunity to do so.

The fact that Ruby did not kill Oswald on Friday night, when it would have been so easy for him to have done so, is virtually conclusive evidence, all by itself, that he didn’t kill Oswald on Sunday for anyone but himself, which in turn is just further evidence that there was nothing inside of Oswald to silence because he too acted alone.

29. One other indication that Oswald’s decision to kill the president was essentially spontaneous (and therefore, devoid of any conspiracy with others) and formed sometime after the route of the president’s motorcade in front of Oswald’s workplace first became public only three days before the assassination, is his lack of planning to ensure his survival. Although Oswald wanted to survive—he tried to escape, and also physically resisted arrest, striking the arresting officer and drawing his revolver before it was wrenched away from him—he apparently never thought out his escape, even to the obvious point of bringing his revolver to work with him so that he would have it to defend and extricate himself from any possible confrontation with the authorities after his attempt on the president’s life the next day. Instead, he admitted during his interrogation by Captain Fritz of the Dallas Police Department that after he left the Book Depository Building following the assassination, he went back to his room at 1026 North Beckley in Dallas and got his revolver.⁸²

30. If Oswald had conspired with others to murder Kennedy, why would he not have explored the possibility with the authorities of saving his own life by implicating them? This would be particularly true if, as the conspiracy theorists allege, he was “set up” by co-conspirators to take the blame, that he was “the designated fall guy.” In fact, they cite his statement in custody that he was just a “patsy” as support for this proposition. But if, indeed, Oswald’s co-conspirators set him up, he’d have all the more reason to implicate them, having no reason at that point to feel any loyalty toward those who had betrayed him. Yet Oswald, throughout his twelve hours of interrogation, never suggested in any way that he was part of any conspiracy to kill Kennedy. Because Oswald knew that there was so much evidence against him, including his ownership of the murder weapon, and that a sentence of death was going to be automatic, to save his life he most likely would have implicated others if there were any to implicate (an extremely common occurrence in criminal cases, i.e., “turning state’s evidence”), yet he said nothing. This fact is circumstantial evidence that there simply were no co-conspirators for him to implicate.*

And what about Ruby? As we have seen, it is scripture among conspiracy theorists that “Jack Ruby silenced Oswald for the mob.” But they don’t ask themselves, “Who was supposed to silence Jack Ruby?” Ruby, we know, lived more than three long years (1,154 days) after killing Oswald before passing away on January 3, 1967, and never once suggested that he killed Oswald for someone else. But if mobsters were behind Ruby's act, they could never know if Ruby would talk someday. Yet there is no evidence that the mob or anyone else tried to silence Ruby. We've observed that the emotionally erratic and unreliable Oswald would have been one of the last people in the world the mob (or any other group of alleged conspirators) would have relied on to carry out its biggest murder ever. But Ruby was equally unreliable. Why would the mob choose someone to silence Oswald who was a notorious blabbermouth, had a volcanic temper, and was so emotionally unstable? The notion that the mob (or anyone else) got the goofy Oswald, of all people, to kill Kennedy and then got the even goofier Jack Ruby, of all people, to silence Oswald is downright laughable. I told the jury in London that the mob could just as well have "gone down to Disneyland and gotten Mickey Mouse and Donald Duck to do their bidding for them."⁸³

Several years after I made that remark in London, I read The Last Mafioso, Ovid Demaris's biography of Los Angeles mob boss Jimmy "The Weasel" Fratiano, the highest-ranking mafioso ever to "turn" on the mob, his testimony for the federal government in the early 1980s sending many of them to prison for life. Fratiano was particularly close to fellow mafioso Johnny Roselli, and Fratiano quotes Roselli as telling him one day while they were driving through the Santa Monica mountains shortly after Roselli's testimony before the HSCA in Washington, D.C., in 1976, "[They're] all hot, you know, about who killed Kennedy. Sometimes I'd like to tell them the mob did it, just to see the expression on their stupid faces. You know, we're supposed to be idiots, right? We hire a psycho like Oswald to kill the President and then we get a blabbermouth, two-bit punk like Ruby to shut him up. We wouldn't trust those jerks to hit a fucking dog."⁸⁴ I don't know if Roselli told Fratiano this, or Fratiano, for some reason, made it up, but either way, it clearly reflects a mafioso's view of the preposterous theory that organized crime, even if it made the even more preposterous decision to murder the president of the United States, would hire Oswald and Ruby to do its bidding for them.

31. I spoke earlier of the virtual impossibility of all the people involved in any conspiracy to kill the president keeping it a secret for even a few days, much less over forty years. But there's a perhaps even more difficult, and related, reality that the original conspirators would have to overcome. Let's assume, for example, that the CIA was behind the assassination. After the assassination, how could the CIA have gotten the FBI, Secret Service, Dallas Police Department, the autopsy doctors, indeed, the Warren Commission itself, to go along with the horrendous crime the agency had committed and do the great number of things the conspiracy theorists say these various groups and people did to cover up the CIA's complicity in Kennedy's murder? Wouldn't that be an impossible task?*_ The only way (there is no other way) that agencies and people like the FBI, autopsy doctors, et cetera, would all agree to cover up the murder of the president of the United States for the CIA (or mob, FBI, military-industrial complex, etc.) would be if they themselves were part of the original conspiracy to kill Kennedy. And again, no rational person can possibly believe that these groups and people all got together to murder the president. The bottom line is that conspiracy musings of the conspiracy theorists are outrageously hallucinatory and bear no relation to reality.

32. Even though there's not a lick of evidence that the CIA, mob, FBI, or any other group conspired with Oswald to kill Kennedy, if the conspiracy theorists could at least show that he had an association or connection with any of these groups, they would then have something to talk about. But here, other than explainable contacts (e.g., the FBI interviewing Oswald when he returned to the United States from Russia, and his very limited attempt to infiltrate anti-Castro Cuban exiles), after the most extensive investigation of a single individual ever conducted, no one has ever come up with any evidence of an association, relationship, or contact that Oswald had with any of these groups. The reason there's no evidence is that no such evidence exists. As I have said before in this book, it's all just sublime silliness.

Since we know that Oswald killed Kennedy, and since there is no evidence that Oswald had any relationship with groups like organized crime, the CIA, the military-industrial complex, or any other group, this fact alone removes these groups from any suspicion of being complicit in the assassination.

After over forty years of the most prodigiously intensive investigation and examination of a murder case in world history, certain powerful facts exist which cannot be challenged: Not one weapon other than Oswald's Mannlicher-Carcano rifle has ever been found and linked in any way to the assassination. Not one bullet other than the three fired from Oswald's rifle has ever been found and linked to the assassination. No person other than Oswald has ever been connected by evidence, in any way, to the assassination. No evidence has ever surfaced linking Oswald to any of the major groups suggested by conspiracy theorists of being behind the assassination. And no evidence has ever been found showing that any person or group framed Oswald for the murder they committed. One would think that faced with these stubborn and immutable realities, the critics of the Warren Commission, unable to pay the piper, would finally fold their tent and go home. But instead, undaunted and unfazed, they continue to disgorge even more of what we have had from them for over forty years—wild speculation, theorizing, and shameless dissembling about the facts of the case.

The purpose of this book has been twofold. One, to educate everyday Americans that Oswald killed Kennedy and acted alone, paying for his own bullets. And two, to expose, as never before, the conspiracy theorists and the abject worthlessness of all their allegations. I believe this book has achieved both of these goals.

BOOKENDS

The Murder Trial of Jack Ruby

On November 26, 1963, a Dallas County grand jury indicted Jack Ruby (“Jack Rubenstein, alias Jack Ruby”) for the murder of Lee Harvey Oswald. Trial judge Joe B. Brown would be presiding over the case. The affable, bespectacled, fifty-six-year-old was known for running a very loose courtroom and for having modest legal talent—so modest, in fact, that his friend, Dallas district attorney Henry Wade, urged him not to handle the case, telling Brown, “This case is too big for you.”¹ Brown, who didn’t make it through high school and graduated from a small Dallas law school that went out of business after a few years, was taken by celebrity and was greatly impressed by the size and composition of the media covering the trial. “Just think,” he told his bailiff, “we’ve got newsmen from all over the world here, and Pulitzer Prize winners and famous columnists and TV commentators right here in my courtroom.”²

Wade’s office was seeking the death penalty against Ruby, the electric chair at Huntsville state prison, and Wade himself, whose cornball manner concealed a good legal mind, would prosecute the case, make the important decisions, and be the nominal head of the prosecution team,^{*} although the actual lead trial prosecutor would be Wade’s assistant, William Alexander, who conducted “the bulk of the prosecution’s” case.³† Having anticipated prosecuting and devouring Oswald, until Ruby stopped that dream, Alexander had joked to reporters that “you can’t have rabbit stew without a rabbit.”⁴

Ruby’s first lawyer was Tom Howard, a veteran criminal defense attorney in Dallas. Howard, though never having handled a big publicity case before, and operating without a secretary or law library out of a small storefront office across the street from the Dallas Police Department, had a reasonably successful record as a criminal defense attorney.^{*}

Howard had successfully represented Jack a couple of years back on a liquor license dispute over a half bottle of beer found on a table at the Carousel after hours. He had gotten that charge dismissed. It wasn’t going to be as easy getting this one tossed out, but Howard’s plan was to try to convince the jury to convict Ruby of “murder without malice” on the rationale that the killing was in the heat of passion with adequate provocation (Oswald had killed Kennedy), thus negating malice and shielding Ruby from a possible death sentence.

To elaborate, there were two types of murder in Texas that Ruby could be found guilty of: murder with malice aforethought and murder without malice aforethought. As in all states, the word aforethought is a useless appendage since it does not mean what it sounds like, premeditation. In most states, there is first-degree and second-degree murder, first degree requiring a showing of premeditation and deliberation along with malice. Texas, to this day, has no degrees of murder, and premeditation and deliberation are not elements of murder that have to be proved. So unlike in most states, the Dallas prosecutors did not have to show that Ruby premeditated and deliberated his killing of Oswald. All they had to prove is that he killed with malice. In Texas, “malice” in a murder case is proved when it can be shown that the killer intended to kill, where there was no legal justification or excuse for his act, and where he was not “under the immediate influence of a sudden passion arising from an adequate cause, by which is meant such cause as would commonly produce a degree of anger, rage, resentment or terror in a person of ordinary temper, sufficient to render the mind incapable of cool reflection.” If it is shown that he was under such influence, the crime is murder without malice. (In most states, it would be voluntary manslaughter.) Even though the prosecution had no legal burden in the Ruby case to show premeditation, premeditation was very relevant since the presence or absence of premeditation could help to prove or disprove malice. If, for instance, Ruby had premeditated the killing of Oswald, it was not the result of a “sudden passion.”

Murder with malice in Texas carries a punishment of death or imprisonment for more than two years (in Texas, the “more than two years” is usually life). Murder without malice is punishable by a maximum of five years’ imprisonment. That’s what Howard was shooting for.

To make the jury more comfortable returning a verdict of murder without malice, although Howard had no intention of ultimately trying to convince the jury that Ruby was insane (he didn’t believe he was), he did intend to show, through a psychiatrist or two, as well as Ruby’s friends and associates, that Jack, shall we say, was not quite right, that he was emotionally unstable, something that no one who knew Ruby could possibly quarrel with. As a device to get Ruby’s mental infirmity into the official record, on December 2 Howard requested a pretrial competency (sanity to stand trial) hearing.

Howard believed that such a simple approach coupled with an expressed plea by Ruby for mercy from the witness stand, as well as the unstated sense of many to “pin a medal on Jack” for killing Oswald, might result in a favorable verdict and light sentence, as opposed to the death penalty. There was some logic behind this thinking. After all, newspaper polls in Dallas taken after Ruby killed Oswald showed, remarkably, that nearly half of the people questioned felt that Ruby should receive no punishment at all.⁵ It’s an old joke about Texas murder trials that the first matter to be settled is whether the varmint who got himself killed damn well deserved what he got. Legend has it that the first question sheriffs investigating a homicide in rural Texas ask is, “Did he need killing?” Indeed, Ruby received hundreds of supportive letters and telegrams (and very few critical of him) from people not just in Texas but all over the world. A sampling from some of the telegrams: “Congratulations. You have done what every loyal American citizen would like to have done. God bless you.” “Heartiest congratulations, but [Oswald] died too fast.” “Thank you for doing what every freedom-loving citizen of the world wanted to do.” “Congratulations. May God bless you.” “Thank you. May the Lord and Texas justice have mercy on you. May you live to be a thousand.” “Our family cannot find in our hearts to censure you. We send you our love and support.” “Had I the guts I’d have done it.* Thanks for trying to vindicate Dallas.” “To a job well done. You are a great man, Jack Ruby.” “Congratulations, you deserve a medal, all the world is in back of you.” “Thank you sir. God bless you.” “I kiss your feet.”⁶ In other words, Howard’s reasoning apparently went, how bad could the jury consider Ruby’s act to be when he had simply done to Oswald what a great number of other Americans wanted to do and which the state of Texas would have eventually done anyway? Indeed, even the wife of U.S. Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas acknowledged to an interviewer that she had shouted, “Good! Give it to him again!” when she saw Ruby shoot Oswald on her television screen.⁷

So Howard wasn’t overly worried about the case, even if Jack was hardly the ideal defendant—a Jewish striptease joint operator in a very conservative, overwhelmingly Anglo-Saxon Protestant city who had also made the Dallas police, and Dallas, a city noted for its civic pride, look bad. But again, Jack shot down the most loathed man in America, and that had to count for something in court,

Howard reasoned.

This strategy changed when Ruby's family, not feeling Howard had enough stature and legal talent for a case this big, brought famed San Francisco lawyer Melvin Belli into the case on December 10, 1963.[†] Though he was often described as “flamboyant,”[‡] there was considerable substance behind the sheen. Known as the “king of torts” (torts are civil not criminal wrongs), Belli* had actually sown new ground in the area of tort law with his skill at using “demonstrative evidence” (evidence that addresses the physical senses of the jury, such as a model of a human skeleton, scale mock-ups of an accident scene, greatly enlarged photographs, live experiments, and so on)[‡] as a plaintiff's lawyer in personal injury cases, and for the record-breaking monetary awards juries were returning for his clients. The problem is that he was primarily a civil not a criminal lawyer, although he had tried, and continued to try after the Ruby case, a criminal case now and then that caught his fancy. Belli, then, was a legal heavyweight, but not in criminal law, and he demonstrated this in several ways, which are chronicled in the major books on the trial. As the trial judge, Joe Brown, would later write, “Belli undoubtedly was, as the newspapers called him, the king of torts, but at trying a criminal case in Texas, he wasn't even royalty.”⁸ Lead Ruby prosecutor Bill Alexander, who had an acerbic relationship with Belli during the trial, acknowledged to me that “Belli was probably a better lawyer in his field than we were in ours, but he was in the wrong ballpark.”⁹

Wanting a Texas lawyer at his side, Belli brought in Joe Tonahill, a colorful and towering trial lawyer from Jasper in East Texas whose homespun style had proved effective with country juries, along with a Los Angeles associate of Belli's, Sam Brody. Phil Burleson, a young Dallas lawyer with appellate experience, was hired to primarily handle legal briefs and research. Howard was consigned to the bleachers, looking on, and shortly thereafter resigned from the defense team.

Surprisingly, for a lawyer of Belli's intelligence and experience, he did nothing to endear himself to the Dallas citizenry, a microcosm of which he would eventually have to rely on for a fair trial for his client. Noted for his flashy but expensive sartorial splendor, he declined to change his attire one lick, including his customary vested suits with silk linings, his rich pastel shirts and ties, and a gold watch chain, items just not seen among Dallas men with their off-the-rack attire. Indeed, his fur-collared Chesterfield overcoat and red velvet briefcase may have been unique among lawyers anywhere in the Panhandle State. And his pronouncements to the local and national media, who followed him like faithful puppies wherever he took himself in Dallas, including restaurants, was confrontational. “He repeatedly criticized the state of Texas. He lectured about Dallas' need to make Ruby a sacrificial goat... ‘The people of Dallas,’ he told the press, ‘perhaps unconsciously have to have a sacrifice in order to cleanse themselves.’”¹⁰ But if Belli intended to put the city of Dallas itself on trial, he had to expect its citizens not to like this, with whatever way that feeling played out.

One might think that Belli would at least have tried to get Dallas's legal community on his side, but he alienated it too when he arrived in Dallas by characterizing members of the district attorney's staff as “yokels.”¹¹ If someone wanted to hide anything from Alexander and Wade, he joked, put it in a law book and they'd never find it.¹²

At a change-of-venue hearing on February 10–13, 1964, during which Belli presented forty-one witnesses in support of his motion to move the trial out of Dallas because Ruby could not get “a fair trial” there, he argued that because many blamed the city for the assassination taking place there, and for negligently allowing the shooting of Oswald to occur, Dallas itself was on trial, and in effect, the jury might have to convict Ruby to acquit the city. There can be little question that Belli's concern was not a frivolous one. There was a collective sense of guilt among the citizenry, mostly about Kennedy being killed there, that continued for years thereafter. Just a day after the assassination, remarks like this were being made by Dallas citizens: “Dallas can’t hold its head up this morning.” “I think Dallas died right with [the president]. We’re the ones that are going to suffer. History will never erase it.” A cabby, when learning that his passengers were from New York, said, “New York? Are you here to take pictures of our black-eye?” Ruby himself told his sister, Eileen Kaminsky, on the afternoon of the assassination, “What a black mark for Dallas.”

The feeling was so prevalent that Dallas’s mayor, Earle Cabell, felt moved to say in defense, “There are maniacs all over the world, and in every city of the world. This was a maniac. It could have happened in Podunk as well as Dallas.”¹³ But apart from Oswald’s action severely damaging Dallas, Cabell testified for the defense at the venue hearing that Ruby couldn’t get a fair trial in Dallas because what Ruby did had further hurt the city very badly. Ruby’s lawyer Joe Tonahill said that prior to Cabell’s statement on the witness stand, Ruby was upbeat about his chances, but what Cabell said affected Ruby deeply. “Why, I love this city, Joe,” he said to Tonahill. Cabell told the Warren Commission that he had known Ruby “for several years.” Jack had a habit of taking people up to Cabell at public functions and introducing them to him as “my friend, the Mayor.” Now, for the first time, Jack was hearing from his “friend,” the head of the city, the essentially official word that he was no hero, but someone who had disgraced Dallas, and Tonahill said Cabell’s words hit Ruby “like a ton of bricks.”¹⁴

In the venue hearing, the prosecution never called one opposing witness to the stand, instead filing with the court thirty-eight affidavits from Dallas citizens swearing under oath that Ruby could get a fair trial in the city. On February 14, Judge Brown did not grant the defense motion, but he did not deny it either, postponing his decision until a jury was selected, at which time he’d decide whether that jury could give Ruby a fair trial.¹⁵

Under Belli’s direction, the defense team decided to come up with an “imaginative” defense. Almost out of hand, Belli rejected Howard’s “murder without malice” strategy and decided on a scientific and sophisticated medical defense of temporary insanity, with psychiatric experts testifying for the defense. In other words, he didn’t want to settle for anything less than an acquittal, a verdict of not guilty based on Ruby’s insanity at the time of the shooting. Ruby entered a plea of “not guilty” to the murder indictment against him, not “not guilty by reason of insanity,”¹⁶ for the simple reason that there was no such plea in Texas, as there is in most states, and there still isn’t to this very day. However, even in Texas the defense can put on an affirmative insanity defense to the charges against the accused, and the Texas Penal Code provides that “no act done in a state of insanity can be punished as an offense.” The question would not be whether Ruby unlawfully killed Oswald—there were eighty million eyewitnesses* to affirm that proposition—but what was on Ruby’s mind, if anything, at the time he did so. Bob Huffaker, who covered the Ruby trial for Dallas’s CBS affiliate, KRLD, wrote that Ruby “had failed to envision actually being charged with murder for what he had conceived as an act of patriotism. Ruby had fancied himself a hero, and he was deflated when the King of Torts hired specialists to sully his righteousness with hints of mental problems.”¹⁷

Texas utilizes the main rule for insanity in the nation, the M’Naughten “right-wrong” test (stemming from the 1843 English case of the Queen v. Daniel M’Naughten), which provides that a defendant is not criminally responsible for his act and is legally insane if at the time of the act he was laboring “under such a defect of reason from a disease of the mind as not to know the nature and quality [interpreted as meaning “consequences”] of the act he was doing, or if he did know it, that he did not know that what he was doing was wrong.” The seminal question for Belli was, what “disease of the mind” did Ruby have that caused him not to know that what he did was wrong? Belli had Ruby examined by psychiatrists, psychologists, and neurologists in late December at the Dallas county jail. The psychologist, Dr. Roy Schafer from Yale University, told Belli in his January 7, 1964, report that a battery of tests on Ruby indicated “the presence of brain dysfunction on a physical basis [i.e., Ruby had organic brain damage, satisfying the “disease of the mind” requirement of M’Naughten if it could be connected up with his act of killing Oswald]...His test responses are very similar...to those obtained from patients who have psychomotor seizures...[and] could also be those of a person with a history of traumatic head injuries or encephalitis.” Schafer recommended an electroencephalographic (EEG) test, which measures fluctuations in the electrical activity of the brain, and a neurological examination.¹⁸

The EEG and neurological findings of Dr. Martin Towler of Dallas were that Ruby was “suffering from a seizure disorder [that] most accurately falls into the category of a Psychomotor Variant.” Dr. Frederic Gibbs, a Chicago neurologist who was considered to be the leading pioneer in the science of electroencephalography, reviewed Towler’s EEG recordings, agreed with Towler, and said that Ruby’s brain waves were “common in epileptics.” When a psychiatrist, Dr. Walter Bromberg, concluded that at the time Ruby shot Oswald he was acting in a “fugue” state or temporary blackout triggered by depression and rage, Belli had all the elements (or so he thought) of a successful medical defense virtually unheard of at the time—that when Ruby shot Oswald he was in the throes of a psychomotor epileptic seizure, a condition manifested by periods, usually transitory, in which a person, functioning only on learned reflexes, does not act like himself, sometimes engaging in aggressive aberrational behavior, and thereafter cannot remember what he did.*

It should be noted that in the vast majority of M’Naughten insanity defenses, defense attorneys do not contend that their client didn’t know what he was doing, only that he didn’t know it was wrong. Here, Belli was going to contend that Ruby was unaware of what he was doing (did not know “the nature and quality” of his act), which of course delivers one to the same destination—that is, you can’t know what you did was wrong when you don’t even know you did it.

Jury selection commenced on February 17, 1964, and after fourteen days in which 162 prospective jurors out of a potential jury pool of 900 were questioned, both sides finally agreed on 12. The all-white jury consisted of eight men and four women. Eleven of the twelve had seen the television footage of Ruby shooting Oswald. The jury was sequestered throughout the trial, each living in a small, windowless room above the county jail. Like all sequestered juries, they were insulated from outside news about the case. The only things on TV they could watch were movies and situation comedies. They could read newspapers and magazines only after they had been heavily censored. “Bo [the court bailiff] really cut up our newspapers tonight,” one juror complained in his diary. “I told him if he starts cutting out Ann Landers, I’ll go home.”¹⁹

After Judge Brown denied the defense motion for a change of venue, the trial of the man who killed the man who killed Kennedy, started on March 4, 1964, with 370 reporters from fourteen countries, representing 111 news organizations, in attendance. The trial had been transferred from Judge Brown’s regular forty-eight-seat courtroom to the much larger (ninety-four-seat) courtroom of a fellow judge, Frank Wilson, to help accommodate the press. Only a few seats were left for the general public.²⁰ The three networks asked Brown to let them televise the trial, and the publicity-loving Brown was all in favor of it. But the opposition came from many sources, including fellow judges, Dallas civic leaders, and the prosecutors. Still, Brown was inclined to let the cameras in. When a strongly worded statement released by the Board of Governors of the American Bar Association, which opposed and “deplored” the proposal to televise the trial, arrived on his desk,²¹ Brown, who had hired Sam Bloom, the head of a Dallas advertising firm, to be his press adviser, reportedly said to Bloom, who had joined in the opposition, “But Sam, couldn’t you give me just one camera?” Bloom shook his head no, and the trial wasn’t televised—to everyone’s relief except Belli, who, like Brown, wanted the trial televised.^{22*}

Though Brown was pressured out of televising the trial (“We had a terrible time talking him out of that,” a member of the Dallas power structure would recall), that didn’t stop the limelight-seeking judge from allowing TV cameras into his home to film him on his sickbed when the flu kept him off the bench one day during the trial.²³

The heart of the trial was the legitimacy, or lack thereof, of Belli’s defense for Ruby that he didn’t really know what he was doing when he shot Oswald. Ruby, of course, knew exactly what he was doing, and it had nothing to do with any hocus-pocus psychomotor epileptic seizure. But Ruby had long since become a pathetic,* bewildered, humiliated (by courtroom allegations he was crazy, had hurt Dallas and the nation, was possibly a latent homosexual, etc.), almost anonymous bystander to the trial proceedings, having turned over his defense to his high-powered attorneys. It was becoming obvious to many early on that just as his hero, JFK, was “dead in the center of his parade,” and Oswald “dead in the center of his custodians,” Ruby, chewing gum at the defense table in as serious a concentration as he was capable of, was “dead in the center” of his trial.²⁴ And Ruby seemed to know, even before the trial started, how the little “class” he had always sought, but never achieved, in his dealings with the outside world would be irrevocably shorn away by his lawyers, who would portray him as someone who belonged in a mental institution. A Dallas artist sketching his courtroom portrait during pretrial hearings was asked by Ruby to not make the sketch “too rough” on him. “Leave me a little dignity,” he importuned the artist.²⁵ Ruby’s prosecutor, Bill Alexander, would later say, “You could see Jack go down day by day during the trial. Belli was doing exactly the opposite of what he wanted. Jack knew that he was going to be found guilty of something. He didn’t mind being found guilty of killing Oswald because Oswald killed the President, but he didn’t want anybody to think that he was retarded, or mentally handicapped, or an insane person. Whatever else you can say about him, Jack had a lot of pride.”²⁶

The Ruby trial took place on the second floor of the Dallas Criminal Courts Building in an old-fashioned courtroom with high ceiling fans, wooden benches, and spittoons next to each of the two counsel tables as well as the judge’s chair. During the prosecution’s case, it put on police witnesses who had spoken to Ruby after the shooting and who testified, in refutation of the defense theory, that Ruby had said things like “I hope I killed the son-of-a-bitch,” “I intended to shoot him three times,” and “Someone had to do it, you guys [Dallas police] couldn’t.”²⁷ Most damaging of all was the testimony of one officer, Sergeant Patrick Dean, that in response to questioning commencing around ten minutes after the shooting of Oswald, Ruby said he “first thought” he’d kill Oswald “if he got a chance” when he saw him two nights earlier in the show-up room and he “noticed the sarcastic sneer on Oswald's face." Ruby added that he "wanted the world to know that Jews do have guts."²⁸

All of Ruby's remarks were irreconcilable with the "fugue" state, temporary insanity defense Belli was propounding. And Ruby's statement that he first thought of killing Oswald on Friday, two days earlier, showed premeditation and conflicted with the defense position that the shooting was a spur-of-the-moment act. Even though the defense, at the moment, was seeking a not-guilty verdict under the insanity defense, it still had available, as a fallback position, a verdict of murder without malice. Dean's testimony, if believed, showed that Ruby premeditated the murder, helping to preclude any defense argument that the killing was without malice, which required that the killing result from a "sudden passion." District Attorney Wade would later say that Dean's testimony about premeditation "was probably the most harmful" testimony of all to Ruby's defense at the murder trial.^{29*}

But it was hard for the prosecution to get around what was obvious to virtually everyone—that there was a screw loose somewhere in Ruby, that he was mentally unsound. Even a prosecution witness, Garnett Claud Hallmark, the general manager of Allright Auto Parks where Ruby had parked his car for three years, testified that he "sometimes wondered about Jack's sanity."³⁰ And William Serur, who had known Ruby well as a friend for over ten years, testified for the defense that he "was sure" that Ruby was "suffering from some form of mental disturbance."³¹ After another witness at Ruby's trial (who had testified to Ruby's bizarre behavior, such as sometimes getting up from their dinner together and leaving for no reason whatsoever) was asked if he had "formed any type of opinion as to Jack's mental state?" he answered, "Well, with apologies to Jack, I've always considered him..." at which time a prosecution objection to the witness's continuing his obvious answer was sustained by the judge.³² No matter. The message was clear. Jack's needle wasn't quite pointing north. And another witness at the trial who was a close friend of Jack's said, during cross-examination by the prosecution, that Ruby's "crazy" behavior the past several years caused him to believe he was "a sick man of some type."^{33†}

The defense case, as expected, was primarily medical. Belli had his psychologist, Dr. Roy Schafer, testify at the trial that Ruby's tests showed he had "organic brain damage" and that Ruby had psychomotor epileptic seizures where he acted in a fugue state. However, on cross-examination, he only speculated that Ruby "might have been" (not was) in such a fugue state at the time he shot Oswald, and said he had no opinion as to whether Ruby knew right from wrong at the time he shot Oswald.³⁴ The defense's EEG expert, Dr. Martin Towler, testified that from his reading of Ruby's abnormal EEG he concluded that Ruby was subject to a "type of seizure disorder that we refer to as a psychomotor variant epilepsy," but, again, he formed no conclusion as to the heart of the defense case, that Ruby was in such a state at the time of the shooting.³⁵ So the defense presented testimony that Ruby had organic brain damage and psychomotor epilepsy. But that wasn't enough to carry the day.

Belli's intended star psychiatric witness was supposed to be Dr. Manfred Guttmacher, a prominent psychiatrist and leading expert on criminal psychology from Baltimore. Belli would later write that Guttmacher was supposed "to crown our medical testimony...pull it all together"³⁶ by testifying that Ruby was in a psychomotor epileptic seizure at the time of the shooting, thereby qualifying him as not knowing right from wrong or the nature and consequences of his act under the M'Naughten test for insanity. Guttmacher, in fact, told the Dallas jury that at the time of the shooting,

Ruby was under “tremendous emotional impact” from the assassination, and the “deep, heavy, hostile, aggressive part of his makeup...became focused on [Oswald].” Guttmacher concluded that “I don’t think that he was capable of distinguishing right from wrong and realizing the nature and consequences of his act at the time of the alleged homicide...I think there was a temporary, very short-lived psychotic episode.”

There was only one thing missing: no reference to the heart of Belli’s defense—that Ruby was in a psychomotor epileptic seizure at the time of the killing. Ruby’s “disease of the mind” under M’Naughten was not connected to his act of killing Oswald. Indeed, on cross-examination by Bill Alexander, Guttmacher testified, “I think he has psychomotor epilepsy...I [have] not maintained he was in a state of psychomotor epilepsy [at the time of the shooting].” Guttmacher had presented Belli with a memorandum on March 3, the eve of the trial, that said it was his belief “that it is scientifically unsound...to assert with absolute assurance that Oswald’s murder took place while Ruby was in an epileptic attack of some sort...What we have to develop is that Jack has a definitely abnormal and damaged brain [as evidenced by] the psychological tests of Dr. Schafer...and the definitely abnormal brain waves...There is abundant evidence in the medical literature that people with brain waves like Jack’s...are given to psychopathic-like behavior, particularly to irrational outbursts of aggression, often when under stress, which can or cannot be actual seizure attacks.”³⁷ (Reportedly, Guttmacher went further, expressing the view that Ruby had exhibited too many indications of uninterrupted consciousness, that the shooting had been carried off too efficiently, with too little fumbling, for an epileptic seizure to be a real possibility.)

That Guttmacher could be so professional and objective in his assessment of Ruby makes his conclusion on the witness stand—that Ruby didn’t know that killing Oswald was wrong and didn’t even know the nature and consequences of his act (that he was firing a bullet into Oswald’s body that could cause Oswald’s death)—all the more incomprehensible. On cross-examination, Guttmacher said his “best diagnosis” of Ruby’s condition at the time of the shooting was that Ruby was “a mental cripple and was carrying on his shoulders an insufferable emotional load and, to use the vernacular, he cracked under it momentarily.” Belli would later say that he had hoped Guttmacher’s testimony would be the “highpoint of the trial.”³⁸ One could say ironically that Guttmacher’s testimony was exactly that. But he delivered it in a big way not for the defense but for the prosecution. The inevitable question that presents itself, of course, is why would Belli base his entire defense on psychomotor epilepsy when he never had one single medical expert to testify that Ruby was in such a state at the time of the shooting? (Dr. Walter Bromberg, the psychiatrist who had interviewed Ruby for eighteen hours prior to the trial, only testified that Ruby was “mentally ill” and had killed Oswald during an episode he called an “epileptic equivalent,” but studiously refused to say that Ruby had psychomotor epilepsy or that he was in an epileptic seizure at the time he shot Oswald.)³⁹

The defense decided not to put Ruby on the stand, a very common defense strategy to avoid cross-examination of the defendant by the prosecution. But what was the fear here? As Belli tells it, Ruby not only told him he didn’t want to testify because “I’ll go all to pieces,” but also said the opposite to him: “I just went in and shot him...Maybe I ought to...get on the stand and tell the truth.” But Belli believed that Ruby’s blunt assertion about his state of mind (“I just went in and shot him”) was actually not the truth, that Ruby had merely made it up after he came out of his unconscious, psychomotor epileptic seizure at the time of the shooting to fill in the blanks of his amnesia (in psychiatry, called “confabulation”), had come to believe it himself, and on the witness stand would blurt out enough incriminating statements to bury himself.⁴⁰

When Belli rested his case, he had put on an extremely anemic defense, particularly in view of the fact that in Texas the defense had the burden of proving that Ruby was insane by a preponderance of the evidence.^{41*} Virtually everyone in our society knows that in a criminal case in America, the prosecution, not the defendant, has the burden of proof. But because of the almost unique circumstances of this case in which Ruby's killing of Oswald was televised, coupled with the fact that the defense, by its apparent sole reliance on the insanity defense, was not forcing the prosecution to prove that the killing did not result from a "sudden passion," for all intents and purposes it was the defendant, Ruby, who had the only legal burden of proof at the trial. True, the prosecution had to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Ruby intentionally killed Oswald without any justification in law, but an estimated eighty million people saw Ruby kill Oswald, and it was an intentional act without any legal justification. The only real legal burden, then, was the defense's burden to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence (substantially lower than beyond a reasonable doubt, but still a burden), that Ruby was insane at the time he shot Oswald. Only if Ruby met that burden was he entitled to a not-guilty verdict. Because of the defense put on by Belli, in this case there couldn't possibly be any failure of proof by the prosecution that would entitle Ruby to the same not-guilty verdict.

In rebuttal, among other medical experts, the prosecution called Dr. Sheff Olinger, a Dallas neurologist, to testify that although Ruby's EEG brain waves were "unusual," they did not show organic brain damage, the "disease of the mind" required under the M'Naughten test of insanity, nor was he subject to psychomotor epileptic seizures.⁴² The noted neurologist Dr. Frederic Gibbs, who had taught Olinger's teacher, disagreed with Olinger, testifying on surrebuttal for the defense that "it was clear" from Ruby's EEG tracings that Ruby "had a particular, very rare type of epilepsy" that "occurs in only one-half percent of epileptics" and frequently results in a "lack of emotional control, convulsive and excessive types of behavior."⁴³ †

Welcome to the world of forensic experts. They can't agree on the time of day, and almost invariably (there are refreshing exceptions) testify during their career as either defense or prosecution experts, but not both. For this reason, when I prosecuted cases I always searched for forensic witnesses with a more balanced history. I didn't want the opposing attorney, during cross-examination of my experts, to ask the question I asked of his experts to destroy their credibility:

"Doctor, how many times have you testified as an expert in your specialty of forensic psychiatry?"

"Oh, maybe 100, 125 times."

"Doctor, in those 100 or 125 times, did you ever once testify for the prosecution? [long pause] I don't believe so, counselor."

The final arguments to the jury were very brief for a murder case of this importance, but the four prosecutors and three defense attorneys agreed on two and a half hours for each side. Curiously, instead of doing what was logical and normal, particularly in a big case—having the arguments start in the morning, or early afternoon, with everyone fresh—Judge Brown overruled Belli's objections and ordered that they commence after the regular court day on Friday evening, March 13, 1964. They didn't conclude until 1:05 Saturday morning, the jury stifling yawns throughout the five hours.⁴⁴

Alexander opened for the prosecution. Treating the defense's medical case dismissively (e.g., Dr. Schafer, the defense psychologist, "thinks he can diagnose anything with ink spots," and referring to Ruby's defense as "this epilepsy business"), he made the telling point that if Ruby, indeed, was an epileptic, then why didn't the defense present any evidence during the trial through testimony of his family and people close to Ruby of prior epileptic spells? He told the jury that what was involved here was nothing more than that "Jack Ruby misjudged public temperament. He thought that he could kill Oswald, that perhaps he would be a hero by doing it*... [He] wanted to become famous and make money out of the act... I tell you that he is nothing but a thrill killer seeking notoriety." In other words, Ruby was just a nobody trying to become a somebody. Alexander asked the jury to return a verdict of death against Ruby not just because he murdered Oswald "but because he has mocked American justice while the spotlight of the world is on us." Alexander argued that Oswald "was entitled to the protection of the law until the law chose no longer to protect him and punish him."⁴⁵

Though Belli's psychomotor epilepsy defense had imploded through the testimony of his own expert witnesses, in his summation he refused to retreat, literally becoming his own expert for the proposition that Ruby should be found not guilty by reason of insanity because Ruby's EEG tracings proved it. The king of torts was forced to rely on his pet—demonstrative evidence—but not, as in most of his civil cases, to fortify his case. It now was his whole case. Ruby would live or die on it. "Ladies and gentlemen of the jury," Belli argued, "finally we showed you the actual tracings themselves... and you yourselves saw those five-to-a-second waves and notched tracings," and he said his esteemed experts had concluded that the tracings clearly showed "organic brain damage" and "the psychomotor variant type of epilepsy." But Belli did not go on to say, because he could not, that his experts said Ruby was in an epileptic state when he shot Oswald.

From this focused but fatally defective argument, Belli went on to ramble discursively on a range of different, disconnected arguments that had no basis in law. An eloquent orator, he was reduced to actually arguing to the jury that since under Texas law (as opposed to any other state) it was excusable homicide (not, as in other states, manslaughter) to kill your wife or her paramour if you caught them in flagrante delicto, "then is there not [such an] excuse for the shooting of the assassin of my President?" He went on to analogize Ruby to the "village clown, the village idiot," an indirect way, apparently, of seeking sympathy and mercy for his client.⁴⁶ That's really all Belli had left in his arsenal, and when DA Henry Wade, in the prosecution's final summation, said, "I ask you, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, to show Jack Ruby the same mercy and the same compassion and the same sympathy that he showed Lee Harvey Oswald, [and] if you do that you can vote only one verdict, that of guilty of murder with malice and of death,"^{47*} on March 14, the jury, after only two hours and nineteen minutes of deliberation, agreed, rejecting Belli's insanity defense and finding Ruby "guilty of murder with malice" and assessing "his punishment at death."⁴⁸

Though the trial was not televised, millions of Americans viewed the reading of the jury's verdict on live national television. As soon as Judge Brown read the verdict, Belli jumped to his feet and began a denunciation of the twelve members of the jury, all white Protestants, who had condemned Ruby to the electric chair. Pointing to the jury box he cried out, "May I thank this jury for a verdict that is a victory for bigotry." As the jurors began filing out of the courtroom, he shouted at them, "I want to assure you we will appeal this to a court where there is justice and impartiality." Surrounded by the media in the courtroom, Belli first unloaded on the jury, saying it had made Dallas "a city of shame forevermore" by a verdict that was "the biggest disgrace in the history of American law." He also had a few kind words for Judge Brown, saying, "This was a kangaroo railroading court... and everyone knew it. Judge Brown went down the line for every motion the District Attorney made. He committed 30 errors.”⁴⁹ Bursting out of the courtroom, Belli delivered perhaps an even more serious tirade to the media. “This jury wasn’t concerned even with listening to us in arguments. They had their minds made up,” he said. When a reporter asked Belli to repeat his accusation, Belli said, “Repeat this? I’ll repeat this with every breath I have in me for as long as I live. And I’ll stop practicing law if we don’t reverse this [verdict on appeal] and make these people of Dallas ashamed of themselves.”^{50*} Shortly thereafter, Belli told a reporter for ABC radio, “I’ve reassessed my feelings about Dallas. I think that it’s sicker than I originally felt when I came here—those horrible, bigoted, little, narrow, nasty people that sat in judgment of this ‘Jew boy.’ I hope to get back to New York and stand in Times Square and see some free Jews, niggers, if you will [Belli was not racist in the least], and some Puerto Ricans, and some dagos, and Chinese, some free Americans walk by and take ’em by the hand and say ‘Thank God, I’m back in America and out of Dallas.’”⁵¹

The trial, excluding the selection of the jury, had only lasted a little over eight court days! The sentence of death stunned the national and international press corps. Several polls of reporters showed them predicting a long prison sentence.⁵² Even the judge was “shocked” by the sentence of death.⁵³ “After all,” Judge Brown said, “we are talking about a man who killed the man who assassinated President Kennedy.”⁵⁴ In fact, if there is one thing that stands out in people’s minds more than anything else about the Ruby trial, it’s that he was sentenced to death. New York Times reporter Jack Langguth was in Dallas at the time of the verdict and felt he knew the pulse of the city enough to say that “the people of Dallas did not want Jack Ruby back among them boasting of his crime and acquittal. Neither did they want him sentenced to death.” The editor of the Dallas Times Herald, A. C. Greene, told Langguth, “This verdict [of death] was almost as shocking to everyone as Ruby’s own shooting had been.” Upstairs in the courthouse after the verdict, one sheriff’s deputy turned to another and remarked, “Too strong.” The other deputy raised an eyebrow. “Prison would have been better. This won’t stand up.”⁵⁵

Most students of the Ruby case are likewise troubled by the sentence, wondering why the jury gave Ruby the ultimate punishment. Even without Belli arguing murder without malice to them, and even with their finding that Ruby killed Oswald with malice, the jury still could have given Ruby a sentence of life or any number of years more than two. In the perceptive book Jack Ruby, the coauthors write, “Men hesitate when asked to put a human being to death. But this jury had seen Ruby gradually exanimated [become lifeless] before their eyes, turned into a thing; and things are easily disposed of.”⁵⁶

For his part, Belli says that the jury, by their verdict, fulfilled their duty by making Ruby “the scapegoat for the unpunishable guilt of a community.” But how and why did the jury feel this was their duty? Belli, in so many words, blamed the Dallas “oligarchy,” embodied in the Dallas Citizens Council, for the jury verdict. According to U.S. News & World Report, the Dallas Citizens Council consisted at the time of about 250 men who were chief executive officers of important companies in Dallas. “Membership is by invitation only,” the magazine said, and it’s “the group that really runs Dallas.” Author William Manchester, who spent much time in Dallas doing research for his book, The Death of a President, wrote, “I had never seen a city so tightly held by so few. Boston, Baltimore and Philadelphia have their courtly establishments. Power there, however, is largely sham power. In Dallas, it is disquietingly real, naked, arrogant. There is something almost Teutonic about Big D’s materialism, its deference to the men of sinew.”

Formed in 1937 by Dallas banker Bob Thornton (after whom a Dallas expressway is named), the Dallas Citizens Council is largely credited with making Dallas a booming metropolis of gleaming skyscrapers and a center of commerce that, in 1963, added more office space than any other American city except New York. Most Dallasites are proud of their business-like, cosmopolitan image. The “Big D” (as Texans call Dallas) is markedly different from smaller and unhurried Fort Worth, “the old cow town” just thirty miles down the road to its west, where cowboy boots and Stetson hats are still very common attire for men, and the presence of stockyards contributes to the feeling of frontier days. Belli argued that on any issue affecting the modern image of Dallas as a civilized, though admittedly right-wing conservative community, the Citizens Council went to work manipulating community opinion to its liking—not an irrational accusation, and one that probably holds true to this very day in a few cities around the country. Belli maintained that since the assassination had seriously blackened the image of Dallas, “prompt execution of Ruby would serve somehow to restore that image and show what a law-abiding place the city was... The Dallas oligarchy had its own orders for the get-Ruby campaign,” Belli says, adding they “desperately wanted to convict Ruby.” Although Belli’s allegation may or may not be true, where he falls down is failing to come up with any evidence, direct or circumstantial, to show what specifically the Dallas civic leaders in this case did to help ensure that the jury (which Belli referred to as the “establishment” jury and “an entirely WASP jury eager to do its Dallas duty”) returned the verdict they wanted. He maintains that the coverage of the Ruby case by the Dallas Morning News, the paper of record in Dallas, reflected “the attitude of the Dallas oligarchy,” but again he doesn’t show in what way.⁵⁷

I, of course, am not in a position to pass judgment on the merits of Belli’s charge, but one thing is clear. As Belli points out, in the early 1960s Dallas was a “city noted for aggressive, white, Protestant narrow-mindedness,” a city not known “for its racial tolerance.”⁵⁸ Anti-Semitism was not uncommon, and although this probably is a complete coincidence, my research showed that for the first two days after Ruby shot Oswald, all of the many captioned articles on the case in the Dallas Morning News, the main establishment paper, referred to Ruby as “Rubenstein” (e.g., “Rubenstein at [Dallas Morning] News at Time of Shooting,” “Any Oswald-Rubenstein Tie in Dallas Sought by Police”), whereas the evening paper, the now-defunct Dallas Times Herald, continued to refer to Ruby as everyone else always has, “Jack Ruby.” Since Ruby legally changed his name in 1947 from his birth name of Rubenstein to Ruby, this throws into question the motivation behind the prosecution’s decision to resurrect the name Rubenstein for the Dallas jury by having the grand jury indict “Jack Rubenstein, alias Jack Ruby,” which, since Ruby had changed his name, was legally incorrect.

Bill Alexander has his own view on how Ruby could have avoided a sentence of death (and as the lead trial prosecutor, Alexander has a better handle on the issue than perhaps anyone else). “A local lawyer,” Alexander told me, “would have said, ‘Judge, this will be short. I only have one witness, the defendant.’ After calling Ruby to the stand, the questions would have gone something like this: ‘Your name?’ ‘Jack Ruby.’ ‘You are the defendant in this case?’ ‘Yes.’ ‘Jack, you’ve heard all the police testify in this case. Is what they said substantially true and correct?’ ‘Yeah, pretty much.’ ‘You did really kill that feller?’ ‘Yes.’ ‘This gun here, state’s exhibit 1, is that your gun?’ ‘Yes.’ ‘Is that the gun you killed him with?’ ‘Yes.’ ‘Whatcha do it for, Jack?’ ‘He killed my president and was smirking at us.’ ‘Well, Jack, whataya think this jury oughta do with you?’ ‘I don’t know, but please don’t give me death. Whatever they think is right, I’ll take.’”

Alexander asks, “Now how in the hell do you cross-examine someone like that?” I asked Alexander, “If, in fact, Ruby had presented such a defense, would you and Wade still have sought the death penalty against him?” I realized the moment I asked the question, that I really had no right putting him on the spot like this. Alexander paused for a few moments, then said, “Yeah, we would have done it, but in a left-handed sort of way. We would have told them, ‘Death is an option, but we’re not demanding it.’”⁵⁸*

I asked Alexander the obvious question—why did the jury come back with a verdict of death? Just because Ruby’s lawyers used the wrong defense, why hold it against Ruby? The facts were the same—Ruby killed Oswald in a state of rage over Oswald’s having killed Kennedy, and certainly, Ruby did not want death. “Belli just dared that jury to give Ruby the death penalty,” Alexander replied, “and they didn’t like that, and they didn’t like Belli either.” Alexander said that from the moment Belli arrived in Dallas, he had displayed a condescending attitude with “nasty little remarks” about the city and its people,⁵⁹ and there was “no doubt about it” that Belli’s demeanor, flashy dress, and attitude “turned the jury off.”

“Are you saying,” I asked Alexander, “that the jury took out their contempt for Belli, and the defense he presented, on Ruby?”

“Yes, to a certain unconscious extent I think they did.”⁵⁹ “The jury wasn’t sentencing Jack Ruby, they were sentencing Melvin Belli,” Alexander told an earlier interviewer.⁶⁰

The acclaimed journalist Murray Kempton covered the Ruby trial for the New Republic and the London Spectator. He wrote about the verdict: “In point of fact, Ruby received no defense at all. The impression is inescapable that Mr. Belli made himself the defendant almost at once, that District Attorney Wade and his assistants happily accepted him as such, and that, in the end, when the jury ordered Ruby to the block, Belli was more an object of its disfavor than his client.”⁶¹

No juror, of course, would ever admit taking his or her adverse feelings against Belli out on Ruby. However, one juror (who might not be representative at all, since a few jurors spoke of how impressed they were with Belli) did almost say this. Juror Douglas Sowell said, “Belli antagonized everybody. I mean he was just very blunt on his letting us know that we were just country bumpkins down here in Dallas. He didn’t make any friends.”

Question by interviewer: “Do you think that had a negative influence?”

Answer: “Oh, I think it had a negative influence...Belli hurt his case.”⁶²

Ruby’s family agreed. In the aforementioned letter sent by Ruby and his family to Belli in which Belli was fired, one of the reasons given was Belli’s “constant bitter criticism of Dallas and the people of Texas” that the family felt was harmful to Ruby’s cause.⁶³

Only a few of the jurors have spoken out, for attribution, as to why they returned a verdict of death, and their answers have been far less than satisfying. Juror J. Waymon Rose could only say, “Well, I’m for the death penalty. I’m for it to deter serious crime. And I don’t think it’s used enough.” Hardly a justification for the death penalty in this case, unless Rose was in favor of it for all murder cases, in which case he shouldn’t have been seated on the Ruby jury. Juror Douglas Sowell said that the jury returned a rather swift verdict of death because “we had already told [the judge and lawyers] that we could give the death penalty.” Yes, but merely being capable of returning a verdict of death doesn’t mean you intend to do so in every murder case. Juror J. G. Holton Jr. said, “I just have my beliefs—that if you kill somebody, the state needs to take your life.” This jury obviously was a hanging one and a prosecutor’s dream. It seems the defense should have asked them during jury selection if they were capable of returning a sentence of life imprisonment.

Perhaps the most troubling observation came from jury foreman Max Causey. We learn from Causey that on the first ballot, three of the jurors, including himself, did vote for life imprisonment but were quickly turned around by the other nine. He then goes on to say, "I personally feel that Mr. Belli and his team selected a nearly impossible defense for Ruby," the psychomotor epileptic seizure argument being "very difficult to sell to the jury."⁶⁴ He adds, in agreement with Bill Alexander, "Any good lawyer could have gotten Ruby off with something less than a death sentence if he had thrown Ruby on the mercy of the court and pleaded plain old 'temporary insanity' brought on by emotional stress over the loss of his beloved president."⁶⁴ So was this some type of a game with the Ruby jury? If Belli lost on his psychomotor epilepsy gamble, then Ruby had to pay the ultimate price? But again, irrespective of Belli's strategic error, the jury still had, in front of them, the same defendant and the same act by that defendant. Belli's error logically should not have stripped the jury of the discretion it had to come back with a sentence of life.

Going in, Belli said he knew that it was "impossible" to get "a good jury" from the highly conservative Dallas jury panel. "Rather, it was our task to head off the dedicated hangmen, those whose minds were completely closed to us." Searching for any ray of sunlight he could find, one of the reasons why he accepted, without challenging, his first juror was, per his contemporaneous trial notes, that he "smiles at me."⁶⁵ (The most famous defense attorney of all, Clarence Darrow, often said he would never willingly accept a juror whom he could not elicit a smile from during jury selection.) That first juror, Max Causey, became the jury foreman who guided the jury to a conviction of murder and sentence of death for Belli's client.

As discussed in depth in the conspiracy section of this book, after the trial Ruby insisted that the Warren Commission give him a polygraph, which it did, on July 18, 1964. But just before he took it, incredibly, he asked that one of his attorneys, Joe Tonahill, leave the room and that Bill Alexander stay, saying, "I prefer Bill Alexander." Ruby even asked "Bill" to frame some of the questions, which Alexander did, and Alexander, always referring to Ruby as "Jack," had off-the-record conferences with Ruby during the test.⁶⁶ Alexander told me that after the polygraph test, an FBI agent asked Ruby why he would want Alexander, who prosecuted him and asked for the death penalty against him, to help with the questions, not one of his own lawyers. Ruby responded that "after all this legal business is over with, Alexander or Wade will call the governor and tell him to spare my life and he will. My lawyers can't do this." I asked Alexander if he would have, as Ruby said, intervened with the governor if Ruby were scheduled to die. Very interestingly, after a short pause, Alexander answered, "I don't know."⁶⁷

Had I been the prosecutor, I would not have sought the death penalty in the Ruby case. In California and in most states, except for killings that take place during the perpetration or attempted perpetration of an inherently dangerous felony, like robbery, without premeditation one can't even be convicted of first-degree murder, only second degree, and without such a conviction, the prosecution can't even ask for the death penalty. But apart from the fact that this was not a clear case of premeditated murder, as a basic rule I never sought the death penalty where there were "substantial mitigating circumstances," in which case I would only seek life imprisonment. In this case, in addition to the fact that Ruby unquestionably had considerable mental problems, which by itself, if severe enough, is a mitigating circumstance in some cases, the overwhelming bulk of Americans had an enormous and justifiable animus against Oswald for killing the president. Ruby, by all the evidence, was one of them. Killing Oswald in a state of rage (“I hope I killed the son-of-bitch,” Ruby said) to avenge, in his inflamed mind, the most serious murder in American history certainly would have constituted “substantial mitigating circumstances.” (In an even more personal example, although I never had such a case, I would never have sought the death penalty against, let’s say, a parent who murdered the killer of his or her child.)

In the many cases where I sought the death penalty, I would say to the jury, “If this is not a proper case for the imposition of the death penalty, what would be?” I could not, in good conscience, have made that argument in the Ruby case. Indeed, even Marina Oswald said she was opposed to Ruby being executed.⁶⁸ While it is true she opposed capital punishment anyway, it is well known that many others who are opposed to it are in favor of it for those who kill their loved ones. A prominent example is movie director Roman Polanski, an opponent of capital punishment who wanted the death penalty for the Manson family killers of his eight-and-a-half-month pregnant wife, Sharon Tate.

In a remarkable vignette in their book, The Trial of Jack Ruby, authors John Kaplan and Jon Waltz tell the story of a judge who had the right idea but went too far with it.

Shortly after Jack Ruby shot and killed Lee Harvey Oswald in the basement of the Dallas Police and Courts Building, another act of violence occurred in Sioux City, Iowa. There, on the afternoon of Sunday, November 24, 1963, Vaschia Michael Bohan, a 47 year-old dental technician, and his mother were seated in the living room of their home watching a television program about the funeral arrangements for President Kennedy. Suddenly, Bohan’s 68 year-old stepfather entered the room and loudly cursed the assassinated president. Bohan rose, picked up a pair of sewing scissors, and stabbed his stepfather six times, once in the mouth and five times in the chest. The older man fell to the floor dead, and at 2:52 P.M.—one hour and thirty-two minutes after the shooting of Oswald—Bohan called the Sioux City Police Department to report his crime. Two police officers arrived shortly thereafter and he surrendered without resistance. On Monday, November 25, 1963, Bohan, like Ruby, was arraigned on a charge of murder. He pleaded not guilty and demanded a preliminary hearing. . . In December, Bohan changed his plea to guilty. On the day before Christmas he appeared in the courtroom of District Judge George M. Paradise for sentencing. The judge had pondered the accused’s crime and the atmosphere in which it had taken place. Referring to the assassination of President Kennedy, Judge Paradise stated that “the entire nation was under stress and strain from the tragedy.” He continued: “But that is not a reason for a citizen of the nation to release his emotions to the extent of causing another tragedy.” The defendant’s deed, he concluded, would weigh forever on his conscience. He sentenced Bohan to eight years in prison and a one thousand dollar fine. The judge suspended the prison sentence and ended the hearing by wishing the defendant a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year. Bohan paid his fine and went home.⁶⁹

Any discussion about Ruby being sentenced to death turned out to be moot and academic. On October 5, 1966, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals reversed Ruby’s murder conviction and sentence of death on two grounds. First, Ruby's statement to Sergeant Dean about deciding to kill Oswald when he saw him at the police lineup on Friday night "constituted an oral confession of premeditation" made by Ruby while in police custody, and therefore it should not have been heard by the jury because the law in Texas expressly provides that a defendant's oral statements while in custody are inadmissible unless committed to writing and signed by the accused, which was not done here. The exception for "spontaneous" admissions was rejected here because Ruby's question to the police before the interrogation as to whether his answers would be made available to the news media was held to have negated any suggestion of spontaneity. Second, the appellate court said that the trial court erred in refusing to grant the defense's motion for a change of venue out of the charged atmosphere existing in Dallas at the time, which, they said, prevented Ruby from getting a fair trial there. A concurring opinion said that "the citizenry of Dallas" most likely "consciously and subconsciously felt that Dallas was on trial."

The case was remanded back to the trial court for a new trial, with instructions to transfer it "to some county other than Dallas."⁷⁰ On December 5, 1966, the new trial judge, Louis Holland, transferred the retrial to Wichita Falls, Texas, approximately 150 miles northwest of Dallas. Although one of Ruby's lawyers, Elmer Gertz, would later write that Wade and Alexander again said they would seek the death penalty against Ruby,⁷¹ this was so only, apparently, because Ruby intended to plead not guilty again and go to trial. District Attorney Wade told the media after the reversal of Ruby's conviction that he might go along with a sentence of life imprisonment for Ruby if Ruby would be willing to plead guilty to murder.⁷²

Looking back, Phil Burleson said, "I had been court appointed as lead counsel for the retrial in Wichita Falls, and my argument was going to be murder without malice, which under the law at that time meant...that he acted in the heat of sudden passion. And the maximum sentence at that time...was five years, and Jack had already...served three and a half, four years."⁷³ In other words, Burleson intended to present the same defense that Ruby's first lawyer, Tom Howard, wanted to use, one that even the lead prosecutor, Bill Alexander, believes would have worked. Why didn't Mel Belli do what would appear to be the obvious, and instead seek an outright acquittal, walking Ruby out of court a free man? Seymour Ellison, a longtime law partner of Belli's, told me that "Mel was obsessed with the thought of walking Ruby out the door when millions of people had seen his client kill Oswald. He told me, 'Sy, if I can do that I'll be right up there with Clarence Darrow.'"^{74*}

While some would say that if this was really the main motivation behind Belli's legal strategy at Ruby's trial, then Belli had committed the ultimate sin of a trial lawyer, putting his interest before that of his client, particularly serious when Belli was playing with Ruby's life (not just a routine sentence in prison, the result in 99 percent of criminal cases). But that would presuppose that Belli believed he had very little chance of securing a not-guilty verdict. And we don't know that. Two points have to be noted in this regard. Mel Belli had a great passion for the law and fought hard for hundreds of clients through the years, particularly the poor and unpowerful against major corporations. Perhaps more importantly on this issue, most of Belli's civil cases involved medical evidence, and it was often said that he knew as much about medicine, even autopsies, as did the doctors he called to the witness stand, people sometimes lightly calling him "Dr. Belli." And although Belli's defense of Ruby was in a criminal trial, he was using a medical defense, albeit a novel one at the time in the criminal law. What I am saying is that Belli, now deceased, may have sincerely thought he would be able to secure a not-guilty verdict for Ruby, in which case illusions of being the equal of Darrow would be irrelevant.

Before a new trial date could be set, Ruby died at Parkland Hospital in Dallas on January 3, 1967, the same hospital in which Kennedy and Oswald had died, and his autopsy was conducted that same day by Dr. Earl Rose. Under “Cause of Death,” the autopsy report reads, “Pulmonary emboli immediate cause of death secondary to bronchiolar carcinoma of the lungs.”⁷⁵ Dr. Rose said the “embolism had come from Ruby’s legs.”⁷⁶

Ruby was buried January 9, 1967, in his hometown of Chicago. Two of Ruby’s appellate lawyers who got his conviction reversed, Elmer Gertz and William Kunstler, served as pallbearers.⁷⁷ That same day in Dallas, four doctors, including Dr. Rose, sectioned Ruby’s brain and concluded he had “multiple metastatic neoplastic lesions.”⁷⁸ “Ruby had cancer of the brain,” Dr. Rose said, “and it was the same cancer that was in his lungs. It had spread.”⁷⁹

A Conversation with Marina

My friend David Phinney, a longtime student of the assassination, and someone with a keen sense of history, had been urging me for some time to interview Marina Oswald. I told him I had Marina on my list of people to talk to but I was in no rush to do so since she had already been interviewed countless times in great depth and I knew there was nothing new I could learn from her. I also knew that although in the early years her credibility was good, in recent years she has hitched her wagon to all the goofy conspiracy theories that have proliferated. But since she is, after all, the widow of Kennedy's assassin, and derivatively a historic figure in her own right, I took Phinney's advice and paid Marina a visit earlier than I had intended during a trip to Dallas on November 30, 2000.*

When I walked, midafternoon, into the Army-Navy Surplus Store in Dallas where she was working full-time as a clerk, my Fort Worth friend, lawyer Jack Duffy, who had made several calls to locate the low-profile Marina for me, introduced me to her. Marina, unsmiling, said to Duffy crisply, "I know who he is. I've seen him many times on TV." I interjected lightly, "I've been on a few times." "Are you proud of it?" Marina asked in a challenging way. I won't say that my meeting with Marina went downhill from that point, but it never got too much better either. Pulling up chairs outside the back of the store, and accompanied by her friend and store manager Linda Wilson, who drove Marina to and from work each day, Marina proceeded to tell me that she had already heard I was writing a book about the assassination and asked me not to write it. When I asked her why, she told me, "Because I know you won't be fair. You're not interested in the truth. I've already been told what you're going to say—that Lee is guilty." I told her I would be scrupulously fair and would include opposing views in my book, including hers. She brushed this off, saying that "people listen to you. No one cares what I say." She said that any book by me saying her late husband killed Kennedy would cause further harm to her, her two daughters by Lee, and her son by the man she divorced but still lives with on a seventeen-acre farm in a small town just east of Dallas. I told her that she and her children were all innocent victims, but in writing my book I had no choice but to discuss the facts as I knew them to be. She told me I didn't know all the facts, that there were "many documents" I've never seen. When I asked the chain-smoking woman with the blue, intelligent eyes what those documents were, she just dismissed my question with a wave of her hands.

Marina, wearing very light makeup, was dressed in the most inexpensive of slacks and a pullover sweater. There was no sense of the modern woman about her, and her clothing and demeanor still spoke of the old country to me. She told me she feels "very strongly" that her former husband did not kill Kennedy. When I reminded her that she told the Warren Commission that she believed he had killed Kennedy, the essence of her long, rambling explanation was that "all that they showed me against him led me to believe it." I asked her if the authorities ever told her what to say or threatened her in any way. She said they never told her what to say, but "they kept talking to me over and over again. I was exhausted, and had a four-week-old child, and at one point I didn't want to answer—the word, I think, is tattle on—my friends and relatives in Russia. And I felt their questions about them were not relevant, but they told me if I wanted to stay here in this country, I'd have to answer all their questions."

At what point in time, I asked her, did she come around to the belief that her husband was innocent? “About fifteen to twenty years later,” she said,* when she started to see things more clearly and do more reading on the subject. She said she realized she had been “lied to.” What lies? I asked. She answered curiously, “You’re catching me off guard,” and she could not tell me. But she was sure of one thing—“Lee was set up as a patsy.” She doesn’t specifically know by whom, but they were connected, she said, to the U.S. government. Who then, I asked, did kill Kennedy? “Cubans,” she replied. “Pro-Castro or anti-Castro Cubans?” I asked. “Anti-Castro Cubans,” she assured me. Who covered this fact up? I asked. “The CIA covered it up,” she said, because the anti-Castro Cubans had been working for the CIA, and the CIA was afraid that if they didn’t cover up the assassination for the anti-Castro Cubans, the latter would let it be known that they had tried to kill Castro for the CIA.

“Lee,” she said, worked “undercover for someone in the American government,” but when I asked her whom, she said she did not know. She believes he knew the assassination was going to take place and told the FBI about it, but doesn’t know why the FBI didn’t stop the assassination. She also believes that LBJ and the CIA, along with the FBI, knew the assassination was going to take place, and later, the Mafia “ordered Ruby” to kill her husband. When I told her she was implicating quite a few groups, she replied that “they all work together.”

When I asked her why, if her husband knew the assassination was going to take place, yet was innocent himself, he didn’t tell the authorities after his apprehension about what he knew, she said, “Lee didn’t want to come forward. He didn’t want to betray the people he was loyal to.” But why, I asked, would he feel any loyalty to those who had betrayed him by setting him up as a patsy? She said she didn’t know the answer to that question, and could only repeat “that Lee was very loyal to these people.” Who were these people? I once again asked Marina, and Marina, who till this day still speaks slightly broken English, again said she did not know.

Although, as indicated, I did not come to interrogate Marina about the facts of the case, since this had already been done ad nauseam, a few references to factual matters were made. When she insisted on Oswald’s innocence, suggesting he would never do such a murderous act, I reminded her that he had, in fact, attempted to murder Major General Edwin Walker, and she readily admitted he had, telling me she knew this because “Lee told me he did.” But she hastened to add that the president was different because “Lee liked Kennedy.” And Jack Duffy, who has studied the assassination for many years and leans toward the conspiracy theory, asked Marina if she had taken “the backyard photos” of Oswald holding the Carcano rifle. “Yes,” she answered evenly, “I did.” “That settles that issue,” Duffy said.

My sense of Marina after meeting her is essentially the same as it was before, with the exception that she was a little more feisty and intense than I had anticipated. Although her mind has clearly become addled by the impregnation of all the conspiracy theories she has heard and read about, I feel that as to matters about which she has personal knowledge, she is a truthful person—easily as truthful as the average person, perhaps more so.

In parting, she said that the previous thirty-seven years had been terrible, but told me she had “a favorite motto” that applies to her life: “Tragedy does not always come to harm you.” By that she meant that my assessment of her as being a victim was wrong. “I have been victimized, but I have not become a victim,” she told me. The experience, she said, had caused her to learn about herself. And what had she learned? I asked. For the first time in our forty-to forty-five-minute conversation, a very slight smile crossed her face. “There are certain things for only me to know,” she said. I bid her good-bye and told her I would be kind to her in my book and I had one bit of very good advice to give her. “What?” she asked eagerly. “You should stop smoking,” I said with a smile to soften my injunctive words, whereupon she proceeded to point to the cigarette in her hand and say that at the time she started smoking years ago, “They [the tobacco manufacturers] didn’t tell us about all the bad ingredients in their cigarettes.” I told her that that was one conspiracy to cover up the truth that I agreed with her on.

In a follow-up telephone conversation on December 5, 2000, Marina, expressing concern about the privacy of her children, said her daughter June had been the valedictorian at the University of Texas with a straight-A average and now has an excellent job with a business corporation in Texas that takes her around the world. Her other daughter, Rachel, also has a college degree and is a registered nurse married to a prominent Austin physician. When I told her that her children doing well was a testament to the job she had done in raising them, she said she did not need my compliments,* and refusing to take any credit, said that sometimes children do well because of what’s inside of them, not because of their rearing. The father of her son, Mark, is Dallas carpenter Kenneth Porter, whom she married in 1965 and divorced in 1974. The two worked out their differences and have continued to live under the same roof, Marina keeping his last name. Mark, she says, is the only child of hers who does not have a college degree. She said he has a blue-collar job, but “he’s not a garbage collector.” When I asked Marina, who became a U.S. citizen in 1991, what she enjoyed doing in her leisure moments, she said she reads a lot, all nonfiction, and is interested in philosophy. We finished our conversation by her telling me that “although I’ve been polite to you today [I hadn’t sensed any difference in our two conversations] doesn’t mean I like you.” I chuckled, telling her that I felt she had a good sense of humor.

When I placed the December phone call, Linda Wilson, Marina’s supervisor, answered. Before turning the phone over to Marina, she told me, “Marina is one of the sweetest, most kind and generous persons you could ever be around. She’s a very, very fine person.” As an example of Marina’s generous ways, she said, “Anyone at the store who comes up short for a purchase, like the kids, or needs a dollar for the bus, or whatever, Marina is always the first one to reach into her purse.”

The People and Groups Involved in the Plot to Kill Kennedy

The reader has learned by now that according to the conspiracy community, much of the world was out to get President Kennedy, and that the people and groups out to kill him were apparently literally fighting among themselves over who got to fire the first shot. And, of course, ever since the murder, virtually the whole world, even those who weren't involved in the murder, has eagerly participated in the cover-up for those who did conspire to murder Kennedy.

When longtime conspiracy theorist Penn Jones Jr. passed away in 1998, there were several tributes to him in a conspiracy theorist publication. One read, "The research community has lost one of its best-loved and most influential figures. But at least we know that Penn Jones Jr. is now in a better place, a place where he can at least learn the truth about what happened in Dealey Plaza all those years ago."¹ A joke told in the comparatively small anti-conspiracy community about the conspiracy buffs' belief that just about everyone was involved in the cover-up of the assassination has them lined up in front of God at the end of time asking him, "Tell us, God, who really killed President Kennedy?" When God replies, "Listen, I'm just going to tell you one time and one time only, and then I want you to forget about this matter—Lee Harvey Oswald killed Kennedy and he acted alone," the buffs, in terrible angst, nudge each other nervously and say, "This is a lot bigger than we thought."

As we've seen, the heart of a criminal conspiracy is two or more people getting together and agreeing to commit a crime. But with conspiracy theorists, "or more" is never enough. What follows are three lists (not complete ones, I must add) of groups, countries, and people allegedly involved in the murder of JFK. The first list is of groups and countries believed by one or more conspiracy theorists to be behind the assassination (sources for the accusation are given only for the most obscure and far-out groups).

1. CIA
2. Organized crime
3. FBI
4. Secret Service
5. Office of Naval Intelligence
6. KGB (Soviet Union)
7. American Communists
8. Cuba
9. Anti-Castro Cuban exiles
10. Germany
11. U.S. Army
12. Military-industrial complex (the Joint Chiefs of Staff and leaders of American business, particularly the defense industry)
13. Dallas Police Department
14. Dallas County Sheriff's Department

15. Dallas Morning News
16. Texas oilmen
17. International banking cabal
18. Illuminati
19. Majesty Twelve (MJ-12), the secret, shadow government of the United States²
20. Minutemen
21. Dallas oligarchy (wealthy civic leaders in Dallas who are believed to rule the city)
22. Right wing in America
23. Mossad (Israeli intelligence agency)³
24. Government of South Vietnam⁴
25. Red China
26. Nationalist China
27. Poland
28. Anti-Defamation League⁵
29. French OAS⁶
30. Renegade members of Hitler's elite staff who fled Germany after World War II⁷
31. Republican Party of Omaha⁸
32. Mayor Daley machine in Chicago⁹
33. Catholic Church¹⁰
34. U.S. Department of Agriculture¹¹
35. Forces that were behind the 1964 U.S.-Belgian rescue operation in the Congo¹²
36. Martians and Venusians^{13*}
37. American Council of Christian Churches¹⁴
38. Exiled czarist Russians¹⁵
39. Eastern establishment
40. National Aeronautics and Space Administration
41. Defense Industrial Security Command
42. U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency
43. International Brotherhood of Teamsters
44. Ku Klux Klan

Although the number of co-conspirators who would have had to participate in the conspiracy as members of the groups allegedly behind the assassination—such as the CIA, organized crime, and military-industrial complex—would necessarily be very high, the following is a partial list of those co-conspirators who have been specifically named and identified by one or more conspiracy theorists as being members of the conspiracy to murder Kennedy. (The reader should not conclude that every person on this list is believed by all or even most conspiracy theorists to have been a member of the conspiracy to murder Kennedy. If just one conspiracy theorist, at any time, accused this person of complicity, the person's name appears on this list.)

1. Tony Accardo

2. Dean Acheson
3. Joseph Alsop
4. James Jesus Angleton
5. Bobby Baker
6. Robert “Barney” Baker
7. Guy Banister
8. W. O. Bankston
9. Bernard Barker
10. Charles Batchelor
11. Benjamin Bauman
12. Thomas Beckham
13. Jerry Belknap
14. Paul Bethel
15. Louis M. Bloomfield
16. Hale Boggs
17. Martin Bormann
18. Orlando Bosch
19. George Bouhe
20. Jack Bowen
21. Eugene Hale Brading
22. Edgar Eugene Bradley
23. Leslie Norman Bradley
24. “Brother-in-law”
25. McGeorge Bundy
26. George Bush (Senior)
27. George Butler
28. Harold Byrd
29. General Charles Cabell
30. Earle Cabell
31. Claude Barnes Capehart
32. Carlos (last name unknown)
33. Alex Carlson
34. Dan Carswell
35. Cliff Carter
36. Lieutenant Colonel Bevin Cass
37. Luis Castillo
38. Fidel Castro
39. Max Cherry
40. Joe Civello
41. Edward Clark
42. Thomas Clines
43. Joseph R. Cody
44. Roy M. Cohn

45. Lucien Conein
46. John Connally
47. Ramon Cortes
48. Kent Courtney
49. William Craver
50. John Crawford
51. Robert Crowley
52. Kenneth Hudson Croy
53. Jesse Curry
54. William Dalzell
55. I. Irving Davidson
56. Harry Dean (aka Harry Fallon)
57. Patrick Dean
58. Bill Decker
59. Louise Deckert
60. Eladio del Valle
61. John De Menil
62. George de Mohrenschildt
63. Herminio Diaz
64. Joe DiMaggio
65. Walter Dornberger
66. Robert Easterling
67. Jack Faulkner
68. Fernandez Feito
69. David Ferrie
70. Abe Fortas
71. Will Fritz
72. Maurice Gatlin
73. William Gaudet
74. Sam Giancana
75. G. Wray Gill
76. Manuel García Gonzales
77. T. Gonzales
78. William Greer
79. Peter Gregory
80. Antoine Guerini
81. Billy James Hargis
82. Roy Hargraves
83. William "Blackie" Harrison
84. William Harvey
85. Richard Helms
86. Gerald Patrick Hemming
87. Jim Hicks

88. Jimmy Hoffa
89. Chauncey Holt
90. J. Edgar Hoover
91. Lawrence Howard
92. David Hoy
93. Patrick Hoy
94. Howard Hughes
95. E. Howard Hunt
96. H. L. Hunt
97. Morris Jaffe
98. Walter Jenkins
99. Lyndon Johnson
100. Mr. Jones (fictitious name)
101. Clarence Jones
102. Clifford Jones
103. Sam Kail
104. Roy Kellerman
105. Nikita Khrushchev
106. Jules Ricco Kimble
107. Pat Kirkwood
108. Fred Korth
109. Jake Kosloff
110. Valeriy Kostikov
111. Larry LaBorde
112. Edward Lansdale
113. Meyer Lansky
114. Richard Lauchli
115. Jack Lawrence
116. Yves Leandez
117. James Melvin Liggett
118. Gilberto Policarpo Lopez
119. Grayston Lynch
120. Quinton Pino Machado
121. General John Magruder
122. Robert Maheu
123. George Mandel (aka Giorgio Mantello)
124. Amos Manor
125. Carlos Marcello
126. Layton Martens
127. Jack Martin
128. John Martino
129. Rolando Masferrer
130. John McCloy

131. John McCone
132. Carl McIntire
133. Robert McKeown
134. Mike McLaney
135. Gordon McLendon
136. Jim McMahan
137. L. J. McWillie
138. Major General John B. Medaris
139. L. D. Miller
140. Joseph Milteer
141. William Monteleone
142. David Sanchez Morales
143. Clint Murchison
144. Ferenc Nagy
145. Madame Nhu
146. Richard Nixon
147. Gordon Novel
148. Dr. Alton Ochsner
149. Ken O'Donnell
150. Harry Olsen
151. Aristotle Onassis
152. Marina Oswald
153. Michael Paine
154. Ruth Paine
155. Kim Philby
156. David Atlee Phillips
157. Robert "Tosh" Plumlee
158. Luis Posada
159. James W. Powell
160. Jack Puterbaugh
161. Carlos Quiroga
162. Paul Raigorodsky
163. William Reily
164. Sid Richardson
165. William Robertson
166. Charles Rogers
167. Alexander Rorke
168. Johnny Roselli
169. Eugene Rostow
170. John Roussetot
171. James Rowley
172. Jack Ruby
173. Ruth Ann (last name unknown)

174. Mike Ryan
175. Emilio Santana
176. Felipe Vidal Santiago
177. Saul (last name unknown)
178. Aldo Vera Seraphine
179. Theodore Shackley
180. Clay Shaw
181. Walter Sheridan
182. Charles Siragusa
183. “Slim”
184. Mr. Smith (fictitious name)
185. Sergio Arcacha Smith
186. Carlos Prío Socarrás
187. Jean René Souetre
188. Arlen Specter
189. Lew Sterrett
190. Adlai Stevenson
191. Frank Sturgis (Frank Fiorini)
192. William Sullivan
193. Kerry Thornley
194. J. D. Tippit
195. Santo Trafficante
196. “Troit”
197. Tammi True
198. Igor Vagonov
199. Adolf Vermont Jr.
200. Wernher Von Braun
201. Igor Voshinin
202. Henry Wade
203. General Edwin Walker
204. Brock Wall
205. George Wallace
206. Harry Weatherford
207. Ed Weisl
208. Mitch WerBell
209. Lieutenant Colonel George Whitmeyer
210. General Charles Willoughby
211. Edwin Wilson
212. Louie Witt
213. Mr. X (fictitious name)
214. Abraham Zapruder

The following is a partial list of assassins—that is, those whom one or more conspiracy theorists have actually named and identified as having fired a weapon at Kennedy in Dealey Plaza (or as being part of the assassination group) from locations including the second and sixth floors of the Book Depository Building, the Dal-Tex Building, the County Records Building, the grassy knoll, the railroad overpass, the area around the pergola, the presidential limousine itself, a manhole on Elm Street, and a storm drain near the north end of the Triple Underpass.* Other conspiracy theorists have named some of these people as only being a member of the conspiracy to kill Kennedy, not an assassin. Apparently, so many people wanted to kill Kennedy that they had to draw straws to get the best firing positions, and from the main assassination location they must have been standing shoulder to shoulder. At least we haven't reached the situation, yet, where they are perched on top of each other's shoulders. But the century is still young.

1. Gus Abrams
2. Felix Alderisio
3. Black Dog Man
4. Roger Bocognani
5. Orlando Bosch
6. Eugene Hale Brading
7. Edgar Eugene Bradley
8. T. Casey Brennan
9. Morgan Brown
10. Richard Cain (Ricardo Scalzetti)
11. "Carlos"
12. Daniel Carswell
13. Cliff Carter
14. Fred Lee Chrisman
15. Patrick T. Dean
16. Eladio del Valle
17. Harold Doyle
18. John Ernst
19. Loy Factor
20. David Ferrie
21. James Files
22. Desmond FitzGerald
23. Franklin Folley (Frank Sinatra's drummer)
24. Clyde Foust
25. Richard Gaines
26. Herminio Diaz Garcia
27. John Gedney
28. Charles Givens
29. Manuel García Gonzales
30. William Greer
31. Jack Grimson

32. Al Groat
33. Loran Hall
34. Charles Harrelson
35. Jim Hart
36. Gerald Patrick Hemming
37. George Hickey (accidentally shot Kennedy)
38. Jim Hicks
39. Chauncey Holt
40. E. Howard Hunt
41. Harold Isaacs
42. Lyndon Johnson*
43. "Junior"
44. Roy Kellerman
45. Klu Klux Klan (two unidentified members)
46. Pedro Luis Diaz Lanz
47. Jack Lawrence
48. "Lebanon"
49. John Mertz
50. Michael Victor Mertz
51. Joseph Milteer
52. David Sanchez Morales
53. Charles Nicolleti
54. Lee Harvey Oswald
55. Lenny Patrick
56. Robert Lee Perrin
57. Sauveur Pironti
58. James Powell
59. "Raul"
60. George Reese
61. Manuel Rivera
62. Charles Rogers
63. Alexander Rorke
64. Johnny Roselli
65. Jack Ruby
66. Miguel Saez
67. Guillermo Novo Sampol
68. Ignacio Novo Sampol
69. Emilio Santana
70. Lucien Sarti
71. Saul (#1) (Accuser: Hugh McDonald)
72. Saul (#2) (Accuser: Ricky White)
73. William Seymour
74. Jean René Souetre

75. Frank Sturgis
76. J. D. Tippit
77. Malcolm Wallace
78. Harry Weatherford
79. Roscoe White
80. Louie Witt
81. Dave Yaras
82. “Zed” (code name)

With at least eighty-two gunmen shooting at Kennedy in Dealey Plaza that day, it’s remarkable that Kennedy’s body was sufficiently intact to make it to the autopsy table.

To reemphasize, the above three lists are only partial. And they don’t even include those involved in the cover-up of the conspiracy to kill Kennedy, which virtually all buffs say the entire Warren Commission was guilty of. The alleged cover-up participants also include, among a great many others, the HSCA staff, Marina Oswald, the three autopsy surgeons, and “the remainder of the [federal] government” that was not behind the assassination (per New Orleans DA Jim Garrison). Indeed, conspiracy theorist E. Martin Schotz says the president’s own brother, Robert F. Kennedy, knowingly participated in the cover-up.

One would think that at least five people (Jackie Kennedy, Governor Connally and his wife, Nellie, William Greer, the Secret Service driver of the presidential limousine, and Roy Kellerman, the Secret Service passenger in the front seat) might forever be immune from being accused, by the terminally wacky buffs, of being involved in the conspiracy to murder Kennedy, if for no other reason than that they themselves were in the line of fire. But not so fast say the conspiracy buffs, unwilling to concede by exemption any Homo sapiens who were alive and breathing on November 22, 1963. Conspiracy theorist James H. Fetzer has removed Greer, who was directly within the line of fire for both shots that hit Kennedy, from the line-of-fire defense, claiming that Greer, as a part of the conspiracy, deliberately stopped the limousine after the first shot to make Kennedy an easier target for the remaining shots. So apparently Greer, per Fetzer, decided to place his own life on the line to see that Kennedy was killed. And two young buffs from Canada also removed Greer as well as his partner, Kellerman, from the line-of-fire defense by actually contending that Greer himself turned around and shot Kennedy, Kellerman holding the steering wheel while his partner did the deed. In fact, a Tulsa citizen, serving as his own lawyer, went so far as to file a lawsuit on September 30, 1996, asking the court to find Greer and Kellerman guilty of murdering Kennedy.¹⁶

That leaves three other passengers in the presidential limousine. Surely at least they have to be immune from the pointed finger, right? Well, not all of them. A few weeks after the assassination, Governor Connally’s wife, Nellie, wrote an account of the assassination on a yellow pad. Thirty years later, Newsweek published excerpts from the account. One excerpt refers to Nellie’s visit to her husband’s bedside in the recovery room at Parkland Hospital. “He asked me about the President,” she wrote, and when she told him the president was dead, his reply was, “I knew.”¹⁷ Conspiracy theorist and author Walt Brown writes, “Those two words [“I knew”] will probably—and perhaps should—generate two conspiracy books.”¹⁸ In other words, there’s at least a chance that Connally was so intent on joining in the conspiracy to murder Kennedy that, like Greer, he was even willing to risk his own life. In fact, conspiracy theorist Harrison E. Livingstone, in his book The Radical Right and the Murder of John F. Kennedy, informs his readers that “those in the know in Texas believe that Connally was part of the planning for the assassination.”¹⁹

I don’t know about Nellie, but it’s probably just a matter of time before some nutty buff removes Jackie’s Oleg Cassini pillbox hat and tries to put the conspiracy hat on her. I mean, she wasn’t quite as much in the line of fire as Connally and Greer were. And God knows, with JFK’s flagrant womanizing, she certainly had a motive. Indeed, how long do we have to wait for some deranged conspiracy theorist to write an article or book stating that President Kennedy was in very ill health, that he had been told he didn’t have too long to live,^{*} and that he, yes he, was a party to the conspiracy to have himself murdered?[‡] The motive? Polls showed his popularity was in decline and he viewed his murder as a good career move. And we know that Kennedy’s popularity did, in fact, rise dramatically as a result of his death on November 22, 1963.

But all of the above assumes that John F. Kennedy was actually killed on November 22, 1963. And we don’t know this. Indeed, conspiracy theorist George Thomson, a swimming-pool engineer, is convinced that twenty-two shots were fired in Dealey Plaza, and five people were killed, but not JFK. Officer Tippit was impersonating JFK in the presidential limousine and it was he who was killed. Kennedy escaped and was seen a year later in New York reveling at a private birthday party for author Truman Capote.²⁰ Who am I to say that George Thomson is wrong?

A verbal exchange on September 17, 1977, at a “Critics Conference” in Washington, D.C., in which G. Robert Blakey, chief counsel for the HSCA, met with nine prominent Warren Commission critics and conspiracy theorists from around the country, captured the essence of the conspiracy movement. When Blakey noted that “nobody has ever suggested that the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service” was involved in the assassination, conspiracy theorist Kathy Kinsella spoke up. “Give us time,” she said.²¹

Lincoln-Kennedy Coincidences

I am including this brief section in my book for two reasons. One, the coincidences between Lincoln's and Kennedy's lives and deaths are so incredible that one can't help but shake one's head in wonderment and fascination. But that alone would not justify their inclusion in the book. What does is the fact that in the world of the conspiracy theorists, there is no such thing as a coincidence. Events and circumstances never fortuitously happen and by mere chance relate to each other. They are actually manifestations and evidence of two or more people acting in concert toward a mutual, sinister goal.

The remarkable Lincoln-Kennedy coincidences, several of them first noticed and published three days after Kennedy's death by Dayton, Ohio, artist and Lincoln scholar Lloyd Ostendorf, follow:

1. Lincoln was elected president in 1860, Kennedy in 1960.
2. Both Lincoln and Kennedy were elected president after each had unsuccessfully sought to get the vice presidential nomination of their party—Lincoln in 1856, Kennedy in 1956.
3. Both Lincoln and Kennedy had served in the U.S. House of Representatives—Lincoln elected in 1846, Kennedy in 1946.
4. The man Lincoln defeated to become president, Stephen Douglas, was born in 1813. The man Kennedy defeated to become president, Richard Nixon, was born in 1913.
5. Both Lincoln and Kennedy, while in their thirties, married a pretty, sophisticated twenty-four-year-old brunette who spoke French fluently.
6. Both Lincoln and Kennedy had sons who died during their presidency—Lincoln's son William dying at the age of eleven, Kennedy's son Patrick dying two days after his birth.
7. Both Lincoln and Kennedy, far more than any presidents before them, sought equality for blacks as an inalienable right required by a decent and just nation. And both of their dramatic efforts failed during their lives, the seeds only bearing fruit shortly after their deaths, in Lincoln's case with the abolition of slavery by the Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution on December 18, 1865,* in Kennedy's case with the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965.
8. Kennedy's secretary was named Lincoln.†
9. Both Lincoln and Kennedy were murdered on a Friday.
10. Both were shot once in the head.
11. Both were seated at the time they were shot.
12. Both were shot from behind, in the back of their head.
13. Both were shot by assassins who were to their right rear.†
14. Both Lincoln's and Kennedy's wives were seated next to them at the time they were shot.§
15. Each wife, after her husband was shot in the head, cradled his head in her lap.
16. Both Lincoln and Kennedy were in the presence of another couple, and in each case the man was also wounded by the assassin (Connally by gunshot, Major Henry R. Rathbone when Booth stabbed him as Rathbone lunged at Booth after Booth shot Lincoln).

17. Lincoln was shot in Ford's theater. Kennedy was shot in a Lincoln limousine (manufactured by Ford Motor Company).
18. Though both Lincoln and Kennedy were shot in the head, which normally causes immediate death, neither died instantly, and feverish efforts to resuscitate them were made by several physicians, both presidents responding with an increased though weak pulse before expiring.
19. On the day Lincoln was killed, he told an aide that he knew there were those who wanted him dead. "If it is to be done," he said, "it is impossible to prevent it." On the day of Kennedy's murder, he said in his Fort Worth hotel room to Jackie and an aide how easy it would be for someone to shoot him from a "high building with a high powered rifle, and there's nothing anybody could do."
20. Unlike 99 percent of the population, both presidential assassins, John Wilkes Booth and Lee Harvey Oswald, were known by their three names.*
21. Both Booth and Oswald were shot and killed before they were brought to trial.
22. Both Booth and Oswald were killed by one shot from a revolver.
23. Both Lincoln's and Kennedy's successors were named Johnson.
24. Lincoln's successor, Andrew Johnson, was born in 1808, and Kennedy's successor, Lyndon Johnson, in 1908.
25. Both Andrew Johnson and Lyndon Johnson were southern Democrats.
26. Both Andrew Johnson and Lyndon Johnson had served as United States senators.
27. The names Lincoln and Kennedy each contain seven letters.
28. The names John Wilkes Booth and Lee Harvey Oswald each contain fifteen letters.
29. The names Andrew Johnson and Lyndon Johnson each contain thirteen letters.

I can only hope the above list will help conspiracy theorists realize that coincidences that seem to defy mathematical probabilities do happen in life. That's why there is a name for them, why they are called co incidences. In fact, they are so common that we sometimes loosely suggest the phenomenon when no real coincidence exists. "Of all the gin joints, in all the towns, in all the world, she walks into mine," Humphrey Bogart says in the movie Casablanca about his lover, Ingrid Bergman.

Epilogue

For most Americans, interest in the Kennedy assassination has held firm for going on half a century, our nation unwilling to bury Kennedy or his legacy of inspiring a generation—his youthful image, vigor, and promise seemingly frozen in time.¹ This is why the pain of his loss lives on. Most believe that interest in the assassination and its perceived mysteries will endure for centuries to come.

Come rain or come shine, in cold or hot weather, people from all over the nation and the world (about two million annually) make their pilgrimage to Dealey Plaza, designated a National Historical Landmark district in October of 1993. Alone, or in twos or threes or more, they whisper and point and stand at or near the two Xs on Elm Street that mark the spots where Kennedy was struck down by two bullets. Repaving the street has only momentarily obliterated the Xs. Within days, assassination buffs or hawkers (who peddle pamphlets, CDs, books, and various other items on the assassination, usually on weekends) have repainted them.^{2*}

The site where Kennedy's assassin was himself gunned down by Ruby, the underground garage in City Hall, is presently closed to the public. But the city fathers, in an effort to revitalize what is now a declining part of downtown Dallas, are expected to open it to the public as a tourist attraction, along with Oswald's jail cell on the fifth floor of the old Police and Courts Building (part of City Hall) in 2007. The Dallas Police Department moved out of the now mostly vacant building to new headquarters in 2003. The city administration had moved out of City Hall in 1978.³

With respect to President Kennedy's grave site, in 1962, the year before Kennedy was assassinated, one million people visited Arlington National Cemetery. During the six months following the assassination, nine million came. Today, approximately four and a half to five million people visit the cemetery each year. When I asked Tom Sherlock, the cemetery's historian, "Approximately how many of these visitors visit President Kennedy's grave site?" he replied, "99.9 percent. Unless they're coming here specifically to visit a loved one's grave, they're coming to see JFK's grave and the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier."⁴

The John F. Kennedy Presidential Library and Museum in Boston, Massachusetts, opened on October 21, 1979, with David Powers, who was in the presidential motorcade in Dallas and was one of JFK's very closest aides and confidants, as curator, a position he maintained up to his death in 1998. The museum and library contain no assassination-related materials other than several hundred selected books on the assassination, an archivist telling me in 2004 that "we celebrate the president's life, not his death." The museum and library have been averaging about 225,000 visitors per year, with 210,594 in 2004.⁵

As with no other case in American history, network and cable TV, as well as the nation's print media, unfailingly continue to mark the anniversaries of Kennedy's death with feature stories and presentations. And of course conspiracy authors continue to write books on their pet theories of the assassination, eighty-four new books coming out since 2003 alone. (Telephone interview of James Sawa on November 26, 2006)

But the only day-in-and-day-out operation or memorial to the assassination of any significance is the Sixth Floor Museum at Dealey Plaza in Dallas. In 1977, Dallas County purchased the turn-of-the-century building at Elm and Houston, which had been leased to the Texas School Book Depository Company between 1962 and 1970, for the dual purpose of saving a historical site and using the office space. The building reopened in 1981 as the Dallas County Administration Building and eventually the first five floors were occupied by offices, the sixth and seventh floors remaining vacant, with very few visitors allowed to go to the sixth floor. In 1983, the nonprofit Dallas County Historical Foundation was created to raise funds for and to operate a $3.5 million museum on the sixth floor, and the museum opened to much fanfare on February 20, 1989. The museum is meant to be a permanent historical and educational display of photographs, films, graphics, charts, and other related interpretive materials pertaining to the assassination. Under the direction of the museum's curator, Gary Mack, and its executive director, Jeff West, as of 2005 the museum had collected over twenty-five thousand items pertaining to the assassination, including oral history audiotapes and videotapes of witnesses and others associated in some way with the participants or events of November 22 to 24, 1963. Artifacts include Abraham Zapruder's camera, one of the three first-generation copies of the out-of-camera original film made on the afternoon of the assassination (the other two, with the out-of-camera film, are at the National Archives), and the FBI model of Dealey Plaza used by the Warren Commission. Everyone, naturally, wants to go to the "corner window," the sniper's nest window where Oswald fired at Kennedy below, but the area is now enclosed by Plexiglas. However, one can clearly see the window and study the area from close quarters. Gerry Spence and I went to the window in 1986, before it was enclosed.

The Sixth Floor Museum attracts an average of 450,000 visitors annually, and well over 4 million people have gone to the museum since it opened in 1989. The museum, which also operates a bookstore on the premises selling books and miscellaneous items related to the assassination and the Kennedy family, is managed by a staff of over forty full-and part-time employees and is open seven days a week (except Christmas) from 9:00 a.m. to 6:00 p.m. at an admission cost of ten dollars. In 2002, the museum renovated and opened the seventh floor, renting it out for special events, such as an exhibit in March of 2003 of silk-screen portraits of Jacqueline Kennedy created by Andy Warhol in the months following the assassination.

In 1970, the city of Dallas erected the JFK Memorial. Located on a block of land owned by Dallas County and bordered by Main, Record, Elm, and Market streets, the memorial, just one block east of Dealey Plaza, is a cenotaph, an empty tomb erected in memory of a deceased person whose body is buried elsewhere. The inscription on a plaque near the cenotaph reads, "An open tomb that symbolizes the freedom of Kennedy's spirit." The very large, white structure (2,500 square feet and thirty feet high), consisting of seventy-two white, precast concrete columns, was designed by Philip Johnson, a prominent architect and friend of the Kennedy family. The simple inscription "John Fitzgerald Kennedy" is in gold leaf on two sides of a low, black granite block in the center of the tomb. Bleak, and with no apparent attempt to be aesthetically pleasing to the eye, there were suggestions a few years ago that the tomb be torn down.⁶

Directly across the street from the JFK Memorial at 110 South Market is the Conspiracy Museum, a two-story structure that has a bookstore, gift shop, documentary theater, and exhibits such as "The Three Hobos," "Mystery Death List," and a wall chart display of "Who Killed JFK?" The museum is open seven days a week and has smaller exhibits dealing with the assassinations of Lincoln and RFK as well as JFK. The president of the museum, Tom Bowden, advertises it as "the only place in Dallas to learn about the conspiracy" surrounding the assassination of Kennedy. The museum's predecessor at the same location was the Assassination Information Center, which was founded in 1989 by the late Larry Howard. Shortly after he died in 1994, and under the new ownership of R. B. Cutler, the Conspiracy Museum started up.

The Rose Hill Cemetery where Oswald was buried is now known as Shannon Rose Hill Memorial Park, located in a low-income area of Fort Worth at 7301 East Lancaster. During a visit there on November 30, 2000, a Memorial Park official told me that around four or five people a week visit Oswald's grave. Originally, Oswald's headstone had his first name on it as well as the years of his life, but after the exhumation in 1981, a new, flat, red headstone simply says, "OSWALD," with no first name or years on it. Facing Oswald's grave from a nearby road inside the cemetery, one can see where Oswald's mother, Marguerite, who died of cancer in 1981, is buried, without any headstone or marker, to Oswald's left. To his right is a headstone with the name "Nick Beef" on it. No one is buried there. The official said she had been told that several years ago some person had paid for the small plot and requested that the fictitious name be placed on the headstone. She did not know why.⁷

Though an entire nation grieved over the death of President Kennedy, his assassin's mother grieved hard for her son in the years before she died. Her sole purpose in life seemed to be to convince the world of her son's innocence. "Lee Harvey Oswald died an innocent man," she would say. Persuaded that he "was framed," she would point out that "he was neither tried nor convicted for his alleged crime." At times she would go beyond this, as when she told the media, in support of her petition to have her son reburied in Arlington National Cemetery, that her son had "done more for his country than any other living human being." Or when, claiming to have "a very unusual ESP," she said, "so doesn't it stand to reason that if my boy shot the President, I would have known at the time it happened?" Living in isolation from her family, she never saw her two grandchildren by Lee after November of 1963, and she spent her final years trying to ward off poverty by selling his letters from Russia and other memorabilia to pay the rent.

In May of 1964, during a television program about President Kennedy's grave, the scene shifted to her son's grave and the announcer's words cut to the bottom of her heart. "The assassin's grave has on it a dead tree," she recalled his saying. "And a picture was shown of a tree. The leaves had fallen off and it certainly looked dead. Alone in my house I broke down and wept. I soon learned that the tree had been planted a few days earlier, since my last visit to the cemetery. I did not know who put it there, but it had not been watered. I was determined that by the next Sunday my son's grave would be the nicest-looking in that section of the Rose Hill Burial Park. I pruned the tree, and I felt sure that there was life left in the roots. So I went back every day for a week, morning and evening, to water the tree. And in five days, the 'dead' tree in which the television announcer found so much ironic symbolism, started to bloom. Some may wonder why I take such an interest in the grave. First of all, my son is buried there. Regardless of what the world says or thinks, he is still my son. I keep the grave nice, too, because of the many people who come to visit. I, as a mother, want these people to go back home knowing a mother's love for a son is everlasting."⁸

In Memoriam

Everyone remembers where they were and what they were doing the moment they heard Kennedy had died.

—Common observation about Kennedy's murder

It was a transforming moment for America because we lost hope. Every president who succeeded Kennedy—they all had good points and bad points—but the legacy of hope died with him. You never had that sense again that we were moving forward, that we could do things.

—Helen Thomas, White House correspondent, United Press International

My really first conscious thoughts were just “My God, what a...great tragedy...What a horrible, horrible tragedy,” and how, in the space of a fleeting moment, things can change. Here we were, two relatively young men—we were almost the identical age, riding with what I would like to believe were two of the most beautiful wives in this country. The President and Jackie were happy. We were proud to be their hosts in Texas, and had a tremendous welcome in San Antonio, Houston, Fort Worth and Dallas...There was just joy, anticipation, wonderful throngs of people...And then in the space of a few seconds...it is unbelievable how an incident can happen that changed all of our lives, changed the course of history for many people in so many different ways you will never know.

—Governor John Connally to CBS correspondent Martin Agronsky at Connally's Parkland Hospital bedside a few days after the assassination

People have to realize that that was a very innocent time, and the very idea that a president could be shot down in the streets of America was absolutely unthinkable.

—Sixty-six-year-old Ventura County, California, resident

I think that for young people, of which I was one at the time, he spoke to the best of our instincts. He brought people together. He didn't drive them apart. His spirit, elan, and charisma were uniquely American. For those of us who remember, it is undying.

—U.S. Senator Dianne Feinstein

It is more satisfying to believe that Kennedy died as a victim of a cause rather than at the hands of a deranged gunman.

—Thomas Reed Turner, Abraham Lincoln scholar

In 1963, I lived in the small mountain village of Miraflores, Colombia, with several other Peace Corp volunteers. One of our compadres returned home that evening by horseback. He told of meeting a campesino [farmer] on the trail who called out to him “Han matado a nuestro presidente” (They have killed our president). He assumed that the president of Colombia had been killed.

—C. J. Lemonds of Plano, Texas, in a letter to the editor of Dallas Morning News

I don't get why anyone wanted to shoot him. What did he do wrong?

—Dallas high school student in 2003

The first thing about him was his driving intelligence. His mind was always on fire. His reading was prodigious, his memory almost total recall of facts and quotations. A friend of mine once crossed the Atlantic on a liner with the Kennedy family years ago. She remembered the day 12-year-old Jack was ill in his stateroom. There lay the thin, freckled little boy reading Churchill's early life, other books scattered about his bed. John Kennedy's intellectuality was perhaps the hallmark of his nature, even more than his youth... He was that rare and precious combination, the man of contemplation as well as the man of action. He had a sharp sense of history from his immense reading, and was acutely conscious of what his own place in history might be.

—CBS commentator Eric Sevareid

For the millions who mourned Kennedy, the grief and disbelief that followed his killing left a mark that is indelible to this day. Many likened the event to the death of a family member.

—Dallas Morning News, November 17, 2003

At the time Kennedy was killed I was 8 years old and in the third grade of my school in a small, rural village in northern Honduras called La Veinte y Ocho. Everyone there considered Kennedy to be the president of the people, not just the president of the United States, because he was concerned about the poor. For instance, under a program called CARITAS, the Kennedy administration started providing milk for the first time ever for school children in Honduras and throughout Central America. The people of my village took Kennedy's death very hard and I clearly remember there was a lot of mourning and crying.

—Carlos Pena, now an American citizen living in Los Angeles

To show you the way that the minds of people were poisoned against the community [Dallas], I went to Detroit about two months after the assassination for a meeting with the automotive people. I got in a cab and I said, "Take me to the Detroit Athletic Club, please." The cab driver said, "You must be from the South." And I said, "I am." He said, "Where are you from?" I said, "Texas." He said, "Where in Texas?" I said, "Dallas." He stopped the cab and said, "Get out. I ain't taking you anywhere."

—James Chambers Jr., president of the Dallas Times Herald

He appealed to and elicited a sense of idealism instead of cynicism.

—Peace Corps volunteer Tina Martin

What John F. Kennedy left us with most of all was an attitude. To put it in the simplest terms, he looked ahead. He knew no more than anyone else what the future was going to be like, but he did know that that was where we ought to be looking.

—Bruce Catton, senior editor of the American Heritage magazine

His life was such—the radiance he shed—that if we live to be a hundred, we will remember how he graced this earth, and how he left it.

—Melville Bell Grosvenor, president and editor of National Geographic Society

He brought gaiety, glamour, and grace to the American political scene in a measure never known before. That lightsome tread, that debonair touch, that shock of chestnut hair, that beguiling grin, that shattering understatement—these are what we shall remember. He walked like a prince and he talked like a scholar. His humor brightened the life of the Republic. Shown his latest nephew in August, he commented, “He looks like a fine baby—we’ll know more later...” When the ugliness of yesterday has been forgotten, we shall remember him, smiling.

—Washington Evening Star editorial

He was the most civilized President we have had since Jefferson, and his wife made the White House the most civilized house in America [alluding undoubtedly to the famous dinners the president and his wife hosted whose attendance was heavily sprinkled with cultural icons from the world of theater, art, literature, music, the sciences, and academe].

—Historian and author Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr.

Kennedy brought more than courage and energy to the White House. Like Sir Winston Churchill, he had a style of his own. And, like Churchill, he had that indefinable thing called grace. Churchill always had style but he developed grace late. Kennedy always had it, and showed it in his quiet humor, even at his own expense, and in his avoidance of political brawling. Grace helped him enormously in American foreign relations: his good nature, his warmth, his good will, and generally his good judgment. It helped him with American voters, too. Kennedy fitted into the presidency almost elegantly.

—James Marlowe, Associated Press

John Fitzgerald Kennedy was struck down in his prime, as he was still striding buoyantly through the halls of Camelot. He had served his thousand days as America’s leader with wit and charm and courage and grace. That is the way most Americans choose to remember him and the brief, shining moments of his presidency.

—Bob Clark, Washington correspondent, ABC News

When Jack quoted something, it was usually classical, but I’m so ashamed of myself—all I keep thinking of is this line from a musical comedy. At night, before we’d go to sleep, Jack liked to play some records; and the song he loved most came at the very end of this record. The lines he loved to hear were: Don’t let it be forgot, that once there was a spot, for one brief shining moment that was known as Camelot. There’ll be great Presidents again, but there’ll never be another Camelot again... it will never be that way again.

—Jacqueline Kennedy, giving birth to the Camelot appellation as it applied to JFK’s thousand days in office, in an interview with historian Theodore H. White for the December 6, 1963, Life magazine memorial edition on President Kennedy

I should have known that he was magic all along. I did know it—but I should have guessed it could not last. I should have known that it was asking too much to dream that I might have grown old with him and see our children grow up together.

—Jacqueline Kennedy

I’ve never covered anything like it [President Kennedy’s assassination]. Not before, not since, and I don’t expect to in this lifetime, nor any lifetime beyond, to infinity and beyond.

—Dan Rather, CBS News

Forever young in our collective minds, if John F. Kennedy, at forty-three the youngest man to be elected president in American history, were alive today, he would be ninety years old.

Abbreviations Used for Citations

Because of space constraints in this book, all of the source notes (citations) for the material in the main text are in the CD-ROM attached to the book.

AFIP, Armed Forces Institute of Pathology

ARRB, Assassination Records Review Board

ARRB MD, Assassination Records Review Board, Medical Deposition

ASAIC, assistant special agent-in-charge (Secret Service)

CD, Warren Commission document

CE, Warren Commission exhibit

DA, district attorney

DMA, Dallas Municipal Archives (formerly the Dallas Municipal Archives and Records Center)

DOJ, Department of Justice

DOJCD, Department of Justice, Criminal Division

DPD, Dallas Police Department

FOIA, Freedom of Information Act

H, Warren Commission hearings and exhibits (volumes 1–15 are testimony; volumes 16–26 are exhibits)

HPSCI, House Permanent Subcommittee on Intelligence

HSCA, House Select Committee on Assassinations (12 volumes)

JCS, Joint Chiefs of Staff

KISS-SCOW, Kissinger-Scowcroft

LBJ, Lyndon Baines Johnson

NARA, National Archives and Records Administration

NAS-CBA, National Academy of Science's Committee on Ballistic Acoustics

NSA, National Security Agency

ONI, Office of Naval Intelligence

SA, special agent

SAC, special agent-in-charge (FBI)

SAIC, special agent-in-charge (Secret Service)

SSCIA, Senate Select Committee on the CIA

WC, Warren Commission

WCT, Warren Commission testimony

WR, Warren Report

Z, Zapruder film

Note: For further information about the format of the citations in this book, as well as a discussion about Warren Commission documents (CDs) and exhibits (CEs), the breakdown of the Warren Commission volumes, and the National Archives' assignment of their numbers to documents in the Archives, see endnote.

Acknowledgments

There are very few people who manage to complete a long and difficult journey without having a lot of help along the way, and I am no exception. But the list of names of those who have helped me in some way, if only to answer one question among the thousands I have asked since I first started work on this book in 1986, is unmanageably long for an acknowledgments section. So to those of you whom I do not mention in this section, and you know who you are, I say thank you so very much.

I can tell those who have not seriously studied the assassination of President John F. Kennedy that it is a bottomless pit. With every project that we take on in our lives, we intuitively know, without even giving it a thought, that if we work long and hard enough we will reach the bottom of the pile. But I found, as others also have, that there is no bottom to the pile in the Kennedy case. It is endless, and I say this not as a casual turn of phrase. At the very moment I am writing these words on my yellow pad, I'm aware that there are at least a hundred people in the United States alone who are dedicating their lives to this case, examining every word and paragraph in every document they can find (the millions of pages on the case at the National Archives alone would take a lifetime to read) to come up with some inconsistency, discrepancy, or hint of a conspiracy in the assassination. And when there are a hundred or more intelligent minds working almost full-time on something (and, in the Kennedy case, thousands of others working part-time), they can create a lot of mischief. For many years during the writing of this book, I've been responding to their findings. But alas, most things, good and bad, come to an end in life, and at least for me, this book will be the end of my immersion in the Kennedy case, as I must go on to other endeavors. For me to continue to address the mostly imaginary issues of this case would be to sacrifice the rest of my life inasmuch as the allegations are, and will continue to be, without end.

The following people have helped me the most in this terribly long journey I am now bringing to an end. I must start with my erudite editor—by my lights, the best in the business—Starling Lawrence. Star's limitless patience and unconditional support, always saying yes, never no, to whatever I needed, coupled with the sagacious advice and guidance he gave me through the many years, elevates him to a very special position on my list. No one has a better ear, if you will, for the right or wrong word in a sentence. And the times were very numerous when Star immediately caught that word, or told me I was going over the top on some point. And when someone as highly critical as I am (I'd find fault with a beautiful morning sunrise) accepts the advice of someone over 90 percent of the time, that person has to be special. And Star is. I've been so blessed to have him as my editor on this monumental odyssey of mine.

And I want to thank Mary Babcock, a hardworking and meticulous copy editor who helped me so very much in rounding my manuscript into its final form.

And then there is Rosemary Newton, who has been like my secretary for this book. Though Rosemary works freelance, typing this book has been her main job, occupying most of her working day for many years. (And in the last several years the times have been many when I have also asked Rosemary to search for something on the Internet for me.) I wrote and dictated at my home and then made literally hundreds of trips to Rosemary's home in the hills, picking up drafts of sections she had typed and dropping off new work for her. Rosemary has had a very tough job working with me on this book, yet she was always competent and extraordinarily reliable. In a way, she worked more closely with me than anyone else and became the person on whom I relied the most.

In addition to transcribing, from my audio dictation, the contents of 72 sixty-minute and 8 ninety-minute tapes, during which she had to listen to my less-than-dulcet voice and my speaking a mile a minute, Rosemary had to decipher and type at least a thousand (maybe many more) inserts of mine handwritten in pencil on yellow legal paper. Though resulting from much dictation, the book you have read is, much more than dictation, a book of inserts. By that I mean the first drafts of sections I wrote (e.g., Zapruder film, wounds to the president, CIA, Oliver Stone, etc.), which I then dictated, were not overly long. But they all increased far beyond their original size in the many subsequent drafts with the addition of yellow-page inserts (as well as inserts on the top, sides, bottom, and between the lines of the pages). If you could read some of these inserts you would have great compassion for Rosemary. While still within an insert on the handwritten yellow or typewritten white page, she would be very apt to get directions like this: “Now to Insert 36 [arbitrary number] on the seventh yellow page following page 67.” Fine. But when she gets there she sees I’ve inserted a five-page handwritten endnote which has three footnote inserts in it, any one of which could itself contain an endnote or direct her to one or more other places. And then back to where she left off on the original insert perhaps an hour earlier. Often the pages and flow of the point I was trying to make got so garbled with inserts, deletions, arrows, et cetera, that it was impossible for me, the architect of the madness, to follow. Yet Rosemary never complained and more than once figured out my own labyrinth for me. As if the above were not enough, a great number of times I would write so small on a page (to squeeze in what I wanted in the only space available) that without a magnifying glass only the world’s most myopic person could read what I had written. I don’t have to tell Rosemary how very grateful I am to her. She deserves some type of medal.

This book, as you know, is itself broken down into two books, Book One being on what happened, the non-conspiracy part, and Book Two, on what did not happen, the conspiracy allegation part of this sweeping story. For Book One, I was fortunate to have two people who made noteworthy writing contributions. Even though he worked with me for a relatively short part of my long journey, no one helped me as much as Dale Myers, the Emmy Award-winning computer animation specialist and superb student of the assassination from Detroit, Michigan. Dale helped me in the writing of several sections of Book One, most notably on acoustics, “Four Days in November” (particularly in the Oswald interrogations), and all matters dealing with still photography. I am deeply grateful to Dale for lending his time, energy, and considerable expertise to this literary project.

The other person who played a writing role, though a smaller one, was Fred Haines, a soft-spoken and extremely well-read intellectual. Fred’s fine hand has survived in several places of the “Lee Harvey Oswald” and “Four Days in November” sections. And it was Fred’s suggestion, a great one, I feel, and one for which I am indebted to him, to have the latter section, and to a lesser extent the Oswald biography (as opposed to every other part of the book), written in a narrative style normally reserved for fiction, giving this part of this nonfiction book a literary quality it would not have had without it. Very few nonfiction books can be written in such a narrative style without resorting to invention, but the unprecedented richness of the historical record on every single incident in this case has permitted it. Thus, as opposed to “Rimma accompanied Oswald to the train station, where he departed for Minsk,” this: “Always faithful Rimma saw him off at the station. He was depressed and wanted her to accompany him on the overnight train trip, but by now he understands that such things were not as simple in the Soviet Union as they might have been in the states. It was snowing as they said their good-byes. Both of them were crying.”

I also want to thank Patrick Martin for all the work he put into the graphics in the photo section of the book to help make them what they are, and Douglas Martin, Fred Kuentz, and Michael McDermott for the similar contributions they made with their respective graphics.

Other individuals who stand out among the many who have helped me along the way include Dr. Michael Baden, the great pathologist who headed up the forensic pathology panel of the House Select Committee on Assassinations. With his many duties (he’s still a pathologist, he lectures, serves as a consultant on important criminal cases, even appears as a regular on a television reality series) he still always got back to me when I called, and took the time to answer my many questions dealing with the medical aspects of the assassination. Though I did not rely on him quite as much, whenever I did call on Dr. Baden’s friend and counterpart in this case, Dr. Cyril Wecht, the famed pathologist and coroner (up to January of 2006) of Allegheny County in Pittsburgh, he unfailingly found time in his very busy day, or in the evenings or on weekends, to answer my questions.

And then there were two people in Dallas, both of whom I could invariably count on to make me laugh in response to their dry, homespun Texas humor, but more importantly, to help me get to the bottom of several problem areas in the case I was exploring. I’m speaking of Bill Alexander, the former top prosecutor in the Dallas DA’s office who was the lead prosecutor in the trial of Jack Ruby for killing Lee Harvey Oswald, and was scheduled to prosecute and put Oswald away if Ruby hadn’t gotten to him first, and former Dallas County sheriff James C. Bowles, who probably was a member of Dallas law enforcement (fifty-three years) longer than anyone else in Dallas history. Alexander, in his mid-eighties, is still practicing law, and Bowles just retired in 2005. Though both were always busy—especially Bowles when he was still sheriff—they always found time in their day to answer my many questions. Together, the two of them were part of Dallas law enforcement for a great number of years and know it as well or better than any two other people alive. They graciously shared their accumulated knowledge and wisdom with me, and even helped me to the extent of putting me in contact with former members of Dallas law enforcement I had been unable to locate.

The main source for this book on the assassination is, of course, as it must be, the twenty-seven volumes of the Warren Commission, the granddaddy of all literature on the assassination. Not too far behind are the thirteen volumes of the HSCA. The next great source, among so many others, is the collection of countless documents on the assassination stored at the National Archives, the temple to America’s past, in College Park, Maryland. There simply is no way that this book ended up being the book I think it is without the wonderful cooperation I received from Steven D. Tilley, up until April of 2004 (he has since been elevated) the chief person in charge of these documents (the JFK Assassination Records Collection) at the archives, and his staff, particularly his able assistant James R. Mathis. Tilley and his staff, more than once, went above and beyond the call of duty to locate obscure but important documents for me. My requests for specific documents, several of which alone contained over a hundred pages each (e.g., the testimony of a witness before the HSCA), were continuous. I kept wondering whether I’d soon be getting a letter from Steve or one of his assistants saying, “Vince, please. Enough is enough,” but I never did. What I always got, never accompanied by a complaint, was a very large envelope in the mail containing everything I had requested that they could find. I of course am very grateful to Steve and his staff for all the tremendous assistance they gave me.

Although I am proud to say that I have done 99.9 percent of my own research for everything I wrote in this book (which is typical for me, not feeling comfortable relying on others to do research for me), I want to give very special thanks to four individuals, three of whom are avid students of the assassination, who have helped me in so many diverse ways. Having no official connection to the case like a Bill Alexander, Dr. Michael Baden, or Steven Tilley, just their friendship and their desire to help me, they were always there for me, without hesitation, whenever I needed them—whether it was to take a photo of an angle at Dealey Plaza I needed, secure someone’s phone number for me, loan me one of their many books on the assassination, in some cases get a document for me they had ready access to, or whatever. They are Jack Duffy of Fort Worth (who has been with me on this book the longest), David Phinney of Los Angeles, Jim Agnew of Chicago, and Bill Drenas of Lowell, Massachusetts. I’ll never forget the help these four gave me and will always be especially grateful to them.

And then there is Gary Mack, the curator of the Sixth Floor Museum at Dealey Plaza in Dallas since 1994 and a student of the assassination since 1975. Gary carries in his head an enormous wealth of knowledge about the case—much of it not the type one would find in the Warren Report or the report of the HSCA—which he is generous to share with whoever asks. If I called Gary once in the past years, I called him thirty times, always for his input on some arcane issue, and nearly always he was able to help me, for which I am, of course, very appreciative and indebted. I also want to thank Gary’s research colleague, fellow Texan David Perry, a former insurance investigator from Grapevine, Texas, who was also very helpful to me on the many occasions I called him for assistance. Dave has made a specialty out of debunking (sometimes in league with Mack) people like Ricky White and Madeleine Brown who come out of the woodwork with their phony assassination-related tales. The story I like to tell about David is the time I found a reference to a nut in a conspiracy book, one I had never heard of before and about whom there was no reference in any other book on the assassination that I was aware of. I called Dave to find out what he knew about the kook and his allegation, but a small part of me was hoping that Dave, too, had never heard of him, enabling me to say to him, “I finally found a nut you’ve never heard of.” But before I could even get the second syllable of the man’s name out of my mouth, Dave started bombarding me with a blizzard of information on him. He knew all about this guy and his allegation and had already debunked the man’s story.

Thanks are also in order to John H. Slate, the very diligent chief of the Dallas Municipal Archives who was invariably helpful to me whenever I needed his assistance, and the many members of the reference staff at the Dallas Public Library. I must not forget the staff of the Pasadena Public Library, where I spent literally hundreds of hours on their machines looking at microfilm and to a lesser extent microfiche. Since up to last year, when they got new machines, the machines were in terrible condition from overuse, and I’m not proficient with mechanical things, I would frequently need their help to fix or adjust a malfunctioning unit, and not once were the staff members anything but helpful and pleasant. And then there were the virtually hundreds of books the library staff got for me that were not at their library but at one of their branches, and the considerable number they got for me through their interlibrary loan service—most out of print and several very obscure—from libraries not only throughout California, but in other states, like one published in 1798, a copy of which they located for me at Brigham Young University in Provo, Utah.

I also want to express my appreciation, ironically, to three people who, unlike those already mentioned, had no conscious intent to help me but nevertheless did. I'm referring to the publishers of the three main conspiracy community publications, which I subscribed to and carefully read through the years. They are Jerry Rose's monthly Decade series, Jim DiEugenio's bimonthly Probe, and Walt Brown's JFK/Deep Politics Quarterly. (The Decade series, ending in the fourth decade after the assassination, and Probe are no longer in existence.) Although I usually didn't agree with the conclusions set forth in the articles in these publications, I found all three to be scholarly and informative, and here and there I picked up valuable points from Rose, DiEugenio, and Brown (as well as from the many private assassination researchers who contributed to their publications) that I hadn't come across in my own research and that had been overlooked by the Warren Commission and HSCA. Also, I learned from these publications the principal areas of interest in the mainstream conspiracy community, which I knew I would have to address in my book if it was going to be the book I wanted it to be.

Although I have done far, far more work on this book than any other book I've ever written, I can honestly say I enjoyed my labor, because apart from the terrible tragedy of Kennedy's death (other than that, Mrs. Lincoln, how was the play?), the case, as any long-time assassination researcher will tell you, is endlessly intriguing and fascinating. Only one section, Oswald's biography, was pure pain for me to write. One reason is that I am a nonfiction, true-crime writer normally working with trial transcripts, police and autopsy reports, witness statements, et cetera, and writing someone's biography is not my cup of tea. Secondly, I was dealing with a subject (Oswald) who moved no fewer than seventeen times in a sixteen-year period before joining the Marines, and had been in the military and in Russia. Nearly every day while writing this section I spent a good part of it with a magnifying glass looking at sketchy, faint, and often difficult-to-decipher grade school, military, and other records, and trying to reconcile conflicting memories of chronological events with documentary evidence that just didn't seem to fit. So it was an unpleasant task, but I had no choice but to "bite the bullet" and do it. I questioned when it would ever end, at one point envisioning a large, empty tub that I knew would one day be full of water, but only because of my putting one drop of water into it at a time. I took to telling people I was on a "lead diet" (biting the bullet) and working "eight days a week," because it was the only section of the book I wrote in which almost without exception, I worked on the case throughout the night in my dreams. I thought the "eight days a week" line was original and clever and so did those I used it on until one day someone reminded me, "Hey, that's a Beatles song," and it rang a distant bell to me. It was a great relief to finally finish this section and return to the luxury of working only seven days a week.

I've always been able to work seven days a week for months on end, sometimes, when required, a hundred or more hours a week, without manifesting any physical problems. In other words, I find work easy. When I was a prosecutor, trying a two-or three-month murder case before a jury wasn't fatiguing at all, although I knew some trial lawyers who, after a two-or three-day drunk driving case, would say they had to go to Palm Springs to recuperate. For whatever reason, I always seemed to be immune to the deprivations of hard work. But I had never encountered the Kennedy assassination before. Although I feel I can still get up and run around the block without any problem, for the first time in my life I feel (I'm not sure and certainly hope it's not true) that the research and writing of this book may have taken a toll on me. And one reason is that, as I've indicated, there simply is no end to the case, and more than once I wondered if I had bitten off more than I could chew.

What I can say with a lot more confidence is that without all the help I got from so many people along the way in this long journey of mine, not only wouldn't this book be the book it is, but I would have had a much more difficult time reaching the finish line to write these acknowledgments.

Bibliography

BOOKS

- Adamson, Bruce Campbell. Oswald's Closest Friend: The George de Mohrenschildt Story. Santa Cruz, Calif.: Self-published, 2001.
- Adelson, Alan. The Ruby Oswald Affair. Seattle: Romar Books, 1988.
- Adler, Bill. The Eloquent Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis: A Portrait in Her Own Words. New York: William Morrow, 2004.
- Agee, Philip. Inside the Company: CIA Diary. New York: Stonehill, 1975.
- Aguilar, Luis. Operation Zapata: The "Ultrasensitive" Report and Testimony of the Board of Inquiry on the Bay of Pigs. Frederick, Md.: Aletheia Books, 1981.
- Alsop, Stewart. The Center: People and Power in Political Washington. New York: Harper & Row, 1968.
- Andrew, Christopher, and Vasili Mitrokhin. The Sword and the Shield: The Mitrokhin Archive and the Secret History of the KGB. New York: Basic Books, 1999.
- Anslinger, Harry J., and Will Oursler. The Murderers: The Story of the Narcotic Gangs. New York: Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1961.
- Anson, Robert Sam. "They've Killed the President!" The Search for the Murderers of John F. Kennedy. New York: Bantam Books, 1975.
- Arévalo, Juan José. The Shark and the Sardines. New York: Lyle Stuart, 1961.
- Armstrong, John. Harvey and Lee: How the CIA Framed Oswald. Arlington, Texas: Quasar, 2003.
- Ashley, Clarence. CIA Spy Master. Gretna, La.: Pelican, 2004.
- Associated Press. The Torch Is Passed: The Associated Press Story of the Death of a President. New York: Associated Press, 1963.
- Austin, Anthony. The President's War: The Story of the Tonkin Gulf Resolution and How the Nation Was Trapped in Vietnam. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1971.
- Aynesworth, Hugh, with Stephen G. Michaud. JFK: Breaking the News: A Reporter's Eyewitness Account of the Kennedy Assassination and Its Aftermath. Richardson, Texas: International Focus Press, 2003.
- Ayton, Mel. The JFK Assassination: Dispelling the Myths. Bognor Regis, West Sussex, United Kingdom: Woodfield Publishing, 2002.
- Baden, Michael M., with Judith Adler Hennessee. Unnatural Death: Confessions of a Medical Examiner. New York: Ivy Books, 1989.
- Baker, Judyth Vary. Lee Harvey Oswald: The True Story of the Accused Assassin of President John F. Kennedy by His Lover. Victoria, British Columbia, Canada: Trafford, 2006.

- Bamford, James. Body of Secrets: Anatomy of the Ultra-Secret National Security Agency. New York: Doubleday, 2001.
- Bane, Bernard M. Is President John F. Kennedy Alive—and Well? Boston: BMB Publishing, 1997.
- Barron, John. Operation Solo: The FBI's Man in the Kremlin. Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 1996.
- Belin, David W. Final Disclosure: The Full Truth about the Assassination of President Kennedy. New York: Scribner's, 1988.
- Belin, David W. November 22, 1963: You Are the Jury. New York: Quadrangle, 1973.
- Belli, Melvin M., with Maurice C. Carroll. Dallas Justice: The Real Story of Jack Ruby and His Trial. New York: McKay, 1964.
- Belli, Melvin M., with Robert Blair Kaiser. Melvin Belli: My Life on Trial; An Autobiography. New York: Popular Library, 1977.
- Benson, Michael. Encyclopedia of the JFK Assassination. New York: Facts on File, 2002.
- Benson, Michael. Who's Who in the JFK Assassination: An A-to-Z Encyclopedia. Secaucus, N.J.: Carol Publishing Group, 1993.
- Bergreen, Laurence. Capone: The Man and the Era. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1994.
- Beschloss, Michael R. The Crisis Years: Kennedy and Khrushchev, 1960–1963. New York: Edward Burlingame, 1991.
- Beschloss, Michael R. Reaching for Glory: Lyndon Johnson's Secret White House Tapes, 1964–1965. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2001.
- Beschloss, Michael R., ed. Taking Charge: The Johnson White House Tapes, 1963–1964. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1997.
- Bethell, Tom. The Electric Windmill: An Inadvertent Autobiography. Washington, D.C.: Regnery Gateway, 1988.
- Bickman, Leonard, and Thomas Henchy. Beyond the Laboratory: Field Research and Social Psychology. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1972.
- Biles, Joe G. In History's Shadow: Lee Harvey Oswald, Kerry Thornley and the Garrison Investigation. San Jose, Calif.: Writers Club Press, 2002.
- Bird, Kai. The Chairman: John J. McCloy and the Making of the American Establishment. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1992.
- Bishop, Jim. The Day Kennedy Was Shot. New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1968.
- Bissell, Richard. Recollections of a Cold Warrior. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1996.
- Blair, Joan, and Clay Blair Jr. The Search for JFK. New York: Berkley, 1976.
- Blakey, G. Robert, and Richard N. Billings. Fatal Hour: The Assassination of President Kennedy by Organized Crime. New York: Berkley Books, 1992.
- Blakey, G. Robert, and Richard N. Billings. The Plot to Kill the President. New York: Times

Books, 1981.

- Blinkov, Samuil, and Il'ya I. Glezer. The Human Brain in Figures and Tables. Translated from Russian by Basil Haigh. New York: Basic Books, 1968.
- Block, Alan A. Perspective on Organizing Crime: Essays in Opposition. Dordrecht, The Netherlands: Kluwer Academic, 1991.
- Block, Lawrence, ed. Gangsters, Swindlers, Killers, and Thieves: The Lives and Crimes of Fifty American Villains. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Blow, Richard. American Son: A Portrait of John F. Kennedy Jr. New York: Henry Holt, 2002.
- Bonavolonta, Jules, and Brian Duffy. The Good Guys: How We Turned the FBI 'round—and Finally Broke the Mob. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996.
- Bonner, Judy Whitson. Investigation of a Homicide: The Murder of John F. Kennedy. Anderson, S.C.: Droke House, 1969.
- Brandt, Charles. "I Heard You Paint Houses": Frank "the Irishman" Sheeran and the Inside Story of the Mafia, the Teamsters, and the Last Ride of Jimmy Hoffa. Hanover, N.H.: Steerforth Press, 2004.
- Brener, Milton. The Garrison Case: A Study in the Abuse of Power. New York: Clarkson N. Potter, 1969.
- Brennan, Howard L., with J. Edward Cherryholmes. Eyewitness to History: The Kennedy Assassination as Seen by Howard L. Brennan. Waco, Texas: Texian Press, 1987.
- Breuer, William B. Vendetta! Fidel Castro and the Kennedy Brothers. New York: Wiley, 1997.
- Brown, Anthony Cave. Treason in the Blood. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1994.
- Brown, Madeleine. Texas in the Morning: The Love Story of Madeleine Brown and President Lyndon Baines Johnson. Baltimore: Conservatory Press, 1997.
- Brown, Thomas. JFK: History of an Image. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1988.
- Brown, Walt. The Guns of Texas Are Upon Us. Williamsport, Penn.: Last Hurrah Press, 2005.
- Brown, Walt. The People v. Lee Harvey Oswald. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1992.
- Brown, Walt. Treachery in Dallas. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1995.
- Brown, Walt. The Warren Omission: A Micro Study of the Methods and Failures of the Warren Commission. Wilmington, Del.: Delmax, 1996.
- Buchanan, Thomas G. Who Killed Kennedy? New York: G. P. Putnam, 1964.
- Bugliosi, Vincent, with Curt Gentry. Helter Skelter: The True Story of the Manson Murders. New York: W. W. Norton, 1994.
- Burleigh, Nina. A Very Private Woman: The Life and Unsolved Murder of Presidential Mistress Mary Meyer. New York: Bantam, 1998.
- Butwell, Richard. Southeast Asia: A Political Introduction. New York: Praeger, 1975.
- Califano, Joseph A., Jr. Inside: A Public and Private Life. New York: Public Affairs, 2004.

- Callahan, Bob. Who Shot JFK? A Guide to the Major Conspiracy Theories. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993.
- Campbell, Rodney. The Luciano Project: The Secret Wartime Collaboration of the Mafia and the U.S. Navy. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1977.
- Canal, John A. Silencing the Lone Assassin. St. Paul, Minn.: Paragon House, 2005.
- Caro, Robert A. The Path to Power. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1982.
- Carter, Lauren. The Most Evil Mobsters in History. New York: Barnes & Noble Books, 2004.
- Castañeda, Jorge G. Compañero: The Life and Death of Che Guevara. New York: Vintage, 1998.
- Castro, Fidel. Che: A Memoir. New York: Ocean Press, 1994.
- Chandler, David Leon. Brothers in Blood: The Rise of the Criminal Brotherhoods. New York: Dutton, 1975.
- Chang, Laurence, and Peter Kornbluh, eds. The Cuban Missile Crisis, 1962: A National Security Archive Documents Reader. New York: New Press, 1992.
- Chapman, Gil, and Ann Chapman. Was Oswald Alone? San Diego: Publishers Export, 1967.
- Cirules, Enrique. The Mafia in Havana: A Caribbean Mob Story. Melbourne, Australia: Ocean Press, 2004.
- Claflin, Edward B., ed. JFK Wants to Know: Memos from the President's Office, 1961–1963. New York: Morrow, 1991.
- Clarke, James W. American Assassins: The Darker Side of Politics. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1990.
- Clemente, Carmine D. Anatomy: A Regional Atlas of the Human Body. 3rd ed. Baltimore: Urban & Schwarzenberg, 1987.
- Colby, William, and Peter Forbath. Honorable Men: My Life in the CIA. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1978.
- Collier, Peter, and David Horowitz. The Kennedys: An American Drama. New York: Summit Books, 1984.
- Colson, Charles W. Loving God. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Zondervan, 1983.
- Committee to Investigate Assassinations, under the direction of Bernard Fensterwald Jr. and compiled by Michael Ewing. Assassination of JFK by Coincidence or Conspiracy? New York: Zebra Books, 1977.
- Connally, Nellie, and Mickey Herskowitz. From Love Field: Our Final Hours with President John F. Kennedy. New York: Rugged Land, 2003.
- Cook, Fred J. The FBI Nobody Knows. New York: Macmillan, 1964.
- Cooper, Milton William. Behold a Pale Horse. Sedona, Ariz.: Light Technology, 1991.
- Cormack, A. J. R. The World Encyclopedia of Modern Guns. London: Octopus Books, 1979.
- Corry, John. The Manchester Affair. New York: Putnam, 1967.

- Corson, William R. The Armies of Ignorance: The Rise of the American Intelligence Empire. New York: Dial Press, 1977.
- Corson, William R., and Robert T. Crowley. The New KGB: Engine of Soviet Power. New York: Morrow, 1985.
- Craig, John R., and Philip A. Rogers. The Man on the Grassy Knoll. New York: Avon, 1992.
- Crenshaw, Charles A., with Jens Hansen and J. Gary Shaw. JFK: Conspiracy of Silence. New York: Signet, 1992.
- Crenshaw, Charles A., with J. Gary Shaw, Gary Aguilar, and Brad Kizzia. Trauma Room One: The JFK Medical Coverup Exposed. New York: Paraview Press, 2001.
- Curry, Jesse E. Retired Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry Reveals His Personal JFK Assassination File. Dallas: Self-published, printed by American Poster and Printing Company, 1969.
- Cutler, Robert B. The Umbrella Man. Beverly Farms, Mass.: Self-published, 1975.
- Dallek, Robert. Flawed Giant: Lyndon Johnson and His Times, 1961–1973. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Dallek, Robert. An Unfinished Life: John F. Kennedy, 1917–1963. Boston: Little, Brown, 2003.
- Dankbaar, Wim, ed. Files on JFK: Interviews with Confessed Assassin James E. Files and More New Evidence of the Conspiracy That Killed JFK. The Netherlands: Self-published, 2005.
- Davis, John H. The Kennedys: Dynasty and Disaster, 1848–1983. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1984.
- Davis, John H. Mafia Kingfish: Carlos Marcello and the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1989.
- Davison, Jean. Oswald's Game. New York: W. W. Norton, 1983.
- Davy, William. Let Justice Be Done: New Light on the Jim Garrison Investigation. Reston, Va.: Jordan, 1999.
- DeLoach, Cartha. Hoover's FBI: The Inside Story by Hoover's Trusted Lieutenant. Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 1995.
- Demaris, Ovid. Director: An Oral Biography of J. Edgar Hoover. New York: Harper's Magazine Press, 1975.
- Demaris, Ovid. J. Edgar Hoover, as They Knew Him. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1975.
- Demaris, Ovid. The Last Mafioso: The Treacherous World of Jimmy Fratianno. New York: Times Books, 1981.
- Dempsey, John Mark, ed. The Jack Ruby Trial Revisited: The Diary of Jury Foreman Max Causey. Denton: University of North Texas Press, 2000.
- Denton, Sally, and Roger Morris. The Money and the Power: The Making of Las Vegas and Its Hold on America, 1947–2000. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2001.
- De Stefano, George. An Offer We Can't Refuse: The Mafia in the Mind of America. New York:

- Faber & Faber, 2006.
- DiEugenio, James. Destiny Betrayed: JFK, Cuba, and the Garrison Case. New York: Sheridan Square Press, 1992.
- DiEugenio, James, and Lisa Pease, eds. The Assassinations: Probe Magazine on JFK, RFK, MLK and Malcolm X. Los Angeles: Feral House, 2003.
- Donovan, James. Strangers on a Bridge: The Case of Colonel Abel. New York: Atheneum House, 1964.
- Douglas, Gregory. Regicide: The Official Assassination of John F. Kennedy. Huntsville, Ala.: Monte Sano Media, 2002.
- Duffy, James R. Who Killed JFK? The Kennedy Assassination Cover-Up, the Web. New York: Shapolsky Publishers, 1988.
- Dulles, Allen. The Craft of Intelligence. New York: Harper & Row, 1963.
- Eddowes, Michael. The Oswald File. New York: Clarkson N. Potter, 1977.
- Eisenberg, Dennis, Uri Dan, and Eli Landau. Meyer Lansky: Mogul of the Mob. New York: Paddington Press, 1979.
- Eisenhower, Dwight D. The White House Years. Vol. 2: Waging Peace, 1956–1961. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1965.
- Epstein, Edward Jay. The Assassination Chronicles. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1992.
- Epstein, Edward Jay. Inquest: The Warren Commission and the Establishment of Truth. New York: Viking, 1966.
- Epstein, Edward Jay. Legend: The Secret World of Lee Harvey Oswald. New York: Reader's Digest Press, 1978.
- Escalante, Fabian. The Cuba Project: CIA Covert Operations 1959–1962. Melbourne, Australia: Ocean Press, 2004.
- Estes, Billie Sol. Billie Sol Estes: A Texas Legend. Granbury, Texas: BS Productions, 2005.
- Evans, Monte. The Rather Narrative: Is Dan Rather the JFK Conspiracy's San Andreas Fault? Barrington, R.I.: Barbara Books, 1990.
- Evica, George Michael. And We Are All Mortal: New Evidence and Analysis in the John F. Kennedy Assassination. West Hartford, Conn.: Self-published, printed by the University of Hartford, 1978.
- Exner, Judith, as told to Ovid Demaris. My Story. New York: Grove Press, 1977.
- Fairclough, Adam. Race and Democracy: The Civil Rights Struggle in Louisiana, 1915–1972. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995.
- Feldman, Harold. Fifty-one Witnesses: The Grassy Knoll. San Francisco: Idlewild, 1965.
- Fenster, Mark. Conspiracy Theories: Secrecy and Power in American Culture. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.

- Fetzer, James H., ed. Assassination Science: Experts Speak Out on the Death of JFK. Chicago: Catfeet Press, 1998.
- Fetzer, James H., ed. The Great Zapruder Film Hoax: Deceit and Deception in the Death of JFK. Chicago: Catfeet Press, 2003.
- Fetzer, James H., ed. Murder in Dealey Plaza: What We Know Now That We Didn't Know Then about the Death of JFK. Chicago: Catfeet Press, 2000.
- Fite, Gilbert C. Richard B. Russell, Jr., Senator from Georgia. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991.
- Flammonde, Paris. The Kennedy Conspiracy: An Uncommissioned Report on the Jim Garrison Investigation. New York: Meredith Press, 1969.
- Fonzi, Gaeton. The Last Investigation. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1993.
- Ford, Gerald R., and John R. Stiles. Portrait of the Assassin. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1965.
- Fox, Sylvan. The Unanswered Questions about President Kennedy's Assassination. New York: Award Books, 1965.
- Franqui, Carlos. Family Portrait with Fidel: A Memoir. New York: Random House, 1984.
- Freed, Donald, with Fred Simon Landis. Death in Washington: The Murder of Orlando Letelier. Westport, Conn.: Lawrence Hill, 1980.
- Freedman, Lawrence. Kennedy's Wars: Berlin, Cuba, Laos, and Vietnam. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Fritz, Will. The Kennedy Mutiny. Akron, Ohio: Self-published, 2002.
- Fuhrman, Mark. A Simple Act of Murder: November 22, 1963. New York: William Morrow, 2006.
- Furiati, Claudia. ZR Rifle: The Plot to Kill Kennedy and Castro; Cuba Opens Secret Files. Melbourne, Australia: Ocean Press, 1994.
- Fursenko, Aleksandr, and Timothy Naftali. "One Hell of a Gamble": The Secret History of the Cuban Missile Crisis. New York: W. W. Norton, 1997.
- Galanor, Stewart. Cover-Up. New York: Kestrel Books, 1998.
- Gambino, Richard. Vendetta: The True Story of the Largest Lynching in U.S. History. Toronto: Guernica, 2000.
- Garrison, Jim. A Heritage of Stone. New York: Berkley, 1972.
- Garrison, Jim. On the Trail of the Assassins: My Investigation and Prosecution of the Murder of President Kennedy. New York: Warner Books, 1988.
- Gates, Gary Paul. Air Time: The Inside Story of CBS News. New York: Harper & Row, 1978.
- Gedney, John Forrester. The Making of a Bum: From Notoriety to Sobriety. Melbourne, Fla.: Gami Publishing, 2001.
- Gellman, Barton. Contending with Kennan: Toward a Philosophy of American Power. New York: Praeger, 1984.

- Gentry, Curt. J. Edgar Hoover: The Man and the Secrets. New York: W. W. Norton, 1991.
- Gertz, Elmer. Moment of Madness: The People vs. Jack Ruby. Chicago: Follett, 1968.
- Giancana, Antoinette, John R. Hughes, and Thomas H. Jobe. JFK and Sam: The Connection between the Giancana and Kennedy Assassinations. Nashville: Cumberland House, 2005.
- Giancana, Sam, and Chuck Giancana. Double Cross: The Explosive, Inside Story of the Mobster Who Controlled America. New York: Warner Books, 1992.
- Gibson, Donald. The Kennedy Assassination Cover-Up. New York: Nova Science Publishers, 2005.
- Goldberg, Robert Alan. Enemies Within: The Culture of Conspiracy in Modern America. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Goldman, Albert. Ladies and Gentlemen—Lenny Bruce!! New York: Random House, 1974.
- Goldsmith, John A. Colleagues: Richard B. Russell and His Apprentice, Lyndon B. Johnson. Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 1998.
- Gosch, Martin A., and Richard Hammer. The Last Testament of Lucky Luciano. New York: Dell, 1976.
- Greene, A. C. Chance Encounters: True Stories of Unforeseen Meetings, with Unanticipated Results. Albany, Texas: Bright Sky Press, 2002.
- Griffin, Joe, with Don DeNevi. Mob Nemesis: How the FBI Crippled Organized Crime. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 2002.
- Groden, Robert J. The Killing of a President: The Complete Photographic Record of the JFK Assassination, the Conspiracy and the Cover-Up. New York: Viking Studio Books, 1993.
- Groden, Robert J. The Search for Lee Harvey Oswald: The Comprehensive Photographic Record. New York: Penguin Studio Books, 1995.
- Groden, Robert J., and Livingstone, Harrison Edward. High Treason: The Assassination of President John F. Kennedy; What Really Happened. New York: Conservatory Press, 1989.
- Grolier's Encyclopedia*. Danbury, Conn.: Grolier, 1993.
- Grose, Peter. Gentleman Spy: The Life of Allen Dulles. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1996.
- Gun, Nerin E. Red Roses from Texas. London: Frederick Muller, 1964.
- Guth, DeLloyd J., and David Wrone. The Assassination of John F. Kennedy: A Comprehensive and Legal Bibliography, 1963–1979. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1980.
- Haig, Alexander M., Jr., with Charles McCarry. Inner Circles: How America Changed the World; A Memoir. New York: Warner Books, 1992.
- Haldeman, H. R., with Joseph DiMona. The Ends of Power. New York: Times Books, 1978.
- Haley, J. Evetts. A Texan Looks at Lyndon: A Study in Illegitimate Power. Canyon, Texas: Palo Duro Press, 1964.

- Hampton, Wilborn. Kennedy Assassinated! The World Mourns; A Reporter's Story. Cambridge, Mass.: Candlewick Press, 1997.
- Hanson, William H. The Shooting of John F. Kennedy: One Assassin, Three Shots, Three Hits—No Misses. San Antonio, Texas: Naylor, 1969.
- Hartogs, Renatus, and Lucy Freeman. The Two Assassins. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1965.
- Hatcher, Julian S., Frank Jury, and Jac Weller. Firearms Investigation, Identification, and Evidence. Harrisburg, Penn.: Stackpole, 1957.
- Heiner, Kent. Without Smoking Gun: Was the Death of Lt. Cmdr. William B. Pitzer Part of the JFK Assassination Cover-Up Conspiracy? Walterville, Ore.: TrineDay, 2004.
- Helms, Richard, with William Hood. A Look over My Shoulder: A Life in the Central Intelligence Agency. New York: Random House, 2003.
- Hemingway, Mary Welsh. How It Was. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1976.
- Hepburn, James. Farewell America: The Plot to Kill JFK. Roseville, Calif.: Penmarin Books, 2002.
- Hersh, Seymour M. The Dark Side of Camelot. Boston: Little, Brown, 1997.
- Heymann, C. David. A Woman Named Jackie. New York: Carol Communications, 1989.
- Higgins, Trumbull. The Perfect Failure: Kennedy, Eisenhower, and the CIA at the Bay of Pigs. New York: W. W. Norton, 1987.
- Highlights: The History of Parkland Hospital*. Dallas: Parkland Memorial Hospital, March 2000.
- Hinkle, Warren, and William W. Turner. Deadly Secrets: The CIA-Mafia War against Castro and the Assassination of J.F.K. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1992.
- Hlavach, Laura, and Darwin Payne, eds. Reporting the Kennedy Assassination: Journalists Who Were There Recall Their Experiences. Dallas: Three Forks Press, 1996.
- Hoensch, Jörg K. A History of Modern Hungary, 1867–1986. London: Longman Group, 1988.
- Hofstadter, Richard. The Paranoid Style in American Politics and Other Essays. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1965.
- Holland, Max, ed. The Kennedy Assassination Tapes. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004.
- Holloway, Diane, ed. Dallas and the Jack Ruby Trial: Memoir of Judge Joe B. Brown, Sr. San Jose, Calif.: Author's Choice Press, 2001.
- Holloway, Diane, ed. The Mind of Oswald: Accused Assassin of John F. Kennedy. Victoria, British Columbia, Canada: Trafford, 2000.
- Hoover, J. Edgar. Persons in Hiding. Boston: Little, Brown, 1938.
- Hope, Bob, with Melville Shavelson. Don't Shoot, It's Only Me: Bob Hope's Comedy History of the United States. New York: Putnam, 1990.
- Hosty, James P., Jr., with Thomas Hosty. Assignment: Oswald. New York: Arcade Publishing, 1996.

- Houts, Marshall. Where Death Delights: The Story of Dr. Milton Helpert and Forensic Medicine. New York: Coward-McCann, 1967.
- Huffaker, Bob, Bill Mercer, George Phenix, and Wes Wise. When the News Went Live: Dallas 1963. Lanham, Md.: Taylor Trade Publishing, 2004.
- Hughes, J. W. Square Peg for a Round Hole. Concord, Calif.: Self-published, 1993.
- Hunt, Howard. Give Us This Day. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1973.
- Hunter, Diane, and Alice Anderson. Jack Ruby's Girls. Atlanta: Hallux, 1970.
- Hunt-Jones, Conover. JFK: For a New Generation. Dallas: The Sixth Floor Museum and Southern Methodist University Press, 1996.
- Hurt, Harry, III. Texas Rich: The Hunt Dynasty, from the Early Oil Days through the Silver Crash. New York: W. W. Norton, 1981.
- Hurt, Henry. Reasonable Doubt: An Investigation into the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1985.
- Israel, Lee. A Biography of Dorothy Kilgallen. New York: Delacorte, 1979.
- James, Rosemary, and Jack Wardlaw. Plot or Politics: The Garrison Case and Its Cost. New Orleans: Pelican Publishing, 1967.
- Jennings, Dean. We Only Kill Each Other: The True Story of Mobster Bugsy Siegel, the Man Who Invented Las Vegas. New York: Pocket, 1967.
- Joesten, Joachim. The Dark Side of Lyndon Baines Johnson. London: Dawnay, 1968.
- Joesten, Joachim. Oswald: Assassin or Fall Guy? New York: Marzani & Munsell, 1964.
- Johnson, Haynes, with Manuel Artime and others. The Bay of Pigs: The Leaders' Story of Brigade 2506. New York: W. W. Norton, 1964.
- Johnson, Sam Houston. My Brother Lyndon. New York: Cowles, 1969.
- Jones, Penn, Jr. Forgive My Grief: A Critical Review of the Warren Commission Report on the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Vol. 1. Midlothian, Texas: Midlothian Mirror, 1966.
- Jones, Penn, Jr. Forgive My Grief: A Critical Review of the Warren Commission Report on the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Vol. 2. Midlothian, Texas: Midlothian Mirror, 1967.
- Jones, Penn, Jr. Forgive My Grief: A Critical Review of the Warren Commission Report on the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Vol. 3. Midlothian, Texas: Midlothian Mirror, 1969.
- Kantor, Seth. The Ruby Cover-Up. New York: Kensington Publishing, 1978.
- Kantor, Seth. Who Was Jack Ruby? New York: Everest House, 1978.
- Kaplan, John, and Jon R. Waltz. The Trial of Jack Ruby. New York: Macmillan, 1965.
- Karnow, Stanley. Vietnam: A History. New York: Viking, 1983.

- Kearns, Doris. Lyndon Johnson and the American Dream. New York: Harper & Row, 1976.
- Kelley, Kitty. His Way: The Unauthorized Biography of Frank Sinatra. New York: Bantam Books, 1986.
- Kennan, George. Memoirs, 1925–1950. Boston: Atlantic Monthly Press, 1967.
- Kennedy, John F. The Strategy of Peace. Edited by Allan Nevins. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1960.
- Kennedy, Robert F. The Enemy Within. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1960.
- Kennedy, Robert F. Thirteen Days. New York: W. W. Norton, 1969.
- Kirkpatrick, Lyman B., Jr. The Real CIA. New York: Macmillan, 1968.
- Kirkwood, James. American Grotesque: An Account of the Clay Shaw–Jim Garrison Kennedy Assassination Trial in the City of New Orleans. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1970.
- Knight, Peter Z., ed. Conspiracy Theories in American History: An Encyclopedia. Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-CLIO, 2003.
- Koepke, Jim. Chasing Ghosts: The Remarkable Story of One Man's Investigation into the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Baltimore: Publish America, 2004.
- Kornbluh, Peter, ed. Bay of Pigs Declassified: The Secret CIA Report on the Invasion of Cuba. New York: New Press, 1998.
- Kornbluh, Peter, ed. The Pinochet File: A Declassified Dossier on Atrocity and Accountability. New York: New Press, 2003.
- Kroth, Jerome. Conspiracy in Camelot: The Complete History of the Assassination of John Fitzgerald Kennedy. New York: Algora, 2003.
- Kuntz, Tom, and Phil Kuntz, eds. The Sinatra Files: The Secret FBI Dossier. New York: Three Rivers Press, 2000.
- Kurtz, Michael L. Crime of the Century: The Kennedy Assassination from a Historian's Perspective. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1982.
- Lacey, Robert. Little Man: Meyer Lansky and the Gangster Life. Boston: Little, Brown, 1991.
- La Fontaine, Ray, and Mary La Fontaine. Oswald Talked: The New Evidence in the JFK Assassination. Gretna, La.: Pelican Publishing, 1996.
- Lambert, Patricia. False Witness: The Real Story of Jim Garrison's Investigation and Oliver Stone's Film JFK. New York: M. Evans, 1998.
- Landis, C., and W. Hunt. The Startle Reaction. New York: Holt, Rinehart, 1939.
- Lane, Mark. Plausible Denial: Was the CIA Involved in the Assassination of JFK? New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1991.
- Lane, Mark. Rush to Judgment. New York: Dell, 1966.
- Lane, Mark. Rush to Judgment. New York: Dell, 1992.
- Lattimer, John K. Kennedy and Lincoln: Medical and Ballistic Comparisons of Their

- Assassinations*. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1980.
- Law, William Matson, with Allan Eaglesham. In the Eye of History: Disclosures in the JFK Assassination Medical Evidence. Southlake, Texas: JFK Lancer Publications, 2005.
- Lawrence, Lincoln. Were We Controlled? New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1967.
- Lazo, Mario. Dagger in the Heart: American Policy Failures in Cuba. New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1968.
- Leaming, Barbara. Jack Kennedy: The Education of a Statesman. New York: W. W. Norton, 2006.
- Leonard, Jerry. The Perfect Assassin: Lee Harvey Oswald, the CIA and Mind Control. Bloomington, Ind.: 1st Books Library, 2002.
- Lewis, Richard Warren. The Scavengers and Critics of the Warren Report: The Endless Paradox. Based on an Investigation by Lawrence Schiller. New York: Delacorte Press, 1967.
- Lifton, David S. Best Evidence: Disguise and Deception in the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. New York: Macmillan, 1980.
- Livingstone, Harrison Edward. High Treason 2: The Great Cover-Up; The Assassination of President John F. Kennedy. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1992.
- Livingstone, Harrison Edward. Killing Kennedy and the Hoax of the Century. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1995.
- Livingstone, Harrison Edward. Killing the Truth: Deceit and Deception in the JFK Case. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1993.
- Livingstone, Harrison Edward. The Radical Right and the Murder of John F. Kennedy: Stunning Evidence in the Assassination of the President. Baltimore: Conservatory Press, 2004.
- Loftus, Elizabeth F. Eyewitness Testimony. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1996.
- Loken, John. Oswald's Trigger Films: The Manchurian Candidate, We Were Strangers, Suddenly. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Falcon Books, 2000.
- Lorenz, Marita, with Ted Schwarz. Marita: One Woman's Extraordinary Tale of Love and Espionage from Castro to Kennedy. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1993.
- Lubin, David M. Shooting Kennedy: JFK and the Culture of Images. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.
- Ludwig, Jurgen. Current Methods of Autopsy Practice. Philadelphia: W. B. Saunders, 1979.
- Luttwak, Edward. Coup d'Etat: A Practical Handbook. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1969.
- Maas, Peter. The Valachi Papers: The First Inside Account of Life in the Cosa Nostra. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1968.
- MacNeil, Robert. The Right Place at the Right Time. Boston: Little, Brown, 1982.
- Mahoney, Richard D. Sons and Brothers: The Days of Jack and Bobby Kennedy. New York: Arcade, 1999.
- Mailer, Norman. Oswald's Tale: An American Mystery. New York: Random House, 1995.

- Mallon, Thomas. Mrs. Paine's Garage and the Murder of John F. Kennedy. New York: Pantheon, 2002.
- Manchester, William. The Death of a President. New York: Harper & Row, 1967.
- Mangold, Tom. Cold Warrior: James Jesus Angleton: The CIA's Master Spy Hunter. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1991.
- Mankiewicz, Frank, and Kirby Jones. With Fidel: A Portrait of Castro and Cuba. Chicago: Playboy Press, 1975.
- Mann, Robert. Legacy to Power: Senator Russell Long of Louisiana. New York: Paragon House, 1992.
- Marchetti, Victor, and John D. Marks. The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1974.
- Marcus, Raymond. The Bastard Bullet: A Search for Legitimacy for Commission Exhibit 399. Los Angeles: Self-published, 1966.
- Marks, John. The Search for the "Manchurian Candidate": The CIA and Mind Control. New York: Times Books, 1979.
- Marrs, Jim. Alien Agenda: Investigating the Extraterrestrial Presence among Us. New York: HarperCollins, 1997.
- Marrs, Jim. Crossfire: The Plot That Killed Kennedy. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1989.
- Martin, David C. Wilderness of Mirrors: How the Byzantine Intrigues of the Secret War between the CIA and the KGB Seduced and Devoured Key Agents James Jesus Angleton and William King Harvey. New York: Harper & Row, 1980.
- Matthews, James P. Four Dark Days in History. Los Angeles: Special Publications, 1963.
- May, Ernest R., and Philip D. Zelikow, eds. The Kennedy Tapes: Inside the White House during the Cuban Missile Crisis. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1997.
- McCarthy, Dennis V. N., with Philip W. Smith. Protecting the President: The Inside Story of a Secret Service Agent. New York: William Morrow, 1985.
- McClellan, Barr. Blood, Money and Power: How LBJ Killed JFK. New York: Hanover House, 2003.
- McClellan, John L. Crime without Punishment. New York: Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1962.
- McConnell, Brian. The History of Assassination. Nashville: Aurora Publishers, 1970.
- McCoy, Alfred W. The Politics of Heroin in Southeast Asia: CIA Complicity in the Global Drug Trade. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.
- McDonald, Hugh C. Appointment in Dallas: The Final Solution to the Assassination of JFK. New York: Zebra Books, 1992.
- McKeever, Porter. Adlai Stevenson: His Life and Legacy. New York: William Morrow, 1989.
- McKnight, Gerald. Breach of Trust: How the Warren Commission Failed the Nation and Why.

- Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 2005.
- McMillan, Priscilla Johnson. Marina and Lee. New York: Harper & Row, 1977.
- McNamara, Robert S., with Brian VanDeMark. In Retrospect: The Tragedy and Lessons of Vietnam. New York: Times Books, 1995.
- Meagher, Sylvia. Accessories after the Fact: The Warren Commission, the Authorities, and the Report. New York: Vintage, 1976.
- Meagher, Sylvia. Subject Index to the Warren Report and Hearings and Exhibits. New York: Scarecrow Press, 1966.
- Meagher, Sylvia, in collaboration with Gary Owens. Master Index to the J. F. K. Assassination Investigation: The Reports and Supporting Volumes of the House Select Committee on Assassinations and the Warren Commission. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1980.
- Mellen, Joan. Farewell to Justice: Jim Garrison, JFK's Assassination, and the Case That Should Have Changed History. Dulles, Va.: Potomac Books, 2005.
- Meneses, Enrique. Fidel Castro. New York: Taplinger Publishing, 1966.
- Menninger, Bonar. Mortal Error: The Shot That Killed JFK. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.
- Méray, Tibor. Thirteen Days That Shook the Kremlin: Imre Nagy and the Hungarian Revolution. New York: Praeger, 1959.
- Messick, Hank. Lansky. New York: Berkley, 1971.
- Miller, Merle. Lyndon: An Oral Biography. New York: Putnam, 1980.
- Model, F. Peter, and Robert J. Groden. JFK: The Case for Conspiracy. New York: Manor Books, 1976.
- Moenssens, Andre A., and Fred E. Inbau. Scientific Evidence in Criminal Cases. Mineola, N.Y.: Foundation Press, 1978.
- Moldea, Dan E. Dark Victory: Ronald Reagan, MCA, and the Mob. New York: Viking, 1986.
- Moldea, Dan E. The Hoffa Wars: Teamsters, Rebels, Politicians, and the Mob. New York: Paddington Press, 1978.
- Moldea, Dan E. The Killing of Robert F. Kennedy: An Investigation of Motive, Means and Opportunity. New York: W. W. Norton, 1997.
- Moore, Jim. Conspiracy of One: The Definitive Book on the Kennedy Assassination. Fort Worth, Texas: Summit Group, 1991.
- Morin, Relman. Assassination: The Death of President John F. Kennedy. New York: Signet, 1968.
- Morrow, Robert D. First Hand Knowledge: How I Participated in the CIA-Mafia Murder of President Kennedy. New York: S.P.I. Books, 1992.
- Mosby, Aline. The View from No. 13 People's Street. New York: Random House, 1962.
- Moss, Armand. Disinformation, Misinformation, and the "Conspiracy" to Kill JFK Exposed.

- Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1987.
- Myers, Dale K. With Malice: Lee Harvey Oswald and the Murder of Officer J. D. Tippit. Milford, Mich.: Oak Cliff Press, 1998.
- Nagle, John M. A Guide to the Sites of November 22, 1963: Facts, Questions, Pictures, and History. Dallas: Self-published, 2005.
- NASA, Nazis, and JFK: The Torbitt Document and the Kennedy Assassination*. With a foreword by David Hatcher Childress and an introduction by Kenn Thomas. Kempton, Ill.: Adventures Unlimited Press, 1996.
- Navasky, Victor S. Kennedy Justice. New York: Atheneum, 1971.
- NBC News. Seventy Hours and Thirty Minutes, as Broadcast on the NBC Television Network by NBC News. New York: Random House, 1966.
- Nechiporenko, Oleg. Passport to Assassination: The Never-Before-Told Story of Lee Harvey Oswald by the KGB Colonel Who Knew Him. New York: Carol Publishing, 1993.
- Nelli, Humbert S. The Business of Crime: Italians and Syndicate Crime in the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1976.
- Newcombe, Fred T., and Perry Adams. Murder from Within. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Probe, 1974.
- Newman, Albert H. The Assassination of John F. Kennedy: The Reasons Why. New York: Clarkson Potter, 1970.
- Newman, John M. JFK and Vietnam: Deception, Intrigue, and the Struggle for Power. New York: Warner Books, 1992.
- Newman, John M. Oswald and the CIA. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1995.
- Newseum, with Cathy Trost and Susan Bennett. President Kennedy Has Been Shot: Experience the Moment-to-Moment Account of the Four Days That Changed America. Narrated by Dan Rather. Naperville, Ill.: Sourcebooks, 2003.
- Nixon, Richard. Six Crises. New York: Doubleday, 1962.
- Norris, W. R., and R. B. Cutler. Alek James Hidell, Alias Oswald. Manchester, Mass.: GKG Partners, 1985.
- North, Mark. Act of Treason: The Role of J. Edgar Hoover in the Assassination of President Kennedy. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1991.
- Noyes, Peter. Legacy of Doubt. New York: Pinnacle, 1973.
- O'Brien, Michael. John F. Kennedy: A Biography. New York: Thomas Dunne Books, 2005.
- O'Donnell, Kenneth P., and David F. Powers with Joseph McCarthy. Johnny, We Hardly Knew Ye: Memories of John Fitzgerald Kennedy. Boston: Little, Brown, 1972.
- Oglesby, Carl. The Yankee and the Cowboy War: Conspiracies from Dallas to Watergate. Mission, Kansas: Sheed Andrews & McMeel, 1976.
- O'Leary, Brad, and L. E. Seymour. Triangle of Death: The Shocking Truth about the Role of

- South Vietnam and the French Mafia in the Assassination of JFK.* Nashville: WND Books, 2003.
- Oliver, Beverly, with Coke Buchanan. Nightmare in Dallas. Lancaster, Penn.: Starburst Publisher, 1994.
- O'Neill, Tip, with William Novak. Man of the House: The Life and Political Memoirs of Speaker Tip O'Neill. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1988.
- Oswald, Robert L., with Myrick Land and Barbara Land. Lee: A Portrait of Lee Harvey Oswald by His Brother. New York: Coward McCann, 1967.
- O'Toole, George J. A. The Assassination Tapes: An Electronic Probe into the Murder of John F. Kennedy and the Dallas Coverup. New York: Penthouse, 1975.
- Palamara, Vince. The Third Alternative—Survivor's Guilt: The Secret Service and the JFK Murder. Pittsburgh: Self-published, 1993.
- Pantaleone, Michele. The Mafia and Politics. London: Chatto & Windus, 1966.
- Parment, Herbert S. Jack: The Struggles of John F. Kennedy. New York: Dial Press, 1980.
- Parment, Herbert S. JFK: The Presidency of John F. Kennedy. New York: Penguin Books, 1984.
- The Pentagon Papers: The Defense Department History of United States Decisionmaking on Vietnam.* Senator Gravel edition. Boston: Beacon Press, 1971–1972.
- Persons, Albert C. Bay of Pigs. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1990.
- Phelan, James. Scandals, Scamps, and Scoundrels: The Casebook of an Investigative Reporter. New York: Random House, 1982.
- Phillips, David Atlee. The Night Watch. New York: Atheneum, 1977.
- Piper, Michael Collins. Final Judgment: The Missing Link in the JFK Assassination Conspiracy. Liberty Lobby, 1998.
- Popkin, Richard H. The Second Oswald. New York: Avon, 1966.
- Posner, Gerald. Case Closed: Lee Harvey Oswald and the Assassination of JFK. New York: Random House, 1993.
- Powers, Francis Gary, with Curt Gentry. Operation Overflight: The U-2 Spy Pilot Tells His Story for the First Time. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1970.
- Powers, Richard G. Broken: The Troubled Past and Uncertain Future of the FBI. New York: Free Press, 2004.
- Powers, Richard G. Secrecy and Power: The Life of J. Edgar Hoover. New York: Free Press, 1986.
- Powers, Thomas. The Man Who Kept the Secrets: Richard Helms and the CIA. New York: Pocket Books, 1979.
- President John F. Kennedy: Assassination Report of the Warren Commission.* FlatSigned Rare Books, FlatSigned.Com, 2004.

- Prouty, L. Fletcher. JFK: The CIA, Vietnam, and the Plot to Assassinate John F. Kennedy. New York: Birch Lane Press, 1992.
- Raab, Selwyn. Five Families: The Rise, Decline, and Resurgence of America's Most Powerful Mafia Empires. New York: Thomas Dunne Books, 2005.
- Ragano, Frank, and Selwyn Raab. Mob Lawyer. New York: Scribner's, 1994.
- Ramsay, Robin. Who Shot JFK? London: Pocket Essentials, 2002.
- Ranelagh, John. The Agency: The Rise and Decline of the CIA. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1986.
- Rather, Dan, with Mickey Herskowitz. The Camera Never Blinks: Adventures of a TV Journalist. New York: William Morrow, 1977.
- Reeves, Richard. President Kennedy: Profile of Power. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993.
- Reid, Ed. The Grim Reapers: The Anatomy of Organized Crime in America. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1969.
- Repetto, Thomas. American Mafia: A History of Its Rise to Power. New York: Henry Holt, 2004.
- Reston, James. Deadline: A Memoir. New York: Random House, 1991.
- Reynolds, Quentin James. Courtroom: The Story of Samuel S. Leibowitz. New York: Farrar, Straus, 1950.
- Richards, David. Played Out: The Jean Seberg Story. New York: Random House, 1981.
- Roberts, Charles. The Truth about the Assassination. New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1967.
- Roberts, Craig. Kill Zone: A Sniper Looks at Dealey Plaza. Tulsa, Okla.: Consolidated Press International, 1997.
- Roberts, Craig, and John Armstrong. JFK: The Dead Witnesses. Tulsa, Okla.: Consolidated Press International, 1995.
- Robertson, Jerry. Documents and Photos for John Armstrong's Book Harvey and Lee. Lafayette, Ind.: Self-published, 2004.
- Robison, John. Proofs of a Conspiracy against All the Religions and Governments of Europe, Carried on in the Secret Meetings of Free Masons, Illuminati, and Reading Societies. New York: George Forman, 1789.
- Rodriguez, Felix I., and John Weisman. Shadow Warrior: The CIA Hero of a Hundred Battles. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.
- Rodríguez Cruz, Juan Carlos. The Bay of Pigs and the CIA. New York: Ocean Press, 1999.
- Roffman, Howard. Presumed Guilty. London: Associated University Presses, 1975.
- Ross, Robert Gaylon, Sr. The Elite Serial Killers of Lincoln, JFK, RFK, and MLK. Spicewood, Texas: RIE, 2001.
- Rupp, Rebecca. Committed to Memory: How We Remember and Why We Forget. New York: Crown, 1998.

- Russell, Dick. The Man Who Knew Too Much: Hired to Kill Oswald and Prevent the Assassination of JFK. New York: Carroll & Graf/Richard Gallen, 1992.
- Russo, Gus. Live by the Sword: The Secret War against Castro and the Death of JFK. Baltimore: Bancroft Press, 1998.
- Russo, Gus. The Outfit: The Role of Chicago's Underworld in the Shaping of Modern America. New York: Bloomsbury, 2001.
- Sahl, Mort. Heartland. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1976.
- Salandria, Vincent J. False Mystery: Essays on the Assassination of JFK. Louisville, Colo.: Square Deal Press, 2004.
- Salerno, Ralph, and John S. Tompkins. The Crime Confederation: Cosa Nostra and Allied Operations in Organized Crime. New York: Doubleday, 1969.
- Sample, Glen, and Mark Collom. The Men on the Sixth Floor. Garden Grove, Calif.: Sample Graphics, 2001.
- Sauvage, Léo. The Oswald Affair: An Examination of the Contradictions and Omissions of the Warren Report. Cleveland: World Publishing, 1966.
- Savage, Gary. JFK First Day Evidence. Monroe, La.: Shoppe Press, 1993.
- Schacter, Daniel L. The Seven Sins of Memory: How the Mind Forgets and Remembers. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2001.
- Schein, David E. Contract on America: The Mafia Murders of John and Robert Kennedy. Silver Spring, Md.: Argyle Press, 1983.
- Schieffer, Bob. This Just In: What I Couldn't Tell You on TV. New York: Putnam, 2003.
- Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr. Robert Kennedy and His Times. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1978.
- Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr. A Thousand Days: John F. Kennedy in the White House. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1965.
- Schlesinger, Stephen, and Stephen Kinzer. Bitter Fruit: The Untold Story of the American Coup in Guatemala. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1982.
- Schlott, Joseph L. No Left Turns. New York: Praeger, 1975.
- Schotz, E. Marlin. History Will Not Absolve Us: Orwellian Control, Public Denial and the Murder of President Kennedy. Brookline, Mass.: Kurtz, Ulmer & Delucia Book Publishers, 1996.
- Sciaccia, Tony. Luciano: The Man Who Modernized the American Mafia. New York: Pinnacle Books, 1975.
- Scott, Peter Dale. Crime and Cover-Up: The CIA, the Mafia, and the Dallas-Watergate Connection. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Open Archives Press, 1993.
- Scott, Peter Dale. Deep Politics and the Death of JFK. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

- Seigenthaler, John. A Search for Justice. Nashville: Aurora Publishers, 1971.
- Semple, Robert B., Jr., ed. Four Days in November: The Original Coverage of the John F. Kennedy Assassination by the Staff of the New York Times. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2003.
- Shannon, William V. The Heir Apparent: Robert Kennedy and the Struggle for Power. New York: Macmillan, 1967.
- Shaw, J. Gary, with Larry R. Harris. Cover-Up: The Governmental Conspiracy to Conceal the Facts about the Public Execution of John Kennedy. Cleburne, Texas: Self-published, 1976.
- Shaw, Maud. White House Nannie: My Years with Caroline and John Kennedy, Jr. New York: New American Library, 1966.
- Sheridan, Walter. The Fall and Rise of Jimmy Hoffa. New York: Saturday Review Press, 1973.
- Shesol, Jeff. Mutual Contempt: Lyndon Johnson, Robert Kennedy, and the Feud That Defined a Decade. New York: W. W. Norton, 1997.
- Sirica, John J. To Set the Record Straight: The Break-in, the Tapes, the Conspirators, the Pardon. New York: W. W. Norton, 1979.
- Sloan, Bill. JFK: Breaking the Silence. Dallas: Taylor Publishing, 1993.
- Sloan, Bill, with Jean Hill. JFK: The Last Dissenting Witness. Gretna, La.: Pelican, 1992.
- Smith, Earl E. T. The Fourth Floor: An Account of the Castro Communist Revolution. Washington, D.C.: Selores Foundation Press, 1987.
- Smith, Matthew. Conspiracy: The Plot to Stop the Kennedys. New York: Citadel Press, 2005.
- Smith, Matthew. JFK: The Second Plot. Edinburgh: Mainstream, 1992.
- Smith, Matthew. Say Goodbye to America: The Sensational and Untold Story behind the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. Edinburgh: Mainstream, 2001.
- Smith, R. Harris. OSS: The Secret History of America's First Central Intelligence Agency. New York: Delta Books, 1973.
- Smith, W. H. B. Small Arms of the World: The Basic Manual of Military Small Arms, American, Soviet, British, Czech, German, French, Belgian, Italian, Swiss, Japanese, and All Other Important Nations. 10th ed. Harrisburg, Penn.: Stackpole Books, 1973.
- Sneed, Larry A. No More Silence: An Oral History of the Assassination of President Kennedy. Dallas: Three Forks Press, 1997.
- Sondern, Frederic. Brotherhood of Evil: The Mafia. New York: Farrar, Straus, & Cudahy, 1959.
- Sparrow, John. After the Assassination: A Positive Appraisal of the Warren Report. New York: Chilmark Press, 1967.
- Specter, Arlen, with Charles Robbins. Passion for Truth: From Finding JFK's Single Bullet to Questioning Anita Hill to Impeaching Clinton. New York: William Morrow, 2000.
- The Speeches of Senator John F. Kennedy's Presidential Campaign of 1960*. Washington, D.C.:

- Government Printing Office, 1961.
- Sprague, Richard E. The Taking of America 1-2-3. Rev. ed. Self-published, 1979.
- Stafford, Jean. A Mother in History. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1966.
- Steinberg, Alfred. Sam Johnson's Boy: A Close-up of the President from Texas. New York: Macmillan, 1968.
- Stone, Oliver, and Zachary Sklar. JFK: The Book of the Film. New York: Applause, 1992.
- Sturdivan, Larry M. The JFK Myths: A Scientific Investigation of the Kennedy Assassination. St. Paul, Minn.: Paragon House, 2005.
- Sullivan, William C., with Bill Brown. The Bureau: My Thirty Years in Hoover's FBI. New York: W. W. Norton, 1979.
- Summers, Anthony. Conspiracy. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1980.
- Summers, Anthony. Goddess: The Secret Lives of Marilyn Monroe. New York: Macmillan, 1985.
- Summers, Anthony. Not in Your Lifetime. New York: Marlowe, 1998.
- Summers, Anthony. Official and Confidential: The Secret Life of J. Edgar Hoover. New York: Putnam, 1993.
- Summers, Anthony, with Robbyn Swan. The Arrogance of Power: The Secret World of Richard Nixon. New York: Viking, 2000.
- Summers, Anthony, and Robbyn Swan. Sinatra: The Life. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2005.
- Tagg, Eric R. Brush with History: A Day in the Life of Deputy E. R. Walthers. Garland, Texas: Shot in the Light Publishing, 1998.
- Tague, James T. Truth Withheld: A Survivor's Story. Dallas: Excel Digital Press, 2003.
- Taylor, Maxwell D. Swords and Plowshares. New York: W. W. Norton, 1972.
- TerHorst, Jerald F., and Ralph Albertazzie. The Flying White House: The Story of Air Force One. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1979.
- Theoharis, Athan G., ed. Culture of Secrecy: The Government versus the People's Right to Know. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1998.
- Theoharis, Athan G., with Tony G. Poveda, Susan Rosenfeld, and Richard Gid Powers, eds. The FBI: A Comprehensive Reference Guide. Phoenix: Oryx Press, 1999.
- Thomas, Evan. Robert Kennedy: His Life. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2000.
- Thomas, Evan. The Very Best Men: Four Who Dared: The Early Years of the CIA. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1995.
- Thomas, Hugh. Cuba; or, Pursuit of Freedom. London: Eyre & Spottiswoode, 1971.
- Thomas, Ralph D. Missing Links in the JFK Assassination Conspiracy. Austin, Texas: Thomas Investigative Publications, 1992.
- Thomas, Ralph D. Photo Computer Image Processing and the Crime of the Century. Austin,

- Texas: Thomas Investigative Publications, 1992.
- Thompson, Josiah. Six Seconds in Dallas: A Micro-study of the Kennedy Assassination. New York: Bernard Geis Associates, 1967.
- Thornley, Kerry W. The Idle Warriors. Avondale Estates, Ga.: IllumiNet Press, 1991.
- Thornley, Kerry W. Oswald. Chicago: New Classics House, 1965.
- Toplin, Robert Brent. Oliver Stone's USA: Film, History, and Controversy. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000.
- Torca, Charles E. Wharton's Criminal Law. 15th ed. Deerfield, Ill.: Clark Boardman Callaghan, 1993–1996.
- Trask, Richard B. National Nightmare on Six Feet of Film: Mr. Zapruder's Home Movie and the Murder of President Kennedy. Danvers, Mass.: Yeoman Press, 2005.
- Trask, Richard B. Photographic Memory: The Kennedy Assassination, November 22, 1963. Dallas: Sixth Floor Museum, 1996.
- Trask, Richard B. Pictures of the Pain: Photography and the Assassination of President Kennedy. Danvers, Mass.: Yeoman Press, 1994.
- Trask, Richard B. That Day in Dallas: Three Photographers Capture on Film the Day President Kennedy Died. Danvers, Mass.: Yeoman Press, 1998.
- Trento, Joseph J. The Secret History of the CIA. Roseville, Calif.: Prima, 2001.
- Tully, Andrew. CIA, the Inside Story. New York: William Morrow, 1962.
- Turner, William W. Rearview Mirror: Looking Back at the FBI, the CIA, and Other Tails. Granite Bay, Calif.: Penmarin Books, 2001.
- Turner, William W., and Jonn G. Christian. The Assassination of Robert F. Kennedy: A Searching Look at the Conspiracy and Cover-Up, 1968–1978. New York: Random House, 1978.
- Twyman, Noel. Bloody Treason: The Assassination of John F. Kennedy, on Solving History's Greatest Murder Mystery. Rancho Santa Fe, Calif.: Laurel, 1997.
- Unger, Irwin, and Debi Unger. LBJ: A Life. New York: John Wiley, 1999.
- United Press International. Four Days: The Historical Record of the Death of President Kennedy. New York: American Heritage, 1964.
- Valentine, Douglas. The Strength of the Wolf: The Secret History of America's War on Drugs. New York: Verso, 2004.
- Voltaire. Dissertation sur la mort de Henri IV. Vol. 2. Ed. Furne, 1835.
- Waldron, Lamar, with Thom Hartmann. Ultimate Sacrifice: John and Robert Kennedy, the Plan for a Coup in Cuba, and the Murder of JFK. New York: Carroll & Graf, 2005.
- Warren, Earl. The Memoirs of Earl Warren. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1977.
- Weberman, Alan J., and Michael Canfield. Coup d'État in America: The CIA and the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. San Francisco: Quick American Archives, 1992.

- Wecht, Cyril H. Cause of Death. New York: Penguin, 1994.
- Weisberg, Harold. Case Open. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1994.
- Weisberg, Harold. Never Again! The Government Conspiracy in the JFK Assassination. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1995.
- Weisberg, Harold. Oswald in New Orleans: Case of Conspiracy with the CIA. New York: Canyon Books, 1967.
- Weisberg, Harold. Photographic Whitewash: Suppressed Kennedy Assassination Pictures. Hyattstown, Md.: Self-published, 1967.
- Weisberg, Harold. Post Mortem: JFK Assassination Cover-Up Smashed! Frederick, Md.: Self-published, 1975.
- Weisberg, Harold. Whitewash: The Report on the Warren Commission. Hyattstown, Md.: Self-published, 1965.
- Weisberg, Harold. Whitewash II: The FBI-Secret Service Cover-Up. Hyattstown, Md.: Self-published, 1966.
- Weisberg, Harold. Whitewash IV: Post Assassination Transcript. Hyattstown, Md.: Self-published, 1966.
- White, Stephen. Should We Now Believe the Warren Report? New York: Macmillan, 1968.
- White, Theodore H. In Search of History: A Personal Expedition. New York: Harper & Row, 1978.
- White, Theodore H. The Making of the President, 1964. New York: Atheneum, 1965.
- Whitehead, Don. The FBI Story: A Report to the People. New York: Random House, 1956.
- Wicker, Tom. JFK and LBJ: The Influence of Personality upon Politics. New York: William Morrow, 1968.
- Williams, James Doyle. The Dolphus Starling, Minnie Lee Williams Family, An Autobiography, Family-Careers. Self-published, October 1990.
- Williams, T. Harry. Huey Long. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1969.
- Wills, Garry, and Ovid Demaris. Jack Ruby. New York: Da Capo Press, 1994.
- Wilson, Kirk. Unsolved Crimes: The Top Ten Unsolved Murders of the 20th Century. New York: Carroll & Graf, 2002.
- Windchy, Eugene G. Tonkin Gulf. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1971.
- Wise, David. The American Police State: The Government against the People. New York: Random House, 1976.
- Wise, David, and Thomas B. Ross. The Invisible Government. New York: Random House, 1964.
- Wofford, Harris. Of Kennedys and Kings: Making Sense of the Sixties. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1980.
- Wrone, David R. The Zapruder Film: Reframing JFK's Assassination. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.

Wyden, Peter. Bay of Pigs: The Untold Story. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1979.

Yeltsin, Boris. The View from the Kremlin. London: HarperCollins, 1994.

Youngblood, Rufus W. 20 Years in the Secret Service: My Life with Five Presidents. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1973.

Zelizer, Barbie. Covering the Body: The Kennedy Assassination, the Media, and the Shaping of Collective Memory. Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1992.

Zirbel, Craig. The Texas Connection: The Assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Scottsdale, Ariz.: Texas Connection, 1991.

Zubin, David M. Shooting Kennedy: JFK and the Culture of Images. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.

ARTICLES IN MAGAZINES AND JOURNALS

Aguilar, Gary L. Letter to editor. Federal Bar News & Journal, June 9, 1994.

Aguilar, Gary L., Cyril H. Wecht, and Rex Bradford. "A Neuroforensic Analysis of the Wounds of President John F. Kennedy: Part 2—A Study of the Available Evidence, Eyewitness Correlations, Analysis, and Conclusions." Neurosurgery-Online.com, vol. 57, no. 3, September 2005.

Alvarez, Luis W. "A Physicist Examines the Kennedy Assassination Film." American Journal of Physics, vol. 44, no. 9, September 1976.

"America's Long Vigil." TV Guide, issue 565, vol. 12, no. 4, January 25, 1964.

Ansen, David. "A Troublemaker for Our Times." Newsweek, December 23, 1991.

Anson, Robert Sam. "The Shooting of JFK." Esquire, November 1991.

Armstrong, Ken. "Dallas Puzzle—By a Canadian Eyewitness." Liberty, July 15, 1964.

"As the Book Appears: A Close Look at the Facts." U.S. News & World Report, January 23, 1967.

"The Assassination: History's Jury." Newsweek, December 16, 1963.

Attwood, William. "In Memory of John F. Kennedy." Look, December 31, 1963.

Auchincloss, Kenneth, with Ginny Carroll and Maggie Malone. "Twisted History." Newsweek, December 23, 1991.

Aynesworth, Hugh. "The JFK 'Conspiracy'." Newsweek, May 15, 1967.

Bardach, Ann Louise. "The Spy Who Loved Castro." Vanity Fair, November 1993.

Beck, Melinda, and Anne Underwood. "I Wanted to Be a Hero." Newsweek, November 22, 1993.

Berendt, John. "Name: Igor 'Turk' Vaganov." Esquire, August 1967.

Berquist, Laura. "John Fitzgerald Kennedy, 35th President of the United States." Look, November 17, 1964.

- Beschloss, Michael. "An Assassination Diary." Newsweek, November 23, 1998.
- Beschloss, Michael. "The Day That Changed America." Newsweek, November 22, 1995.
- "Best of '86." Time, January 5, 1987.
- Bethell, Tom. "Conspiracy to End Conspiracies." National Review, December 16, 1991.
- Bethell, Tom. "Jim Garrison's Great Escape." American Spectator, December 1998.
- Bethell, Tom. "Was Sirhan Sirhan on the Grassy Knoll?" Washington Monthly, March 1975.
- "Birch View of JFK." Newsweek, February 24, 1964.
- Blythe, Myrna, and Jane Farrell. "Marina Oswald, Twenty-five Years Later." Ladies' Home Journal, November 1988.
- "The Bold and the Beautiful." U.S. News & World Report, December 26, 1966.
- "The Book That Has Backfired." U.S. News & World Report, December 26, 1966.
- Branch, Taylor, and George Crile III. "The Kennedy Vendetta: How the CIA Waged a Silent War against Cuba." Harper's Magazine, August 1975.
- Breo, Dennis L. "JFK's Death—The Plain Truth from the MDs Who Did the Autopsy." Journal of the American Medical Association, vol. 267, no. 20, May 27, 1992.
- Breo, Dennis L. "JFK's Death, Part II—Dallas MDs Recall Their Memories." Journal of the American Medical Association, vol. 267, no. 20, May 27, 1992.
- Breo, Dennis L. "JFK's Death, Part III—Dr Finck Speaks Out: 'Two Bullets, from the Rear'." Journal of the American Medical Association, vol. 268, no. 13, October 7, 1992.
- Breslin, Jimmy. "A Death in Emergency Room No. One." Saturday Evening Post, December 14, 1963.
- Bunton, Judge Lucius. "Texas Judge Offers Perspectives on Presiding at Oswald's Trial." Texas Bar Journal, November 1988.
- Cartwright, Gary. "I Was Mandarin." Texas Monthly, December 1990.
- Cartwright, Gary. "The Old Soldier." Texas Monthly, February 1991.
- Cartwright, Gary. "Who Was Jack Ruby?" Texas Monthly, November 1975.
- Chandler, David. "The 'Little Man' Is Bigger Than Ever." Life, April 10, 1970.
- Chevigny, Bell Gale. "Surviving Revolution and Obscurity." Ms., April 1987.
- Chomsky, Noam. "Vain Hopes, False Dreams." Z Magazine, September 1992.
- Christensen, Dan. "JFK, King, the Dade County Links." Miami Magazine, December 1976.
- "Clay Shaw: An Exclusive Penthouse Interview." Penthouse, September 1969.
- Connally, John. "Why Kennedy Went to Texas." Life, November 24, 1967.
- Corliss, Richard. "Who Killed JFK?" Time, December 23, 1991.
- Corn, David, and Gus Russo. "The Old Man and the CIA: A Kennedy Plot to Kill Castro?" Nation, March 26, 2001.

- Crenshaw, Charles A., and J. Gary Shaw. "Commentary on JFK Autopsy Articles." Journal of the American Medical Association, vol. 273, no. 20, May 24, 1995–May 31, 1995.
- Cushman, Robert F. "Why the Warren Commission?" New York University Law Review, vol. 40, May 1965.
- Daly, Steve. "Camera Obscura." Entertainment Weekly, January 17, 1992.
- Daniel, Jean. "When Castro Heard the News." New Republic, December 7, 1963.
- Davidson, Bill. "A Profile in Family Courage." Saturday Evening Post, December 14, 1963.
- "The De-briefing Process for the U.S.S.R's Defectors." Newsweek, February 24, 1964.
- "The Demise of a Don." Time, June 30, 1975.
- Devlin, Lord. "Death of a President, the Established Facts." Atlantic, March 1965.
- "Did This Man Happen upon Kennedy's Assassins?" Maclean's Reports, November 1967.
- "A Different Look at Dallas, Texas." U.S. News & World Report, February 3, 1964.
- "Discovering History with a Car Collector: Feature Car: The Kennedy Lincoln." Car Collector, April 2005.
- Dudman, Richard. "Commentary of an Eyewitness." New Republic, December 21, 1963.
- Epstein, Edward. "Reporter at Large." New Yorker, July 13, 1968.
- Epstein, Edward. "The Second Coming of Jim Garrison." Atlantic, March 1993.
- "Fateful Two Hours without a President." U.S. News & World Report, November 14, 1966.
- "FBI: Shaken by a Cover-Up That Failed." Time, November 3, 1975.
- Fisher, Bob. "The Why and Hows of JFK." American Cinematographer, February 1992.
- Fonzi, Gaeton. "Seduced by the Web-Weavers." Pennsylvania Gazette, November 1993.
- Fonzi, Gaeton. "Who Killed JFK?" Washingtonian, November 1980.
- Freese, Paul L. "The Warren Commission and the Fourth Shot: A Reflection on the Fundamentals of Forensic Fact-Finding." New York University Law Review, vol. 40, May 1965.
- Gage, Nicholas. "The Little Big Man Who Laughs at the Law." Atlantic, July 1970.
- Gates, David, with Howard Manly, Donna Foote, and Frank Washington. "Bottom Line: How Crazy Is It?" Newsweek, December 23, 1991.
- Gavin, James M. "We Can Get Out of Vietnam." Saturday Evening Post, February 24, 1968.
- Gelb, Leslie. "Would Defeat in Iraq Be So Bad?" Time, October 23, 2006.
- Gertz, Elmer. Review of "My Life as a Radical Lawyer." Real Crime Digest, August 30, 1993.
- Gertz, Elmer. "The 30th Anniversary of the Kennedy Assassination." Real Crime Book Digest, October–November 1995.
- Gest, Ted, and Joseph Shapiro with David Bowermaster and Thom Geier. "JFK: The Untold Story

- of the Warren Report.” U.S. News & World Report, August 17, 1992.
- Goldman, Peter, with John J. Lindsay. “Dallas: New Questions and Answers.” Newsweek, April 28, 1975.
- Goldman, Peter, with Elaine Shannon, Diane Camper, and Lee Donosky. “Rush to Judgment.” Newsweek, January 15, 1979.
- Golz, Earl. “Confidential: The FBI’s File on JFK.” Gallery, November 1982.
- Golz, Earl. “Confidential: The FBI’s File on JFK—Part Two.” Gallery, December 1982.
- “Good-bye Belli.” Newsweek, March 30, 1964.
- Goodhart, Arthur. “The Mysteries of the Kennedy Assassination and the English Press.” Law Quarterly Review, vol. 83, January 1967.
- Goodhart, Arthur. “The Warren Commission from the Procedural Standpoint.” New York University Law Review, vol. 40, May 1965.
- Goodman, Craig G. “History of the U.S. Petroleum Depletion Allowance, Part III.” Oil and Gas Quarterly, vol. 39, March 1991.
- Greenstein, Fred I. “Diffusion of News of the Kennedy Assassination.” Public Opinion Quarterly, Summer 1965.
- Groden, Robert. “A New Look at the Zapruder Film.” Rolling Stone, April 24, 1975.
- Grosvenor, Melville Bell. “The Last Full Measure.” National Geographic, March 9, 1964.
- “Growing Rift of LBJ and Kennedy.” U.S. News & World Report, January 2, 1967.
- Guinn, Vincent. “JFK Assassination: Bullet Analysis.” Analytical Chemistry, vol. 51, no. 4, April 1979.
- Hall, Kermit. “The Virulence of the National Appetite for Bogus Revelation.” Maryland Law Review, vol. 56, no. 1, 1997.
- Hansen, Mark. “Truth Sleuth or Faulty Detector.” American Bar Association Journal, May 1999.
- “Historic Photo Report.” U.S. News & World Report, December 9, 1963.
- Holland, Max. “The Demon in Jim Garrison.” Wilson Quarterly, Spring 2001.
- Holland, Max. “The JFK Lawyers’ Conspiracy.” Nation, February 20, 2006.
- Holland, Max. “The Key to the Warren Report.” American Heritage, vol. 46, no. 7, November 1995.
- Holmes, John Clellon. “The Silence of Oswald.” Playboy, November 1965.
- “In the Works: Tighter Laws on Gun Sales.” U.S. News & World Report, December 9, 1963.
- “Investigations.” Time, December 13, 1963.
- Isaacson, Walter. “If Kennedy Had Lived.” Time, April 13, 1992.
- “Jack Kennedy’s Other Women.” Time, December 29, 1975.

- Jackson, Donald. "The Evolution of an Assassin." Life, February 21, 1964.
- Janos, Leo. "The Last Days of the President: LBJ in Retirement." Atlantic, January 1973.
- "JFK: The Death and the Doubts." Newsweek, December 5, 1966.
- Johnson, Priscilla. "Oswald in Moscow." Harper's Magazine, April 1964.
- Kaiser, Robert Blair. "The Mystery Tramps in Disguise?" Rolling Stone, April 24, 1975.
- Kaplan, David A. "The JFK Probe—25 Years Later." National Law Journal, November 28, 1988.
- Katz, Bob. "Mark Lane, the Left's Leading Hearse Chaser." Mother Jones, August 1979.
- Kelley, Kitty. "The Dark Side of Camelot." People, February 29, 1988.
- Kempton, Murray. "Jack Ruby on Trial." New Republic, March 7, 1964.
- Kempton, Murray, and James Ridgeway. "Romans." New Republic, December 7, 1963.
- "Kiss of Death." Newsweek, October 7, 1963.
- Knebel, Fletcher. "J. Edgar Hoover, the Cop and the Man." Look, May 31, 1955.
- Knebel, Fletcher. "A New Wave of Doubt." Look, July 12, 1966.
- Kornbluh, Peter. "JFK & Castro: The Secret Quest for Accommodation." Cigar Aficionado, October 1999.
- Lacayo, Richard. "How Sick Was J.F.K.?" Time, December 2, 2002.
- Lattimer, J. K. "Additional Data on the Shooting of President Kennedy." Journal of the American Medical Association, vol. 269, no. 12, March 24, 1993.
- Lattimer, J. K., J. Lattimer, and G. Lattimer. "An Experimental Study of the Backward Movement of President Kennedy's Head." Surgery, Gynecology, and Obstetrics, February 1976.
- Lattimer, John K. "Observations Based on a Review of the Autopsy Photographs, X-rays and Related Materials of the Late President John F. Kennedy." Resident and Staff Physician, May 1972.
- Lattimer, John K., Angus Laidlaw, Paul Heneghan, and Eric J. Haubner. "Experimental Duplication of the Important Physical Evidence of the Lapel Bulge of the Jacket Worn by Governor Connally When Bullet 399 Went through Him." Journal of the American College of Surgeons, vol. 178, May 1994.
- Lattimer, John K., and Jon Lattimer. "The Kennedy-Connally Single Bullet Theory." International Surgery, vol. 50, no. 6, December 1968.
- Lattimer, John K., Edward B. Schlesinger, and H. Houston Merritt. "President Kennedy's Spine Hit by First Bullet." Bulletin of the New York Academy of Medicine, Second Series, vol. 53, no. 3, April 1977.
- Lemann, Nicholas. "The Case against Jim Garrison." GQ, January 1992.
- Levine, Jack. "Hoover and the Red Square." Nation, October 20, 1962.
- Levy, Michael L., Daniel Sullivan, Rodrick Faccio, and Robert Grossman. "A Neuroforensic Analysis of the Wounds of President John F. Kennedy: Part 2—A Study of the Available Evidence, Eyewitness Correlations, Analysis, and Conclusions.” Neurosurgery, vol. 54, no. 6, June 2004.

Lewis, Flora. “The Tragedy of Bertrand Russell.” Look, April 4, 1967.

Lundberg, George D. “Closing the Case in JAMA on the John F. Kennedy Autopsy.” Editorial. Journal of the American Medical Association, vol. 268, no. 13, October 7, 1992.

Macdonald, Dwight. “A Critique of the Warren Report.” Esquire, March 1965.

Magnusen, Ed, edited by Ronald Krise. “The Truth about Hoover.” Time, December 22, 1975.

Mailer, Norman. “The Amateur Hit Man.” New York Review of Books, May 11, 1995.

Mailer, Norman. “Oswald in the U.S.S.R.” New Yorker, April 10, 1995.

Manchester, William. “The Death of a President.” Look, January 24, 1967.

Manchester, William. “William Manchester’s Own Story.” Look, April 4, 1967.

Mandel, Paul. “End to Nagging Rumors: The Six Critical Seconds.” Life, December 6, 1963.

Marchetti, Victor. “CIA to Admit Hunt Involvement in Kennedy Slaying.” Spotlight, August 14, 1978.

“Marina’s Turn.” Time, September 21, 1992.

Martin, Harold H. “‘Help Us Fight!’ Cry the Angry Exiles.” Saturday Evening Post, June 8, 1963.

Martindale, David. “The Bizarre Deaths following JFK’s Murder.” Argosy, March 1977.

“A Matter of Reasonable Doubt.” Life, November 25, 1966.

McGill, Ralph Emerson. “Hate Knows No Direction.” Saturday Evening Post, December 14, 1963.

McKinley, James. “Cries of Conspiracy.” Part V of “Playboy’s History of Assassination in America.” Playboy, May 1976.

McKinley, James. “The End of Camelot.” Part IV of “Playboy’s History of Assassination in America.” Playboy, April 1976.

McNamara, Robert. “The Lessons of October.” Newsweek, February 13, 1989.

Morgenthau, Tom, with Elaine Shannon. “Tales of Conspiracy.” Newsweek, July 30, 1979.

Morley, Jefferson. “The Good Spy: How the Quashing of an Honest C.I.A. Investigator Helped Launch 40 Years of JFK Conspiracy Theories and Cynicism about the Feds.” Washington Monthly, December 2003.

Morrow, Lance, and Martha Smilgis. “Plunging into the Labyrinth.” Time, December 23, 1991.

Mosk, Richard M. “Conspiracy Theories and the JFK Assassination: Cashing in on Political Paranoia.” Los Angeles Lawyer, November 1992.

“Murder of Innocence.” Reporter, October 1992.

Nash, George, and Patricia Nash. “The Other Witnesses.” New Leader, October 12, 1964.

- Nichols, John. "President Kennedy's Adrenals." Journal of the American Medical Association, vol. 201, no. 2, July 10, 1967.
- Nichols, John. "The Wounding of Governor Connally of Texas." Maryland State Medical Journal, October 1977.
- Norton, Linda, James A. Cottone, Irvin M. Sopher, and Vincent J. M. DiMaio. "The Exhumation and Identification of Lee Harvey Oswald." Journal of Forensic Science, January 1984.
- "A Note from Jack Ruby." Newsweek, March 27, 1967.
- Oliver, Revilo P. "Marksmanship in Dallas." American Opinion, February 1964.
- Olson, Don, and Ralph F. Turner. "Photographic Evidence and the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy." Journal of Forensic Sciences, vol. 16, no. 4, October 1971.
- O'Toole, George, and Paul Hoch. "Dallas: The Cuban Connection." Saturday Evening Post, March 1976.
- "Pages from a Family Album." Look, November 17, 1964.
- Petty, Charles. "JFK—An Allonge." Journal of the American Medical Association, vol. 269, no. 12, March 24, 1993.
- Phelan, James. "Rush to Judgment in New Orleans." Saturday Evening Post, May 6, 1967.
- Phelan, James. "The Vice Man Cometh." Saturday Evening Post, June 8, 1963.
- Phillips, Kevin. "Fat City." Time, September 26, 1994.
- "Pike Committee Report." Village Voice, February 16 and 23, 1976.
- "Playboy Interview: Jesse Ventura." Playboy, November 1999.
- "Playboy Interview: Jim Garrison." Playboy, October 1967.
- "Playboy Interview: Mark Lane." Playboy, February 1967.
- Posner, Gerald. "Cracks in the Wall of Silence." Newsweek, October 12, 1998.
- Prouty, Fletcher. "President Kennedy Was Killed by a Murder, Inc." Executive Intelligence Review, February 7, 1992.
- Rahn, K. A., and L. M. Sturdivan. "Neutron Activation and the JFK Assassination, Part I, Data and Interpretation." Journal of Radioanalytical and Nuclear Chemistry, vol. 262, no. 1, October 2004.
- Randall, Teri. "Clinicians' Forensic Interpretations of Fatal Gunshot Wounds Often Miss the Mark." Journal of the American Medical Association, vol. 269, no. 16, April 28, 1993.
- Randich, Eric, Wayne Duerfeldt, Wade McLendon, and William Tobin. "A Metallurgical Review of the Interpretation of Bullet Lead Compositional Analysis." Forensic Science International, April 2002.
- Randich, Eric, and Patrick M. Grant. "Proper Assessment of the JFK Assassination Bullet Lead Evidence from Metallurgical and Statistical Perspective." Journal of Forensic Sciences, vol. 51, no. 4, July 2006.

- Raskin, Marcus. "JFK and the Culture of Violence." American Historical Review, April 1992.
- Reeves, Richard. "JFK: Secrets & Lies." Reader's Digest, April 2003.
- "The Right to Be Wrong." Newsweek, March 30, 1964.
- Rogers, Warren. "The Persecution of Clay Shaw." Look, August 26, 1969.
- Saunders, Charles J., and Mark S. Zaid. "The Declassification of Dealey Plaza: After Thirty Years, a New Disclosure Law at Last May Help to Clarify the Facts of the Kennedy Assassination." South Texas Law Review, vol. 34, October 1993.
- Schonfeld, Maurice W. "The Shadow of a Gunman." Columbia Journalism Review, July–August 1975.
- Schwartz, Sorrell L. Letter to editor. Time, February 16, 1981.
- "Seventy-five Year Secrecy for Exhibits in JFK Killing." U.S. News & World Report, January 4, 1965.
- Sidey, Hugh. "All the Way with JFK." Time, May 26, 2003.
- Sidey, Hugh. "When It Counted, He Never Faltered." Time, December 2, 2002.
- "$650,000 for Family of Man Killed by Oswald." U.S. News & World Report, November 2, 1964.
- Smith, Sandy. "Carlos Marcello, King Thug of Louisiana." Life, September 8, 1967.
- Smith, Sandy. "The Crime Cartel." Life, September 1, 1967.
- Smith, Wayne. "JAMA Knows Best: The Medical Journal Called the JFK Case Closed—and the Verdict Went Unchallenged." Columbia Journalism Review, September–October 1993.
- Solomon, Jolie. "True Disbelievers." Newsweek, November 22, 1993.
- "Sorrow Rings a World." Life, December 6, 1963.
- Sprague, Richard E. "The Assassination of President John F. Kennedy: The Application of Computers to the Photographic Evidence." Computers and Animation, vol. 19, May, June, and July 1970; vol. 20, March and May 1971.
- Stetler, Russell. "Can Congress Crack the Kennedy Assassination?" Inquiry, March 16, 1978.
- "Still Secret: The KGB's Oswald File." Newsweek, July 5, 1999.
- Stolley, Richard. "Shots Seen Round the World: A Journalist's Behind-the-Scenes Story of the Most Historic Home Movie Ever." Entertainment Weekly, January 17, 1992.
- Stolley, Richard. "What Happened Next..." Esquire, November 1973.
- Stone, Oliver. "Oliver Stone Talks Back." Premiere, January 1992.
- Stone, Oliver. "Was Vietnam JFK's War?" Newsweek, October 21, 1996.
- Sturdivan, Larry M., and K. A. Rahn. "Neutron Activation and the JFK Assassination, Part II, Extended Benefits." Journal of Radioanalytical and Nuclear Chemistry, vol. 262, no. 1, October 2004.
- Sullivan, Daniel, Rodrick Faccio, Michael L. Levy, and Robert Grossman. "The Assassination of

- President John F. Kennedy: A Neuroforensic Analysis—Part 1: A Neurosurgeon’s Previously Undocumented Eyewitness Account from Trauma Room 1.” Neurosurgery, vol. 53, no. 5, November 2003.
- Summers, Anthony. “Hidden Hoover.” Vanity Fair, March 1993.
- Summers, Anthony, and Robbyn Summers. “The Ghosts of November.” Vanity Fair, December 1994.
- Szulc, Tad. “Cuba on Our Mind.” Esquire, February 1974.
- Talbot, David. “Fatal Flaw.” Image, March 29, 1992.
- Thomas, D. B. “Echo Correlation Analysis and the Acoustic Evidence in the Kennedy Assassination Revisited.” Science & Justice, vol. 41, no. 1, 2001.
- Thomas, Evan. “At War over a Tragic Film.” Newsweek, January 17, 1992.
- Thomas, Evan. “Bobby at the Brink.” Newsweek, August 14, 2000.
- Thomas, Evan. “The Real Cover-Up.” Newsweek, November 22, 1993.
- Thompson, Thomas. “In Texas a Policeman and an Assassin Are Laid to Rest Too.” Life, December 6, 1963.
- Thomson, J. Anderson, Jr., Joy Boissevain, and Clare Aukofer. “Lee Harvey Oswald—Another Look.” Mind and Human Interaction, vol. 8, no. 2, Spring/Summer 1997.
- Thorburn, William. “Cases of Injury to the Cervical Region of the Spinal Cord.” Brain, a Journal of Neurology, vol. IX, 1887.
- “Three Patients at Parkland.” Texas State Journal of Medicine, vol. 60, January 1964.
- “To Help You Keep the Record Straight about That Book.” U.S. News & World Report, February 6, 1967.
- Trillin, Calvin. “The Buffs.” New Yorker, June 10, 1967.
- “The Truth about Hoover.” Time, December 22, 1975.
- “Truth about Kennedy Assassination.” U.S. News & World Report, October 10, 1966.
- Vanocur, Sander. “Kennedy’s Voyage of Discovery.” Harper’s Magazine, April 1964.
- Viorst, Milton. “The Mafia, the CIA, and the Kennedy Assassination.” Washingtonian, November 1975.
- “The Warren Commission Report.” Time, October 2, 1964.
- Wecht, Cyril. “The Medical Evidence in the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy.” Forensic Science Gazette, vol. 4, no. 4, September 1973.
- Wecht, Cyril, and Robert P. Smith. “The Medical Evidence in the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy.” Forensic Science, vol. 3, fig. 2, 1974.
- Welsh, David. “The Legacy of Penn Jones.” Ramparts, November 1966.
- West, Jessemyn. “Prelude to Tragedy: The Woman Who Sheltered Lee Oswald’s Family Tells Her - Story.” Redbook, July 1966.

- Whalen, Richard J. “The Kennedy Assassination.” Saturday Evening Post, January 14, 1967.
- “What Does Oliver Stone Owe History?” Newsweek, December 23, 1991.
- Wheeler, Keith. “Cursed Gun—The Track of C2766.” Life, August 27, 1965.
- “Who Killed JFK? Just One Assassin.” Time, November 24, 1975.
- “Who Knew about ‘Bugging’ ...RFK’s Story—and the FBI’s.” U.S. News & World Report, December 26, 1966.
- Will, George F. “Eleven Men and Sic ’Em.” Newsweek, November 7, 2005.
- Wilson, Richard. “What Happened to the Kennedy Program?” Look, November 17, 1964.
- Wrone, David R. “Review of Gerald Posner, Case Closed.” Journal of Southern History, vol. 6, February 1995.
- Zoglin, Richard. “What If Oswald Stood Trial?” Time, December 1, 1986.

GOVERNMENT REPORTS

- Alleged Assassination Plots Involving Foreign Leaders, An Interim Report of the Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities, United States Senate, Together with Additional, Supplemental, and Separate Views.* 94th Congress, 1st session, Senate Report No. 94-465. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1975. (Alleged Assassination Plots)
- Covert Action in Chile 1963–73.* Church Committee Staff Report. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1975.
- Drugs, Law Enforcement and Foreign Policy: A Report Prepared by the Subcommittee on Terrorism, Narcotics and International Operations of the Committee on Foreign Relations.* 100th Congress, 2d session, Senate. December 1988. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1989.
- Final Report of the Assassination Records Review Board.* Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1998. (Final Report of the ARRB)
- Final Report of the Select Committee on Assassinations, U.S. House of Representatives, Ninety-fifth Congress, Second Session, Summary of Findings and Recommendations.* House Report 95-1828. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1979. (HSCA Report)
- Foreign Relations of the United States, 1961–1963.* Vol. 2: Vietnam, 1962. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1990.
- Foreign Relations of the United States, 1961–1963.* Vol. 4: Vietnam, August–December 1963. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1991.
- Foreign Relations of the United States, 1961–1963.* Vol. 11: Cuban Missile Crisis and Aftermath. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1996.

Forensic Analysis: Weighing Bullet Lead Evidence. Committee on Scientific Assessment of Bullet Lead Elemental Composition Comparison, Board on Chemical Sciences and Technology, National Research Council. Washington, D.C.: National Academies Press, 2004.

Hearings before the Legislative and National Security Subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations, House of Representatives. 103rd Congress, 1st session, November 17, 1993. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1994. (Conyers Committee Hearing)

Hearings before the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, on FBI Oversight. 94th Congress, 1st and 2nd sessions, 1973–1974. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1976. (FBI Oversight)

The Investigation of the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy: Performance of the Intelligence Agencies. Book V. Final Report of the Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities. 94th Congress, 2nd session, Senate Report No. 94-755. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1976. (Church Committee Report)

“1968 Panel Review of Photographs, X-Ray Films, Documents, and Other Evidence Pertaining to the Fatal Wounding of President John F. Kennedy on November 22, 1963, in Dallas, Texas.” (Clark Panel Report)

Report of the Committee on Ballistic Acoustics. Commission on Physical Sciences, Mathematics, and Resources, National Research Council. Washington, D.C.: National Academies Press, 1982. (CBA Report)

Report of the President’s Commission on the Assassination of President Kennedy. Warren Commission. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1964. (Warren Report)

Report to Accompany S. 3006, The President John F. Kennedy Assassination Records Collection Act of 1992. 102nd Congress, 2nd session, Senate Report No. 102-328. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1992. (1992 Senate Report)

Report to the President by the Commission on CIA Activities within the United States. New York: Manor Books, June 1975. (Rockefeller Commission Report)

“Review Requested by the Department of Justice of the Acoustical Reports Published by the House Select Committee on Assassinations.” Technical Services Division, Federal Bureau of Investigation, November 19, 1980. (TSD Report)

Sklar, Barry. U.S. Cuban Relations, 1959–1964: An Analysis. Washington, D.C.: Library of Congress, Congressional Research Service, 1978.

Supplementary Detailed Staff Reports on Intelligence Activities and the Rights of Americans. Book III. Final Report of the Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities. 94th Congress, 2nd session, Senate Report No. 94-755. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1976. (Supplementary Detailed Staff Reports)

Texas Supplemental Report on the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy and the Serious Wounding of Governor John B. Connally, November 22, 1963 [by Attorney General Waggoner Carr]. Austin, Texas: Attorney General’s Office, 1964. (Texas Supplemental Report)

* As is well known, John Fitzgerald Kennedy, the second of nine children of Joseph and Rose Kennedy, was born into great wealth, and the family's domiciles reflected it. The Kennedys summered at their six-acre compound containing three homes in Hyannis Port, Massachusetts, on Cape Cod off the waters of Nantucket Sound, and vacationed in the winter at their Palm Beach, Florida, mansion off the Atlantic Ocean. Even the clan's main sports reflected plutocracy—tennis, boating, swimming, and, oh yes, touch football.

†PT boats were known to be “dangerous beyond the call of duty” (Blair and Blair, Search for JFK, p.158).

* People spoke of JFK's "irresistible charm," it was well known that he was not vindictive toward his political opponents, and unlike his brother Bobby, he had few, if any, bitter enemies. Except for segregationists, the militant right, and some in big business, from what I have read people liked John F. Kennedy. As Look magazine observed, "Even his political opponents liked and respected him" (Attwood, "In Memory of John F. Kennedy," p.12).

* Officially called the Report of the President's Commission on the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy.

‡ Contrary to popular belief, the Warren Commission didn't quite say there was no conspiracy in the assassination. The commissioners wrote, "The Commission has found no evidence that either Lee Harvey Oswald or Jack Ruby was part of any conspiracy, domestic or foreign, to assassinate President Kennedy...Because of the difficulty of proving negatives to a certainty the possibility of others being involved with either Oswald or Ruby cannot be rejected categorically, but if there is any such evidence it has been beyond the reach of all the investigative agencies and resources of the United States and has not come to the attention of this Commission" (WR, pp.21–22).

Note: Throughout this book emphasis by italics in quotations has been added by the author unless otherwise indicated.

* Even the court reporter was a real one, from the federal Eastern District of Virginia. Eagerly anticipating the trial, Judge Bunton told the media, “If Oswald had been tried, any judge would have wanted to do it. It’s going to be just as true to life as they can get it—with the real witnesses and a real jury flown in from Dallas. It’s going to record a lot of what would have developed if, in fact, Lee Harvey Oswald had come to trial.” Bunton explained that the trial would take some liberties with history. “It will be tried in federal court as opposed to state court. At the time that President Kennedy was killed, it was not a federal offense to kill the president. Since that time the law has been changed.” (United Press International, July 17, 1986) The case was tried under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

* - It is an anomaly that Earl Warren, someone who one would think would be viewed like Caesar's wife among all sensible people, would be attacked and his integrity impugned by those from all areas of the political spectrum, even by many on the political left, who heretofore had sung his praises for the progressive direction he had taken the court in the area of civil rights. Apparently the Kennedy assassination trumped everything.

* - And naturally, this motivation to uncover a conspiracy, if there was one, applies equally well to the media. As CBS television news anchor Dan Rather has said, “If I could prove Oswald didn’t do it or Oswald didn’t act alone, it would be the greatest accomplishment of my career” (USA Today, February 4, 1992).

* “In their exploitation of a national tragedy, [the conspiracy theorists] have impugned the character and motives of hundreds of reluctant participants in that disaster. By plain inference they have indicted scores of public servants, from the lowliest cop on the beat in Dallas to the Chief Justice of the United States, for malfeasance bordering on treason” (Roberts, Truth about the Assassination, p.120).

* Just as the U.S. government, if it had prosecuted Oswald in real life, would not have charged him with conspiring with anyone to kill Kennedy (since the government did not believe he did), the jury in London only dealt with the issue of whether Oswald was guilty or not guilty of murdering Kennedy. However, the issue of conspiracy unavoidably permeated the entire trial. (See later discussion.)

* - A condensed version of the trial was shown in England and several major European countries as well as Australia, and also to a very large national audience on Showtime here in the states on November 21 and 22, 1986.

* Throughout this book I will be referring to Oswald as Kennedy's killer, and conspiracy theorists, as well as legal purists, have maintained for years that the only proper way to refer to Oswald is "alleged assassin," on the rationale that under our system of justice in America, a suspect or defendant is presumed to be innocent until a jury finds him guilty in a court of law. But this invests a power and legitimacy to a verdict of guilty or not guilty that it does not have. A verdict of not guilty, for instance, cannot change the reality of whether or not the defendant committed the crime. That reality was established the moment of the crime, and nothing that happened thereafter can ever change it. If a courtroom verdict could, then if the defendant actually robbed a bank, but the three witnesses who saw him do it were unavailable to testify against him at the trial (e.g., the defendant's associates had either killed them or threatened them into not testifying), his subsequent not-guilty verdict means he didn't really rob the bank. In other words, the jury verdict succeeded in doing something that God can't even do—change the past. Likewise, if someone did not rob a bank, but in a case of mistaken identity he was found guilty, the new reality is that he actually did rob the bank. To those who have challenged my calling Oswald guilty throughout the years by saying he was never found to be guilty in a court of law, I've responded that "under that theory, Adolf Hitler never committed any crimes, Jack the Ripper never committed any crimes, and the only crime Al Capone ever committed was income tax evasion."

* For example, prominent conspiracy theorist Anthony Summers says, “No professional marksman was able to achieve [what Oswald did] in subsequent tests” (Summers and Summers, “Ghosts of November,” p.98); see also Henry Hurt’s book, Reasonable Doubt, page 8: “The United States government...has never conducted a test in which Oswald’s shooting ability has been matched. The country’s top experts can work the ancient Mannlicher-Carcano rifle bolt with sufficient speed. Those experts can hit a similarly moving target. But no official expert has ever been able to do both at the same time. That feat belongs to Oswald alone—a man of questionable shooting skills.”

‡ Even on May 6, 1959, when Oswald was about to leave the Marine Corps, and hence, wouldn't have had any incentive to fire well, he fired a 191, qualifying him as a "marksman" with the M-1 rifle.

* However, once evidence made the hypothesis of guilt unavoidable, just as unavoidable was the unconscious partiality toward any piece of evidence, or interpretation of evidence, that supported the hypothesis. This was the one weakness of the Warren Commission, but short of a surgical operation on human nature, I know of no way to avoid such a problem. Fortunately, because the evidence of Oswald's guilt was so complete and overwhelming, and there simply was no evidence that he acted in concert with others, this weakness of the Warren Commission, which is inherent in any and all investigative bodies, had no negative impact on the Commission's findings. Only if there were substantive evidence of Oswald's innocence or substantive evidence of his complicity with others in the assassination, one or both of which the Commission ignored or did not examine objectively, would there be cause to question seriously the validity of the Commission's conclusions.

* Whenever I hear someone say the Warren Commission investigation was superficial, I immediately know that the person has never read or worked with the twenty-seven volumes of the Commission, and is just parroting hearsay from some other person who also hasn't read or worked with them. One of the deficiencies of the Warren Report and its supporting volumes is that although there are two separate name indexes, there is no subject index. In 1966, Sylvia Meagher eliminated that problem with her Subject Index to the Warren Report and Hearings and Exhibits, an absolutely invaluable reference work for anyone studying the assassination. In 1980, in collaboration with Gary Owens, she published her Master Index to the J.F.K. Assassination Investigations, which is a name and subject index to the Warren Report and volumes as well as the HSCA Report and volumes.

‡Ninety-four witnesses gave testimony before members of the Warren Commission. An additional 395 were questioned under oath by members of the Commission's legal staff, 61 gave affidavits, and 2 gave statements. (WR, p.xiii) As Time magazine said, "That is surely not a record of investigators refusing to listen to witnesses who might disturb their eventual conclusion" ("Who Killed J.F.K.? Just One Assassin," p.32). Nearly all of the ninety-four witnesses gave their testimony at the closely guarded headquarters of the Commission in Washington's Veterans of Foreign Wars Building. Some of the additional 395 were also flown in to give their depositions before Warren Commission assistant counsels, although most depositions of witnesses were taken outside Washington, D.C. (See Warren Commission volumes 1–15; Telephone interview of Richard Mosk by the author on September 8, 2005; closely guarded: "Warren Commission Report," Time, p.48)

‡ And the case will continue to be investigated and examined and analyzed for years and years to come. Indeed, in testimony before the Warren Commission, Richard Helms, the CIA's head of covert operations, said, "I assume the case will never be closed" (5 H 124). And FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover told the Commission, "So far as the FBI is concerned, the case will be continued in an open classification for all time" (5 H 100).

* Obviously, it is those most familiar with the facts of the case who have the most problems with Posner's scholarship. G. Robert Blakey, the chief counsel for the HSCA, wrote, "Like [Mark] Lane, Posner often distorts the evidence by selective citation and by striking omissions. Although Posner is not as disdainful of the truth as Lane, his book is a mirror image of Lane's 'Rush to Judgment'" (Washington Post, National Weekly Edition, November 15–21, 1993, p.23).

* I was asked by Chicago lawyer Michael Stiegel, representing the litigation section of the American Bar Association (ABA), to prosecute the case, but declined, because unlike the docu-trial in London, none of the actual Warren Commission witnesses testified. The witnesses were actors and employees of Failure Analysis. Further, the length of the trial was only five hours, not nearly enough time to get into the case. Prominent American trial lawyers represented each side of the case, including John W. Kecker for the prosecution and David Boies for the defense. The August 10, 1992, ABA trial resulted in a hung jury, seven for conviction, five for acquittal. The only other serious mock (an oxymoron?) trial of Oswald I know of in addition to the London and ABA trials was on April 1, 1967, at Yale Law School. The six-hour trial used Yale law students as lawyers and witnesses, though medical testimony was given by some doctors. The jury of educators, theologians, executives, and housewives couldn't reach a verdict, and deadlocked at six for conviction, six for acquittal. (New York Times, April 2, 1967, pp.1, 37)

* There's even, since 1985, a "Jesus Seminar" of seventy-five prominent New Testament scholars with advanced theological degrees who analyze, write about, debate, and eventually cast their vote for one of four levels of authenticity (ranging from "Jesus definitely said or did it," to "Jesus didn't say or do it") that each feels a particular Gospel passage has.

* Just two examples among many of the high esteem with which Weisberg is held in the conspiracy community: The aforementioned Robert Groden, the author of several conspiracy books, said before Weisberg's death that "there is no man living today who knows more about the work of the Warren Commission and the FBI on the assassination, or whose writings on the case have so successfully withstood all challenges to their accuracy, than Harold Weisberg" (1996 reply brief by Groden in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, p.11, Robert Groden v. Random House, The New York Times, and Gerald Posner, Docket 94-9100). Walt Brown, one of today's leading conspiracy theorists, has written books on the assassination and publishes the foremost monthly magazine for conspiracy devotees, JFK/Deep Politics Quarterly. Speaking of Weisberg's death on February 21, 2002, Brown wrote that Weisberg was the "dean" of all Warren Commission critics and his "mentor." He added that "everyone who ever had even a passing interest in the concept of conspiracy owes a massive debt of gratitude to Harold...He was a living history of the documentation of the most significant event of the 20th Century." (JFK/Deep Politics Quarterly, April 2002, pp. 18, 21)

Weisberg's power and reach in the conspiracy community were such that fellow Warren Commission critic and conspiracy theorist Harrison E. Livingstone, himself a prolific and noteworthy writer in the conspiracy genre, but one who resented Weisberg's fame and adulation, said that for years and years, "if he [Weisberg] damned something, it was lost. If he praised something, which was rare, then it or the person became an object of worship" (Livingstone, Radical Right and the Murder of John F. Kennedy, p.505).

* Indeed, if this book (including endnotes) had been printed in an average-size font and with pages of normal length and width, at 1,535,791 words, and with a typical book length of 400 pages, and 300 words per page, this work would translate into around thirteen volumes.

* - At some point, of course, my writing on this case had to come to an end. Since the production and lead time for this outsized book was several months, and advance copies were scheduled to be sent out to reviewers on March 1, 2007, that point was in early November of 2006, when the book was in final galley form and my editor informed me that no further writing by me about new allegations being made in the case would be possible, only corrections to the galleys, or a very short insert here or there for clarification or other necessary purposes. So I was unable to respond to any book or other publication on this case that was published after early November of 2006.

‡ One character, for example, and there are many others, is so interesting that when Warren Commission counsel called him to testify about his relationship to Oswald, counsel became so captivated by the man and his story that counsel just listened to him, even telling the witness at one point, when the witness, on his own, started talking about Oswald, “I want to get to that,” but “first” he wanted to hear more of the man’s background—that part of the witness’s testimony consuming over twenty pages of small print in a Commission volume.

* - It was not the most expensive and plush suite in the hotel. That was the Will Rogers Suite on the thirteenth floor, normally going for $100 a night, but rejected by the Secret Service because there was more than one access to it. So LBJ and Lady Bird stayed in that suite. (Gun, Red Roses from Texas, p.24)

‡Twenty-eight Secret Service agents accompanied the president on his trip to Texas (HSCA Report, p.228).

* The Texas School Book Depository Company had two buildings: an administrative office and storage area at 411 Elm Street (at Houston), and a warehouse four blocks north at 1917 North Houston (between Munger and McKinney). Parking lot 1, designated for “employees and publishers,” was located across the street from the warehouse (Frazier parked there). Parking lots 2 (“company officials and customers”) and 3 (“publishers and managers”) were located on the west side of the Depository Building.

* Presidential historian Robert Dallek, the first scholar to examine Kennedy's medical records on file at the Kennedy presidential library in Boston, reported in 2002 that Kennedy had nine previously undisclosed hospital stays between 1955 and 1957 and took a substantial amount of medication during his presidency on a daily basis. Included on the list were painkillers for his back, steroids for his Addison's disease, antispasmodics for his colitis, antibiotics for urinary-tract infections, antihistamines for allergies, and, on at least one occasion, an antipsychotic for a severe mood change that Mrs. Kennedy believed was brought on by the antihistamines. According to Dallek, three doctors were treating Kennedy, including the famous "Dr. Feelgood," Max Jacobson, who was giving him amphetamine shots during his first summit with Soviet premier Nikita Khrushchev. Although Dallek suggested that Kennedy and his advisers had recklessly deceived the public by not telling voters in 1960 just how sick he really was, Ted Sorenson, one of Kennedy's closest advisers, and reporter Hugh Sidey, who followed Kennedy from 1957 to 1963, denied that the president's medication kept him from performing his duties. Both reported that the president never faltered during the grueling 1960 presidential campaign, one that left them, and everyone else, absolutely exhausted. Sidey wrote that the newly released medical records were indisputable, "but they don't give the whole picture and do leave the impression that Kennedy was little more than a chemical shell ready to self-destruct. I have my doubts. John Kennedy was a strong, determined President partly handicapped by a weakened body. But he was never an invalid." In 1970, long before Dallek's revelations, Kennedy's two closest assistants, Kenneth P. O'Donnell and David F. Powers, wrote of Kennedy's "tireless energy and stamina which wore out everybody following him on an average eight-hour day of campaigning." (Lawrence K. Altman and Todd S. Purdom, "In J.F.K. File, Hidden Illness, Pain and Pills," New York Times, November 17, 2002, pp.1, 28; see also Dallek, Unfinished Life, pp. 213, 262, 398-399, 471; Lacayo, "How Sick Was J.F.K.?" pp.46-47; Sidey, "When It Counted, He Never Faltered," pp.46-47; Peggy Noonan, "Camelot on Painkillers," Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2002, p.A12; O'Donnell and Powers with McCarthy, Johnny, We Hardly Knew Ye, p.116)

*- The Dallas Morning News, Texas's largest circulation daily at the time, with a readership of over a quarter of a million, was no friend of JFK's, its editorials consistently being anti-Kennedy because of the right-wing inclination of its publisher, E. M. "Ted" Dealey. Indeed, in a White House meeting in the autumn of 1961 between Kennedy and a contingent of Texas media leaders, Dealey bluntly told JFK, "You and your administration are weak sisters," adding that the country needed "a man on horseback to lead the nation, and many people in Texas and the Southwest think that you are riding Caroline's tricycle." (Aynesworth with Michaud, JFK: Breaking the News, pp.6-7)

*- Ultimately, 447 Dallas police officers were used on specific assignments associated with the president's visit, 178 of them assigned to the motorcade route. The biggest assignment (one would think inappropriately from a priority standpoint) was to the Trade Mart, where 63 were assigned to work the parking area outside and 150 under the command of a deputy chief were to provide security inside. (King Exhibit No. 5, 20 H 464)

* - In the spring of 1964, Robert Kennedy stated, “There was no plan to dump Lyndon Johnson. It didn’t make any sense... And there was never any discussion about dropping him.” The president himself told a close confidant in October 1963 that the idea of dumping Johnson was “preposterous on the face of it. We’ve got to carry Texas in ’64, and maybe Georgia.” (Schlesinger, Robert Kennedy and His Times, p.605)

* Kilduff was the acting press secretary in the absence of Pierre Salinger, who was en route to Hawaii at the time of the assassination.

* The president's exaggeration was not great. Jacqueline Kennedy, traveling abroad to thirteen countries, alone or with the president, and speaking fluent French, Spanish, and Italian as she went, "soon carved for herself a niche of fame" independent of JFK. Described by many as beautiful, cultured, and imperious, "she drew crowds by the thousands and became a good-will ambassador for America on her own." (Associated Press, November 26, 1963)

‡ Kennedy had unquestionably become an effective politician, but unlike most in his chosen profession, he wasn't inordinately ambitious, was famous for never taking himself too seriously, and once said that he only started in politics "because Joe died. [Joseph P. Kennedy Jr., JFK's older brother, was the one of the four sons of Joe Sr. who was being groomed for high political office; he and his copilot died during the Second World War when their plane, laden with explosives to be dropped on a German bomb-launching base in France, exploded in midair over the English Channel on August 12, 1944.] If something happened to me tomorrow, my brother Bobby would run for my seat in the Senate. And if Bobby died, Teddy would take over for him." (New York Times, November 23, 1963, p.13)

* - The president received a long, standing ovation when he referred to the controversial TFX jet fighter, built at the General Dynamics plant in Fort Worth, as a powerful force for freedom (Dallas Morning News, November 23, 1963, p.11).

‡For years prior to its occupancy by the Texas School Book Depository Company, when it became known as the Texas School Book Depository Building after its principal occupant, the building was known as the Sexton Building, and many old-timers continued to call it that for years thereafter.

* The $8.6 million Boeing 707 jet, tail number SAM26000, was delivered to the air force on October 10, 1962. Though not the first Air Force One, it is the first jet aircraft designed specifically for presidents, JFK being the first one to make extensive use of a jet for presidential travel. (James Sawa, "JFK Air Force One: Conspiracy or Not," self-published, 2004) When JFK first saw the new Air Force One, he exclaimed, "It's magnificent! I'll take it." President Gerald Ford would later say, "When they fly you on Air Force One, you know you're the president." (TerHorst and Albertazzie, Flying White House, p.13)

* Variations in transcripts of both channels 1 (regular) and 2 (presidential motorcade) of the Dallas police radio transmissions are common. In 1982, the National Academy of Science's Committee on Ballistic Acoustics (NAS-CBA) created a new recording of the channel 2 radio traffic at the time of the assassination directly from the original Gray Audograph disk. This recording proved to be the best to date, avoiding many of the skips and repeats inherent in previous recordings. Throughout this book, the most complete versions of channel 1 and 2 radio traffic conversations, primarily from the recordings themselves, are utilized.

* The Depository had previously been occupied by a wholesale grocery company engaged in supplying restaurants and institutions, and during the time it occupied the building, the floors became oil-soaked and this oil was damaging the books that were now being stacked on the floor (CD 205, p.135).

* Jackie would later recall that three times on the Texas trip “we were greeted with bouquets of the yellow roses of Texas. Only in Dallas they gave me red roses. I remember thinking: How funny—red roses for me” (Gun, Red Roses from Texas, unnumbered p.5).

‡The president's personal style causes the Secret Service deep concern. Not only does he travel more frequently than any previous president, but he relishes contact with crowds of well-wishers. The problem is compounded by the fact that Kennedy is not receptive to many of the measures designed to protect him, treating the danger of assault philosophically. (HSCA Report, p.228)

* According to U.S. Census records, the population of the city of Dallas was 679,684 in 1960. In 1970, it had increased to 844,401.

* Dealey Plaza is a three-acre, well-manicured patch of land with concrete pergolas and peristyles, reflecting pools, and some office buildings. It is called “The Front Door of Dallas” and was named in 1935 after George Bannerman Dealey, a Dallas civic leader and the founder of the city’s main paper, the Dallas Morning News. The plaza is in the form of a triangle, with three main thoroughfares, Main Street in the middle having east and westbound lanes, and flanked by Elm to the north having only westbound lanes, and Commerce to the south with only eastbound lanes. The three arteries converge at a triple underpass built in 1936 beneath the Union Terminal Railroad overpass at the southwestern tip of the plaza. (CE 877,17 H 897–898) The site of the Texas School Book Depository Building at the northwest corner of Houston and Elm in the plaza was originally owned by John Neely Bryan, the founder of Dallas.

* - There is no evidence that the two Secret Service agents in the president's limousine, Greer and Kellerman, were as alert as Youngblood and directed the president to get down.

* Kellerman is the only one in the car who heard this remark. In 1964 he testified that he spoke often with the president during the three years he served him, and would not have mistaken the president's Boston accent (2 H 75). But it's unlikely the president could have spoken after the bullet penetrated his throat.

* Back at Love Field, where Air Force One pilot Colonel James B. Swindal is listening to the radio chatter of the Secret Service agents in the motorcade (the plane's communication center was linked with the White House Communications Agency's temporary signal board in the Sheraton Dallas Hotel, which in turn was linked to the Secret Service radio frequency), he hears two loud shouts over the radio frequency around 12:30 that he recognizes as the voice of Roy Kellerman. Then he hears a third sharp cry from Kellerman: "Dagger cover Volunteer," the code names, respectively, for Rufus Youngblood, the chief Secret Service agent in LBJ's limousine, and Vice President Johnson. But the radio immediately becomes a "babel of screeching voices. Then it fell silent." (TerHorst and Albertazzie, Flying White House, pp.199, 210–211)

* Mrs. Kennedy would later have no recollection of crawling on the trunk of the car. Looking at still frames from the Zapruder film while working with author William Manchester, she said they brought nothing back to her. It was as though she were looking at photographs of another woman. (Manchester, Death of a President, p.161 footnote)

* Parkland Memorial Hospital, a ten-story county hospital about four miles from Dealey Plaza, was the largest and best hospital in Dallas County, a distinction it holds to this very day. Taking its name from the wooded parkland it sat on, the hospital opened on May 19, 1894. The present Parkland Hospital, on a new site, was dedicated on October 3, 1954.

* Later estimates of the speed vary. Two of the motorcycle escorts gave estimates of the speed on Stemmons Freeway ranging from 80 to 90 mph (Savage, JFK First Day Evidence, p.364; Sneed, No More Silence, pp.129, 156). Dallas police radio recordings (NAS-CBA DPD tapes, C2, 12:34 p.m.) indicate approximately four minutes were required to cover the four-mile ride to Parkland, which computes to an average speed of 60 mph over the entire route, which accounts for the slowing down of the limousine once it got off the Stemmons Freeway onto Industrial and then Harry Hines Boulevard.

‡ Not all pass the Trade Mart. The first press bus in the motorcade, unaware the president has been shot, proceeds to the Trade Mart, where the bus passengers soon learn he's been shot and is at Parkland Hospital (Semple, Four Days in November, pp.591–592).

* Jackson redeemed himself two days later when he took a Pulitzer Prize–winning photograph of the murder of Lee Harvey Oswald by nightclub owner Jack Ruby.

* Harkness testified that Euins told him, “It was under the ledge,” which referred to the sixth floor (6 H313). Photographs of the building show a decorative ledge separating the sixth and seventh floors. Harkness further testified that “it was my error in a hasty count of the floors” (6 H 313) that led to his broadcast reference to the “fifth floor.” Harkness’s error is understandable in light of the fact that in 1963 the Depository’s first-floor windows were covered with decorative masonry. Persons unfamiliar with the building could easily mistake the second floor for the first, third for the second, and so on—making the sixth floor appear as if it were the fifth floor. This is apparently what Harkness did during these initial confusing moments.

* Later that afternoon, Euins told the Dallas County Sheriff's Department in a sworn and signed statement that the shooter "was a white man" (CE 367, 16 H 963).

‡The gesture, witnessed by a spectator, became the basis for an early report that Johnson had been wounded or suffered a heart attack (Associated Press wire copy, November 22, 1963, 1:18 p.m.; Manchester, Death of a President, p.169).

* There was one red rose from the bouquet that did not make it into the hospital. Stavis Ellis, one of the Dallas police cyclists who had led the close-tailing presidential limousine to Parkland is among the large crowd of people who have swarmed around the emergency area in back of the hospital. After President Kennedy's body and Connally have been removed from the limousine he can't resist the temptation to look inside the car. He sees several puddles of blood on the rear seat and floorboard. Right in the middle of one of the puddles lay a beautiful red rose. Years later he would recall, "I never forgot that. I can still see it, that red rose in that blood." (Sneed, No More Silence, p.147)

* Inside the emergency area at Parkland were four emergency rooms, Trauma Rooms One, Two, Three, and Four. They were located on what was called the ground floor, not the first floor, at Parkland Hospital. Kennedy was immediately taken to Trauma Room One. (3 H 358–359, WCT Dr. Charles James Carrico) Above the ground floor were floors one through ten. The operating rooms were on the second floor. Though Governor Connally, who was taken to Trauma Room Two, was eventually brought up to an operating room on the second floor, Kennedy never left Trauma Room One. The entire emergency area at Parkland has since been reconstructed, and the Trauma Room One that Kennedy was brought into is no longer in existence. (Telephone interview of representative of Parkland's Corporate Communication section by author on January 21, 2004)

‡ Photographs show this second-floor window to be closed at the time of the shooting. Brewer no doubt meant the sixth-floor sniper's nest window, which would have been at the southeast corner, second floor down from the roof.

* - At the time, CBS did not have the capability of putting a commentator on camera immediately. “It took nearly twenty minutes to set up the cameras so Cronkite’s voice could be joined by his face, and because of that experience, CBS would later install a ‘flash studio’ to enable visual, as well as audio, bulletins to be transmitted immediately.” (Gates, Air Time, p.3)

* After eliciting from Carrico and other Parkland doctors that the president was wearing a back brace, nowhere did Warren Commission counsel go on to ask the doctors just what they did with the famous brace, although one could assume they would have removed it at some point. One doctor testified he saw it “lying loose” (6 H 66, WCT Dr. Gene Coleman Akin), though another said he “pushed up the brace” to feel the president’s femoral pulse (3 H 368, WCT Dr. Malcolm O. Perry), suggesting it wasn’t removed. In less-than-clear testimony, Secret Service agent William Greer suggested that the brace was among the items of the president’s belongings he was given in two shopping bags by a Parkland nurse when the body was ready for removal (2 H 125), but this wouldn’t tell us when, if at all, it was removed by the Parkland doctors during their effort to save his life. Almost thirty years later, Dr. Marion T. “Pepper” Jenkins, one of the Parkland doctors, said the president “must have had really severe back pain judging by the size of the back brace we cut off. [Again, not when, though the natural assumption would be at the beginning of the effort to save the president. But Dr. Paul Peters, who arrived at least five minutes after the president entered Trauma Room One, said the brace was still on, and he only refers to his removing “an elastic bandage wrapped around his pelvis,” but says nothing about removing the back brace (6 H 70).] He was tightly laced into this brace with wide Ace bandages making figure-of-eight loops around his trunk and thighs” (Breo, “JFK’s Death, Part II,” p.2805). A Parkland doctor described it as a “corset-type” brace with “stays...and buckles” (3 H 359, WCT Dr. Charles James Carrico).

Dr. John Lattimer, who studied the assassination for years, researched the entire brace issue and concluded it may have been responsible for Kennedy’s death. He writes that Kennedy had “bound himself firmly in a rather wide corset, with metal stays and a stiff plastic pad over the sacral area, which was tightly laced to his body. The corset was then bound even more firmly to his torso and hips by a six-inch-wide knitted elastic bandage, which he had wrapped in a figure eight between his legs and around his waist, over large thick pads, to encase himself tightly...He apparently adopted this type of tight binding as a consequence of the painful loosening of his joints around the sacroiliac area, probably a result of his long-continued cortisone therapy.” The result? When he and Connally were hit by the same bullet, the “corset prevented him from crumpling down out of the line of fire, as Governor Connally did. Because the president remained upright, with his head exposed, Oswald was able to draw a careful bead on the back of his head.” (Lattimer, Kennedy and Lincoln, p.171; Lattimer, “Additional Data on the Shooting of President Kennedy,” p.1546)

Since the first bullet that struck Kennedy passed through soft tissue and did not penetrate any organ of the body, it was the opinion of Dr. Perry, Kennedy’s chief attending surgeon, that “barring the advent of complications, this wound was tolerable, and I think he would have survived it” (3 H 372). Writer James Reston Jr. captioned his article on this issue, “That ‘Damned Girdle’: The Hidden Factor That Might Have Killed Kennedy” (Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2004, p.B9). If this is true, the Japanese destroyer that sunk Kennedy’s PT boat in World War II and killed two of his crewmates, only injuring Kennedy’s already fragile back when he was hurled backwards onto the deck (Leaming, Jack Kennedy, p.139; O’Donnell and Powers with McCarthy, Johnny, We Hardly Knew Ye, p.48), finally claimed Kennedy as its third victim twenty years later.

If there is no certainty as to the role the president’s back brace played in his death, there is something closer to certainty that caused his death and which he himself was responsible for. As indicated earlier, President Kennedy did not want Secret Service agents riding on the steps attached to the right and left rear bumper of the presidential limousine. Gerald A. Behn, special agent in charge of the White House Secret Service detail, said that shortly after assuming his job in late 1961, President Kennedy had told him this. No fewer than five Secret Service agents gave statements to the Warren Commission that it was common knowledge among the White House detail that this was Kennedy's desire, which he reiterated twice in the summer of 1963, once in Rome on July 2, 1963, the other time in Tampa, Florida, just four days before the assassination. Kennedy's desire was not etched in stone, and since the Secret Service has the right to do whatever is necessary to protect the president, in Tampa, on November 18, Special Agent Donald Lawton was standing on the right rear step, Special Agent Charles Zboril on the left rear. Kennedy told Special Agent Floyd Boring, who was seated in the right front seat of the limousine, to have the two agents return to the follow-up car. When the limousine slowed through downtown Tampa about three minutes later, the two agents dismounted. (CE 1025, 18 H 805–809; "Kennedy Barred Car-Step Guards," New York Times, November 24, 1964, pp.1, 33)

The likelihood is high that if Kennedy had not been opposed to Secret Service agents riding on the back of his car—the agent standing on the right rear step would have blocked Oswald's sight on Kennedy's head.

* Per the Warren Report, “As the President’s limousine sped toward the hospital, 12 doctors rushed to the emergency area.” The report named the twelve (four surgeons, one neurologist, four anesthesiologists, one urological surgeon, one oral surgeon, and one heart specialist), but omitted at least two doctors, Dr. Carrico and Dr. Charles Crenshaw. (WR, p.53)

* - The medical school, so often referred to in assassination literature, is the University of Texas Southwestern Medical School located right next door to Parkland Hospital. In fact, the first floors are connected by a long corridor. The two institutions are separately owned and governed but have an extremely close relationship, Parkland being the “teaching hospital” for the medical school. In fact, many of the doctors on the Parkland staff are professors at the school, and most of the school’s graduates do their residency at Parkland.

* - The femoral artery is the main artery of the thigh and can be felt in the pelvic area.

‡The bullet wound happened to be located in the precise place where a tracheotomy is normally performed.

* The Parkland doctors chose type O RH-negative blood because it is safe to give to anyone, regardless of his or her type, as it causes no adverse reaction.

*-“KKB-364” is the radio call sign of the Dallas police radio station.

* The city of Dallas was broken down into eighty-six police districts. Each day was broken down into three eight-hour shifts (“platoons”). Most districts only had one patrolman assigned to it, although “hot districts” (those with a higher incidence of crime) had two. The number “78” was Tippit’s radio call number because it was the police district, number 78, he was assigned to. (Eighty-six districts: “Dallas Police Department Squad Districts as of January 1, 1960,” DMA, box 7, folder 10, item 3; Telephone interview of Jim Bowles by author on March 25, 2004)

‡The author of the only book on the Tippit murder case wrote that “the initials [J. D.] he was known by didn’t have any particular meaning. To everyone he was just J. D.” Tippit’s brother, Wayne, told the author that reports that his brother’s initials stood for “Jefferson Davis” were incorrect. (Myers, With Malice, pp.28, 588 note 20) However, at least as to the first initial, a fellow officer who worked with Tippit for a while referred to him as John (Sneed, No More Silence, p.463).

* The Parkland doctors had worked on the president in the emergency room for forty-two minutes before he expired. (See also New York Times, November 23, 1963, p.2)

Dr. Charles Baxter, one of the many surgeons attempting to save the president, would later recall, “As soon as we realized we had nothing medical to do, we all backed off from the man with a reverence that one has for one’s president. And we did not continue to be doctors from that point on. We became citizens again, and there were probably more tears shed in that room than in the surrounding hundred miles” (“Surgeon Who Operated on JFK in Dallas Dies,” Associated Press, March 12, 2005).

‡In emergency medicine, injuries are described as one-plus, two-plus, et cetera. A four-plus injury is a worst-case scenario.

* The few minutes leading up to Tippit's murder were only known to Tippit and Oswald. (Witnesses to the murder were only aware of the previous minute, not minutes.) So we have to infer what happened from what little we do know. Looking at the map in the photo section, we know that to get to Tenth and Patton, where Tippit was murdered, Oswald had to have at least started out by going south on Beckley. We also know that the last time we heard from Tippit was at 1:08 p.m. when he called the channel 1 police dispatcher twice to communicate but was never acknowledged. Since this time is so close to the time of his death, in February of 2004 I called the person I felt would be most qualified to confirm or dispel my suspicion that the 1:08 p.m. transmission by Tippit was related to his death, Dallas sheriff Jim Bowles, a fifty-three-year member of Dallas law enforcement—thirty years with the Dallas Police Department, twenty-three with the Dallas sheriff's office, the last eleven as sheriff. Responding to my amazement over his fifty-three years in law enforcement, Bowles said, "Most police officers have starved to death [on their low pay] by that time." Just as important as Bowles's long experience in law enforcement is the fact that he was a Dallas police radio dispatcher supervisor in November of 1963. (Because of his father's stroke, Bowles was off duty on the day of the assassination.) Indeed, it was Bowles who transcribed the recordings on the police radio tapes for the Warren Commission. "Oh, I don't think there's too much question the two 1:08 transmissions from Tippit pertained to Oswald," Bowles said. I asked Bowles when would the 1:08 transmissions have likely been made, shortly before the murder or earlier? "Most likely earlier, when Tippit first saw Oswald walking like the devil possessed, probably back on Beckley or Crawford, and he just slow-tailed him to Tenth." (Confirmation of Bowles's analysis that Tippit was slowly following Oswald comes from witness William Scoggins, who said that when he saw Tippit's car cross the intersection of Tenth and Patton, Tippit was traveling "not more than ten or twelve miles an hour" behind where Oswald was walking on Tenth [3 H 324]. And Helen Markham also noticed that the police car was "going real slow...real slow" [3 H 307].) I asked Bowles, "Tippit wouldn't have pulled his squad car over to the curb next to Oswald shortly after spotting him, and was calling in at 1:08 to let the dispatcher know he was leaving his patrol car [and radio, since in 1963 the Dallas Police never had walkie talkies] to approach Oswald?" Bowles, who worked for ten years in the Dallas police radio dispatcher's office, said, "Possible, but that wouldn't be the norm for an officer under these circumstances, particularly Tippit. I knew Tippit. He was a slow, cautious, deliberate guy. The norm would have been for him to call in for a further description of the suspect from the dispatcher. But not being acknowledged, after following Oswald for a few minutes he pulled over to see what this person [Oswald] is up to." "You don't think Tippit had enough PC [not as in probable cause for an arrest, but still used as a loose way of referring to a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity justifying a police officer to stop a pedestrian or driver of a car for questioning] to stop Oswald because Oswald vaguely fit the general description of the suspect sent out over police radio?" "Possibly," Bowles said, "but his PC was probably the description coupled with some overt behavior by Oswald like walking too fast, looking over his shoulder, walking in some erratic, jerky way. Remember, Oswald had just killed the president. He probably wasn't walking in a normal, casual way and a police officer would pick up on this more than someone else would." (Telephone interview of Dallas sheriff Jim Bowles by author on February 23, 2004)

* The Kennedy loyalists felt it was in the worst of taste for President Johnson to take the former president's plane back to Washington instead of flying back on Air Force Two, the plane he had come to Texas in. And indeed, when Warren Commission counsel asked O'Donnell if, after he informed LBJ that the president had died, there was "any discussion about his taking the presidential plane, AF-1, as opposed to AF-2?" O'Donnell replied, "There was not" (7 H 451). And he reiterated this in his book (O'Donnell and Powers with McCarthy, Johnny, We Hardly Knew Ye, p.40). But one wonders if O'Donnell found it convenient to deny the conversation when he thereafter heard the sentiments of his associates about Johnson flying on Air Force One. President Johnson told the Warren Commission that after O'Donnell informed him that Kennedy had died, O'Donnell "said that we should return to Washington and that we should take the president's plane" (5 H563). And Secret Service agent Rufus Youngblood, special agent in charge of the vice presidential detail for the Texas trip, testified before the Warren Commission that "O'Donnell told us to go ahead and take Air Force One. I believe this is mainly because Air Force One has better communications equipment and so forth than the other planes [Air Force Two and the cargo plane]" (2 H 152-153). U.S. News & World Report sought to confirm this and was told by a former White House official that, at the time, the three jet planes in the presidential fleet were being "regeared for communications of a classified nature. Naturally, the first plane to be re-equipped was AF-1. Most of the new gear had been installed in AF-1. The other two jet planes had not been completed" ("Fateful Two Hours without a President," p.73).

Another reason to believe LBJ and Youngblood on this point is that the weight of the evidence (see later text) is that LBJ was very sensitive to the feelings of the entire Kennedy camp following the assassination.

* - O'Donnell thought that he had convinced Johnson to depart immediately upon his arrival at Love Field; however, Johnson wasn't about to fly back to the capital alone, with a dead president and a grieving widow on a following plane. He agreed to return to Love Field but was determined to wait for Mrs. Kennedy and the president's body before departing for Washington. (5 H 563, WC statement of President Lyndon Baines Johnson; O'Donnell and Powers with McCarthy, Johnny, We Hardly Knew Ye, p.34; Bishop, Day Kennedy Was Shot, pp.193-194; Telephone interview of Assistant Special Agent-in-Charge Lem Johns by author on June 28, 2005)

‡ Although the FBI and other members of law enforcement first suspected that the nation's right wing was behind the assassination, Warren Commission chronicler and assassination researcher Max Holland writes, "For officials whose instincts were honed by national-security considerations, the Soviet-American rivalry loomed over what had happened and dictated what immediately needed to be done. The overwhelming instant reaction among these officials was to suspect a grab for power, a foreign, Communist-limited conspiracy aimed at overthrowing the U.S. government. The assassination might be the first in a concerted series of attacks on U.S. leaders as the prelude to an all-out attack... When Major General Chester Clifton, JFK's military aide, arrived at Parkland Hospital, he immediately called the National Military Command Center and then switched to the White House Situational Room to find out if there was any intelligence about a plot to overthrow the government. The Defense Department subsequently issued a flash warning to every U.S. military base in the world and ordered additional strategic bombers into the air. General Maxwell Taylor [chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff] issued a special alert to all troops in the Washington [D.C.] area, while John McCone, director of Central Intelligence, asked the Watch Committee to convene immediately at the Pentagon. The committee, an interdepartmental group organized to prevent future Pearl Harbors, consisted of the government's best experts on surprise military attacks" (Holland, "Key to the Warren Report," pp.52, 54).

* The conventional wisdom and that of the Warren Commission is that Tippit pulled his squad car over to talk to Oswald because Tippit must have heard the description of the suspected killer of the president, which was sent out over Dallas police radio at 12:45, 12:48, and 12:55 p.m., that he was a “white male, approximately thirty, slender build, height five foot ten inches, weight 165 pounds,” and Oswald’s description was similar to the suspect (WR, p.165). The argument of conspiracy theorists, seeking to link Oswald to Tippit before Tippit’s murder, that Oswald wasn’t similar enough for Tippit to have stopped him, is a very weak one. If there ever was a time when a police officer would stop someone if he even remotely resembled a suspect, surely this was it.

‡ We will never know what words Oswald and Tippit exchanged that caused Tippit to leave his patrol car and start to approach Oswald. But we can safely assume that there was something about Oswald's words, appearance, or demeanor that made Tippit want to check Oswald out further, but that was not suspicious enough at that point for him to have drawn his gun on Oswald.

‡Tippit had a bad habit, which his fellow officers unsuccessfully tried to break him of, of never looking anyone straight in the eye, looking down or sometimes sideways when he approached a person on duty. This may have accounted for how Oswald got the jump on him. (See endnote discussion.)

* I asked Tatum at the London trial if he got “a good look” at the man who shot Tippit and whom he identified at the trial. “Very good look,” Tatum responded. I asked if there was “any question in your mind” that the man was Oswald. “None whatsoever,” he answered. (Transcript of On Trial, July 23, 1986, p.200)

* - Actually, Tippit pulled over and stopped his squad car on the street in front of the driveway between 404 and 410 East Tenth Street (CE 523, 17 H 229; photo of car parked on East Tenth: Barnes Exhibit D, 19 H114).

* - Hulse has gotten the 510 East Jefferson address (the site of Reynolds Motor Company) from the call sheet passed through the conveyor belt to the dispatch room from the adjacent room manned by civilian employees of the police department taking calls from other civilians—the result of the phone call made by L. J. Lewis from that location. The confusion resulting from the two addresses given for the shooting delayed the arrival of many police officers in getting to the shooting scene.

* This, and Hoover's statement about a Secret Service agent being killed, are two examples of the kind of erroneous information that was being passed along immediately after the assassination during the initial phases of the investigation. Shanklin's source was apparently the Dallas police radio where similar information had just been broadcast.

*- Seventeen of O'Neal's eighteen employees are out to lunch when he got a call from Secret Service agent Clint Hill, shortly after 1:00 p.m., who wanted him to bring the best casket he had to Parkland Hospital. His most expensive model, at $3,995, was the Elgin Casket Company's Handley Britannia, a four-hundred-pound, double-walled, hermetically sealed, solid-bronze coffin manufactured by the Texas Coffin Company. O'Neal had to wait until three more of his men came back from lunch before he could wrestle the behemoth into his 1964 Cadillac hearse. (ARRB MD 131, Texas Coffin Company reorder card; Bishop, Day Kennedy Was Shot, p.267; Manchester, Death of a President, pp.291-292)

* At 1:00 a.m. the next morning at Bethesda Hospital, O'Donnell slipped into the room where Kennedy's body lay, removed the ring, and brought it back to Jackie (O'Donnell and Powers with McCarthy, Johnny, We Hardly Knew Ye, p.35; New York Times, December 5, 1963, p.32).

‡ One of the most prominent misconceptions that has been parroted by virtually everyone, including the Warren Commission, is that in 1963 it wasn't a federal crime to murder the president. "Murder of the president has never been covered by federal law," said the Warren Commission in 1964 (WR, p.454). "At that time it was not a federal crime to assassinate a president," said Chief Justice Earl Warren in his memoirs (Warren, Memoirs, p.355). Indeed, even FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover said that "it is not a federal crime to kill the president" (5 H 98, WCT, Hon. J. Edgar Hoover). For almost all practical intents and purposes, this is true, but the statement, technically, is not. Under Section 1111 of Title 18 of the U.S. Code, murder was, of course, a federal crime in 1963. And just as obviously there was no language in Title 18 that said, "However, if the victim of the murder is the president of the United States, then it's not a federal crime." Where the limitation came in is in subdivision (b) of Section 1111, which provided (and still does) that for there to be federal prosecutorial jurisdiction over any murder, it has to take place "within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States," which the courts have held to be places owned, possessed, or controlled by the U.S. government (most importantly, the president's residence, the White House, but also, for example, federal buildings like the Pentagon, military installations, U.S. highways, national parks, islands like Palmyra in the Pacific that are U.S. possessions, etc.). Since a Dallas street is not a U.S. highway and would not qualify, there could not be a federal prosecution of Oswald for having killed Kennedy. It is highly anomalous that even in 1963, if it could have been shown that Oswald had entered into a conspiracy to murder the president, or even threatened harm to him, since Sections 372 and 871, respectively, of Title 18 contain no such territorial limitation, federal jurisdiction to prosecute Oswald for those separate offenses would have existed. But not for the actual act of murdering the president.

As a direct result of Kennedy's assassination, and pursuant to one of the recommendations of the Warren Commission (WR, pp.26, 455), this loophole in the federal law was plugged on August 28, 1965, when Congress enacted Section 1751 of Title 18 specifically making the assassination of a president (or president elect or vice president) murder under Section 1111, and conveying federal jurisdiction irrespective of where the killing occurred, even if on foreign soil. Section 1751(k) provides that "there is extra territorial jurisdiction over the conduct prohibited by this section." Also, anomalously, although the jurisdictional limitation wasn't removed for the president until 1965, in 1963 it already was a federal crime to murder (anywhere) federal judges, U.S. attorneys and marshals, and other "officers and employees of the United States." (18 USC §1114; WR, p.454) Congressional efforts to make, without limitation, the assassination of a president a prosecutable federal crime (a House bill in 1901 and Senate bill in 1902 following the assassination of President McKinley in 1901, and a House bill in 1933 following the attempted assassination of President Roosevelt on February 15, 1933) failed to be enacted into law (WR, pp.454–455; H.R. 10386, 57th Cong., 1st sess., 1901; S. 3653, 57th Cong., 1st sess., 1902; H.R. 3896, 73rd Cong., 1st sess., 1933). Attempted assassination is also covered under Section 1751, and the indictment of Charles Manson follower Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme for her attempted assassination of President Gerald Ford on September 5, 1975, in Sacramento, California, was the first under the new law. Fromme was subsequently convicted and is now serving a life sentence.

* - Actually, only one other of the boys was missing: Charles Douglas Givens (CE 705, 17 H 419; CE 1974, 23 H 873), who went to the corner of Main and Record (two blocks from the Depository) to watch the motorcade. When he returned to the Depository sometime after 12:40 p.m., police wouldn't let him back inside (7 H 382, 385–386, WCT Roy Sansom Truly; 6 H 355, WCT Charles Douglas Givens). Givens, who had a prior police record for narcotics violations, was spotted in the crowd an hour later by Dallas police lieutenant Jack Revill, who recognized Givens from his past dealings with him. Givens was subsequently taken to police headquarters, where he was questioned and gave a statement (5 H 35–36, WCT Jack Revill; 6 H 355, WCT Charles Douglas Givens; CE 2003, 24 H 210).

* The Tippit murder occurred at approximately 1:12 p.m. and the murder scene at Tenth and Patton is not even quite seven blocks from the shoe store and Texas Theater. Also, we know Oswald was running at least part of the time after he shot Tippit, yet Oswald doesn't reach the shoe store until close to twenty to twenty-five minutes later. Even given the somewhat circuitous path he must have taken to reach the shoe store area, the likelihood is that although the area was swarming with police officers searching for him, Oswald succeeded, along the way, in secreting himself from human view, where he most likely stayed hidden for several minutes at a time.

* The almost reflexive belief was that a southern segregationist had shot the president. “A lawyer in Riverdale commented: ‘We have allowed certain factions to work up such furor throughout the South with fanatic criticism [of Kennedy] that a demented person can feel confident that such atrocious action is justifiable’” (New York Times, November 23, 1963, p.5).

The terrible irony is that the man who killed the president was not the product of that segment of the South that despised the president for championing civil rights for the black population, but someone who admired the president for it.

* On the evening of Monday, November 25, 1963, a quarter of a million West Berliners crowded into newly dedicated John F. Kennedy Square, where just five months earlier Kennedy gave his famous “Ich bin ein Berliner” (I am a Berliner) speech, to mourn Kennedy’s death, thousands openly crying. The Associated Press reported that “never in memory has this tortured city grieved more than in the last four days since the death of the President.” (Dallas Morning News, November 26, 1963, p.16) Earlier on Monday the Telegraph, a conservative London paper, said that “few of the 35 American Presidents have touched the minds and hearts of British people as have Abraham Lincoln, Franklin Roosevelt and John Kennedy.” The paper opened a fund drive to build a statue of Kennedy in London with a contribution of one thousand pounds. (Dallas Morning News, November 26, 1963, p.15)

* The venom was flying both ways. Republican Senator John Tower of Texas, regarded as a right-wing conservative, had always been highly critical of Kennedy. When he was informed at a Republican conference in St. Louis that his office in Washington had received about a dozen anonymous and threatening phone calls and a number of similar telegrams, he arranged to have his wife and three daughters stay at the home of friends in Maryland until he returned to the capital. Republican Representative Bruce Alger of Dallas was also reported to have received a number of threatening phone calls and telegrams. (New York Times, November 23, 1963, p.7)

‡ One such story about Roosevelt became a favorite of Roosevelt's, and he delighted in telling it to friendly Democratic audiences. It seems there was a wealthy businessman commuting from heavily Republican Westchester County in New York who would hand the newsboy at the train station a dime every morning for the New York Times, glance at the front page, then hand the paper back as he rushed out the door to catch his train. Finally, one day, the newsboy, unable to control his curiosity any longer, asked the man why he always only looked at the front page.

"I'm interested in an obituary," the man said.

"But the obituaries are on the back pages of the paper, and you never look at them," the newsboy retorted.

"Son," the man said, "the son of a bitch I'm interested in will be on page one."

* The presidential cabin located toward the rear of the plane consisted of three rooms: the stateroom—the president’s “office” on the plane—and an adjacent bedroom and bathroom.

* Barnes told the Warren Commission that after he took the prints he had “lifted” from the right side of Tippit’s car back to the crime lab, “no legible prints were found” (7 H 274). Contrary to popular belief, this is typical. In working with the Los Angeles Police Department when I was with the Los Angeles district attorney’s office, I learned that approximately only 30 percent of the times that fingerprint experts are dispatched to the scene of a crime are they able to secure clear, readable, latent prints belonging to anyone. In most cases the prints found are just too fragmentary, smudged (the Tippit car), or superimposed with other prints to be used for comparison with a fingerprint exemplar of someone (here, Oswald) taken at a police station. (To compound the problem in the Tippit case, Barnes testified that the exterior surface of Tippit’s car was “dirty,” making it much more difficult to lift a readable print.) Indeed, even in those cases where readable prints are secured, only 10 percent of the time do those prints match up to those of a suspect. The rest belong either to the victim or to some third party. A simple equation: 10 percent of 30 percent equals 3 percent. Hence, in only 3 percent of the times that fingerprint experts go to a crime scene are they able to secure the latent prints of the accused. Ninety-seven percent of the time they are unsuccessful. As a prosecutor I would present this “negative fingerprint testimony” from my expert, and I found it to be a powerful statistical rebuttal to the common defense argument that since the defendant’s prints were not found at the scene, he was never there.

* The Warren Commission never pinned down what row or seat Oswald was in, and the arresting officers were all in disagreement. McDonald said Oswald was in the “second seat” over from the “right center aisle” and mentions no row (3 H 299); Hawkins said “three or four” seats over from the right center aisle as you face the screen, and “three or four rows from the back” (7 H 93); Walker: “fourth or fifth” row from the back, “third seat” in from where McDonald was (7 H 38–39); Captain W. R. Westbrook: “third or fourth row from the back,” seated “in the middle” (7 H 112; see also Sneed, No More Silence, p.314). Hutson not only seemed to be the most precise, but on a trip I took to Dallas on September 22, 2004, Ken Holmes, a Dallas student of the assassination with an emphasis on historical detail, said he was very confident, from his studies, where Oswald was seated in the theater, and he pointed out the seat to me. In Hutson’s December 3, 1963, report to Chief Curry, Hutson said that Oswald was “sitting in the third row from the back” in the “fifth seat” of “the center section,” which he later told the Warren Commission. In his Commission testimony, however, he didn’t say fifth seat from what side, but in his report to Curry he did. It was “the fifth seat north of the south aisle [from the stage looking toward the audience, the north aisle is on one’s right, the south aisle to one’s left] of the center section.” (Report from Officer T. A. Hutson to J. E. Curry, Chief of Police, December 3, 1963, p.1; 7 H 31, WCT Thomas Alexander Hutson) That’s the same seat Holmes pointed out to me. Holmes, a member of the Dallas Historical Society, has run a popular tour of JFK assassination sites for several years under the name Southwestern Historical Inc.

* “We were sort of in a bind,” Air Force One pilot Colonel Swindal would later recall, “because there was no place on Air Force One for a casket, and we sure didn’t want to put it in the cargo hold” (Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006, p.B11).

* It has to be noted that this is Mrs. Kennedy's version of what happened. Although President Johnson never addressed himself directly to the matter, his brief statement to the Warren Commission suggests a different version from what Mrs. Kennedy told author William Manchester. He says that when Mrs. Kennedy and President Kennedy's body arrived, "Mrs. Johnson and I spoke to her. We tried to comfort her, but our words seemed inadequate. She went into the private quarters of the plane" (5 H 564). Mrs. Johnson's version is more directly at odds with that of Mrs. Kennedy. She told the Warren Commission that "we had at first been ushered into the main presidential cabin on the plane, but Lyndon quickly said, 'No, no,' and immediately led us out of there; we felt that is where Mrs. Kennedy should be" (5 H 566).

* Dallas district attorney Henry Wade, a law enforcement power in his own right, would later tell the Warren Commission, “Fritz runs a kind of one-man operation there where nobody else knows what he is doing. Even me, for instance, he is reluctant to tell me, either, but I don’t mean that disparagingly. [But, of course, it is disparaging.] I will say Captain Fritz is about as good a man at solving a crime as I ever saw, to find out who did it, but he is the poorest in the getting [of] evidence that I know, and I am more interested in getting evidence” (5 H 218). Without further explanation, unless Wade was speaking loosely, it is difficult to know how one “solves” a crime without a successful gathering of evidence, unless Wade meant that Fritz’s intuition was usually accurate.

‡There would eventually be three more interrogations of Oswald. All four, totaling approximately twelve hours, took place intermittently between 2:30 p.m. on November 22 and 11:10 a.m. on November 24, 1963. (WR, pp.180, 633)

* Although the Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution has provided since 1791 that an accused has the right to counsel to assist him in his defense, in Texas in 1963 the police did not have to advise a suspect or person arrested of this right. In this case, Oswald asked Fritz if he had the right to counsel and Fritz told him he did (4 H 215, WCT John Will Fritz; WR, p.602). However, Texas statutory law at the time did require that someone under arrest be advised that he did not have to make a statement, and if he did, it could be used against him. Although there is nothing in the report of Captain Fritz on his interrogation of Oswald (WR, pp.599–611) that he advised Oswald of this right against self-incrimination, Dallas assistant district attorney Bill Alexander, who sat in on many interrogations of arrestees by Fritz through the years, said that Fritz always would comply with Texas law and he assumes the reason this was not in Fritz’s notes is that it “went without saying” that he gave Oswald this admonition (Telephone interview of William Alexander by author on February 17, 2002). In any event, once FBI agents James Bookhout and James Hosty joined in Oswald’s interrogation, the agents advised Oswald of both rights (WR, p.619; 7 H 310, WCT James W. Bookhout; see also 7 H 353, WCT, Forrest V. Sorrels).

In the landmark cases of Escobedo v. Illinois (378 U.S. 478), a year after the assassination, and Miranda v. Arizona in 1966 (384 U.S. 436), it became a federal constitutional right that a suspect (and certainly an arrestee) has to be advised at the commencement of questioning of his right to have counsel during his interrogation, and if he doesn’t have funds for a lawyer, one will be appointed. He also has to be told he has a right to remain silent, and anything he says can be used against him, and if this is not done, any statement made by him thereafter that was elicited by the police during the interrogation cannot be introduced against him at his trial.

It should be noted that even before Escobedo and Miranda, the widespread practice, particularly by federal law enforcement agencies like the FBI and Secret Service, was to tell a suspect or arrestee of these rights and help him get a lawyer by allowing him to make a phone call for this purpose, as Captain Fritz allowed Oswald to do in this case. It’s just that there was no legal requirement to advise arrestees and suspects of these rights before they were questioned.

* - Author William Manchester wrote that JFK's Bible, "his most cherished personal possession," was found on the plane, and LBJ had rested his hand on it (Manchester, Death of a President, pp.324, 328). But Lady Bird took the "Bible" off the plane with her as a memento, and later inquiry revealed it was not a Bible but a Catholic prayer book or missal, which, to all appearances, had never been opened (Holland, Kennedy Assassination Tapes, p.310).

‡Johnson's elevation to president from vice president marked the fourth time in American history when an assassin's bullet has elevated a sitting vice president. Andrew Johnson was the first so elevated when John Wilkes Booth, a fierce proponent of the Confederate cause, shot Abraham Lincoln at the Ford Theater in Washington, D.C., on April 14, 1865. Lincoln died the next day. Booth was shot to death during his capture on April 26, 1865. Next was the elevation to the presidency of Chester Alan Arthur, when Charles Julius Guiteau, a self-styled "lawyer, theologian, and politician" who claimed he had worked for President James A. Garfield's election and was entitled to a prominent foreign service post in payment for it, which he never got, shot Garfield as he was walking to a train in the Baltimore and Potomac Station in Washington, D.C., on July 2, 1881. Garfield did not die from his wound until September 19, 1881, and Guiteau was later hanged, on June 30, 1882. The next vice president to be elevated was Theodore Roosevelt when President William McKinley was shot by Leon F. Czolgosz, an anarchist who said McKinley was "the enemy of the working people," on September 6, 1901, at the Pan American Exposition in Buffalo, New York. McKinley didn't expire until September 14. Czolgosz was electrocuted on October 29. (McConnell, History of Assassination, pp.310–312, 314–317; WR, pp.504–510)

That the job of the president of the United States is the most dangerous elected job in the world cannot be too vigorously contested. In addition to the two attempted assassinations of President Gerald Ford in 1975 (by Lynnette "Squeaky" Fromme in Sacramento on September 5, 1975, and Sarah Jane Moore in San Francisco on September 22, 1975), the attempted assassination of President Richard Nixon by Samuel Joseph Byck on February 22, 1974, and the attempted assassination of President Ronald Reagan by William Hinckley in Washington, D.C., on March 30, 1981, two other presidents were attacked before Kennedy, but the attempts failed. Additionally, attempts were made on one president-elect and even one former president. On January 30, 1835, an English-born house painter, Richard Lawrence, fired two pistols, both of which misfired, at President Andrew Jackson. Like William Hinckley, Lawrence was found by a jury to be not guilty by reason of insanity and died in a mental hospital sixteen years later. On November 1, 1950, two Puerto Rican nationalists, Oscar Collazo and Griselio Torresola, attempted to shoot their way into Blair House, where President Harry Truman and his wife were temporarily residing while the White House was being repaired. Torresola was shot to death by White House guards in a hail of gunfire (one of the guards was also killed). Collazo was seriously wounded and sentenced to death, but Truman commuted his sentence to life imprisonment. President-elect Franklin D. Roosevelt was shot at in his car five times at a political rally in Miami's Bayfront Park on February 15, 1933 by Giuseppe Zangara, a thirty-two-year-old bricklayer and stonemason. All five of Zangara's shots missed Roosevelt. However, one of them hit Chicago mayor Anton Cermak, who was riding with Roosevelt. Cermak died of his wound on March 6, and Zangara was electrocuted on March 20, only thirty-three days after his attempt on Roosevelt. The former president who escaped was Theodore Roosevelt, who was running for president again as the candidate of the Progressive or "Bull Moose" Party. On October 14, 1912, a German-born New York bartender, John Schrank, fired one shot at Roosevelt as he entered his car outside a hotel in Milwaukee. The bullet hit Roosevelt in the chest, but a folded manuscript of the speech he was about to make and the metal case for his eyeglasses absorbed part of the bullet's thrust, and he survived. Schrank was found to be insane and died in a mental hospital in 1943. (WR, pp.505, 509–513)

So starting with Lincoln in 1865, approximately one out of every three American presidents either has been assassinated or had an attempt on his life.

* - Speaking of his early days in office to his biographer, Doris Kearns, LBJ said, "I took the oath. I became president. But for millions of Americans I was still illegitimate, a naked man with no presidential covering, a pretender to the throne, an illegal usurper. And then there was Texas, my home, the home of both the murder and the murder of the murderer. And then there were the bigots and the dividers and the Eastern intellectuals, who were waiting to knock me down before I could even begin to stand up. The whole thing was almost unbearable" (Kearns, Lyndon Johnson and the American Dream, p.170).

* Marguerite told her biographer, Jean Stafford, in 1965, “I’m a mother in history. I’m all over the world...and my son’s the one accused. You know, here is Mrs. Kennedy, a very wealthy woman, Mrs. Tippit, a very wealthy woman, Marina, very wealthy [referring to the donations from the public Marina and particularly Mrs. Tippit received], but I am wondering where my next meal is coming from. It’s almost unbelievable” (Stafford, Mother in History, p.54).

* - Two other planes leave Love Field following Air Force One: Air Force Two, the vice presidential plane, tail number SAM86970, now occupied mostly by Kennedy staffers forced to leave Air Force One to make room for President Johnson and his entourage; and SAM86373, the C-130 cargo jet carrying the blood-spattered presidential limousine and other trappings of the presidency, such as the president's seal and a special American flag (Holland, Kennedy Assassination Tapes, pp.48-49; see also TerHorst and Albertazzie, Flying White House, pp.210, 212).

* But there are five small windows in the room, all with venetian blinds and curtains connected to one five-and-ten-cent-store-type curtain rod. There is a single iron-rail bed, a large wooden movable wardrobe dresser drawer, a small plastic-top table, and a nightstand with a table lamp next to the head of the bed. Two small throw rugs are on the linoleum-tiled floor. (CD 705, pp.1–2, March 28, 1964; CE 2046, 24 H 460–461; 10 H 297, WCT Mrs. Arthur Carl Johnson)

* The date that Oswald came to the FBI office is not known, although it is inferable from Ruth Paine's testimony that Oswald indicated to her it was sometime during the week preceding the weekend of November 9–10, 1963 (3 H 18). Hosty, in his 1996 book, Assignment: Oswald (p.29), says it was "ten days before" the assassination. And in a July 15, 1975, affidavit given to the FBI, Nannie Lee Fenner, the FBI receptionist to whom Oswald gave the note, said it was around ten days before the assassination. But there seems to be little basis for this certitude. Indeed, when Hosty testified under oath about it in 1975, he said Oswald dropped the note off "probably November the sixth, seventh, or eighth," which would have been sixteen to eighteen days earlier. And Fenner testified in 1975 that "I do not know the exact date...It would have been in November. It could have been before that. I have racked my brain up one side and down the other and I cannot come up with the date." Fenner said Oswald, not identifying himself, came to the FBI office during the noon hour and said to her, "S.A. Hosty, please." He had a "wild look in his eye" and was "awfully fidgety." While she was checking to see if Hosty was in, she said the "bottom portion" of the note Oswald was holding was visible to her and she recalls "the last two lines" of the note, which said, "I will either blow up the Dallas Police Department or the FBI office." When Fenner learned, and told Oswald, that Hosty was not in, he gave her the note to give to Hosty. After Oswald left, she decided to see "what was above" those two lines and said it "was something about [Hosty] speaking to his wife and what he was going to do if they didn't stop." Fenner said the note was signed "Lee Harvey Oswald," and when Hosty came back to the office, she gave the note to him. Hosty, who disposed of the note following the assassination (see later discussion), did not recall the note being signed, and said the note did not contain the language Fenner recalls. When asked at a House Judiciary subcommittee hearing in 1975, "It [the note] didn't say anything about the blowing up of the office?" he replied, "No, sir, I would have remembered that." Hosty characterized Fenner as unreliable and someone with "a distinct reputation for gross exaggeration," saying he was "almost certain that Fenner had never even read the note. It is more likely that she heard about it and embellished her knowledge." A coworker of Fenner's, Joe Pearce, gave an affidavit on July 22, 1975, that Fenner had "a tendency to exaggerate." Actually, Fenner's testimony before the House Judiciary subcommittee that when she saw Oswald on TV after the assassination and recognized him as the man who had given her the note, yet told no one at the office about this fact when she came in to work because "there was no one for me to talk to" and "what I didn't know was none of my business," throws her entire story about the contents of the note into question. And of course her recalling that the note said Oswald threatened to blow up the Dallas Police Department for a grievance he had against the FBI has no ring of truth to it. (FBI Oversight, December 11 and 12, 1975, pp.37–38, 40–41, 47, 53 [Fenner's testimony on December 11]; pp.129–130, 145–146 [Hosty's testimony on December 12]; Hosty with Hosty, Assignment: Oswald, pp.185, 195–199; Telephone interview of James Hosty by author on April 9, 2004; Joe Pearce affidavit: DOJCD Record 186-10006-10077, July 29, 1975; see also Church Committee Report, pp.96–97)

* - Ayres would later tell author William Manchester that he started to say “President” Johnson, but checked himself, apparently not wanting to further hurt Mrs. Kennedy with the declared reality that her son was no longer the president (Manchester, Death of a President, p.371).

* Most of the nearly one and a half million telephones in service in the Washington metropolitan area on November 22 were used during the first half hour. A staggering quarter-million long-distance calls alone were made on Friday, resulting in overloaded exchanges, delayed dial tones, and intermittent service. Normal telephone operations were not completely restored until 4:15 p.m. EST.
(Manchester, Death of a President, pp.205–206, 253–254)

* When Boswell was informed that the autopsy would take place at Bethesda, he said, “That’s stupid. The autopsy should be done at the Armed Forces Institute of Pathology [AFIP],” located just five miles up the road from Bethesda at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center. The AFIP was “the apex of military pathology and, perhaps, world pathology,” according to Boswell. However, his suggestion was rejected. “That’s the way it is,” he was told. “Admiral Burkley wants Bethesda.” (Breo, “JFK’s Death—The Plain Truth from the MDs Who Did the Autopsy,” p.2796; ARRB MD 26, Memorandum, Andy Purdy to Jim Kelly and Kenneth Klein, August 17, 1977, Notes of interview with Dr. J. Thornton Boswell, pp.1–2)

* In spite of all the planning for the landing, the ambulance is waiting there not by design but by order of Captain Robert Canada Jr., USN, commanding officer of Bethesda Naval Hospital. Canada, unaware of the role his hospital would play, had sent the navy ambulance to Andrews Air Force Base in case Lyndon Johnson, a navy veteran, whom Canada had treated after his massive heart attack in July 1955, had suffered another one. (Manchester, Death of a President, p.381)

* In a large-sample national poll in March of 1964 by the National Opinion Research Center, an affiliate of the University of Chicago, an astonishing 53 percent of those interviewed said they had wept when they heard the news of Kennedy's death (New York Times, March 7, 1964, p.11). This percentage is remarkable by itself, and becomes even more so when you factor in the number of people who, though grieving as much, cannot bring tears to their eyes.

* Despite Marina's suspicion that her husband had murdered the president, as she walked past the media at police headquarters upon her arrival, she said loyally, "Lee good man—he no shoot anyone" (JFK/Deep Politics Quarterly, April 2006, p.8).

* Dr. Boswell said Humes was “afraid the sheets would end up in somebody’s barn on Highway 66 as exhibits” and immediately threw them into the morgue washing machine to be laundered (ARRB MD 26, Memorandum, Andy Purdy to Jim Kelly and Kenneth Klein, August 17, 1977, Notes of interview with Dr. J. Thornton Boswell, pp.2–3; ARRB Transcript of Proceedings, Deposition of Dr. J. Thornton Boswell, February 26, 1996, p.14).

‡FBI agents O'Neill and Sibert noted the following were in attendance at the beginning of the autopsy: Admiral Calvin B. Galloway, USN, commanding officer of the U.S. Naval Medical Center, Bethesda; Captain John H. Stover, commanding officer, U.S. Naval Medical School; Admiral George G. Burkley, USN, the president's personal physician; Commander James J. Humes, chief pathologist; Commander J. Thornton Boswell, chief of pathology at Bethesda; Jan G. Rudnicki, laboratory assistant to Dr. Boswell; John T. Stringer Jr., medical photographer; John H. Ebersole, assistant chief radiologist at Bethesda; Floyd A. Riebe, medical photographer; Paul K. O'Connor, laboratory technologist; James Curtis Jenkins, laboratory technologist; Jerrol F. Custer, X-ray technician; Edward F. Reed, X-ray technician; James E. Metzler, hospital corpsman, third-class; and Secret Service agents Roy Kellerman, William Greer, and John J. O'Leary (who stayed only briefly) (ARRB MD 44, FBI Report of O'Neill and Sibert, November 26, 1963, p.2). Admiral George Burkley reported that Admiral Edward Kenney, the surgeon general of the navy; Captain Robert O. Canada, commanding officer of Bethesda Naval Hospital; and Brigadier General Godfrey McHugh, air force aide to the president, were also present when the president's body was moved to the autopsy table (NARA Record 189-10001-10048, Report of George Burkley, November 27, 1963, 8:45 a.m., p.7, ARRB MD 48). During the course of the autopsy Pierre A. Finck, chief of the wound ballistics pathology branch at Walter Reed medical center, arrived to assist Humes and Boswell. In addition, Lieutenant Commander Gregory H. Cross, resident in surgery, and Captain David Osborne, chief of surgery, entered the autopsy room. (ARRB MD 44, FBI Report of O'Neill and Sibert, November 26, 1963, p.2) At one point, Major General Philip C. Wehle, commanding officer of the U.S. Military District of Washington, D.C., entered the autopsy room to make arrangements with the Secret Service regarding the transportation of the president's body back to the White House. Near the end of the autopsy, Chester H. Boyers, chief petty officer in charge of the pathology division, entered the room to type up receipts for items given to the FBI and Secret Service. At the end of the autopsy, John VanHoesen, Edwin Stroble, Thomas E. Robinson, and Joe Hagan (personnel from Gawler's Funeral Home) prepared the president's body for burial. Also in attendance at that time were Brigadier General Godfrey McHugh and Dr. George Bakeman, USN. (ARRB MD 44, FBI Report of O'Neill and Sibert, November 26, 1963, pp.2-3) The HSCA also noted that Richard A. Lipsey, personal aide to General Wehle, and Samuel A. Bird were also present at various times (7 HSCA 9).

* This is a standard practice in professional photography wherein each angle is photographed three times at three different exposures—one slightly underexposed, one slightly overexposed, and one at the presumed proper exposure setting—ensuring that at least one of the three images will be perfectly exposed.

* Oswald was referring to an antisedition law enacted in 1940 to combat the threat of global Communism that prohibited advocating the overthrow of the U.S. government “by force or violence.” Abt, himself a member of the Communist Party, won his biggest victory in 1965 when the U.S. Supreme Court held that the nation’s 1950 Internal Security Act (commonly called the McCarran Act), which required that all Communists and Communist organizations register with the federal government, was unconstitutional because it violated the Fifth Amendment’s right against self-incrimination. (Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 382 U.S. 70 [1965]; Los Angeles Times, August 14, 1991, p.A14)

‡ Despite Captain Fritz's instructions, there is no record that Oswald made any attempts to contact Attorney Abt in New York on November 22.

‡When I asked Alexander if at that time he also believed Oswald had killed Kennedy, he responded, “Yeah. We felt it was clear that the same person who killed Tippit killed Kennedy. That’s why he killed Tippit, because he was stopped while in flight from Kennedy’s murder. It was pretty obvious to all of us—I don’t remember anyone that was thinking otherwise—that Oswald had committed both murders” (Interview of William Alexander by author on December 11, 2000).

*- No bullet, or significant portion thereof, was found in either Kennedy's or Connally's body.

* - The young lad Amos Euins also saw a gunman firing from the window, but his description of the gunman, as we have seen, was of little value, Euins first describing the gunman as being a colored man, and later, a white man.

* - Inspector Zarza checks the box and finds two copies of the Militant that had not yet been forwarded (7 H 296, WCT Harry D. Holmes).

* Under the 1966 U.S. Supreme Court case of Miranda v. Arizona, even if a suspect or arrestee has waived his right to have a lawyer present during his interrogation, and also waived his right against self-incrimination, once he indicates, at any time during the interrogation, that he does not want to answer any further questions, “the interrogation must cease,” and any statement he makes thereafter, even if apparently free and voluntary, cannot be used against him because said statement is deemed to be, as a matter of law, “the product of compulsion, subtle or otherwise” (Miranda v. Arizona, 86 S. Ct. 1627, 1628). Here, as we shall see, Oswald continued to be interrogated and continued to answer questions for two more days. But Miranda wasn’t yet in existence back in 1963.

* - Some of the military men present talked of bringing in metal detectors to expedite the search for any bullets in the president's body (ARRB MD 19, Memorandum to File, Andy Purdy, August 17, 1977, p.10).

* Predictably, the paraffin cast for Oswald's right cheek showed no reaction, that is, no nitrates indicating he had fired a weapon (4 H 276, WCT J. C. Day), but the paraffin cast on his hands, also predictably, showed a positive reaction, indicating, though not conclusively, he had recently fired a weapon. Though, as indicated, there is no gap between the chamber and the barrel of a rifle through which gases can escape (resulting in no nitrate residue being found on Oswald's right cheek from firing his Mannlicher-Carcano), there is a gap between the barrel and the cylinder on a revolver through which gases do escape; hence, nitrate residue was found on Oswald's hands, most likely from his shooting Officer Tippit with his .38 caliber Smith & Wesson revolver (4 H 276, WCT J. C. Day). Indeed, the gun residue test was devised only for the firing of small arms, not rifles. To confirm that firing a rifle will not leave nitrate residue on the firer's cheeks, the FBI had one of their agents, Charles L. Killion, fire three rounds in Oswald's Carcano rifle. The result of the paraffin test conducted thereafter was negative for his cheeks and hands (3 H 494, WCT Cortlandt Cunningham; WR, pp.561–562).

‡Virtually all high school, college, and professional sporting events were canceled or postponed throughout the nation that coming weekend. By far the most prominent exception (for which it has received criticism by many down through the years) was the National Football League. Although the American Football League postponed all of its Sunday games, NFL Commissioner Pete Rozelle said that “it has been traditional in sports for athletes to perform in times of great personal tragedy,” and announced that the NFL’s schedule of seven games would be played on Sunday. CBS announced it would not televise the games. (Dallas Morning News, November 23, 1963, sect.2, p.1; Rozelle quote: Sunday Press [Binghamton, NY], November 24, 1963, sect.D, p.1)

* The way Grant explained it, when he and Thompson were at Dallas police headquarters earlier in the day, there were “so many reporters and photographers pushing and shoving” in the cramped corridor on the third floor, some “standing on chairs, some on their camera cases, all trying to get in position” for a “photograph of suspect Lee Harvey Oswald” whenever he happened to appear “being led from one room to another,” that he suggested to Thompson they “get out” of the madhouse and “look for a more exclusive angle to the story.” With Thompson, born in Texas, “using his Texas accent and disarming demeanor” to extract information out of a deputy sheriff, they got the address of Oswald’s rooming house, and Earlene Roberts, the housekeeper, then told them of the phone calls that Oswald used to make to Irving. They headed out there and after inquiring around town, finally found the Paine residence. (Allen Grant, “Life Catches Up to Marina Oswald,” Los Angeles Times, November 22, 1988, part V, pp.1, 8)

* Although Ruby was highly patriotic, he was completely apolitical, though a lifelong Democrat, “being devoid of political ideas to the point of naivete” (CE 2980, 26 H 469–470; CE 1747, 23 H 355). Carousel comic Bill Demar, who knew Ruby well, said he “never recalled ever having heard him discuss politics” (15 H 102, WCT William D. Crowe Jr. [Bill Demar]). His rabbi, Hillel Silverman, told the FBI that Ruby was a very shallow person intellectually, and he considered Ruby to be someone “who would not know the difference between a communistic philosophy and a totalitarian philosophy, in that he was not well-read and spent little time concerning himself with this type of information.” The rabbi, however, appears to have missed the mark when he said that although Ruby thought the president of the United States was the greatest individual in the world, it wasn’t because of the president himself, but because of Ruby’s respect for the position involved and of his high respect for the American government. (CE 1485, 22 H 906–907, FBI interview of Hillel Silverman on November 27, 1963) Though that was probably a large part of Ruby’s feeling for Kennedy, the consensus of others, including those who were much closer to Ruby than Silverman, is that Ruby had an extraordinary feeling for Kennedy personally.

‡The fact that Barry Goldwater, who was already gearing up to run against Kennedy for president in 1964, was brought up in the discussion by the emcee at the Carousel around the same time as the remark about Kennedy, indicates the incident probably happened within months of the assassination.

* - At some time during the afternoon, Ruby stopped in to see a friend of his, Joe Cavagnaro, the sales manager at the Statler Hilton Hotel. He told Cavagnaro about his plans to close the Carousel for three days. Cavagnaro said, "He asked me what we were going to do. I told him, 'Jack, you can't just close a hotel. People have to have a place to eat and sleep.' But he expected the whole city to close down." (Wills and Demaris, Jack Ruby, pp.38, 40)

* Throughout the rest of his life, Ruby rarely permitted the name “Oswald” to come from his lips, either purposefully or instinctively refraining from uttering the word. “I don’t know why,” he told the Warren Commission. “I don’t know how to explain it.” One explanation is that he unconsciously sensed that to do so would invest it with a human dignity it did not have. Authors Gary Wills and Ovid Demaris wrote that “Ruby could not bring himself to call the thing by name. It is the instinct that kept [Carl] Sandburg from using [John Wilkes] Booth’s name in his long description of Lincoln’s death. When he must refer to the assassin, he calls him ‘the Outsider.’” The authors note that William Manchester, who does use Oswald’s name many times in his book, is nonetheless “sickened by the need to do so.” Manchester writes, “Noticing him [Oswald], and even printing his name in history books...seems obscene. It is an outrage. He is an outrage.” (5 H 187, WCT Jack L. Ruby; Wills and Demaris, Jack Ruby, p.264; Manchester, Death of a President, pp.276–277)

In their book Johnny, We Hardly Knew Ye, JFK’s two closest aides, Kenneth P. O’Donnell and David F. Powers, never used Oswald’s name once, though they wrote about the horrors of JFK’s death.

* When I asked Alexander if Wade had immediately assigned him to the Oswald case, the tall, angular-faced Texan who speaks slowly, and sometimes sprinkles those words with salty, ranch-hand profanity, responded, “There was no need for any conversation between Henry and me. It was understood” (Telephone interview of William Alexander by author on December 11, 2000).

* On the evening of April 10, 1963, retired Major General Edwin A. Walker, a prominent right-wing figure in Dallas, was shot at through the window of his suburban Dallas home. The bullet intended for him was deflected by the window frame and missed Walker's head. (See later text.)

* Wade would later tell the Warren Commission, “You just had to fight your way down through the hall through the press... To get into homicide it was a strain to get the door open enough to get into the office” (5 H 218). One problem is that the third-floor hallway was only about 113 feet long and just 7 feet wide (CE 2175; 24 H 848; WR, p.197), and this space was further reduced by all the radio and TV equipment, such as cables and tripods, in the corridor. To compound the problem of all the members of the media and Dallas Police Department mingling or moving about in the narrow hallway, throughout the three days of Oswald’s detention the Dallas police were obligated to continue normal business in all five of its bureaus located along the same hallway. Therefore, many persons, such as witnesses and relatives of defendants, had occasion to visit the third floor on matters unrelated to the assassination. (WR, p.204)

* The total bill for the 255-pound Marsellus 710 coffin from Gawler's and its accompanying 3,000-pound Wilbert Triune/copper-lined vault is $3,160 (ARRB MD 130, Embalmers Personal Remarks; ARRB MD 134, Funeral Arrangements for John Fitzgerald Kennedy, November 22, 1963, p.1).

* “We wanted to file on him [Oswald] before midnight,” Alexander would later recall. “It just would look better that we got the SOB on the same day he killed Kennedy” (Telephone interview of William Alexander by author on December 12, 2000).

* Alfred D. Hodge, the fifty-five-year-old owner of the Buckhorn Trading Post, was unable to identify the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle or .38 caliber Smith & Wesson revolver as being weapons he had sold (15 H 498, WCT, Alfred Douglas Hodge).

* - Why Oswald wasn't fingerprinted when he was booked into the jail just after midnight is not known.

* - The only source for Oswald ostensibly being asleep is author Jim Bishop. However, Bishop does not say who his source was, but the implication is that it was Sergeant Warren. (Bishop, Day Kennedy Was Shot, p.651) Even if it were Warren, Warren may simply have assumed that a physically still Oswald was asleep and called out to awaken him.

* “Someone had neglected to pass the word that the original Lincoln catafalque had been located in the basement of the Capitol building,” and based on a book on the Lincoln funeral that included steel-point engravings, White House carpenters had quickly constructed the replica (Bishop, Day Kennedy Was Shot, pp.486, 548; Manchester, Death of a President, p.437).

* Earlier in the day, Jackie's mother, Mrs. Janet Auchincloss, had told Maud Shaw, Caroline and John Jr.'s nanny, that she and Jackie felt that Miss Shaw "should be the one to break the news to the children, at least to Caroline," who was five years old and would be six in a little less than a week. "Oh, no," Shaw said, "please don't ask me to do that." "Please, Miss Shaw," Mrs. Auchincloss said. "It is for the best. They trust you, and you know how to deal with them. I am asking you as a friend, please. It has to be you." In writing about the matter later, Shaw does not pinpoint the time she did this, merely indicating it was after she had tucked the children into bed for the night. She says she went into Caroline's room and started reading to her from one of her books. When Caroline asked her why she was crying, she told her she had "very sad news." She says, "Then I told her what had happened. It was a dreadful time for us both." Caroline eventually fell asleep, with Ms. Shaw still petting her. She said John Jr. still did not know and "was really too young [two, though he'd be three in a few days] to understand." Later, she said, it was decided that Mrs. Robert Kennedy would tell him the best she could. (Shaw, White House Nannie, pp.14, 20-21)

* - In fact, Marina Oswald doesn't return as expected. Ruth Paine won't see her again until March 9, 1964, the beginning of an estrangement that exists to this day.

* After viewing the copy in New York, Life publisher C. D. Jackson instructed Stolley to purchase all rights to the film, including television and movie rights, for $150,000 paid in six annual installments of $25,000. The agreement was consummated November 25 in the office of Zapruder's lawyer, Sam Passman. Zapruder asked Stolley not to reveal the fact of the sale because it might intensify the already existing anti-Jewish sentiment in Dallas. Stolley felt that Passman earned his legal fee by suggesting that Zapruder donate the first $25,000 he received for the film to the widow and family of Officer Tippit. Zapruder readily agreed and his donation of $25,000 two days later earned public applause. Zapruder died of cancer in 1970, two years after he received his last payment. (Trask, National Nightmare, pp.146–150; Stolley, "What Happened Next...", p.262; Wrone, Zapruder Film, p.36)

* - This is apparently a reference to the claim of Deputy Sheriff Roger Craig, who told police Friday evening that he saw a man who resembled Oswald get into a station wagon driven by a Negro. Evidence, including a bus transfer and Oswald's own admissions, proved Craig's claim to be false. The fact that Curry is still unaware that Oswald took a bus and a cab to Oak Cliff after the shooting, something homicide investigators learned Friday night, demonstrates how little Curry knew about the details of the assassination investigation.

* Quite apart from his unfathomable grief, RFK did not want to attend, finding it difficult to accept that anyone, particularly LBJ, whom he disliked, would be taking his brother's place, and he showed up five minutes late. As alluded to earlier, Johnson had a deep sense of illegitimacy following the assassination and "desperately needed affirmation." Though the American public and Congress gave it to him, it was clear to him RFK had not, and in Bobby's attitude, Johnson felt the rejection of his legitimacy he had feared from others. (Shesol, Mutual Contempt, p.119) "During all of that period," LBJ would later say, "I think [Bobby] seriously considered whether he would let me be president, whether he should really take the position [that] the vice president didn't automatically move in. I thought that was on his mind every time I saw him in the first few days. I think he was seriously considering what steps to take" (Tape-recorded interview of LBJ by William J. Jordan, LBJ Library, Austin, Texas; Shesol, Mutual Contempt, p.119).

‡ Bobby Kennedy agreed to stay on as LBJ's attorney general, if for no other reason than he didn't have anywhere else to go, at least in government. His friend Dean Markham warned RFK that to resign could "boomerang," benefiting Johnson. "Public sentiment will be on his side," Markham told RFK, "and the feeling will be that he tried to cooperate and work with you, but you didn't want to." (Shesol, Mutual Contempt, p.124) After serving as attorney general until September 2, 1964, when he resigned to run for and win the U.S. Senate seat from New York, on March 16, 1968, Kennedy announced his decision to run against Johnson for the Democratic nomination that year, but fifteen days later, on March 31, 1968, Johnson told a stunned nation on national television that he would not seek reelection.

* Not all Americans were accepting of the uninterrupted coverage. All three networks received calls, in the low hundreds, from viewers complaining about the cancellation of their favorite shows and asking when regular programming would be resumed.

‡While the rest of the world, including the Soviet Union, eulogized the slain president, Communist China, in sharp contrast, stood virtually alone, Peking not only not offering condolences and eulogies, but defiling, even ridiculing him. The Official New China News Agency did not let up in its attacks on Kennedy and his successor. The Worker's Daily went so far as to publish a cartoon of Kennedy sprawled face down in blood on the ground, his necktie bearing a dollar sign, with the caption "Kennedy Bites the Dust." (United Press International, November 25, 1963, p.24)

* Depository employees James Jarman Jr., called “Junior” by friends (3 H 198, WCT James Jarman Jr.), and Harold Norman are believed to be the men referred to by Oswald. Both men ate lunch while on the first floor, but both said they did not have lunch with Oswald (3 H 188–189, WCT Harold Norman; Transcript of On Trial, July 28, 1968, p.72 [never saw Oswald after around ten in the morning]; 3 H 201, WCT James Jarman Jr.).

* - The fact that the card contains a photograph at all is evidence of forgery since a genuine Selective Service card, including the one Oswald had in his wallet at the time of his arrest in his own name, does not include a photograph of the card bearer (CE 801, 17 H 686).

* “Those people [press] were in our way every time we moved that man from my office to the jail and back,” Captain Fritz would later tell the Warren Commission. “We had to push him and pull him through the crowd” (15 H 150).

‡But later in the day, Chief Curry does, indeed, identify Molina by name over TV. Indeed, Molina is mentioned over national television on Saturday afternoon as someone who has been a previous subject of U.S. Department of Justice scrutiny as a possible subversive, with the vague implication that, who knows, maybe he could have been involved in the assassination in some way. FBI Director Hoover would later say that there had never been a file on Molina, and he wasn't even known to the FBI prior to November 22, 1963. Molina's wife, Soledad, had dropped him off at police headquarters at City Hall at 9:45 Saturday morning, and between then and 5:00 p.m., when the police drove him home after they were satisfied he had no connection to Oswald or the assassination, he was grilled off and on throughout the day by Dallas police detectives as well as the FBI. Though never told he was under arrest, when he once, between interviews, got up to leave, a Dallas police officer blocked his exit and told him to go sit down. Upon returning home, he learned from a horrified Soledad that he had been all over the news, and cast in a suspicious light. When his Book Depository Building employer thereafter started getting crank calls and warnings from some customers that if the company didn't let the "subversive" working for it go, they would stop doing business with the company, the employer finally let Molina go on December 30, after sixteen years of employment, telling him that automation had required his firing, but he knew better. (6 H 369–371, WCT Joe R. Molina; CE 1937, 23 H 732; CE 2036, 24 H 448–449)

* - Actually, Oswald received an honorable discharge from the Marines following active duty, but later received an “undesirable” discharge from the Marine Corps Reserves because of his defection to the Soviet Union (WR, pp.386–387).

* Contrary to his statement, Curry certainly knew where he had learned that the FBI purportedly had prior contact with Oswald—Lieutenant Jack Revill. It was Revill's memo regarding FBI agent James P. Hosty Jr.'s alleged remarks in the basement of City Hall that had put Curry on alert. And Curry also may have known from Captain Fritz about Hosty's contact with Oswald's wife, which came out the previous day in Fritz's interrogation of Oswald.

* The three other young men in the lineup with Oswald, age twenty-four, were John Thurman Horne, seventeen; David Edmond Knapp, eighteen; and Daniel Gutierrez Lujan, twenty-six (7 H 200, WCT Walter Eugene Potts).

* Oswald's warning was unnecessary. Truth is, the visitors' telephones were not tape-recorded by the police (4 H 154, WCT Jesse E. Curry).

* Mrs. Paine attempted to reach attorney John Abt after six o'clock, as Oswald requested, but was unable to get an answer at either number. She testified that she could not recall if she conveyed the results of her efforts to Oswald during a subsequent conversation at 8:00 p.m. Saturday evening. Mrs. Paine made another attempt to reach Mr. Abt at home on Sunday morning, again without success. (3 H 88-89, WCT Ruth Hyde Paine)

* - Michael Paine had told Fritz that he and Ruth had visited the Oswalds when they lived on Neely Street. Fritz later determined that the photographs were taken in the backyard at Neely. (CE 2003, 24 H 268)

* - Abt testified that he told reporters who called him at his cabin in the Connecticut woods, where he had gone to spend the weekend, that “if I were requested to represent him, it would probably be difficult, if not impossible, for me to do so because of my commitments to other clients.” Abt said he was never contacted directly by Oswald or any member of his family. (10 H 116)

‡ Normally, except in rare instances, men from Sheriff Decker's office handle the transfer of prisoners between the city and county jails. Decker testified that the city police handle "maybe one-tenth of maybe 1 percent" of the transfers (12 H 45).

* - There actually was no person in protective custody as described in the story. Darwin Payne later stated that the report may have been a distorted reference to Howard Brennan, who had been assured by police that he and his home would be under surveillance by law enforcement. (Hlavach and Payne, Reporting the Kennedy Assassination, p.94)

* - There are two jail offices in the police building, one in the basement next to the parking area, the other on the fourth floor.

* See photo section for photo of November 24, 1963, Dallas Times Herald found on the floor at the foot of Ruby's bed after he shot Oswald. The paper is opened to page A3, the facing page, A2, being the "My Dear Caroline" letter. (CE 2426, 25 H 525; WR, p.355)

‡A Dallas police detective, Leonard Mullenax, was shot to death the previous year in a hotel room while working undercover on a drug case. Though Ruby didn't know Mullenax well, he was sufficiently depressed over it to contribute two hundred dollars to his widow, close his club, and take his strippers with him to the funeral. Because of lack of sufficient evidence, Mullenax's alleged killer was never prosecuted. (Kaplan and Waltz, Trial of Jack Ruby, pp.66–67; Hall [C. Ray] Exhibit No. 2, 20 H 43)

* - In accordance with postal regulations, the portion of Oswald's application for his post office box in Dallas that listed names of persons other than the applicant who were entitled to receive mail was thrown away after Oswald closed his box on May 14, 1963 (7 H 527, WCT Harry D. Holmes; Cadigan Exhibit No. 13, 19 H 286). But the New Orleans post office did not comply with this regulation, and that portion of Oswald's application for his New Orleans post office box still existed (7 H 527, WCT Harry D. Holmes).

* Humes completed the autopsy report between 3:00 and 4:00 a.m. EST (1 HSCA 330; ARRB Transcript of Proceedings, Deposition of Dr. James Joseph Humes, February 13, 1996, p.135).

* - There is no evidence that the Fair Play for Cuba Committee in New York ever sent Oswald a letter signed by Alex Hidell.

‡In fact, Oswald appeared on Stuckey's television program once, a related radio program once, and was interviewed once by the press in relation to his court appearance.

* Later investigation revealed that Oswald's encounter was probably with a young, crew-cut WFAA radio newsman named Pierce Allman, who ran into the Depository to telephone the radio station about the shooting. Allman reported encountering a young man on the front steps who pointed toward the telephone inside, although Allman told the Secret Service he couldn't say for sure whether the man was Oswald or not (CD 354, p.2, Secret Service interview of Pierce Allman on January 29, 1964).

* But Holmes testified that Oswald made it clear that “he was still up in the building” when the shooting started and had “rushed downstairs to go out to see what was going on” (7 H 302, 306).

‡ Sorrels probably misspoke here since the Warren Commission investigation never came up with a change-of-address card, if there ever was one, for Oswald in New Orleans. Sorrels probably was referring to the portion of the application for Oswald's post office box in New Orleans that listed "A. J. Hidell" as someone entitled to receive mail through the box.

* As can be seen in the sketch of the layout of the basement in the photo section of this book, looking out from the jail office to the garage basement ahead, there is a traffic lane that starts at the top of the Main Street entrance ramp on the left. The lane descends into the garage basement and continues past the jail office until it exits the basement by way of the Commerce Street ramp on the right. Most of the media are on the far side of the lane behind a railing that runs alongside the lane, their backs to the parking lot behind them, their eyes facing the jail office. To enable those reporters craning their necks behind others to have a better view, Assistant Chief Batchelor has given permission for them to stand in a semicircle extending from the end of the railing across the bottom of the Main Street ramp. However, on their own, many have also spilled over beyond the railing on the Commerce Street side and are on the jail side of the railing close to the armored truck. (15 H 119–120, 12, H 17–18, WCT Charles Batchelor; 12 H 101–102, WCT M. W. Stevenson; Batchelor Exhibit No. 5001, 19 H 116; 12 H 119, WCT Cecil E. Talbert; CE 2179, 24 H 851; Talbert Exhibit No. 5070, 21 H 668; 15 H 150, WCT John Will Fritz)

* - For whatever reason, Brown, not Beck, will end up being behind the wheel of this car (CE 2003, 24 H 295; 12 H 19, WCT Charles Batchelor).

* Roger Mudd was still ten seconds from the end of his piece when the shot was fired. Since CBS television was taping Mudd, it missed the live broadcast from the Dallas basement. Dan Rather partially redeemed CBS's blunder by coming up with the idea of a televised slow-motion playback of the shooting with freeze frames and analysis. This was a national television first, but Dallas's KRLD-TV had been using the technique occasionally for local sporting events. Unbeknownst to Rather and the technicians working with him at KRLD-TV, in New York, Don Hewitt, one of two executive editors of CBS News, was on the telephone trying to reach Rather to suggest the same idea. An hour and a half after the shooting, Rather was on the air with a slow-motion version of the shooting, using a pointer to draw the audience's attention to the critical frames and movements. (However, it was not the first slow-motion showing of the shooting of Oswald [without freeze-frame analysis] on national television. At 12:42 EST, NBC television commentator Frank McGee at NBC headquarters in New York tells his national audience, "We will replay the tape of this bizarre shooting in slow motion.") (Rather with Herskowitz, Camera Never Blinks, pp.120, 139–140; NBC News, Seventy Hours and Thirty Minutes, p.93) In Air Time: The Inside Story of CBS News, author Gary Paul Gates writes, "November 22, 1963, was, in career terms, the most important day in Dan Rather's life. His swift and accurate reporting on the Kennedy assassination and its aftermath that weekend transformed him from a regional journalist into a national correspondent. A few days after the assassination, he received a call from [CBS headquarters in New York] informing him that he was being transferred to Washington to cover the White House" (Gates, Air Time, p.293).

‡However, less than a minute later, CBS headquarters in New York, upon seeing the tape of the shooting from its local affiliate's live coverage in Dallas, which was received over closed circuit in New York, puts the tape on over the network to a national audience (New York Times, November 25, 1963, p.1).

* An FBI examination of Pappas's tape at the FBI laboratory "revealed that no identifiable utterances were made by Ruby at the time he shot Oswald...Two groans are heard on the tape immediately following the shot. However, it cannot be said whether any utterance by Ruby would have been picked up by the microphone at this time" (FBI Record 124-10072-10368, July 17, 1964, Letter from J. Edgar Hoover to J. Lee Rankin; see also CD 1314, July 29, 1964). The Ike Pappas tape recording (CD 1314a) is available at the National Archives and reveals that the shot was fired one minute and fifty-eight seconds after Oswald left the third-floor Homicide and Robbery office (see also 15 H 368-369, WCT Icarus M. Pappas).

The famous photo of Ruby shooting Oswald (see photo section) was snapped by Dallas Times Herald photographer Robert Jackson. It won Jackson a Pulitzer Prize. Another photo, taken six-tenths of a second before by rival Dallas Morning News photographer Jack Beers, did not. Beers's daughter said that this six-tenths of a second bothered her late father to the day he died, her father feeling he had been cheated by fate. He had a "depression that went untreated" and it was "all due to that picture." Bitter and despondent, Beers died of a heart attack in 1975 at the age of fifty-one. (Michael Granberry, "Six Tenths of a Second, Two Lives Forever Changed," Dallas Morning News, June 30, 2002, pp.1A, 33A)

‡The Dallas Police Department had failed to protect the accused presidential assassin, and hence he would never be brought to trial for a jury to decide whether he was guilty, a fact that will reverberate, to the benefit of those who question the official position of the Warren Commission, down through the centuries. “If we had had jurisdiction,” J. Edgar Hoover would later say, “we would have taken custody of him and I do not believe he would have been killed by Rubenstein [Ruby]” (5 H 115).

* There's a rather interesting addendum to this. Although Combest never mentioned this in his testimony before the Warren Commission, he told author Anthony Summers in August of 1978 that Oswald accompanied his shaking of his head with "a definite clenched-fist salute" (Summers, Not in Your Lifetime, p.407 note 85). Anti-conspiracy author Joan Davison wrote in 1983, "When Combest testified [before the Warren Commission] in 1964 he probably didn't know what a clenched-fist salute was. Although the gesture had been a socialist salute in Spain in the 1930's, it didn't become a widely recognized symbol of political militancy in this country until the late 1960's. It was probably then that Combest reinterpreted Oswald's gesture as a political statement. Second, a news photograph taken of Oswald after his arrest [see photo section of this book] shows him raising his right manacled arm in what very clearly appears to be a clenched-fist salute. In any event, a raised fist was Oswald's last comment" (Davison, Oswald's Game, p.254).

Davison limits the salute to Spanish socialists in the 1930s, but no one was watching the Communists more in 1963 than the John Birch Society, and in a February 1964 article in its publication, American Opinion, a contributor wrote that what Oswald gave was "the Communists' clenched-fist salute" (Oliver, "Marksmanship in Dallas," p.14; Oliver Exhibit No. 2, 20 H 721).

* - Prior to the Escobedo case in 1964, federal law enforcement agencies had a policy of doing this, but as indicated earlier, there was no legal requirement that they advise suspects of this constitutional right, and if they didn't, any statement made by the defendant thereafter would be inadmissible at the defendant's trial.

* - During the ceremony, John-John, age three, was kept busy in a room off the rotunda.

* - At midnight, police begin warning those at the rear of the line that extends for miles from the Capitol, that they might as well go home—the rotunda would be closed at nine in the morning in preparation for the burial later that day. Most paid no heed. (New York Times, November 26, 1963, p.10)

* - Fritz may have misspoken here, as there is no evidence that any Dallas officer was stationed at the bottom of the ramp.

‡In a December 6, 1963, meeting between Captain Fritz and Tom Howard, attorney for Jack Ruby, Fritz asked Howard if Ruby knew the officer at the top of the ramp, to which Howard replied no. Fritz asked why, then, did Ruby refuse to discuss this point with him during questioning, and Howard stated that “the reason was because Ruby did not want to get the officer in trouble.” (CE 2025, 24 H 438–439)

* Murray Kempton and James Ridgeway would write in the New Republic, “It had been less than three years since Mr. Kennedy had announced that a new generation was taking up the torch. Now, old General de Gaulle and old Mr. Mikoyan were coming to see him buried” (Kempton and Ridgeway, “Romans,” p.10).

* “How come you weren’t handcuffed to Ruby?” I asked Leavelle. “No need to,” Leavelle said. “Jack wasn’t going anywhere I didn’t want him to. If he did, I’d know where to find him,” he added in the special dry wit of Texans. (Telephone interview of James Leavelle by author on November 19, 2004)

* The idea of the eternal flame at Kennedy's grave site, one that would glow forever, was Jackie's. She had seen one under the Arc de Triomphe in Paris (one of only two in the world, the other at Gettysburg), and insisted on one for her husband, saying she didn't want the country to ever forget him. Her request threw those around her, as well as those in charge of the funeral, into a tizzy, no one knowing how to produce such a device—at one point prompting Richard Goodwin, a JFK assistant and writer, to bark into the phone at an officer at nearby Fort Myers, "If you can design an atomic bomb, you can put a little flame [one that wouldn't die] on the side of that hill." The military ended up passing, resorting instead to the yellow pages of the telephone directory under "Gas Companies," and securing a modified road torch supplied by the Washington Gas & Light Company. (Manchester, Death of a President, pp.550–552)

‡A quarter hour after the Kennedy family had left the cemetery, the president's coffin was lowered into the grave under the vigilant eyes of the network television cameras. It's 3:32 p.m. Three minutes later, under orders from John C. Metzler, Arlington Cemetery's superintendent, the power to the network cameras was cut to allow the final stages of the burial to be carried out in private. Shortly thereafter, the burial vault was sealed, the grave filled with dirt, a picket fence erected around the plot, and the surrounding ground dressed with evergreen boughs and flowers. (Manchester, Death of a President, p.604; 3:32 p.m.: ARRB MD 134, Funeral Arrangements for John Fitzgerald Kennedy, November 25, 1963, p.3, "at precisely 3:32 p.m., the casket was slowly lowered into the ground" see also New York Times, November 26, 1963, pp.2, 4)

* In a court distribution on October 21, 1964, Mrs. Tippit received $312,916 in cash, and a trust fund for $330,946 was set up for the Tippit children. Also, $3,716 went to policemen's and firemen's funds. (“$650,000 for Family of Man Killed by Oswald,” p.9)

At least financially, Mrs. Tippit would now have no worries. In an AP interview during the weekend after her husband's death, Marie Tippit said, “We always kept thinking we'd put money [aside], but with three kids it just never worked out. It was one payday to the next.” Tippit's police salary when he died was $490 per month. She said that to get by, her husband “worked at Austin Barbecue Friday and Saturday nights and at the Stevens Park Theater Sundays.” Her eyes swollen with tears as she sat in her neat, three-bedroom, pink-brick home, she spoke lovingly of her husband. “He was very quiet, likeable—almost a lovable guy...He was a good father. He always told the kids, ‘If you're going to do a job, do it right or not at all.’ There was no hollering around here. He wanted me to stay at home and take care of the children.” (Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 25, 1963, p.2)

* The exact time of the conversation is not known, but we know it was after Oswald's death at 2:07 p.m. EST because Rostow refers to Oswald's death in the conversation.

* Since, as indicated earlier in the text, in 1963 there was no federal jurisdiction over the murder of President Kennedy on a Dallas street (as opposed to on federal property), how did the FBI, a federal agency, even have jurisdiction to investigate the murder? Under Title 18 of Section 372 in the U.S. Code, it was a federal crime (no matter where committed) to conspire to murder any federal official on account of, or while he was engaged in, the lawful discharge of his duties, language that would have covered the murder of the president. And at the time of the assassination, in the eyes of many, including President Johnson, the possibility of a conspiracy was very real. However, the Warren Commission acknowledged that “once it became reasonably clear [they never identified this point in time] that the killing was the act of a single person, the State of Texas had exclusive jurisdiction... [and the FBI handled the investigation thereafter] only upon the sufferance of the local authorities.” (WR, pp.454, 456; 5 H 25, WCT Alan H. Belmont; Cushman, “Why the Warren Commission?” pp.478–479) The above in no way militates against the inherent power of President Johnson to have established, by executive order (11130), the Warren Commission, or that of Congress (by Senate Joint Resolution 137) to have empowered the Commission to issue subpoenas and grant immunity in carrying out its mandate. It only deals with the issue of whether Texas law enforcement or the FBI had investigative jurisdiction over the case.

* - When Johnson telephoned Dulles, who was now in retirement, on November 29 and said, “You’ve got to go on” the Commission “for me,” the always reserved Dulles said, “You think I can really serve you?” “I know you can... There’s not any doubt about it,” Johnson replied, probably thinking of Dulles’s vast experience in the CIA as being helpful in clarifying and evaluating Oswald’s defection to Russia and his trip to Mexico City. “If I can be of any help,” the longtime civil servant said. But perhaps anticipating criticism of his selection, he added, “and you’ve considered the effect of my previous work and my previous job?” “I sure have,” LBJ said. “We want you to do it... that’s that. You always do what’s best [for your country]. I found that out about you a long time ago.” (Telephone conversation between LBJ and Dulles at 5:41 p.m., November 29, 1963, in Holland, Kennedy Assassination Tapes, p.167)

‡As with Warren eighteen years later, Roberts was appointed by the president (Franklin Delano Roosevelt), and the presidential commission he headed and the report it submitted were named after him (Roberts Commission, Roberts Report).

† Courtney Evans, one of Hoover's assistant directors, would later acknowledge what most everyone already knew. "He wanted to get credit for solving [this] thing," Evans said, "and he wanted to get it fast" (Thomas, "Real Cover-Up," p.71).

§ Although Hoover never expressly stated to LBJ his opposition to what LBJ was proposing in lieu of congressional investigations, he did state his opposition to LBJ's proposal of a "high-level" commission in an internal memo to his assistants that day (Church Committee Report, p.46; Memorandum from Hoover to Messrs. Tolson, Belmont, Mohr, DeLoach, Rosen, and Sullivan, November 29, 1963).

^{}—Johnson and Hoover also got into a discussion of the case. Johnson asked Hoover, “How many shots were fired?” “Three,” Hoover replied. “Any of them fired at me?” Johnson inquired. “No. All three at the president.” Hoover went on to illustrate how much confusion there was about the facts of the case, even by the FBI director himself, when he told Johnson that the shot that hit Kennedy in the head “wasn’t shattered” (it was). It was a “complete bullet...that rolled out of the president’s head” at the hospital “and fell onto the stretcher.” (Holland, Kennedy Assassination Tapes, p.141; LBJ Record 177-10001-10237, Transcript of telephone conversation between LBJ and Hoover at 1:40 p.m. on November 29, 1963, LBJ Library)

* One hears various figures for the length of time the Warren Commission was in existence. And I suppose that's because of when one starts counting. The Commission was created on November 29, 1963, but no work was done until December 5, 1963, when the Commission had its first executive session (WR, p.x). It called its first witness on February 3, 1964 (1 H 1), and submitted its final report to the president on September 24, 1964 (Letter from Commission to President Johnson dated September 24, 1964, WR, p.vii). I would think the reasonable computation of time would be from December 5, 1963, to September 24, 1964, a period of a little over nine and a half months.

* The May 17, 1954, landmark decision in Brown v. Board of Education (347 U.S. 483) held that segregation in public schools was prohibited by the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

* On December 13, 1963, Congress passed a joint resolution granting the Commission the power to issue subpoenas, compel testimony, administer oaths, examine witnesses, receive evidence, grant immunity from prosecution, and seek a federal court to hold someone in contempt if he or she refused to give requested testimony (Public Law 88-202, S. J. Res. 137, 88th Congr., 1st sess., December 13, 1963, in WR, pp.473–474).

‡ Although it did not appear in any Commission document, according to J. Edgar Hoover, Olney had a “hostility” toward the FBI, and Commission members Russell, Dulles, and Ford “all threatened to resign if Olney were appointed” (FBI Record 124-10103-10087, Memo from Hoover to Tolson, Belmont, Rosen, and DeLoach, June 22, 1964, p.2).

‡No Texas Court of Inquiry proceedings were ever conducted on the assassination. The Texas attorney general's office worked closely with the FBI and Warren Commission throughout the life of the Warren Commission, helping in the investigation whenever asked, including serving as a liaison between the Commission and the city and county officials of Dallas, and had a representative attend many of the Commission hearings. On October 5, 1964, Texas attorney general Waggoner Carr sent a very thin report (perhaps seven or eight pages stretched out to twenty) to Governor John Connally in which he said he did "not have the slightest hesitancy in concurring in the conclusion of the Warren Commission" that Oswald killed Kennedy and acted alone. (Texas Supplemental Report, pp.8, 10)

* James Malley, the FBI inspector from the bureau's General Investigative Division who was assigned by Hoover to serve as liaison to the Warren Commission, and who led the FBI's field investigation of the assassination, disputes Sullivan's allegations, stating that he was not aware of any negative feelings Hoover had toward the Commission. Malley added that "he would not necessarily trust any statements that [Sullivan] made about the assassination investigation and Director Hoover's role in it." (11 HSCA 54-55; Malley led field investigation: DeLoach, Hoover's FBI, pp.127-128) However, we do know that on December 1, 1963, before the FBI turned over its report on the investigation to the Warren Commission, the Washington Post reported (obviously through a leak) that "all the police agencies with a hand in the investigation...insist that [the case against Oswald] is an unshakable one" (Washington Post, December 1, 1963). And on December 10, the day after the FBI's supposedly secret report on the assassination was delivered to the Commission, the New York Times ran the page-one headline, "Oswald Assassin beyond a Doubt, FBI Concludes," along with an accompanying story announcing the delivery of the report to the Commission and details about the final conclusions reached by the FBI (New York Times, December 10, 1963, p.1). More leaks followed shortly (e.g., "Assassination: History's Jury," pp.25-27).

* A sixty-seven-page supplemental report was sent by the FBI to the Warren Commission on January 13, 1964, with additional exhibits. Most of this supplementary report dealt with Oswald's biography, associates, and affiliations (CD 107). A separate thirty-nine-page FBI report dealing exclusively with Ruby, with emphasis on his background, was also submitted to the Warren Commission on January 13. That same day, the FBI issued a twenty-six-page supplementary report on Ruby, with more emphasis on Ruby's killing of Oswald. Both reports concluded that up to that point the FBI's investigation had not established that Ruby and Oswald had any connection or that Ruby had conspired with anyone to kill Oswald. (Both Ruby reports are listed under FBI Record 124-10062-10290.)

* Rankin would later tell the HSCA that he gave some thought to an independent investigative staff “and I finally concluded that I would lose more than I would gain, that the whole intelligence community in the government would feel that the Commission was indicating a lack of confidence in them and that from then on I would not have any cooperation from them. They would universally be against the Commission and try to trip us up.” He said the Commission, pursuant to his recommendation, made the decision not to employ a separate unit of investigators. (JFK Document 014027, Transcript of deposition of J. Lee Rankin before HSCA on August 17, 1978, pp.43, 97–98) But as we will see (see later text), the Warren Commission did from time to time, on an ad hoc basis, employ independent experts and investigators to verify the conclusions of federal law enforcement agencies.

* - Two misconceptions about the Warren Commission hearings need to be clarified. First, Commission hearings were closed to the public unless the witness appearing before the Commission requested an open hearing. No witness except one (Mark Lane) requested an open hearing, and the testimony of that witness was taken in a public hearing. (WR, p.xiii; 2 H 33, WCT Mark R. Lane) Second, although the hearings (except one) were conducted in private, they were not secret. In a secret hearing, the witness is instructed not to disclose his testimony to any third party, and the hearing testimony is not published for public consumption. The witnesses who appeared before the Commission were free to repeat what they said to anyone they pleased, and all of their testimony was subsequently published in the first fifteen volumes put out by the Warren Commission.

* For yet another example very representative of the Warren Commission's being on top of the details of the assassination and literally directing the FBI's investigation, as opposed to, as commonly believed, being completely reliant on whatever information the bureau chose to give it, see endnote for a verbatim letter from the Warren Commission General Counsel Rankin to FBI Director Hoover dated March 26, 1964.

* The HSCA said that “the FBI’s investigation into a conspiracy was deficient in the areas that the committee decided were most worthy of suspicion—organized crime, pro-and anti-Castro Cubans, and the possible associations of individuals from these areas with Lee Harvey Oswald and Jack Ruby. In those areas in particular, the committee found that the FBI’s investigation was in all likelihood insufficient to have uncovered a conspiracy” (HSCA Report, p.242). Even assuming the FBI could have done a better job in these areas, the HSCA’s observation would have far more virility if, as a result of the committee doing what it said the Warren Commission and FBI should have done (i.e., conduct a more expansive investigation), it had uncovered evidence of a conspiracy. But it did not. So in essence the HSCA is telling the FBI and Warren Commission, “You should have conducted a more in-depth investigation into these three areas so you could have come up with the same conclusion that we did, namely, that there was nothing.” I write this not in defense of the FBI and Warren Commission, but to put the HSCA’s observation into a proper perspective and thereby reduce it to its true dimensions.

* For people to say that the Warren Commission and the FBI conducted a superficial investigation is the equivalent of their saying that they haven't gotten within a hundred miles of the Warren Commission's twenty-seven volumes. Though many don't agree with his conclusions, virtually everyone agrees that the late Warren Commission critic Harold Weisberg studied the Kennedy assassination longer and more thoroughly than any other known person. And he certainly has written the most about it in his eight books. And Weisberg says the Warren Commission "checked into almost every breath Oswald drew." As an example, he says the FBI "traced and chased all over the world those who traveled on the bus to Mexico City with Oswald...to collect every particle of information, no matter how minute, how seemingly inconsequential." (Weisberg, Oswald in New Orleans, p.214) Weisberg's criticism of the Warren Commission dealt mostly with his belief that the Commission itself suppressed much information and that its own documents reveal Oswald's innocence and the existence of a conspiracy. Another severe Warren Commission critic, Sylvia Meagher, acknowledged the Commission's and FBI's "microscopic research into Oswald's life" (Meagher, Accessories after the Fact, p.243).

* Initially, Willens suggested five areas. A sixth, “Presidential Protection,” was added at the Commission’s request. (Epstein, Inquest, p.12)

* Because Epstein's book started as his master's thesis in government at Cornell University and he was a doctoral student at Harvard by the time it was published, most readers assumed its accuracy without question since it came clothed in the robes of academe. But the reality is that although Epstein is far more sensible than most Warren Commission critics, and his book is valuable in that it was, for years, the only in-depth analysis of the inner workings of the Warren Commission and its internal fighting, disputes, and dynamics, it unquestionably suffers from a serious lack of credibility in one of its very most important areas: where he purports to quote Warren Commission staff. The Coleman example cited in the text is just one of many.

In a 1967 article in the Law Quarterly Review, Professor Arthur L. Goodhart, who went directly for confirmation to some of the persons on the Commission staff whom Epstein quoted, published his findings (Goodhart, "Mysteries of the Kennedy Assassination and the English Press," pp.23–63). They were startling. Joe Ball said that all the quotations attributed to him by Epstein were "wrong or false." Wesley Liebeler denied telling Epstein that the Warren Commission members (as opposed to the staff) had done "nothing," and was very angry overall about Epstein's distortions and misstatements in his book. Norman Redlich said, "I am appalled by the inaccuracies of the book and the statements which he has attributed to me which I never made." (Sparrow, After the Assassination, pp.36–37; Roberts, Truth about the Assassination, pp.122–123) And General Counsel J. Lee Rankin told Look magazine about Inquest, "This book is full of distortions" (Knebel, "New Wave of Doubt," p.72).

* This is evident when in reading the testimony of Warren Commission witnesses, one becomes, in many instances, exasperated over a Commission counsel beating around the bush without ever asking the obvious question, sometimes to the point where the witness will volunteer the relevant information without the question having yet been asked. And the lack of trial experience by most of the Warren Commission members and their assistant counsels was particularly betrayed in their frequent failure, at the beginning of their examination of a witness, to get the time and place (i.e., date, time of day, and location) of the event about which the witness would be testifying (something routinely done by experienced trial lawyers), the information coming out in bits and pieces later in the examination. Assistant Counsel Arlen Specter would later speak of the “limited courtroom experience” of the Warren Commission staff as a whole (Specter with Robbins, Passion for Truth, p.47).

‡“I had appeared in court before appellate judges, but had never tried a case or appeared in court at the trial level,” Redlich said (Telephone interview of Norman Redlich by author on September 6, 2005).

* - In testimony before the HSCA, when Marina was asked about the “inconsistencies” of some of her prior statements, which were not given under oath, she said, “At the beginning, if it is possible to understand for people, I am just a human being and I did try to protect Lee...Some things I did not want to talk about because I tried to protect Lee. So they can hold this against me, there is nothing I can do about it. I had to protect myself too. I didn’t have any home to turn back to. I was not eligible or qualified to live right here...But it was not because I was afraid that I might betray some secrets that [I could] be punished for...I swear that I never worked for any government of any country [and] I was not aware of the crime he [Oswald] was planning” (12 HSCA 433). Marina had told the Warren Commission on her first day of testimony in 1964, “You must understand this was my husband. I didn’t want to say too much.” Shortly thereafter, Marina’s Russian interpreter, Leon I. Gopadze, volunteered to the Commission, “She says she was not sworn in before. But now inasmuch as she is sworn in, she is going to tell the truth.” (1 H 14, WCT Marina N. Oswald)

‡ Marina explained to her biographer, Priscilla McMillan, that she didn't tell the authorities about the Walker matter because the attempt by her husband on Walker's life was unsuccessful and Walker was alive. She decided that she would be a witness against him only in a situation where she felt it really mattered. (McMillan, Marina and Lee, p.560; but see also 1 H 18, WCT Marina N. Oswald)

* Although Commission members had their biggest disagreement among themselves over the single-bullet theory (see Zapruder film section), the biggest dispute they had with the staff was in the area of conspiracy. Gerald Ford would recall that “the staff draft said there was no conspiracy. Categorically, saying there was no conspiracy. And the Commission—and I don’t recall who raised the issue—said that goes too far. And so we inserted the language, ‘The Commission found no evidence of a conspiracy’ . . . And there was a unanimous vote to have that language.” (Specter with Robbins, Passion for Truth, pp.119–120)

* In addition to the basic conclusions noted, the Commission found that except for the force required to effect his arrest, Oswald was not subjected to any physical coercion by any law enforcement officials; that he was advised of his rights; and that he was given the opportunity to obtain legal counsel and was even offered legal assistance from the Dallas Bar Association, which he rejected. The Commission also reproached the Dallas Police Department for allowing the press to have uninhibited access to the area through which Oswald had to pass, thereby subjecting Oswald to harassment and creating chaotic conditions not conducive to orderly interrogation; and for making numerous, and sometimes erroneous, statements to the press that would have presented serious obstacles to the obtaining of a fair trial for Oswald. See WR, pp.18–25, for a complete listing of the Commission's twelve conclusions.

* - When even people of the stature of Beschloss and Thomas, and writing with the implied endorsement of an important magazine like Newsweek, say that the Warren Commission engaged in a cover-up, no wonder the vast majority of everyday Americans believe they haven't been told the whole truth about the assassination.

* - Syndicated columnist Jack Anderson came up with a slight variation of this. Anderson felt that because of Johnson's suspicion that Castro was behind the assassination, "President Johnson felt, rightly or wrongly, that the American people could not be told this. They would demand retaliation against Cuba which could have...involved the Soviet Union...and meant World War III. So Johnson and his advisors felt that it was better that Americans not know the truth" (Jack Anderson, "Who Murdered JFK?" An American Exposé/The Jack Anderson Specials, television documentary, Saban Productions, November 1988).

* - And if Lane can mislead his readers about the Katzenbach memo, why can't another conspiracy theorist mislead his students? Michael Kurtz has taught a class on the Kennedy assassination for years at Southeastern Louisiana University. In his conspiracy book, Crime of the Century, he actually writes (and hence, undoubtedly teaches) that "the purpose of such a commission [Warren Commission] was not to investigate the facts of the case. Rather, 'the public must be satisfied that Oswald was the assassin.'" (Kurtz, Crime of the Century, p.144)

Another college professor, Gerald D. McKnight, goes further than Kurtz, telling his readers that not just Katzenbach but also Johnson and Hoover "had settled on...the 'facts' of Dallas that they deemed safe for the ordinary understanding of the American people." The remarkable professor, then, feels that the president of the United States, the head of the FBI, and the nation's acting attorney general all agreed, early on, to cover up the assassination. (McKnight, Breach of Trust, p.22) And McKnight is actually a professor emeritus of history at Hood College in Frederick, Maryland.

* In his testimony before the HSCA on July 28, 1978, Willens was asked, "Were you ever instructed by anyone while you served on the Warren Commission staff not to pursue any area of inquiry because the area might endanger the national security?" Answer: "No." Question: "Did anyone ever suggest to you that certain matters should not be explored for whatever reason?" Answer: "No." (11 HSCA 442)

* Nothing done by the Warren Commission has convinced Americans more of a conspiracy in the assassination than the Commission's allegedly "sealing the records" of the Commission for seventy-five years, thereby preventing Americans from learning "the real truth" about the assassination. The thinking goes that if the Warren Commission didn't have anything to hide, why seal the records? This is a major misconception of the American people, and the entire matter is discussed in depth in an endnote on the Assassination Records Review Board. To summarize, the Warren Commission expressed, in writing, its desire that the American people have access to all the records. The sealing of the records (they are no longer sealed) was the result of a National Archives regulation that had nothing to do with the Warren Commission.

‡ Under Texas law, “The husband and wife may, in all criminal actions, be witnesses for each other; but they shall in no case testify against each other except in a criminal prosecution for an offense committed by one against the other” (Vernon’s Ann. C.C.P. art. 714).

* The mandate of the Church Committee was very broad: to investigate all improper and unlawful activities, domestic and foreign, engaged in by the FBI and CIA as well as American military intelligence agencies. It was not contemplated, however, that it would investigate the allegation that federal intelligence agencies like the CIA and FBI were involved in the murder of President Kennedy. But when a committee member, Senator Richard Schweiker of Pennsylvania, proposed that the committee expand its mandate into an investigation of the assassination, Senator Church appointed Senator Schweiker and fellow committee member Senator Gary Hart of Colorado to be a two-member subcommittee of the Church Committee looking into the assassination. Though it was just a subcommittee of the Church Committee, many assassination researchers refer to the Church Committee as the Schweiker Committee (or Subcommittee). Since the ultimate report on the assassination came from the Church Committee, not the subcommittee, this book will only refer to the Church Committee.

‡In 1969, New Orleans district attorney Jim Garrison charged Clay Shaw, a local businessman, with having conspired “with David W. Ferrie, Lee Harvey Oswald [both of whom were now deceased] and others” to murder President Kennedy. The investigation and trial of Shaw are covered in the conspiracy section of this book.

* The first time the Zapruder film was ever shown to everyday Americans, albeit a very small number, was when Jim Garrison subpoenaed the film from Life magazine on February 13, 1969, and showed a multigenerational copy of it to the jury and a packed courtroom of spectators in the trial of Clay Shaw. And starting with its November 29, 1963, issue, Life magazine showed selected frames of the Zapruder film to its millions of readers at various times, such as in its undated memorial edition in December 1963 and its October 2, 1964, cover story on the Warren Commission's findings.

* Sprague said the budget for the second year would be for the same amount—a total of $13 million, more than the $10 million the Warren Commission spent. However, he pointed out that in addition to the HSCA also investigating the assassination of Martin Luther King, the HSCA would be employing and paying for its own investigators, whereas the Warren Commission's eighty-three-member staff was supplemented by 222 investigators borrowed from the FBI, CIA, and Secret Service, whose services the Warren Commission never had to pay for. (New York Times, December 10, 1976, p.19)

* On February 2, by a vote of 237 to 164, the House of Representatives (House Resolution 222) had given the HSCA the authority to continue temporarily.

‡The lobbying of congressional members to get the HSCA reconstituted, mostly delegated by Sprague to Tanenbaum and his staff, was heavy, time-consuming, and not always pleasant. At a dinner meeting with several congressmen at a restaurant called the Chicken Place in Maryland, after Tanenbaum made his pitch, John Ashbrook, a conservative Republican from Ohio, said, “Well, we really don’t mind funding the Kennedy assassination, although I didn’t think much of the man, but we’ll be damned if we’re going to fund that nigger King’s.” (Telephone interview of Robert Tanenbaum by author on March 10, 2004. See also Fonzi, Last Investigation, pp.204–205. Gaeton Fonzi says Ashbrook called Tanenbaum aside to tell him this, but Tanenbaum told me it was right at the dinner table in front of everyone.)

‡At an April 11, 1977, press conference after he left the HSCA, Sprague described Gonzalez's conduct as "McCarthyism," but added that he had also begun to have friction with Gonzalez's successor, Stokes, before he left, though he did not elaborate (New York Times, April 12, 1977, p.18).

* The mandate of the final HSCA had been set forth in the earlier, September 1976 House resolution, as well as House Resolution 222 on February 2, 1977, which authorized the HSCA to “conduct a full and complete investigation” of the assassination of President John F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King, each crime the province of a separate subcommittee. The eventual, permanent Kennedy subcommittee was chaired by Representative Richardson Preyer of North Carolina, the King subcommittee by Walter Fauntroy. Each subcommittee had its own task force, each headed by a deputy chief counsel: Gary T. Cornwell for the Kennedy investigation, Gene R. Johnson for the King investigation. Each task force comprised a dozen or so senior and junior staff counsels, investigators, researchers, and administrative personnel. (HSCA Report, pp.9–10, 514) On April 28, the funding of the committee for 1977 was cut drastically to $2.5 million (Blakey and Billings, Plot to Kill the President, p.67).

* Although Blakey and his staff brought in many highly qualified experts in various fields to answer these questions (which applied equally to the King assassination), no one on the HSCA legal staff could compare with Sprague and Tanenbaum in the area of experience in handling major criminal murder investigations and prosecutions.

* - Compare that to the report of the Warren Commission, which was unanimously agreed upon by all seven members.

* Although Blakey, as chief counsel for the HSCA, had much influence on the direction of the investigation toward organized crime more than any other alleged conspiratorial group, he turned out to have little, if any, influence on the committee's ultimate conclusion. The HSCA said the same thing about individual members of anti-Castro Cuban groups as it did about organized crime, and no one was pushing the HSCA toward its conclusion about the anti-Castro Cubans.

‡Blakey's conclusion of the mob being behind the assassination is quite surprising given his background, inasmuch as the murder of Kennedy bore none of the indications of a mob hit. And with the mob's history of never going after public figures, starting out with the most powerful man on earth is more than improbable. It's completely far-fetched. (See organized-crime section for full discussion of issue.) And here we had Blakey—who had worked in the organized-crime section of the Justice Department under RFK, was considered one of the country's top experts in the field of organized crime, and was a fixture at organized-crime seminars, having personal contacts with detectives in the organized-crime section of every major police department in the country—reaching that precise conclusion.

It must be noted that other than the acoustical fourth-shot conclusion of the HSCA, which, as indicated, has been completely discredited, the HSCA in large part did an excellent job of reinvestigating the assassination of President Kennedy, and much of the credit for this has to go to Blakey, who shepherded the investigation. This is why it is further surprising to me that someone of Blakey's stature could say "the mob did it," and then proceed to write a book (Blakey and Billings, Plot to Kill the President) that doesn't offer one piece of credible evidence to support his conclusion.

* There was one other “investigation” of the assassination. Though under the auspices of the federal government, it was an unauthorized one. On October 26, 1992, Congress enacted “The President John F. Kennedy Assassination Records Collection Act of 1992,” popularly referred to as the “JFK Act,” to release to the American public all previously classified documents relating to the assassination. Pursuant to the JFK Act, the Assassination Records Review Board (ARRB) was created to implement the objective of the act, and the board was in operation from October 1, 1994, to September 30, 1998, a period of exactly four years. Among the documents released, not one remotely resembling a smoking gun was found that would call into question the findings and conclusion of the Warren Commission. As the reader will see, particularly in the section on the president’s autopsy, certain overzealous members of the ARRB staff took it upon themselves to go beyond the ARRB’s limited mandate to release assassination-related documents, and decided to investigate what they perceived to be certain acts of conspiracy in the assassination. For those readers who want to know all about the ARRB and what it achieved, see endnote to this section.

* - Though the autopsy surgeons should have used the more conventional technique of setting forth distances from the top of the head (or soles of the feet for lower wounds) and the midline of the body, the HSCA's language here is loose and very misleading. The autopsy report did say that the entrance wound in the back was "situated on the upper right posterior thorax just above the upper border of the scapula... This wound is measured to be 14 cm. from the tip of the right acromium process and 14 cm. below the tip of the right mastoid process." The autopsy report said that the exit wound in the throat was "situated in the low anterior neck at approximately the level of the third and fourth tracheal rings." And with respect to the head wound, the autopsy report said it was "situated in the posterior scalp approximately 2.5 cm. laterally to the right and slightly above the external occipital protuberance." (CE 387, 16 H 980-981) What person reading the HSCA's harsh criticism would imagine that the above words appeared in the autopsy report?

‡Normally, a medicolegal autopsy is part of a criminal investigation by a forensic pathologist—a pathologist who has a thorough understanding of death by so-called unnatural causes (homicide, suicide, and accidents)—who evaluates the circumstances of the death, including anticipating and answering questions that might arise later in legal proceedings. Forensic pathology, per Dr. Baden, is an “untaught speciality, a stepchild of the medical profession.” The only way to learn the specialization is to serve, after graduation from medical school, in a medical examiner’s office. (Baden with Hennessee, Unnatural Death, pp.ix–x) The medicolegal autopsy is often a multidisciplinary effort that requires the cooperation of and continuing communication with other scientific disciplines like toxicology, anthropology, and odontology. And in a criminal case, the pathologist works closely with the prosecutor and chief detective on the case as well as representatives from the crime laboratory of the law enforcement agency having jurisdiction.

* When Dr. Michael Baden of the HSCA's forensic panel asked Dr. John Ebersole, the assistant chief of radiology at Bethesda who was present at the autopsy, if he had any impression "that somebody in the room was in any way giving orders" to Humes "as to how the autopsy should be done," Ebersole responded, "Absolutely not" (Transcript of hearings before HSCA medical panel, March 11, 1978, p.15).

* Perhaps one of the best indicators that Humes was not out of his depth during the autopsy is a reading of his testimony before the Warren Commission in 1964, or better yet, before the HSCA forensic pathology panel on September 16, 1977, when he was, in effect, grilled by some of the top medical examiners in the land (e.g., Drs. Baden, Petty, John Coe, Joseph Davis, etc.) not only on the president's autopsy but also on the extremely complex interpretation of the autopsy photos and X-rays taken under Humes's direction at the time of the autopsy (2 H 347–376, WCT Dr. James J. Humes; 7 HSCA 243–265, Transcript of Dr. Humes's testimony before the HSCA). I didn't get the slightest impression from the give-and-take that major leaguers (the forensic panel) were talking to a minor leaguer, or, if we're to believe Dr. Helpert, a sandlotter. It couldn't be more obvious that Humes spoke knowledgeably and confidently about all aspects of the autopsy.

* - That may have been his main mission, but Finck acknowledged that “although to start with I was there as a consultant” to study the wounds, he very definitely became “a part of the autopsy team,” signing, with Boswell and Humes, the autopsy report as one of the three autopsy surgeons (HSCA Record 180-10102-10409, p. 71; CE 387, 16 H 983). Indeed, FBI agent Francis X. O’Neill, who was present throughout the autopsy, told the HSCA that Finck seemed to “take over the autopsy when he arrived” (JFK Document 006185, HSCA staff interview of O’Neill on January 10, 1978, p.6).

* - In addition to the three pathologists who conducted the autopsy, just who were all of these other pathologists who agreed 100 percent with the conclusion of the autopsy surgeons? Were they qualified experts? You be the judge. Dr. Wecht estimates that the following pathologists had collectively conducted “around 100,000 autopsies” by the time of their work on the Kennedy case. As of 1978, when he was on the HSCA forensic pathology panel, he alone had conducted “around 6,000” autopsies. (Telephone interview of Dr. Cyril Wecht by author on October 22, 2002) HSCA: Dr. Michael M. Baden, chief medical examiner (coroner) of New York City; Dr. John I. Coe, chief medical examiner of Hennepin County, Minneapolis, Minnesota; Dr. Joseph Davis, chief medical examiner of Dade County, Miami, Florida; Dr. George S. Loquvam, director of the Institute of Forensic Science, Oakland, California; Dr. Charles S. Petty, chief medical examiner, Dallas County, Dallas, Texas; Dr. Earl Rose, professor of pathology, University of Iowa, Iowa City, Iowa; Dr. Werner V. Spitz, chief medical examiner, Wayne County, Detroit, Michigan; Dr. James T. Weston, chief medical investigator, University of New Mexico School of Medicine, Albuquerque, New Mexico; and Dr. Cyril H. Wecht, coroner of Allegheny County, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Clark Panel: Dr. William H. Carnes, professor of pathology, University of Utah, Salt Lake City, Utah; Dr. Russell S. Fisher, professor of forensic pathology, University of Maryland, Baltimore, Maryland; and Dr. Alan R. Moritz, professor of pathology, Case Western Reserve University, Cleveland, Ohio, and former professor of forensic medicine, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts. Dr. Wecht said that between them, Fisher and Moritz, two of the most experienced forensic pathologists in the field, would have conducted “upwards of 30,000 autopsies” at the time. (The panel also included Dr. Russell H. Morgan, professor of radiology, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Maryland.) Rockefeller Commission: Lieutenant Colonel Robert R. McMeekin, chief, division of aerospace pathology, Armed Forces Institute of Pathology, Washington, D.C.; Dr. Werner V. Spitz (see HSCA above); and Dr. Richard Lindenberg, director of neuropathology and legal medicine, state of Maryland, Baltimore, Maryland. (The commission also included Dr. Fred J. Hodges, professor of radiology, Johns Hopkins School of Medicine, Baltimore, Maryland, and Alfred G. Olivier, chief of the Wound Ballistics Branch at the U.S. Army’s Edgewood Arsenal in Maryland.)

* Much has been made in the assassination literature of the fact that the autopsy surgeons were wrong on the location of the entrance wound. But is there any real significance to the head entrance wound being 3 inches higher than the autopsy surgeons said it was other than as a reflection on the alleged incompetence of the surgeons? “No, not really,” Dr. Werner Spitz, the German-born member of the HSCA’s forensic pathology panel and the Rockefeller Commission, said. “It’s just a red herring. We know from the autopsy photos and X-rays that there was only one entrance wound to the back of the president’s head. The only significance this matter has is academic. If the bullet had entered where the autopsy surgeons said it did—and we know from the photos and X-rays they were wrong—it would have been an unusual deflection for the bullet to have exited where it did. This was a military-type bullet and it is unlikely that it would be deflected so sharply upwards” (Telephone interview of Dr. Werner Spitz by author on March 26, 2005).

* Ten centimeters, which is close to 4 inches, was bandied loosely about, including by the HSCA (7 HSCA107), ever since the Clark Panel said the wound was “100 millimeters” (10 centimeters) above the external occipital protuberance. But as indicated, the more precise measurement was 9 centimeters.

* The outwardly exploding bullet in the parietal area lifted “a large plate of [parietal] bone upward,” causing it to “protrude from the wound” (Sullivan, Faccio, Levy, and Grossman, “Assassination of President John F. Kennedy: A Neuroforensic Analysis—Part 1,” p.1023).

‡Dr. Alfred G. Olivier, chief of the Wound Ballistics Branch at the U.S. Army's Edgewood Arsenal in Maryland, supervised experiments in 1964 in which Western Cartridge 6.5-millimeter bullets were fired from Oswald's Mannlicher-Carcano rifle (at the appropriate distance, simulating that from the sixth-floor window to the point on Elm Street where Kennedy was struck in the head) at reconstructed and inert human skulls filled with a 20 percent gelatin substance to see whether the president's exit head wound could have been caused by the subject rifle and bullets. In one skull that was struck at a point closely approximating the wound of entry to the backside of Kennedy's head, the bullet "blew out the right side of the reconstructed skull in a manner very similar to the head wound of the president." (WR, p.87; CE 861–862, 17 H 854; 5 H 75–77, 87, 89, WCT Dr. Alfred G. Olivier)

‡As can be seen, the autopsy surgeons saw the X-rays they took of the president's body. "We had to see those right then as part of our examination," Dr. Humes said, and "the X-rays were developed in our X-ray department right on the spot." However, the photos taken of the president during the autopsy were not seen by them that night or before the autopsy report was prepared. "They were turned over to the Secret Service in their cassettes unexposed [that night], and I have not seen any of them since," Dr. Humes told the Warren Commission. (2 H 372, WCT Dr. James J. Humes; ARRB Transcript of Proceedings, Deposition of Dr. James Joseph Humes, February 13, 1996, pp.96–98) The first time Humes saw the autopsy photos was at the National Archives, and Boswell at the National Archives, on November 1, 1966 (ARRB Transcript of Proceedings, Deposition of Dr. James Joseph Humes, February 13, 1996, p.96; HSCA Record 180-10093-10429, HSCA interview of James Humes on August 17, 1977, p.7); HSCA Record 180-10097-10151, p.1, January 26, 1967). Dr. Pierre Finck didn't see the photographs at the archives until January 20, 1967 (HSCA Record 180-10097-10151).

* Though Ernest Hemingway once opined that the only difference between the rich and the poor is that the rich have more money, it has been said that old wealth comes through, regardless of the raiments worn by their possessors; that there is a well-scrubbed aspect to those born to the manor; and that the wealth is even heard in their voices. But President Kennedy, a Brahmin by birth and rearing, though dressing in an understated fashion—as is the usual custom of the privileged class—was clothed in the finest of garments and accessories on November 22, 1963. Though the FBI didn't note the make of Kennedy's gray suit, it was well known that he bought his suits at Brooks Brothers, the oldest haberdashers in America dating back to 1818, and in 1963 a more exclusive store than it is today. His black leather belt, size 34, was made by Farnsworth-Reed. The blue-and-white striped shirt he wore was custom made by Charles Dillon shirtmakers at 444 Park Avenue, New York. His white shorts were made for Brooks Brothers by D. & G. Anderson, Scotland. His size 10½ shoes were black moccasin, no make given. He had a white linen handkerchief, and a tortoiseshell comb by Kent of London. (HSCA Record 180-10087-10096, Report of FBI agent Robert L. Bouck, November 23, 1963) He was wearing a gold Cartier wristwatch with a black leather band (HSCA Record 180-10087-10095, December 2, 1963). His blue silk tie was labeled "Monsieur" Christian Dior.

* Dr. Finck reported that the tie worn by Kennedy showed “a tear of the cloth to the left side of the knot and corresponding to the two anterior holes in the shirt. The tie knot was not perforated but glanced by the bullet, which is indicated by the fact that the white padding of the tie is visible and... the blue cloth on the internal aspect of the knot is intact, which indicates a tangential path of the left side in relation to the knot.” (AFIP Record 205-10001-10002, Memorandum, Finck to Blumberg, p.7; also ARRB MD 28) The tear to the tie was described by the FBI laboratory as a “small elongated nick” on the “left side of the knot of the tie” (CD 205, p.154; 5 H 62, WCT Robert A. Frazier; 7 HSCA 89). An FBI examination found no metallic residue on this nick in the tie, and unlike the shirt, the FBI could not find any characteristic disturbance in the fabric around the tie hole that “would permit any conclusion” as to the direction of the missile (5 H 62, WCT Robert A. Frazier; 7 HSCA 89–90; FBI Record 124-10024-10173; Gallagher Exhibit No. 1, 20 H 2).

‡Warren Commission critics have pointed out that Dr. Perry told Dr. Humes that the wound in the throat was 3 to 5 millimeters in size (CE 397, 17 H 29), and a 6.5-millimeter bullet that did not fragment (as we know Commission Exhibit No. 399, as opposed to the later bullet that struck the president in the head, did not) could not exit through a hole “between 3 and 5 millimeters in diameter” (Thompson, Six Seconds in Dallas, p.51). But clearly, Perry had to be wrong in his estimate of the size of the wound, since there is no evidence the bullet that entered the president’s back exited anywhere else, and no bullet was found inside the president’s body. Moreover, Perry, who later told the Warren Commission that the wound was “perhaps 5 millimeters in diameter,” admitted that he “did not examine [the wound] minutely,” giving it and the head exit wound a “ cursory examination” (6 H 15, 3 H 368, 375). The critics never mention, naturally, that Dr. James Carrico, the first Parkland doctor to see the president, estimated the throat wound to be “5 to 8 millimeters in size” (3 H 361), which would be consistent with the exit wound of a 6.5-millimeter bullet.

* For years, one of the very biggest allegations among conspiracy theorists is that every one or virtually all of the Parkland doctors said the exit wound was to the rear or right rear of the president's head, which would be in direct contradiction of the autopsy findings. An example: "All the doctors and nurses at Parkland Hospital who saw the body described a large exit wound in the back of the President's head" (Grodan and Livingstone, High Treason, p.26). But this is simply not true. A significant minority of Parkland doctors saw the exit wound essentially, or close to, where the autopsy and X-rays clearly showed it to be. Dr. Charles Baxter testified that the head exit wound was in the "temporal and parietal" area (6 H 44), as all the later scientific and medical evidence proved. Dr. Robert Grossman, the neurosurgeon who accompanied Dr. William Kemp Clark, the chief neurosurgeon at Parkland Hospital, into Trauma Room One, said that the large defect he saw was "in the parietal area above the right ear" (Ben Bradlee, "Dispute on JFK Assassination Evidence Persists," Boston Globe, June 21, 1981, p.A23), although Grossman's credibility on this matter may be questioned (see endnote). Dr. Adolph Giesecke Jr. testified the exit wound extended "from the brow line [ridge above eye] to the occiput on the left [sic] hand side of the head" (6 H 74). Dr. Marion T. Jenkins, the Parkland anesthesiologist, said he saw "a great laceration on the right side of the head (temporal and occipital)" (CE 392, 17 H 15). Dr. Kenneth Salyer told the Warren Commission that the exit wound was in the "right temporal region" (6 H 81). And Dr. Donald Seldin, chairman of the Department of Medicine at Parkland, said that "the entire frontal, parietal and temporal bones were shattered...I believe that the official story is accurate in all details" (Letter from Dr. Donald Seldin to Vince Palamara dated August 27, 1998).

* - It clearly appears that Dr. McClelland is telling the truth on his accusation. In author Gerald Posner's book, Case Closed, he writes that Dr. Jenkins told him what happened. "When Bob McClelland came into the room, he asked me, 'Where are his wounds?' And at that time I was operating a breathing bag with my right hand, and was trying to take the President's temporal pulse, and I had my finger on his left temple. Bob thought I pointed to the left temple as the wound" (Posner, Case Closed, p.313 footnote). It's rather amazing that Jenkins would say this when close to thirty years earlier, when he testified on the record before the Warren Commission, he said, "I don't know whether this is right or not, but I thought there was a wound on the left temporal area" (6 H 48).

*- I sought the advice of Dr. Baden on many of the medical issues in this case because of his background and qualifications. A board-certified forensic pathologist who is presently the codirector of the New York State Police Medicolegal Investigative Unit, he has an impressive curriculum vitae. Among many other things, he has been the chief medical examiner for New York City; been the president of the Society of Medical Jurisprudence; held professional appointments at several institutions of higher learning, including New York Law School and the Albert Einstein Medical School; and served as an expert in forensic pathology on numerous prominent cases, among them the examination of the remains of Czar Nicholas of Russia and his family, the reexamination of the Lindbergh kidnapping and murder, autopsies of the victims of TWA Flight 800, and the O. J. Simpson and Claus von Bulow murder trials. He has written a number of articles in medicolegal professional publications and coauthored the book Unnatural Death: Confessions of a Medical Examiner. Most importantly, of course, I sought him out because he was the chairman of the nine-member forensic pathology panel of the HSCA's investigation into the deaths of President Kennedy and Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., a chairmanship that shows the very high esteem he has in his profession.

* - Baden said that Kennedy's head wasn't even shaved of its hair at the time of the autopsy, and hence, any observations by onlookers of the autopsy (as opposed, he said, to the autopsy surgeons themselves, who were working directly with the president's head) would also likely have been skewed.

‡ In an assertion by the HSCA forensic pathology panel that is so incorrect it can only be categorized as strange, someone (no one, thus far, has admitted authorship) wrote, “In disagreement with the observations of the Parkland doctors are the 26 people present at the autopsy. All of those interviewed who attended the autopsy corroborated the general location of the wounds as depicted in the [autopsy] photographs; none had differing accounts” (7 HSCA 37). However, though they clearly were wrong, several autopsy witnesses thought the exit wound was to the right rear or rear of the president’s head.

* Sibert's 1977 drawings for the HSCA place the head wound square in the back of the head. Shown the drawings in his appearance before the ARRB in 1997, Sibert, who didn't recall making them, said, "I would have moved [the wound on the back of the head] over a little bit to the right on the back of his head here, rather than dead center" (ARRB Transcript of Proceedings, Deposition of James W. Sibert, September 11, 1997, p.70). O'Neill's 1997 drawing for the AARB shows the exit wound encompassing the right-rear quadrant of the head (ARRB MD 86, Interview Report of Francis X. O'Neill, January 10, 1978, pp.10-11). In an October 24, 1978, affidavit to the HSCA, Sibert said there was "a large head wound in the upper back of the head." But in a November 8, 1978, affidavit to the HSCA, he said "the massive head wound pointed towards the right side of the head." It is instructive to note that there was an increased likelihood for Agents Sibert and O'Neill to make an error in the placement of the wound because as Sibert testified before the ARRB—and he told me in a telephone interview—he and O'Neill were standing next to each other at the head of the autopsy table, looking at the top of the president's head (as he lay on the autopsy table) rather than the side of his head. (Telephone interview of James Sibert by author on July 21, 2000; ARRB Transcript of Proceedings, Deposition of James W. Sibert, September 11, 1997, p.123) Dr. Boswell said in 1994 that the "FBI people...were never out of the morgue. They stayed there the entire time and...stayed on the telephone [in a May 7, 1992, JAMA interview, Boswell said the agents were "talking on their radios to people outside the room"] all the time...They were causing an awful lot of distraction" (Transcript of taped telephone interview of Dr. J. Thornton Boswell by Dr. Gary Aguilar on March 8, 1994, p.7). And while causing a distraction they were obviously distracted themselves—hardly reliable, percipient witnesses to the precise location of the president's wounds.

* Abraham Zapruder himself, who was looking through the zoom lens of his camera at the moment the president was struck in the head, testified that he saw the right side of Kennedy's head open up and brain matter spray out (7 H 571–572). In his office, within an hour of the shooting, Zapruder was interviewed by Dallas Times Herald writer Darwin Payne. Payne's shorthand notes reflect Zapruder telling him that blood was coming out the "side" of Kennedy's head, that it "looked like blobs out of his temple...forehead" (Trask, National Nightmare, p.97). And at about 2:10 on the afternoon of the assassination, during a live interview with Dallas's WFAA-TV program director, Jay Watson, Zapruder put his hand to the right front side of his head to demonstrate where he saw the president's head "practically open up" (Trask, Pictures of the Pain, pp.77–78).

* The fifteen were the three pathologists who conducted the autopsy of the president on the night of the assassination (CE 387, 16 H 983), the nine doctors in 1978 on the forensic pathology panel of the HSCA, and the three pathologists in 1968 on the Clark Panel (ARRB MD 59, Clark Panel Report, 1968, p.15). The 1975 Rockefeller Commission did not address itself to the back and throat wounds, only focusing in on the allegation by conspiracy theorists that Kennedy was struck in the head by a shot fired from the grassy knoll.

‡Of course, when a bullet entering the body passes through soft tissue before it exits, the exit wound is going to be as small or almost as small (and as circular or almost as circular) as the entrance wound. Striking bone damages the bullet, normally causing it to leave a ragged, irregular, and larger exit hole. The bullet that entered the president's body in the upper right part of his back only passed through soft tissue before exiting from his throat (CE 387, 16 H 983).

‡The Warren Commission, in a transparent effort to reconcile Perry's remarks with its ultimate conclusion, selectively cited the November 23 New York Herald Tribune's account of the press conference, which quoted Perry as only saying it was "possible" the wound in the throat was an entrance wound (WR, pp.90–91). But Tom Wicker of the New York Times, who attended the conference, got the distinct impression from Perry that the wound "had the appearance of a bullet's entry" (New York Times, November 23, 1963, p.2; Gary L. Aguilar and Kathy Cunningham, "How Five Investigations into JFK's Medical/Autopsy Evidence Got It Wrong," May 2003, p.2, available at <http://www.history-matters.com/essays/jfkmed/How5Investigations/>).

* There is also testimony that may corroborate the presence of Crenshaw's "mysterious stranger," but once again the facts are less sensational. Homicide detective L. C. Graves, one of the two Dallas detectives who were escorting Oswald at the time he was shot by Ruby, testified that he rode in the ambulance to Parkland Hospital, changed into "one of those scrub uniforms and crepe-soled shoes," and stationed himself outside the second-floor operating-room door, where he was joined later by an FBI agent. Crenshaw may have been referring to Graves, who said he remained at the door until Oswald was declared dead, then made arrangements for an autopsy and security in the morgue. (13 H 9-10, WCT L. C. Graves)

‡The first entry in the White House Detail for November 24, 1963, records an 8:30 a.m. breakfast in bed by the president and his wife at their home, “The Elms,” and the entries end with a telephone call by the president from his home to a “Judge Moursand” at 11:15 p.m.

The relevant times for any alleged call by LBJ to the operating room at Parkland are from 11:32 a.m. (12:32 p.m. EST), when Oswald was brought into the emergency room at Parkland, to 11:42 a.m. (12:42 p.m. EST), when he was brought into the operating room, to 1:07 p.m. (2:07 p.m. EST), when Oswald was pronounced dead. (Times of Oswald at Parkland: “Three Patients at Parkland,” p.71)

The White House Detail entries between 12:26 p.m. and 2:19 p.m. EST, which would encompass the 12:32 p.m. to 2:07 p.m. time frame, are these: “12:26 p.m. After having coffee with members of the [St. Mark’s Church] congregation, the President, accompanied by Mrs. Johnson, departed church; 12:35 p.m. Arrived at North Portico of the White House; 12:45 President Johnson called Secy. [of State Dean] Rusk, probably to have him join Pres. after ceremonies at the Capitol since Secy. Rusk did join Pres. at EOB [Executive Office Building] at 2:40 p.m.; 1:08 p.m. The President, accompanied by Mrs. Kennedy, Mrs. Johnson, The Attorney General, Caroline & John Jr. Kennedy and Colonel Jackson departed the White House in the Funeral Procession; 1:46 p.m. Arrived at Steps of the Capitol; 2:19 p.m. The President, accompanied by Colonel Jackson, departed the Capitol.” (White House Detail, November 24, 1963)

* The downward angle of a bullet striking President Kennedy between Zapruder frames 190 and 225, the period during which most agree he was hit, was found to range between 16 and 21 degrees, with the angle decreasing as the limousine moved farther away from the muzzle (6 HSCA 34; WR, pp.105–107; 5 H 162, WCT Lyndal L. Shaneyfelt; HSCA Report, p.82).

* - There is no question that the Warren Commission staff was aware of how Dr. Humes described the location of the wound in his autopsy report. For example, Commission counsel asked Dr. Malcolm Perry, “And have you noted in the autopsy report the reference to the presence of a wound on the upper right posterior thorax just above the upper border of the scapula?” (6 H 14, WCT Dr. Malcolm O. Perry; see also 2 H 351, WCT Dr. James J. Humes)

* - The fact that Humes, when he gave this categorical answer, had no way of knowing if the photographs and X-rays, when they emerged at some point in the future, would confirm or refute his testimony, is fairly strong circumstantial evidence that he was very confident in the correctness of his conclusions, indicating not only that the conclusion he reached was very obvious to him, but also that he was no insecure amateur doing a professional's work, as Warren Commission critics want everyone to believe.

‡In an informative behind-the-scenes look in 1992 at the operation of the Warren Commission, in which the twelve surviving assistant counsels on the Warren Commission staff as well as the lone surviving Commission member, Gerald Ford, were interviewed, U.S. News & World Report disclosed that Robert Kennedy gave his family's approval for Chief Justice Warren and Commission counsel Lee Rankin to look at the photos, but only Warren elected to see them (Gest, Shapiro, Bowermaster, and Geier, "JFK: The Untold Story of the Warren Commission," p.40). See also endnote for fact that Warren Commission assistant counsel Arlen Specter was privately shown one autopsy photo by a Secret Service official while on a trip to Dallas.

* Chief Justice Warren's fears were not unfounded. In 1991, Robert J. Groden, a leading conspiracy theorist and consultant to the HSCA's photographic panel, sold pirated copies of the gruesome color photographs taken at the autopsy, along with an accompanying story, for $50,000 to the tabloid Globe, which published them on the front cover (and across five internal pages) under banner headlines like "Shocking Autopsy Photos Blow Lid Off J.F.K. Cover-Up!" "Jackie Crawled Out of Limo to Grab Her Dying Hubby's Brains—and She Had Them in Her Hand!" and "JFK Autopsy Photos Were Faked & Here's How & Why Feds Did It" (Ken Harrell, "Shocking Autopsy Photos Blow Lid Off J.F.K. Cover-Up!" Globe, December 31, 1991; Reporters Daily Transcript, Superior Court of the State of California for the County of Los Angeles, Sharon Rufo, et al., Plaintiffs, vs. Orenthal James Simpson, et al., Defendants, Case No. SC031947, December 20, 1996, vol.36, pp.60–63).

‡ This suggests that the Kennedy family did not care, but they did and they let their reservations be known to the Commission. Warren goes on in his book to indicate this (Warren, Memoirs, p.372).

* - In his final summation, Spence argued, “I’ll tell you this much, if one of us was charged with murder, and the most important piece of evidence in the whole trial was gone, and it was evidence that we needed to prove our innocence, we needed it to prove our innocence, and it was gone...what would we say? We would say, ‘What has happened to this country?’ We would say, ‘What kind of procedure is this?’ We would say, ‘What kind of judicial system is this?’ We would say, ‘What’s going on with the FBI?’ ...I can hear Lee Oswald saying, ‘I’m a patsy’” (Transcript of On Trial, July 25, 1986, p.1015).

* Mrs. Lincoln mentioned in a 1978 interview that although “she had no intention of looking inside the various containers [within the trunk] because she was very upset about the assassination of the president and was upset at the prospect of having to handle the autopsy materials,” she was very careful with them “and noted that they fit neatly into the trunk,” indicating that at some point she did look inside the footlocker (HSCA Record 180-10077-10138, Interview of Mrs. Evelyn Lincoln, July 5, 1978, pp.5–6; also ARRB MD 128).

* In a similar vein, and fortifying the natural inference that RFK (or, for that matter, any member of the Kennedy family) would have had every motive to have expropriated his brother's brain, on April 5, 1988, RFK's brother-in-law, Stephen Smith, telephoned Los Angeles County deputy district attorney Steven Sowders, and asked him, on behalf of RFK's widow, Ethel, to return RFK's bloodstained suit jacket and shirt to her from his assassination in Los Angeles in June of 1968, and if that couldn't be done, to make sure that these items were kept at the DA's office and never given to any third party. Sowders said RFK's clothing was not returned to the Kennedy family, and is still in the office's "evidence locker," not available for public scrutiny. (Telephone interviews of Steven Sowders by author on July 20, 1999, and June 25, 2002; see also Washington Post, April 20, 1988, p.C3) Greg Stone, a dedicated student of the RFK assassination who got to know the Kennedy family, told me years ago that the family didn't want RFK's clothing on display anywhere for the public.

* - The Kennedy's infant son Patrick, who died in August of 1963 after only thirty-nine hours of life, and their unnamed stillborn infant daughter who died in 1956, were both reburied beside their father's grave.

* Most brain sectioning for examination purposes is coronal—from ear to ear, that is, side to side—but some are sagittal, that is, the slices are from front to back.

‡Also, Horne knew that if the first supplementary examination of the brain was not on November 25, the argument could be made that the second exam, which Horne said took place on November 29, was really the first and only exam.

*— Since Burkley told Humes that the president’s family wanted the brain to be buried with the body, and the president’s funeral was on November 25, this certainly sounds as if the conversation between Burkley and Humes (which took place around the time Humes turned the president’s brain over to Burkley) occurred before November 25. But since we know (see later text) that the examination of the president’s brain took place after November 25 (i.e., after the funeral), two possibilities come to mind to explain this apparent contradiction. One is that the wishes of the Kennedy family could have been expressed after the funeral, and it would not have been a pointless desire, since the brain could be put in the coffin even after the original burial. For instance, we know that on the evening of March 14, 1967, the president’s body was reburied. Indeed, when ARRB counsel asked Humes in 1996 whether he had asked Burkley how the Kennedy family “would be able to inter the brain if the president had already been buried?” he responded, “I didn’t worry about it one way or the other. I would presume that they could devise a method of doing that without too much difficulty, however” (ARRB Transcript of Proceedings, Deposition of Dr. James Joseph Humes, February 13, 1996, pp.148–149). What is also possible, and more likely, is that the Kennedy family expressed its wish about the brain being buried with the body before the funeral, and Humes, looking back almost thirty years later in his JAMA interview, confused when Burkley told him about the Kennedy family’s wish, thinking it was when he transferred the brain to Burkley after December 6, when it may have been at some time before the funeral on November 25.

But all this is irrelevant since we know the brain was not buried with the body at the time of the president’s funeral on November 25. Among other reasons why we know this, Admiral Burkley told the HSCA that when he received the brain from Humes he decided to keep it because he thought they could do serial sections of both the damaged and undamaged portions of the brain (HSCA Record 180-10093-10429, Memorandum to File, Andy Purdy, August 17, 1977, p.5). In a handwritten cover note to his subsequent November 28, 1978, affidavit to the HSCA, Burkley wrote that he “retained the brain” because, for instance, “the possibility of two bullets having wounded President John F. Kennedy’s brain would have been eliminated” by such a sectioning, and “had the Warren Commission called me” to testify, he said he would have told them why he kept the brain (HSCA Record 180-10104-10271, HSCA affidavit of George G. Burkley, November 28, 1978, handwritten cover note to affidavit). Indeed, as late as April 26, 1965, the president’s brain was inside a container in a footlocker at the National Archives (HSCA Record 109-10364, Memorandum, SAIC Bouck to Chief, Transfer of Material—Assassination of President Kennedy, April 26, 1965; ARRB MD 70).

* - Horne doesn't bother, of course, to tell his readers that although Stringer did first tell the ARRB that he did not shoot the basilar view of the president's brain shown to him, when asked again, "You did not take a basilar view of the brain, is that correct?" he backpedaled considerably, answering, "I think so, yeah. Whether I took that [photo of basilar view shown him], I don't know" (ARRB Transcript of Proceedings, Deposition of John T. Stringer, July 16, 1996, pp.216-218, 221).

* The November 29 date for the one and only supplementary brain exam is partially corroborated by Chief Petty Officer Chester Boyers, who was in charge of the Pathology Department at Bethesda Naval Hospital in November of 1963. Boyers told an HSCA investigator his records reflected that he prepared tissue slides of sections of the president's brain for analysis on December 2, 1963, very close to the November 29 date. (ARRB MD 62, Interview of Chester H. Boyers, April 28, 1978, p.4)

One of the strongest reasons to believe that the supplementary brain exam did not take place on November 25 (the date, to repeat, that Horne believes the first of two supplementary brain exams took place), and was no earlier than November 29, is that, as Dr. Baden told me, when a brain is put in formalin, it's "never put in for just a few days. In fact, it's usually for two weeks. The reason is that it takes time for the brain to harden and fix to the point where it's easier to make thinner slices. Even November twenty-ninth is early, but November twenty-fifth wouldn't make any sense for a brain examination" (Telephone interview of Dr. Michael Baden by author on July 14, 2000).

When Humes testified before the Warren Commission on March 16, 1964 (less than four months after the autopsy, when we can assume his memory would have been more fresh), that the supplementary brain exam was "some days after" the autopsy, it is doubtful that he would have been referring to November 25, because he left the embalming room in the early morning hours of November 23, just fifty or so hours earlier. "This delay" he referred to for the brain exam(2 H 355) was probably six days later, on the twenty-ninth. In his testimony before the ARRB in 1996, Humes says the brain exam was "a couple of days after" he delivered the autopsy report to the White House on Sunday evening, November 24, not a couple of days after the autopsy (ARRB Transcript of Proceedings, Deposition of Dr. James Joseph Humes, February 13, 1996, p.148).

* Dr. Michael Baden, the chief forensic pathologist for the HSCA, confirmed for me the normalcy of these changes resulting from formalin fixation. On a broader note, Baden only had one word for Horne's whole theory: "ridiculous." (Telephone interviews of Dr. Michael Baden by author on July 14, 2000, and March 25, 2002)

* - Not Finck, since, as indicated, Horne concludes that Finck was only present at the alleged second supplementary exam, and unaware of the fraud being perpetrated by his colleagues.

* - We can probably thank Gunn for small favors—the aforementioned negative footnote on Stringer, which Horne buried near the end of his memorandum.

* Dr. Humes testified before the Warren Commission that when it first became known on the afternoon of November 22 that the autopsy would be at Bethesda, “I was called to the [Bethesda Medical] Center by my superiors and informed that the president’s body would be brought to our laboratories for an examination, and I was charged with the responsibility of conducting and supervising this examination” (2 H 348).

* The Zapruder film, art historian David Lubin wrote in his book Shooting Kennedy: JFK and the Culture of Images, may be “the saddest movie ever made.” Saying that the “internal architecture” of the film even conforms “to the three-act structure” of modern motion pictures, “whether comedy, drama, or melodrama” (Act I being the smiling and radiant first couple; Act II, the tragedy; and III, the ending of the “terrible tale” as the limousine disappears into a dark tunnel), he writes that if major works of cinematic art “combine beauty...happiness, tragedy and horror,” then the twenty-six-second film “may qualify as such a work.” He sees JFK and Jackie as movie stars, “two of the biggest ever to pass before the eyes of a motion picture camera.” (Lubin, Shooting Kennedy, pp.1, 4, 15) Playing off these and other observations by Lubin, New York Times reporter Richard B. Woodward writes that the very brief movie, “beginning in anticipation” as the limousine turns the corner into Dealey Plaza, ends “in national despair” less than half a minute later, the film suddenly over. Unlike the film of Ruby killing Oswald two days later, which provided sound for its viewers and showed the killer, not only is the Zapruder film eerily silent, but the killer is “off-screen, his presence announced only by the hero and heroine [JFK and Jackie] reacting to the gunshots.” (Woodward, “The 40th Anniversary of a 26-Second Reel,” New York Times, November 16, 2003, p.40; Lubin, Shooting Kennedy, pp.4, 17, 35)

* The assassination of President William McKinley at the 1901 Pan-American Exhibition in Buffalo, New York, was also captured on film. Unlike the Zapruder film, investigators who studied Kinematographs (produced by the original Edison Laboratory) of President McKinley's speech easily identified the assassin, Leon F. Czolgosz, as he made his way through the large crowd toward the president. Attempts to detect Czolgosz exchanging glances with possible confederates failed, despite the use of enlargements. Another motion picture camera was a few feet from McKinley just as Czolgosz came through the receiving line and fired the fatal shots. (Olson and Turner, "Photographic Evidence," p.400)

* The shot Zapruder describes as the first one was actually, from all the evidence, the second in the sequence. Zapruder was confused, testifying that “I thought I heard two, it could be three [shots], because to my estimation I thought he was hit on the second—I really don’t know...I never even heard a third shot” (7 H 571). However, according to a Dallas Times Herald reporter’s shorthand interview notes (jotted down on November 22), Zapruder said he “heard 3 shots...after the first one Pres slumped over grabed stomach...hit in stomach...two more shots...looked like head opened up and everything came out” (Trask, Pictures of the Pain, p.149 note 13).

* It is perhaps worth noting that out of the seven Commission members, the three who had problems with the single-bullet theory were among the least faithful in attending Commission hearings during which testimony was given, two of them the worst. Cooper missed 44 out of the 94 hearings, the fourth worst attendance record; Boggs missed 74 hearings, the second worst. Living up to Benjamin Franklin's adage that an empty drum sounds the loudest, Russell, who should have been the quietest, was the loudest dissenter. Shockingly irresponsible, Russell only attended 6 out of the 94 hearings, having more important things to do at the time, namely, being the leader in the Senate of the South's opposition to the passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. In fairness to Russell, he did write a letter to Johnson on February 24, 1964, saying that because of his "legislative duties," he did not have enough time to serve on the Commission, but Warren ignored the letter, and Russell continued to serve. (Fite, Richard B. Russell, pp. 406, 416, 421) Chief Justice Warren, who was busier and had more responsibilities outside the Commission than anyone else on the Commission, had the best attendance record, commendably attending all or a portion of all 94 hearings. Representative Gerald Ford had the next best attendance record, showing up at 70 of the 94 hearings. Dulles attended 60, and McCloy 35. (Meagher, Accessories after the Fact, p. xxx)

* The genesis of the Groden sketch was a copyrighted sketch drawn by conspiracy theorist R. B. Cutler in 1969 (Letter from R. B. Cutler to author dated December 14, 1986). Groden alludes to this in his testimony before the HSCA when he says the sketch he was using “was drawn by a Warren Commission critic” (1 HSCA 65). Although Cutler erroneously had Connally seated directly in front of Kennedy, he at least correctly had Connally turning to his right at the time he was hit.

* For years, books and assassination researchers have loosely said 3 degrees, and I was guilty of this myself. But actually, the degree of declination was found to be 3.9 degrees (WR, p. 106), which is almost 4 degrees.

‡ Another way of looking at this point is this: If Kennedy was hit by two bullets and Connally, as the conspiracy theorists maintain, by a third and separate bullet, what physical evidence is there (the bullet itself or even one single fragment of it) of this third bullet's existence?

* Although it is almost universally believed that Arlen Specter was the sole architect of the “single-bullet theory,” a belief that he himself has promoted, there is evidence that he was not. (See endnote discussion.)

* - Connally can first be seen reacting to being hit by a bullet at frame 222 of the Zapruder film, when his upper body can be seen for the first time emerging from behind the Stemmons Freeway sign (see photo section of book; HSCA Report, p. 82).

* - But conspiracy theorists shouldn't despair. If they need an extra bullet or two, I would refer them to Warren Commission critic Nord Davis Jr. Nord is a serious student of the assassination who has studied all twenty-six volumes of the Commission, and he is confident that twenty-one bullets were fired in Dealey Plaza. Now, I can't vouch for Nord's credibility. After all, he is the same fellow who says that the Parkland doctors confused Officer Tippit's body for that of President Kennedy. (Nord Davis Jr., "Dallas Conspiracy, Pardon Me, but...", vol. 44, self-published, 1968, pp. 12, 16) But hey, with the desperate position the conspiracy theorists are in having run out of bullets, they can't be picky about who is trying to help them.

* In a letter to FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover in May of 1964, Warren Commission assistant counsel Norman Redlich wrote that “the Commission is aware that it is impossible to determine the exact point at which the first two shots were fired” (Letter from Norman Redlich to J. Edgar Hoover, May 7, 1964).

* As previously indicated, although the Warren Commission had a copy of the entire Zapruder film, Life, in response to a request by FBI photographic expert Lyndal Shaneyfelt, only provided the Warren Commission with enlarged color slides of Zapruder frames 171–334, which were thought by Shaneyfelt, at the time, to include “all of the pertinent frames of the assassination” (5 H 139, 142; CE 885, 18 H 1–80). The fact that the Warren Commission, when it published its volumes, only published sequenced frames 171 forward is evidence, author Gerald Posner points out, that they were “under the assumption that nothing of interest happened earlier” (Posner, Case Closed, p. 323 footnote). However, in fairness to the Warren Commission and FBI, they did analyze and draw inferences from frames 161 and 166 (5 H 147–149, 161, WCT Lyndal L. Shaneyfelt; WR, p. 98; CE 888–889, 18 H 86–87).

* If Governor Connally were reacting to the sound of a shot between Z162 and Z167, when might that shot (with its contemporaneous sound) have been fired? Human reaction times in response to the sound of gunshots were measured and published in the 1939 experimental work of C. Landis and W. Hunt (Landis and Hunt, Startle Reaction). For “head movement,” “movement of neck muscles,” and “initiation of arm movement,” Landis and Hunt found that the reaction time was 0.06 to 0.20 second—that is, the equivalent of 1.1 to 3.7 Zapruder frames (6 HSCA 28). Since Connally’s reaction begins at Z162, the sound of the shot would have been heard by Connally at about Z158–161. The caveat to the Landis and Hunt study is that it presupposes that one always reacts to hearing the sound of a gunshot instantaneously. This is, on its face, a clearly unwarranted assumption. One may hear a shot and react only in the mind, not moving at all. (Even if, in this case, Connally reacted instantaneously by the “movement of [his] neck muscles,” that obviously would not be discernible on the Zapruder film.) This is why I asked Cecil Kirk, my photographic expert at the London trial, “When you say that your [HSCA] panel concluded that the first shot was fired around frame 160, that’s on the assumption that Connally turned immediately?” “Yes.” “If he took just one second to react, that would put the first shot back around 140, is that correct?” “That is correct.” (Testimony of Cecil Kirk, Transcript of On Trial, July 23, 1986, pp. 280–281) What I’m saying is that the HSCA, as well as virtually the entire anti-conspiracy community, has been gratuitously generous (a trait the conspiracy community seems to be incapable of in the assassination debate) to the conspiracy theorists in placing the first shot around frame 160, meaning Oswald may have had more time than believed to get off his later, second shot.

‡ Because the president also turns sharply to his right during this period (Z157–160), some have suggested that he too is reacting to the sound of the first shot. It should be noted, however, that unlike Connally, he continues to smile and wave to crowds along the north side of Elm Street. Although we can never be sure, it is difficult to believe that the president would have responded this way had he interpreted the sound as a shot the way Connally and some others did.

* Ironically, when the president was closest to Oswald—when the limousine was directly below Oswald's window—he was the most difficult shot for Oswald, which Oswald would know. Directly below, the president would be traveling from Oswald's left to right the most, and Oswald's rifle would have virtually no stability.

‡ There were three signs along the north side of Elm Street between Houston and the Triple Underpass—the R.L. Thornton Freeway, Stemmons Freeway, and Fort Worth Turnpike signs (CE 2114, 24 H 544). From Mrs. Baker’s position in front of the Depository, the “first sign” would have been the R.L. Thornton Freeway sign, which was nearly in line with the west end of the Depository.

* - The Stemmons Freeway sign begins to block Zapruder's view of Kennedy and Connally as early as Z201, although the top of Kennedy's head is visible as late as Z207. While Connally begins to emerge from the sign at Z221, Kennedy doesn't fully reappear until Z225.

‡ Actually, the likelihood is that on the day of the assassination, November 22, 1963, there was no opening even at frame 186. When I asked Gary Mack, the curator of the Sixth Floor Museum, “How would the foliage on the live oak tree differ from November 22, 1963, to May 24, 1964, when the FBI took its reenactment photo?” Mack, who has two live oak trees on the front lawn of his home in Dallas, said, “Live oak trees start to drop their leaves in March. So on May 24, there would most likely be less foliage than on November 22, but in no case more.” (Telephone interview of Gary Mack by author on January 24, 2006) With the foliage, then, almost assuredly being thicker and more abundant on November 22, the likelihood is that there would have been no opening for the assassin even at frame 186. “Live oaks are green all year,” longtime Dallas resident Ken Holmes said, “but they shed a little starting in March” (Interview of Ken Holmes in Dallas by author on January 26, 2006). On the other hand, the Secret Service took some photographs of the scene of the assassination way back on December 5, 1963, just two weeks after the assassination, and U.S. Secret Service inspector Thomas J. Kelley testified that from the photographs the foliage on the live oak tree on May 24 was “very similar, practically the same” as it was on December 5 (5 H 134).

* Although around Z210 is the first time that a sniper in the sixth-floor window would have a completely clear view of the president emerging from under the oak tree, the president's body, in reenactment photographs, can be seen clear enough from the sixth-floor window as early as Z207 (CE 892, 18 H 88).

‡ Itek Corporation, after its multimonth analysis of the film for CBS in 1976, disagreed. Stating that it “has been suggested that from around frame 189 to 195 [Kennedy’s] hand appears to move very little and could be construed to be frozen in position,” Itek’s report said its specialists found that “his hand continues the relatively even sweep across his face and down until no longer measurable at frame 206” (HSCA Record 180-10001-10396, “John Kennedy Assassination Film Analysis,” Itek Corporation, May 2, 1976, p. 35). Itek’s conclusion was that “no evidence could be found that would indicate that President Kennedy was struck before the Stemmons Freeway sign blocked Zapruder’s view. President Kennedy was first wounded most probably after frame 212 and before frame 223” (HSCA Record 180-10001-10398, May 2, 1976, p. 11).

* But to remind the reader, the HSCA, unlike the Warren Commission, concluded that Kennedy first showed a reaction to being hit at frame 200, when the HSCA saw, as few others have, Kennedy's right hand freeze in the midst of a waving motion.

‡ Only at frame 205 can Kennedy's head be seen to start moving to his left to face the front (CE 885, 18 H 18). But this could very well have been because he had just passed the last large group of people on his right—who appear to be women office workers—waving to him, as shown in photo number 3 by Dealey Plaza spectator Hugh Betzner, which corresponds to around Z frame 186 (Betzner photo and correlation to Z186: 6 HSCA 51; Telephone interview of Richard Trask by author on October 23, 2006).

* There's an old adage—be careful what you ask for: you might get it. The conspiracy theorists have made a desperate effort to refute the single-bullet theory on the rationale that if they do, Oswald wouldn't have had time after hitting Kennedy to fire the shot that hit Connally; hence, there must have been a conspiracy. But they may be creating a scenario which, if accepted, could seriously damage or destroy their cherished conspiracy hypothesis. Let's look at the theoretical possibilities, which I personally reject. We saw that the HSCA concluded that Kennedy was first struck by a bullet at around frame 190 (HSCA Report, p. 47). If Connally, per Thompson, was first struck around Z235 (the "barest of a fraction" before Z238) that leaves 45 frames, or, at 18.9 frames of the Zapruder film per second, about 2.4 seconds between both hits. Since, using the scope on the Carcano, Oswald could get off two shots in 2.3 seconds, the theory of the conspiracy theorists comes tumbling down. And if, as believed, Oswald used the iron sights, in which case he could fire two rounds in 1.6 seconds (see later text), Oswald would have had time to spare in getting off two rounds. Therefore, since all the evidence points to only Oswald having fired a weapon in Dealey Plaza on November 22, 1963, Oswald is the sole assassin, with or without the single-bullet theory.

‡ Baden said the panel was divided on whether the puncture was caused by the bullet entering the lung or the injury to Connally's fifth rib. Connally's Parkland Hospital operative record only said "the middle lobe [of the right lung] had a linear rent" (CE 392, 17 H 17).

* Though we can know from the evidence the approximate time Oswald's aforementioned three shots were fired, and hence, the spacing of the shots, earwitnesses, for the most part, didn't agree. The space between Z160 and Z207–222 is shorter than that between Z207–222 and Z313, yet most Dealey Plaza witnesses thought there was more time between the first and second shots than between the second and third (WR, p. 115). (Examples of each: "Following the first shot, there was a slight pause, and then two more shots were discharged, the second and third shots sounding closer together" [Lillian Mooneyham: CE 2098, 24 H 531]; "It seemed to me that there was less time between the first and the second [shots] than between the second and third" [4 H 149, WCT Mrs. John B. Connally Jr.].) What explanation can there be for the considerable majority hearing the opposite of what the evidence shows? Apart from the fallibility of eye and ear testimony, though the earwitnesses heard the first shot, it could have been such a shock to their senses that only the sound (which many erroneously thought was that of a firecracker or car backfire) registered, not the sound in relation to the very next sound they heard. By the time of the second shot they may have regained their mental and auditory acuity, now knowing shots were being fired, but they were in no position to compare the space between the second and third shots with that of the first and second. At the London trial, when I asked Dallas deputy sheriff Eugene Boone, who as a member of law enforcement was very accustomed to the sound of shots from a weapon, what was the spacing of the shots he heard that day in Dealey Plaza, he said, "The first two shots and then the third shot was a little longer." Question: "So the first and second shots were closer together, then there was an interval, and then the third shot?" "Yes, sir." I then proceeded to have Boone demonstrate to the jury by the use of the word bang the three shots. There was a meaningful interval between the first and second, and second and third shots, but the latter interval was greater. (Testimony of Eugene Boone, Transcript of On Trial, July 23, 1986, pp. 125–126)

Quite a few witnesses thought the shots were evenly spaced. "I distinctly remember three shots...and the three shots were evenly spaced" (7 H 475, WC affidavit Clifton C. Carter).

* While it was clear that the House Select Committee preferred the neuromuscular-reaction explanation for the president's head snap to the rear, it allowed, in its official conclusion, for another cause. It said that the head snap to the rear could also have been caused "by a propulsive effect resulting from the [brain] matter that exited through the large defect [on the right side of the president's head] under great pressure, or a combination of both." (7 HSCA 178) The president's head can be seen on the Zapruder film as going not only backward but slightly leftward. This movement to the left can be explained by the explosive exiting of the brain matter on the right side of the president's head creating a corresponding propulsive momentum (commonly called a "jet effect") in the opposite direction, as a rocket recoils in a direction opposite to that in which its jet fuel is ejected. (See endnote for further discussion.)

* - The enhanced photograph was published as part of Itek Corporation's report in 1976 on their analysis of the Zapruder film (HSCA Record 180-10001-10396, "John Kennedy Assassination Film Analysis," Itek Corporation, May 2, 1976, p. 57).

‡ And indeed, from Governor Connally's wife, we know that the shot to the president's head caused "brain tissue" to land on "both of us" (she and her husband), each of whom was seated in front of the president (4 H 147). In fact, Secret Service agent Roy Kellerman, seated in the front passenger seat of the presidential limousine (even farther forward of the president than the Connallys), testified that the blood spray from the president's head shot landed "all over my coat" (2 H 78).

Not only were the blood, brain tissue, and skull fragments all blown to the front of the president's body, but the five bullet fragments found in the presidential limousine were all to his front. The fragment of the base of a bullet (CE 569) was found on the floor beside the right side of the driver's seat, and the fragment of the nose of a bullet (CE 567) was found on the driver's seat right beside the driver (5 H 67, WCT Robert A. Frazier). And then there were the three small fragments found beneath the left jump seat (CE 840, 17 H 840; 5 H 66). Also, the three skull fragments found inside the limousine were all to the president's front, one in the footwell in front of the backseat, another on the floor in the middle of the car, the other on the floor near the jump seat (HSCA Record 180-10075-10174, January 6, 1964; ARRB MD 259, Interview of Floyd Boring by ARRB investigators Joan Zimmerman and Doug Horne, September 19, 1996; HSCA Call Report of phone call to Douglas Horne by Floyd Boring on September 19, 1996).

The main argument from conspiracy theorists that the "law of physics" requires that an object hit by a projectile has to be pushed in the direction the projectile is traveling, and therefore, the head snap to the rear compels the conclusion of a shot from the front, can easily be used against them. In addition to the fact that the president's head moved forward at the moment of impact, how do the conspiracists explain what would be the ridiculous anomaly of blood, brain tissue, three skull fragments, and five bullet fragments all flying to the front of the president's body at the same precise time they claim Kennedy's head was being propelled backward by a shot from the front? They don't. And can't.

* In 1990, four years after the London trial, I asked Dr. Art Hoffman, a physicist out at UCLA, to give me his views on this matter. In a written report to me, Hoffman hypothesized the situation of a man lying on his back. “How far,” he asked, “will his head rise if struck by a bullet fired directly upward from below? Using the known mass (161 grains) and muzzle velocity (2,165 feet per second) of the Mannlicher-Carcano bullet and 15 pounds for the weight of the head, and assuming that the bullet is completely stopped within the head for maximum momentum transfer [here, the bullet wasn’t completely stopped by bone in the head, most of it exiting the head in fragments, which would even decrease the transference of momentum] and assuming that no other forces than gravity retard the motion of the head, we [Hoffman worked with a colleague, Dr. Robert Ditraglia] find that it would rise only two inches... The height that a head would be lifted against gravity is a reasonable estimate of how far it might [be propelled] when struck horizontally. The resisting forces of the neck muscles and connecting tissue are comparable to gravity since these muscles normally function to stabilize the head against gravity. Indeed, they are capable of exerting forces several times that of gravity... These considerations lead us to conclude that the Mannlicher-Carcano bullet would not impart a particularly large [movement] to the head.” From measurements based on his analysis of the Zapruder film, Hoffman found a “2 inch forward movement” of Kennedy’s head “owing to the entrance of the Mannlicher-Carcano bullet” from behind. He concluded that Kennedy’s head snap to the rear was “8½ inches,” obviously far too much for the impact of any bullet to have caused. (Letter from Dr. Art Hoffman to author dated March 20, 1990, pp. 1–3)

* The Warren Commission has no firm opinion as to when the first shot was fired in Dealy Plaza (saying it could have been as late as Z210), or whether it hit either Kennedy or Connally. But it did note that at 18.3 frames per second on the Zapruder film, the time between Z210–225 (when the Commission believes both Kennedy and Connally were struck by the same bullet) and Z313 (the head shot to the president) was “4.8 to 5.6 seconds.” With the 2.3 seconds required between two shots, and only 4.8 to 5.6 seconds to fire them in, the Commission said, “The gunman would have been shooting at very near the minimum allowable time” to fire them, adding, “Although it was entirely possible for him to have done so.” (WR, pp. 111–112, 115)

* To help explain why he felt Oswald could have fired more accurately in rapid rather than slow fire at a short range (as opposed to great distances, where the advantage of the telescopic sight for accuracy trumps other considerations), Lutz testified at the London trial that “the ability to fire the rifle with the telescopic sight requires that you readjust your head, raise it from the stock. With the open sight...the face can be placed on the stock of the rifle and be fired a lot more quickly as result of being able to recover to the same spot.” (Testimony of Monty Lutz, Transcript of On Trial, July 24, 1985, p. 453)

A firearms expert for the Los Angeles Police Department elaborated on this point for me: “With the old type optical sight that they had on rifles in those days,” he said, “there was a narrow field of view. Just for example, at 100 yards it could have a view of only twenty feet across or wide. Upon discharging the weapon, you normally did lose sight of the target and had to reacquire the sight on the target. With the open iron sight, however, you’re only limited by what your eye can see, and if you’re really experienced with a firearm, you won’t lose your target at all after firing the weapon, but even if you do, it won’t take you as long to reacquire your sight on the target as it would with a telescopic sight” (Telephone interview of LAPD firearms expert by author on March 17, 2006).

*—Oswald’s particular Carcano, serial number C2766 (stamped on the left side of the barrel), was manufactured at the Italian government’s arsenal at Terni, Italy (fifty miles north of Rome), sometime during the year 1940, a version of an older design. Its first name came from the designer of the weapon’s predecessor in 1880, the Austrian, Ferdinand Ritter von Mannlicher; the second name, from one of two men who modified the original into its 1940 form, M. Carcano. Soon after the assassination, many Italian people referred to the rifle as il fucile maledetto—that “cursed gun.” How the weapon was used from the time of its origin in 1940 to the time it made its way into history is not known, but because the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle was the rifle of the Italian army, it is believed it was used during the Second World War before Italy’s surrender in September 1943, after which it returned to the military warehouse at Terni. FBI firearms expert Robert Frazier described Oswald’s Carcano thusly: “The stock is worn, scratched. The bolt is relatively smooth, as if it had been operated several times. I cannot actually say how much use the weapon has had. The barrel is not...in excellent condition. It was, I would say, in fair condition. In other words, it showed the effects of wear and corrosion...It is a surplus type of weapon.” (3 H 394, WCT Robert A. Frazier; Wheeler, “Cursed Gun,” pp. 62–65)

* At the London trial, I elicited from Oswald's Marine squad mate in Santa Ana, Nelson Delgado, that the score on the range one gets during basic training (when Oswald fired as a sharpshooter) is extremely important because "that score is going to follow you throughout your military career. Your promotion is going to be based, in part, upon that." But when you're about to leave the military (as Oswald was when he only qualified as a marksman), there is no incentive to do well. I asked Delgado if he "got the impression that Oswald wasn't even trying" when he shot for the record just before leaving the corps. Answer: "Yes." Delgado said that during that period Oswald wasn't even taking care of his rifle. I asked Delgado if he felt Oswald could have done better if he had tried during this last firing for the record and Delgado said he felt Oswald could have. (Testimony of Nelson Delgado, Transcript of On Trial, July 24, 1968, pp. 596–599; see also 11 H 304, WCT Maj. Eugene D. Anderson)

The Marine rifle ratings are marksman, 190–209; sharpshooter, 210–219; and expert, 220–250.

* Indeed, one rifleman got off three shots at the target in 4.1 seconds, less than 1.4 seconds per round, though he only had one hit. And on March 21, 1979, an HSCA marksman, firing at distances of 143, 165, and 266 feet, hit three of the three targets (though he missed the head portion of the target at 266 feet) in “less than 5 seconds for all three shots” (8 HSCA 184).

‡ Relevant to this issue, I asked Lutz at the London trial, “How does the recoil of the Carcano compare with the recoil of other military rifles?” Answer: “It is considerably less.” “Would that tend to improve the shooter’s marksmanship under rapid-fire conditions?” “Yes, it would.” (Testimony of Monty Lutz, Transcript of On Trial, July 24, 1986, p. 454)

‡ As indicated earlier, the reasonable assumption is that Oswald used the iron sights on his Carcano. But if he had, indeed, used his four-power scope, the first shot at approximately sixty yards would have appeared to him to be only fifteen yards away, and the second shot at eighty-eight yards, only twenty-two yards away.

* Owing to the differences in the automobiles, the reenactors were sitting ten inches higher than the president and governor were on the day of the assassination. This variance was accounted for by investigators in their calculations. (5 H 148, WCT Lyndal L. Shaneyfelt)

* For those who feel that any projection backward shows a presumption toward Oswald's guilt, note that the trajectory could not be projected forward. Since we know from the entrance wounds to the backs of Kennedy and Connally that the bullet was traveling on a straight line downward, any such projection forward to a possible source would have the assassin lying on the pavement of Elm Street flat on his back in front of the limousine. Even were that the alleged case, the body of the presidential limousine would be in the way of any of his bullets.

‡ The pathology panel concluded from the X-ray evidence that although the bullet struck bone, it was undeflected and “proceeded in an essentially straight and forward path” to its point of exit (7 HSCA 176, 125–126).

* Remarkably, as late as 2004, Posner wrote that “it would take nearly 30 years [by Failure Analysis, as reported by Posner in his book in 1993] for science to establish the [single-bullet] theory as fact” (Los Angeles Times, August 29, 2004, p. R5). But the Warren Commission clearly established the single-bullet theory by the testimony of scientists back in 1964, and the HSCA did likewise with scientists in 1978. Actually, science was never required, as Posner suggests. Only common sense. A bullet passing through soft tissue in Kennedy’s body and then exiting the body had nowhere else to go but to Governor Connally’s body, which was in perfect alignment with Kennedy’s body to be hit by the exiting bullet. No more than ten seconds of reflection is necessary to know this.

* The author devotes only one clause in one sentence to the reconstruction. And this clause actually suggests the opposite of a single-bullet conclusion. Also, buried as part of a caption for three photos in the photographic section, the author makes reference to the fact that there was a 1964 reconstruction (Posner, Case Closed, p. 327, photo section between pp. 320 and 321).

* The inside flap to Posner's book declares that "after thirty years, Case Closed finally succeeds where hundreds of other books and investigations [i.e., the Warren Commission and House Select Committee on Assassinations] have failed—it resolves the greatest murder mystery of our time, the assassination of JFK."

* - The Zapruder film was not shown to the American public until 1976 (see later discussion).

* For those conspiracy theorists who say that the Zapruder film is a hoax and probably feel that they are the bold avant-garde in the conspiracy community, I am here to tell them that they really are just pikers in this regard. Author Bernard M. Bane writes that the assassination itself never even took place! “President Kennedy’s assassination was a hoax,” he writes, “masterminded by social engineers in furtherance of promoting social reform.” He doesn’t spell out how these people did it, but in his book Is President John F. Kennedy Alive—and Well? he answers his question with a confident yes. “So what has kept JFK from surfacing all these years, given that he is not being held against his will as in the case of a house arrest? . . . In order to implement a revisionist face-saving surfacing, he needs the cooperation of the powers that be, his erstwhile adversaries, which, not surprisingly, he is not getting.” (Bane, Is President John F. Kennedy Alive—and Well? pp. viii, 120–121) So there.

‡ Although the conspirators would be able to see that Zapruder was in a better position to film the assassination they knew was about to take place, Zapruder's film, if they tried to alter it, would still have to be 100 percent consistent with films taken from less favorable vantage points, like the Nix and Bronson films. Moreover, how could the conspirators have known, in advance, that only Zapruder would be in the position he was in—that there wouldn't be other spectators with motion picture cameras on the north side of Elm Street?

Indeed, since we know that in addition to the many motion picture cameras in plain view, there were many Dealey Plaza spectators taking still photographs, unless the conspirators had a helicopter hovering over Dealey Plaza with several telescopic sights trained tightly on everyone in the plaza, how could they possibly know which of the cameras took stills and which were the more dangerous (to them) motion picture cameras they had to seize?

* - If it weren't to frame Oswald, and the conspirator-forgers didn't want something in the film to be known, they obviously (assuming, as the theorists contend, the conspirators had possession of the original film) would have simply destroyed the film rather than engage in the incredibly complex effort to alter it.

* - These are additions or alterations to an image using computer technology to manipulate the pixels (i.e., colored dots) that make up the image.

‡ Alterationist David Lifton is satisfied that the original Zapruder film was processed and developed at the Kodak plant in Dallas, but believes a copy was altered at a supersecret Kodak facility in Rochester, New York, and thereafter passed off as the original (David S. Lifton, “Pig on a Leash, a Question of Authenticity,” in Fetzer, Great Zapruder Film Hoax, pp. 387–388, 413). Apart from the fact there is no evidence this was done, surely Lifton has to realize that this altered copy could be immediately exposed as a forgery when it was ultimately compared with the out-of-camera original.

* How, indeed, would they know that presidential assistant David Powers, in the car right behind the president's limousine, who had a movie camera and did stand up in his car to take home movies at various places along the parade route starting at Love Field, would not have taken any pictures on Elm Street during the assassination (Trask, Pictures of the Pain, pp. 37, 63, 369; Letter from Dave Powers to Richard Trask dated March 28, 1989)? If he had, why would they think they'd be successful in stealing his film so they could alter it to make it consistent with their altered Zapruder film?

* Little is known of Marguerite's two younger sisters, except Pearl married and had already died at the time of the assassination, and Aminthe was married and living in Knoxville, Tennessee (8 H 96, WCT Lillian Murret; Armstrong, Harvey and Lee, p. 13).

* Oswald was a voracious reader of serious literature who had intellectual proclivities, and most who came in contact with him felt he was bright and spoke very well, but he was dyslexic. Throughout this biography, the reader can expect to see a great number of misspelled words and defective grammar by Oswald, which I've decided to quote as is, for historical accuracy.

* Dr. Mancuso continued to rent the house until 1944, when Marguerite obtained a judgment of possession against him. She then sold the home for $6,500 to a bank, which resold it to Dr. Mancuso. (WR, p. 670; CE 2197, 25 H 76)

‡ Though Marguerite is quite specific about this, her sons, though less specific, disagree. John said that “maybe once every two weeks,” Marguerite “would drop around” (11 H 20). And Robert said that later, when Lee was also at Bethlehem, “on weekends she came to the home to visit us” (Oswald with Land and Land, Lee, p. 35).

* Robert told the Warren Commission that he and John did not come home this Christmas of 1945 because Marguerite, Lee, and Ekdahl had been living in Boston and their stay there had included the Christmas holidays (1 H 278). Not only does this clearly conflict with John's testimony (11 H 25), but we know from school records that Lee, Marguerite, and Ekdahl were back in Dallas at least as early as October of 1945 since Lee entered in the first grade on October 31, 1945 (CE 1874, 23 H 679).

* Ekdahl died shortly after the divorce proceedings, and there seems to be no record in the literature as to how Lee reacted to his death (Thomson, Boissevain, and Aukofer, “Lee Harvey Oswald—Another Look,” p. 122).

* Two snapshots given the Warren Commission by John Pic suggest the barrenness of the neighborhood. The only building visible, at some distance, is a small, low, single-story building that Pic said contained both the local grocery store and the laundromat. The photos show Lee, a dog named Blackie they had acquired, and a ten-year-old car belonging to Marguerite. (Pic Exhibit Nos. 54 and 55, 21 H 122; 11 H 30, WCT John Edward Pic) The kids all wanted Marguerite to get a new car because this one didn't work. Marguerite would have the boys out on the street every morning waving down people to push the car to get it started so she could get to work. (11 H 77, WCT John Edward Pic)

‡ Somehow, at least to me, the story just doesn't have the ring of truth to it, not only because there's no corroboration, and no evidence that Lee had ever engaged in conduct designed to kill either of his brothers, but also because Marguerite's ho-hum attitude about this most serious and dangerous of conduct is not too believable.

* - Conspiracy theorists, as much dreamers as the young Oswald, have always believed that in later years Oswald became a rendition of the main character in the show he was fascinated by, a double (some even say triple) agent. The fact that they have no evidence to support this belief, and that millions of others were fascinated by the popular TV show, is not troubling to them.

* One wonders just how much pressure Marguerite was putting on Lee to go to school. Though she undoubtedly urged him to do so, we also know that Marguerite, who had since started selling insurance, would occasionally allow Lee to go with her during the day, but he found it too boring waiting for her in the car as she made her frequent stops (Siegel Exhibit No. 1, 21 H 485).

* – “I was never told my son needed psychiatric treatment, believe me,” Marguerite would later tell author Jean Stafford (Stafford, Mother in History, p. 22).

* - Marguerite had since left the employ of Lerner Shops and was now working at Martin's Department Store in Brooklyn. The next month she went to work for Lady Oris Hosiery on Park Avenue South in Manhattan, a chain of hosiery shops she had worked for in New Orleans in 1943. (Carro Exhibit No. 1, 19 H 309; CE 2213, 25 H 110)

‡ The consensus of many observers is that Oswald was not bright and was intellectually shallow. I'm not a psychiatrist, but I have always been puzzled by this assessment. In my opinion, his words and thinking process in his late teens and early twenties have always struck me as being those of someone not only above average in intelligence, but much more intellectual than I would expect most people of his young age to be.

* As with the common perception about Lee's intelligence, I also tend to disagree, although not as confidently, in the general impression of Marguerite. Obviously, Lee and his brothers knew Marguerite and I didn't. But from the cold written record, and taking cognizance of the fact that everything in life is relative, I don't find Marguerite to have been that bad a mother. She may have been deficient in several respects, but she was always working hard and providing for them. And the record seems to reflect, as her friend Myrtle Evans would agree, that at least with regard to Lee, alongside of whom she is now buried for eternity, she did love him dearly. One wonders if it wasn't her offending personality, rather than her conduct and attitude, that turned people off so, and that the two somewhat separate realities seemed to slop over onto each other and get blurred, influencing people's perception of her. As an example of her disobliging personality, journalist Hugh Aynesworth, who got to know the members of the Oswald family better than any of his peers, wrote, "Few people have ever so deeply annoyed me as Marguerite Oswald. And of all the things I disliked about her, none irritated me more than her voice. It was strange—unique in my experience—a jarring combination of birdlike sing-song, childish whine, and predatory threat that invaded your head like a dental drill. She would not stop talking" (Aynesworth with Michaud, JFK: Breaking the News, pp. 123–124).

* On the day after the assassination, Dr. Hartogs was interviewed on television about why anyone might want to murder a president. At the time he did not recall having Lee in observation and his remarks were entirely generalities. Such an assassin, Hartogs thought, would be mentally disturbed, with a personal grudge against authority figures, and likely a person seeking to overcome his own insignificance and helplessness with an act that frightens others, even one that would shatter the world, discharging his own insecurity by making others insecure. (8 H 219–220)

Oddly, Hartogs found fit to tell the Warren Commission (perhaps to impress others that he had foreseen Oswald as doing what he did, and without there being any indication he knew of the two knife incidents) that he had found Oswald “to have definite traits of dangerousness. In other words, this child had a potential for explosive, aggressive, assaultive acting out” (8 H 217). But if Hartogs actually believed this back in 1953, he knew he obviously should have recommended that Oswald not be returned to the community and that he be institutionalized immediately. In his Warren Commission testimony, he said, “I recommended that this youngster should be committed to an institution.”

Question: “Immediately?” Hartogs: “Yes, that is right.” But Hartogs did not make this recommendation, only recommending institutionalization as a last resort. In his testimony before the Commission, when confronted with his earlier report by Warren Commission counsel, Hartogs was forced to concede that his earlier report in 1953 “contradicts” the recollection of Oswald’s character and disposition he gave the Commission. Trying to cover himself on another point, he said that he “implied” Oswald’s potential for explosive violence by his “diagnosis of passive-aggressive,” but the latter is hardly a synonym for the former. Hartogs told the Commission that although he did not use the words “potentially dangerous” in his report, he believed that violence was always a possibility with a passive-aggressive personality, whose aggressivity can be triggered by a situation of high stress, particularly if he “nourishes his hate and hostility for [a] considerable length of time.” (8 H 218, 221–222, WCT Dr. Renatus Hartogs)

Author Gerald Posner, apparently trying to explain away Hartogs’s contradictory testimony, says Hartogs did not mention in his 1953 report his belief that Oswald was capable of explosive violence “since that would have mandated institutionalization,” and Hartogs only wanted “probation” with “guidance” (Posner, Case Closed, p. 13). But Posner gives no source for this, and Hartogs himself never said this in his testimony. Further, if one were to embrace Posner’s logic, it’s understandable and acceptable for a psychiatrist to recommend only probation and guidance, not institutionalization, for someone he believes is dangerous and capable of explosive violence.

* There were differences of culture between New York City and New Orleans that resulted in Oswald getting beaten up one day. Lee got on a crowded school bus headed for Beauregard and sat where a seat was available. It happened to be in the section of the bus to the rear for colored people. Coming from New York City, Lee didn't have the faintest idea that he had done anything wrong. He found out differently at the end of the line in front of the school. White boys on the bus jumped and pummeled Lee when they got off the bus, loosening his front teeth. (8 H 124, WCT Lillian Murret; 8 H 159, WCT Marilyn Dorothea Murret)

* To elaborate on the earlier footnote on Marguerite, the knock on her by virtually everyone who knew her that she was almost impossible to coexist with and not a good mother has a few dissenters, at least as to the issue of whether she was a loving and caring mother. The Evans are two of the few dissenters. And Lee's junior high school friend in New Orleans, Ed Voebel, was another, telling the Warren Commission that "I think she [Marguerite] tried to take care of him," adding that "if he wanted something, no matter what it was...she would try to get it for him" (8 H 11). These testimonials cannot be disregarded, though it has to be noted that neither the Evans nor Voebel lived in Marguerite's household, and Voebel only personally met Marguerite one time and did sense that "something was lacking" in Lee's relationship with his mother. But more importantly, even if we ignore the negative observations about Marguerite by the professionals like the psychiatrists, psychologists, and social workers in New York, even, indeed, those of her own sister Lillian—sisters, of course, can be catty—the relationship a son has with his mother is so special that virtually nothing can tear it asunder. Yet not just one, but all three of Marguerite's sons seemingly had no respect for her and felt she left much to be desired as a mother. That assessment, coming from such a source, is even more difficult to disregard, although the available record of that assessment from the three sons is mostly conclusionary about their feelings concerning Marguerite, as opposed to supporting their conclusions with chapter and verse.

* - Some confusion has been caused by the fact that there were two businesses under the name Tujague in New Orleans, one of them a restaurant reputed to be an underworld hangout involved in gambling. The HSCA checked to see where Oswald had actually worked, and it turned out to be the shipping company. Frank DiBenedetto, who took over the business when Gerald Tujague died, told the committee that Tujague had once told him that he was in no way related to the owners of the restaurant. (9 HSCA 101-102)

* - Apparently, Oswald wasn't bad with a pistol either. At the naval air base in Japan where he was later stationed, his pistol instructor, Marine sergeant Arnie Vitarbo, said, "Everyone was required to train with a pistol and rifle, and he showed a special interest. He was better than average...but everyone seemed to think he was different. A loner" (Los Angeles Daily News, April 21, 1992; see also 11 H 305, WCT Maj. Eugene D. Anderson).

* - There's no way to know for sure if Oswald used the alias Hidell because of his exposure to Heindel or not. The likelihood is that he did not, it just being a coincidence, the further coincidence being that Heindel was also from New Orleans, though there's no evidence the two knew each other before Atsugi. Because Marina, who had firsthand knowledge, said Oswald came up with Hidell as an "altered Fidel" due to his reverence for Fidel Castro (1 H 64), and Heindel saying the "i" in his nickname was hard, not soft, as in Fidel, it's safe to assume that Oswald's alias had nothing to do with Heindel.

* There was another puzzling question. On Oswald's take-home pay of eighty-five dollars a month, how was he even able to afford going to the Queen Bee, one of the three most expensive nightclubs in Tokyo whose "strikingly beautiful hostesses...catered to an elite clientele,...not impoverished marine privates"? A night at the club "could cost anywhere from sixty to one hundred dollars." (Epstein, Legend, p. 71) But one should remember that Oswald was notoriously close with his money all of his life and did not gamble like his fellow marines, so he could have easily saved enough to go to the Queen Bee. After all, we know that no one thought any bigger than Oswald. And of course he could have met the hostess at some place other than where she worked.

* - Most of the former squad mates whom the Warren Commission took testimony or affidavits from were only with Oswald in Santa Ana, not Japan. Of three squad mates who were stationed with Oswald at Atsugi, one never mentioned one way or the other whether he had heard of Oswald's pro-Russian and anti-American bent (8 H 318, WC affidavit of John Rene Heindel), and another said, "I never heard Oswald make any anti-American or pro-Communist statements" (8 H 317, WC affidavit of Peter Francis Connor). However, as indicated, fellow marine Paul Murphy did say that Oswald spoke "a little Russian" in Japan (8 H 320, WCT affidavit of Paul Edward Murphy).

* - At the trial in London, Delgado said that Castro ended up executing an American, Major Morgan, who had assisted him in the revolution, and whom Oswald and he had spoken of emulating, and that execution in particular disillusioned Delgado about Castro (Transcript of On Trial, July 24, 1986, p.593–594).

‡ A much more famous remark of this nature has been attributed to Oswald, but he may not have made it. Kerry Thornley told the Warren Commission that Oswald “looked upon history as God. He looked upon the eyes of future people as some kind of tribunal, and he wanted to be on the winning side so that ten thousand years from now people would look in the history books and say ‘Well, this man was ahead of his time.’” Oswald, he said, “was concerned with his image in history.” (11 H 97–98) From the context it is not clear whether Thornley came up with the ten-thousand-year observation himself, or Oswald mentioned it to him first.

* He was transferred to the Marine Corps Reserve, in which he was expected to serve until December 8, 1962, his unit headquartered at the Naval Air Station in Glenview, Illinois (WR, pp. 688–689; Folsom Exhibit No. 1, 19 H 679).

* - Where Oswald spent the night of October 9 is not known, but it's likely he spent it in an airport waiting room. The Warren Report (p. 690) says, "On the same day [he arrived at Southampton] he flew to Helsinki," but the visas in his passport (CE 946, 18 H 162-163) showed that he arrived at Southampton on October 9 and left London Airport (now Heathrow) for Helsinki on October 10.

* Oswald told UPI reporter Aline Mosby in November in Moscow, “For two years I’ve had it in my mind, don’t form any attachments, because I knew I was going away. I was planning to divest myself of everything to do with the United States. I’ve not just been thinking about it, but waiting to do it. For two years, saving my money” (CE 1385, 22 H 705).

* The reader will note in reading the many writings of Oswald in this section that his dyslexia caused various degrees of errors in spelling, punctuation, and grammar, ranging from really bad to almost passable. The only explanation that makes sense for why his dyslexia was not as obvious in some of his letters is that, like the above referred-to letter to the Supreme Soviet, he had third-party help, or he deemed a particular letter important enough to rewrite it several times to make it better. For instance, Marina told the Warren Commission that with respect to the envelope alone on his November 9, 1963, letter to the Soviet embassy in Washington, D.C., “Lee retyped it some ten times or so” (1 H 45), although she later told her biographer Priscilla McMillan it was more like four times (McMillan, Marina and Lee, p. 624 note 17). The Warren Commission noted the varying quality of his letters and dismissed a third possibility, at least as to the letters coming from Oswald in the United States. “There is no evidence,” the Commission’s report said, “that anyone in the United States helped Oswald with his better written letters or that anyone else wrote his letters for him” (WR, p. 666).

* In a memorandum dated October 22, 1959, the KGB also decided that “it was not advisable to give [Oswald] refugee status in the Soviet Union” (Nechiporenko, Passport to Assassination, p. 34).

* Thirty years later, Rimma told Frontline that “I saw Lee in the bath. It was water there and it was reddish, so it was blood. Lee cut his wrist” (Transcript of “Who Was Lee Harvey Oswald?” Frontline, PBS, November 16, 1993, p. 8). But two years later she told author Norman Mailer that she stayed out in the hallway and did not see Lee in the tub, and was told he had “cut his wrists.” When they brought him out on a stretcher she said he was unconscious, his cheeks were hollow, his face was bluish, and he looked like a person about to die. (Mailer, Oswald’s Tale, p. 50)

* - It is not known if Oswald ever made this offer, or if he was just bluffing Snyder. As indicated earlier, Oswald made no reference to offering the Soviets anything in return for citizenship, although Semichastny claims Oswald, in one or more conversations with the KGB, offered the Soviets information he called “outdated.”

* Of course, the situation was rife with other considerations and possibilities. Though Oswald couldn't be expected to know the complex law of subversive activity by U.S. citizens, even treason, surely he had to know that what he was threatening to do was flirting with a violation of some federal law, although in his unschooled mind he probably felt safe since he knew he hadn't actually passed any information to the Soviets yet. And then there is the possibility that Oswald may very well have assumed that the Soviets had bugged the U.S. embassy and Snyder's office and he was speaking to them and attempting to establish his bona fides.

‡ McVickar, possibly being influenced by the occurrence of later events, in responding to a request after the assassination from Thomas Ehrlich, a special assistant to the legal adviser to the Department of State, to set forth his impressions of Oswald in Moscow, wrote, “I recall thinking at the time that Oswald was behaving with a great deal of determination and purpose for such a young and relatively uneducated person. He was certainly very independent and fearless in a rather blind way and it seemed to me that he could have acquired all these ideas himself. . . . On the other hand, there also seemed to me to be the possibility that he was following a pattern of behavior in which he had been tutored by person or persons unknown. . . . It seemed to me that there was a possibility that he had been in contact with others before or during his Marine Corps tour who had guided him and encouraged him in his actions” (CE 941, 18 H 155; 5 H 384, WCT Frances G. Knight).

* Oswald may have conflated (a poor conflation at that) the names Korengold and A. I. Goldberg, a reporter for the Associated Press, to come up with “Goldstene.” Goldberg did try to interview Oswald at the Metropole, he says before Mosby, and Oswald, speaking to him through the slightly opened door of his room, refused to talk, confining himself to “I’ve got my reasons” in response to Goldberg’s “Why?” Goldberg never saw him again. (CE 2719, 26 H 99–100)

* Though he was lonely, he apparently was not alone. A June 4, 1964, internal memorandum of the CIA on KGB operations against foreign tourists noted that “Rm 233, Hotel Metropole, Moscow” [Oswald’s room] was “equipped with infra-red camera for observation of occupants” (Newman, Oswald and the CIA, pp. 9, 531 note 46).

Meanwhile, on November 2, the U.S. State Department (even before receiving a November 2 Moscow embassy dispatch to them from Snyder proposing “to delay action on Oswald’s request”) sent a telegram to its Moscow embassy that read in part, “If Oswald insists on renouncing U.S. citizenship, Section 1999 Revised Statutes precludes Embassy withholding right to do so” (CE 908, 18 H 97–99; CE 916, 18 H 114).

* Although Oswald's diary entry of November 15, 1959, says he was interviewed by Mosby that day (CE 24, 16 H 97), and in his handwritten account of the interview, which was found among his personal effects, he also says it was on November 15 (CE 2717, 26 H 91), this has to be incorrect, since Mosby's published story on the interview in the Fort Worth Star-Telegram ("Fort Worth Defector Confirms Red Beliefs"), published on Sunday, November 15, 1959, was datelined "Moscow, November 14 (UPI)," and in the article Mosby said she interviewed Oswald the previous day, "Saturday" (CE 2716, 26 H 90).

* Though this sounds like an elegant suite, something Oswald could not be expected to be able to afford, Mosby says the room was the standard “thirty dollar a day room with meals that all tourists must buy” (CE 1385, 22 H 702).

* Oswald ended his letter lightheartedly: “It is snowing here in Moscow now, which makes everything look very nice from my hotel window. I can see the Kremlin and Red Square and I have just finished a dinner of meat and potatoes. So you see the Russians are not so different from you and I” (CE 295, 16 H 822).

* - How did the decision on Oswald come about? Former KGB colonel Oleg Nechiporenko, with access to KGB files, writes in his book Passport to Assassination that “the news of Oswald’s visit to the [U.S.] Embassy, in conjunction with his attempt at suicide, upset the people who ran Intourist... Now the Western mass media were clued into events, which could lead to reports that in the Soviet Union tourists are ‘driven to commit suicide.’ This could damage the image and the commercial interest of Intourist by scaring away potential tourists to the USSR. Therefore, the Intourist brass again began to sound all the alarms. This time it sent another strictly confidential message on November 12 straight to Anastas Mikoyan, Deputy Chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers. As First Deputy Chairman, Mikoyan was in charge of all Soviet foreign trade organizations, including Intourist. In this capacity he could issue orders to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Chairman of the KGB. Mikoyan forwarded the letter to the head of the Seventh Department of the Second Chief Directorate, the division of counterintelligence that handled tourists” (Nechiporenko, Passport to Assassination, p. 39). The implication is that the mere forwarding of the letter carried the imprimatur of Mikoyan that he was not opposed to Oswald being permitted to stay in the Soviet Union.

* - Author Norman Mailer, in research for his book Oswald's Tale: An American Mystery, spent six months in Russia in 1993. While there he tracked down and interviewed the KGB agents who were assigned to monitor Oswald's every move. Undoubtedly aided by his international stature as an author, he was also given access to the Belarus KGB files on Oswald, including transcripts of conversations overheard by the KGB (through electronic surveillance) in the apartment in Minsk that Oswald shared with his wife, Marina. I have availed myself, in this book, of some of Mailer's seminal research on Oswald in Russia along with that of KGB colonel Oleg Maximovich Nechiporenko, who also had access to KGB files on Oswald, which he used for his book Passport to Assassination.

*- Meanwhile, since Marguerite hadn't heard from Lee for several months, she became worried, and wrote her congressman in Fort Worth, Jim Wright, on March 6, 1960, asking him for help in locating Lee (CE 1138, 22 H 118). Wright forwarded her inquiry to the Department of State, which in turn sent it to the American embassy in Moscow. The embassy responded to the Department of State on March 28 that embassy officials had had no contact with Oswald since November 9, 1959, and had "no clue as to his present whereabouts." The embassy suggested that Mrs. Oswald write a personal letter to Lee, send it to the embassy, and they'd forward it to the Soviet Foreign Office. (CE 923, 18 H 122; CE 927, 18 H 126) There's no evidence that Marguerite did that, but the day after she wrote to Wright she wrote a letter to U.S. Secretary of State Christian Herter, also asking him for assistance in locating Lee. "Lee is probably stranded," she wrote Herter, "and even if he now realizes that he has made a mistake he would have no way of financing his way home. He probably needs help." (CE 206, 16 H 594-595; see also CE 928-930, 18 H 128-130)

* - Author Norman Mailer was told by the KGB agent in charge of Oswald's detail that by now the agency had given Oswald a new code name. Mailer writes, "It was Likhoi. That sounded like Lee Harvey, but the word meant valiant, or dashing. It was KGB humor. Likhoi never seemed to do anything but go to work, walk around, and shop." (Mailer, Oswald's Tale, p. 114)

* It is not clear how many times Oswald went hunting with the club. Although Tzagiko suggested only once, Lee suggested it was several times, later telling a group of college students in Alabama that the group of hunters he went with sometimes spent the night in outlying villages, which were so poor that they “often” left their bag with the villagers, who did not seem to have enough to eat (CE 2678, 26 H 34–35; CE 2679, 26 H 35–36; WR, p. 699).

* In a typed narrative to a book he was contemplating writing on Russia and his experiences there, Oswald described life in Russia, and at the factory, as centered around the “Kollektive.” He wrote that the head of the Kollektive in his factory, Comrade Lebizen, saw to it that everyone maintained shop discipline, attended party meetings, and received all the new propaganda as it came out. Meetings of the Kollektive were “so numerous as to be staggering.” In a single month were scheduled one meeting of the professional union, four political information meetings, two young Communist meetings, one meeting of the production committee to discuss ways of improving work, two Communist Party meetings, four meetings of the “School of Communist Labor,” and one sports meeting. All but one of the fifteen meetings were compulsory for Communist Party members and all but three were compulsory for everyone. They were scheduled so as to not to interfere with work (meaning at lunch or after work), and were anywhere from ten minutes to two hours in duration. “Absenteeism,” he said, “is by no means allowed.” Oswald said that no one liked the meetings. (CE 92, 16 H 285, 290–292)

* - In the same interview Marina acknowledged that when she wed Oswald, she was not a virgin, that she was terrified he might ask but he did not.

* In Russia, an a is added to a last name for a wife. When a husband and wife are spoken of as one, the husband's name is used—hence, “the Prusakovs.”

* In September 1992, Marina told a Moscow correspondent for the Toronto Star, Jennifer Gould, “I was never in love with Lee.” Marina, fifty-one at the time and living as man and wife with Kenneth Porter, a rancher in Rockwell, Texas, was in Moscow for the filming of Marina’s Story, a $3.7 million NBC made-for-television movie about her life—ironically billed as a “love story.” (Jennifer Gould, “Oswald’s Soviet Friends Come to His Defense,” Toronto Star, January 31, 1993; “Marina’s Turn,” p. 71)

‡ Tamara, an older coworker of Marina's at the pharmacy, was convinced that of the two men Marina had been seeing, it was Anatoly whom she loved (McMillan, Marina and Lee, p. 101).

* While Marina, as previously indicated, was not a virgin, the extent of her sexual freedom is somewhat unclear. Her chief accuser in Minsk, Yuri Merezhinsky, was a member of the small group of hip men and women Marina hung out with, and according to him, “everybody” in the group was having sex with Marina except for Sasha Piskalev, the one in the group who was “in love up to his ears” with Marina and “was ready to marry her.” Fine. But then it turns out that Yuri himself never had sex with Marina either. (Mailer, Oswald’s Tale, pp. 154–157)

*- The odd language “it is assumed” stems from a June 3, 1960, memorandum from FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover to the Department of State in which he said that the bureau had learned from Oswald’s mother that her son had taken his birth certificate with him to Russia and that three letters she had written to him had been returned undelivered, raising the possibility of something having happened to him and someone using his birth certificate. See discussion on the Second Oswald allegation in conspiracy section.

* - There was, of course, one governmental agency that could give Oswald the promise of immunity he wanted so badly. Indeed, if Oswald was the CIA agent or operative on a mission to Russia that conspiracy theorists are so convinced he was, the issue of immunity, and Oswald's fears and anxieties with respect to prosecution, would never have arisen in the first place.

* According to Marina's biographer, Priscilla McMillan, Marina called Lee either "Lee" or "Alka." She called him "Lee" when she was angry at him. "Alka" was a nickname Marina had given Lee (McMillan doesn't say how she came up with it or its derivation) that was reserved for warm and sentimental moments, as when she was thinking of the happy days in Russia when they first met (McMillan, Marina and Lee, p. 221).

‡ Although Oswald had verbally told the American embassy in Moscow in October 1959, and even confirmed in a note he wrote on hotel stationery that he had given to them, that he wanted to dissolve his American citizenship and wanted to become a Soviet citizen, this was not enough to constitute expatriation. What would have been? Among other things (none of which Oswald had done) being “naturalized as a citizen of a foreign state” having “taken an oath or made an affirmation or other formal declaration of allegiance to a foreign state” “entered or served in the armed forces of a foreign state” having “made a formal renunciation of nationality...before a diplomatic or consular office of the United States in a foreign state” (recall that Oswald had not returned to the U.S. embassy in October 1959 to fill out the necessary formal documents for renunciation); et cetera. (CE 938, 18 H 144; for Oswald erroneously indicating on the Application for Renewal of Passport form that he had renounced his citizenship, or affirmed his allegiance to the Soviet Union, or it being a typographical error, see CE 938, 18 H 144; CE 947, 18 H 176–177; WR, pp. 755–756; and 5 H 282–283, 286, WCT Richard Edward Snyder)

*- Conspiracy theorists, ever suspicious, believe that Marina was granted an exit visa more quickly than normal, and they thus infer that she (and hence, her husband) was a KGB agent. Although Marina formally applied for her Soviet exit visa on August 21, 1961, she initiated her request in a letter to the Soviet authorities more than a month earlier, though the exact date is not known. However, we know that as early as July 17, 1961, her husband gave the Soviets a statement guaranteeing the support of his wife if they allowed her to leave for America. (CE 985, 18 H 405) So we know that at least five months transpired between when the Soviets received a document of some sort requesting an exit visa and when they granted her permission to leave on December 25, 1961. Of eleven cases examined by the CIA, Soviet wives of American citizens had to wait from five months to a year to obtain an exit visa. Of six cases examined by the U.S. Department of State after 1953, the liberalized post-Stalin era, the approximate waiting periods for Soviet wives of American citizens were, in decreasing order, approximately thirteen months, seven months, three months, one month, and ten days. (WR, pp. 279–280; CE 2756, 26 H 141–142)

* - A name derived from that of the father, especially by the addition to his first name of a prefix or suffix.

‡ Section 423.2-1 of the U.S. State Department regulations in force at the time provided that repatriation loans could be made to destitute U.S. nationals: “(a) Who are in complete and unquestioned possession of their citizenship rights; (b) Who are entitled to receive United States passports; (c) Whose loyalty to the United States is beyond question, or to whom the provisions of Section 423.1-2(b) apply” (7 FAM [Foreign Affairs Manual] § 423.2–1; 5 USC § 1701; WR, p. 771). Oswald clearly satisfied the qualifications of items (a) and (b), although not (c). Surely, his statements at the embassy at the time of his “defection” rendered his loyalty to the country of his birth highly suspect, but the State Department felt that an escape clause, appended to Section 423.1-2 (b), was applicable here. It permitted such loans when “the United States national is in or the cause of a situation which is damaging to the prestige of the United States Government or which constitutes a compelling reason for extending assistance to effect his return.” (7 FAM § 423.1–2; CE 950, 18 H 310) The State Department did indeed feel that Oswald’s “continued presence in Russia was damaging to the prestige of the United States because of his unstable character and prior criticisms of the United States.” Government officials knew about his botched suicide attempt when he first tried to gain residence in the USSR, and no one could be sure that he would not pull some other crazy stunt that would create an international incident embarrassing to the United States. (CE 950, 18 H 309–311; WR, p. 771)

* Although transportation to Texas was not provided for, it still appears that the eight hundred dollars, then one thousand dollars, that Oswald had earlier requested from the International Rescue Committee for transportation was more than he actually needed.

* Though not included in the Warren Commission volumes, the cover letter of Agent Fain's July 10, 1962, report to FBI headquarters of his June 26 interview of Oswald says that Fain asked Oswald if he'd be willing to take a polygraph test on whether he had furnished any information to the Soviets, or had been recruited by Soviet intelligence agents, or had made any deals with the Soviets in order to obtain permission to return to the United States. Oswald declined to take the test without giving any reason. (FBI Record 124-10010-10033, July 10, 1962, Cover page C)

* But some in the Russian emigré community felt that Marina was as much to blame for their difficulties as was Lee. One was Katya Ford. Though she liked Marina and agreed that Oswald was “mentally unstable,” she felt Marina was “a rather immature girl” who deliberately provoked Oswald by saying things to him that she knew would anger him, such as that he was “badly brought up or something like that.” (2 H 300, WCT Katherine N. Ford) Jeanne de Mohrenschildt said that Marina “ribbed him even in front of us. She ribbed him so, that if I would ever speak to my husband that way we would not last long.” When asked by Warren Commission counsel for an example of the ribbing, Mrs. de Mohrenschildt said Marina would say, “Oh, big hero” or “Look at that big shot, something like that.” (9 H 312–313) But George de Mohrenschildt seems to be the only one that went beyond this, claiming that Marina was always nagging Oswald over the fact that they weren’t as well off as others, and said that he and his wife finally told her to stop annoying him, that “he is doing his best” (9 H 233).

*- Lee told Marina he had been fired at Leslie Welding but didn't say why (1 H 5, WCT Marina N. Oswald). Shortly thereafter, he filled out an application card at the Texas Employment Commission in Dallas and said he was "laid off" by the Fort Worth employer, again without explanation (10 H 135, WCT Helen P. Cunningham). However, he implied to the group at his home that the reason he lost his job was that it was "seasonal" (McMillan, Marina and Lee, p. 252; 8 H 366, WCT George Alexandrovich Bouhe).

‡ Mrs. Taylor got the job of babysitting June while Marina was at the dentist. It wasn't easy. "The minute Marina left, the child would start to cry. She whimpered all the time. I couldn't feed her. Every time I got near her she'd scream. She never slept. She's a very difficult child to get along with. She was not affectionate at all to anybody else but to her own parents" (11 H 127–128, WCT Mrs. Donald Gibson [Mrs. Gary Taylor, formerly Alexandra de Mohrenschildt]).

* It is not known where Oswald spent the nights of October 8 through October 14, 1962, in Dallas, which raises all types of sinister alarm bells for conspiracy theorists. But other than the fact that Oswald had been a defector—not a terribly important event—he was of no interest to anyone. Before the assassination, no one had any reason to have Oswald under surveillance, watching his every move. The conspiracy theorists, however, do not accept this obvious fact, and expect every day and minute of his time to be accounted for. Whenever a day is unaccounted for, it must be because Oswald eluded those who were watching him (but no one was), and snuck off to meet with those he was conspiring with to kill Kennedy.

‡ During part of this period Oswald stayed with Marina at Elena Hall's residence in Fort Worth. Hall had an automobile accident on October 18 that resulted in her being hospitalized until October 26, and four days after returning from the hospital, she left for New York to visit friends, not returning until after Marina and Lee had moved into an apartment on November 3. So Marina was all alone at Hall's residence and Oswald stayed overnight with her on several days. (11 H 137, WCT Mrs. Donald Gibson; 1 H 8, WCT Marina N. Oswald; 11 H 120, WC affidavit of Alexander Kleinlerer; WR, pp. 719–720)

‡ And with the contacts came the beatings, even though Lee wasn't living with Marina at the time. Elena Hall told the Warren Commission that the first time Marina came to live with her after Marina's stay at the Taylors, Marina "had black and blue over half of her face...He would beat her all the time" (8 H 395).

* - Indeed, a harbinger that nothing had changed occurred at Elena Hall's home in Fort Worth the day before the Oswalds moved into the Elsbeth apartment. Elena was away in New York and pursuant to Lee's asking him, Alexander Kleinlerer came to Elena's to discuss and help in the moving arrangements. While there, Oswald noticed that the zipper on Marina's skirt was not completely closed. "He called to her in a very angry and commanding tone of voice, just like an officer commanding a soldier. His exact words were 'Come here!' in Russian and he uttered them in the way you would call a misbehaving dog in order to inflict punishment. He was standing in the doorway. When she reached the doorway he rudely reprimanded her in a flat imperious voice about being careless in her dress and slapped her in the face twice. Marina had the baby in her arms. Her face was red and tears came to her eyes. I was very much embarrassed and also angry but I had long been afraid of Oswald and I did not say anything" (11 H 120, WC affidavit of Alexander Kleinlerer).

* He would come to be described as “six feet one or two inches tall, handsome, dark, broad-shouldered, a man of arresting physique who frequently wore bathing trunks on the street the better to display it, loud, hearty, humorous, a man who was forever dancing, joking, and telling off-color stories, and who would drink all night and never show it, lover of innumerable women, a European aristocrat so secure of his lineage that there was no one whose friendship could demean him” (McMillan, Marina and Lee, p. 264). Albert Jenner, de Mohrenschildt’s questioner at the Warren Commission who clearly was taken with George, and whose enjoyment at questioning George leaps from the transcript pages, gratuitously added, for the record, that the witness was “athletically inclined...quite tanned, [and] an outdoors man” (9 H 180).

* Though de Mohrenschildt was impressed with certain character traits of Oswald's, he did, on the other hand, discount the possibility that Oswald was a Soviet spy, saying, "I never would believe that any government would be stupid enough to trust Lee with anything important...an unstable individual, mixed-up individual, uneducated individual, without background. What government would give him any confidential work? No government would. Even the government of Ghana would not give him a job of any type" (9 H 237).

* - Anna thinks that Marina said Lee had beaten her, but Marina said Lee hadn't, and she didn't tell Anna he had, but "perhaps [Anna] understood that he had beaten me, because it had happened [before]." Meller did say she saw no bruises on Marina when she arrived at her home. (1 H 34, WCT Marina N. Oswald; 8 H 386-387, WCT Anna N. Meller)

* Hall and Davis were convicted by a federal jury shortly thereafter. Their lawyer, John Abt (whom Oswald would later want to represent him after his arrest for Kennedy's murder), had argued that the act of registration violated the Fifth Amendment's prohibition against self-incrimination, and the conviction was later reversed in 1965 when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled the McCarran Act was unconstitutional (Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 382 U.S. 70, 86 [1965]).

‡ Oswald's appetite for the revolutionary cause carried over to the New Year, Lee celebrating the first day of 1963, when most other men his age were watching football games on TV, by sending thirty-five cents to Pioneer Publishers, the literary arm of the SWP, for three pamphlets by J. B. Cannon: The Coming American Revolution, The End of the Comintern, and The 1948 Manifesto of the 4th International Period. And he said he'd appreciate it if they would send him the English words to the song "International." (Dobbs Exhibit No. 7, 19 H 573)

* Ironically, in 1957, Walker, stationed with his army unit in Arkansas, subjugated his segregationist impulses and carried out his duty, commanding the “federalized” National Guard troops that forced integration on Little Rock’s Central High School (Cartwright, “Old Soldier,” p. 59).

* The Tulsa-based Hargis, whose oratorical style of preaching was what Oklahomans call “bawl and jump” (shouting to the point of hoarseness while flailing one’s arms), weighed in at 270 pounds and was known more for his anti-Communism than for his preaching the Gospel of Christ, though one of his favorite lines was “for Christ and against communism.” In the 1960s and early 1970s his fame and influence was on its way to rivaling Reverend Billy Graham’s. The Christian Crusade, which Hargis founded, had an enormous budget by 1972 and his message was being delivered in over 500 radio and 250 television stations around the country, mostly in the South. On the air and in his many books (e.g., Communist America—Must It Be?, The Real Extremists—The Far Left, Why I Fight for a Christian America), Hargis routinely accused the likes of President Kennedy, his brother Robert, and network news anchors like Walter Cronkite, Chet Huntley, and David Brinkley of being soft on Communism. He himself had a soft side, shown by his establishment, in 1966, of a missionary foundation that ran medical clinics and orphanages in Asia and Africa. His power and reach substantially and irrevocably waned in 1974, when he resigned as president of the Christian college he had founded in Tulsa amid allegations he had had sex with a few male and female students. Newsweek noted in 1987 that Hargis was “the first televangelist brought down by allegations of sexual misconduct.” (Myrna Oliver, “Rev. Billy James Hargis, 79, Pastor Targeted Communism,” Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2004, obituary, p.B10; New York Times, November 29, 2004, p. A23) Likewise, it was charges of sexual misconduct against General Walker (arrested and convicted of public lewdness after making sexual advances to an undercover Dallas police officer in the men’s room of a public park) that brought his downfall as a significant force two years later in 1976 (Cartwright, “Old Soldier,” p. 59).

* The considerable and ongoing, to this day, interest by members of the conspiracy community in Ruth Paine is because they have actually entertained the notion that she and her husband were part of a conspiracy to murder Kennedy (e.g., Garrison, Heritage of Stone, pp. 80, 114–115). Indeed, at the London trial, Gerry Spence, on cross-examination, actually pushed the issue, suggesting that a series of incidents involving Ruth only appeared to be coincidences. “It just is a coincidence that you befriended the wife of the man who was later charged with the murder of our president?” Spence asked Ruth, disbelief in his voice. “And is it a coincidence that it was you, Mrs. Paine, who directed Lee to the job that put him in the Texas School Book Depository?” “And it’s just a coincidence that the gun that supposedly killed the president was located in your house?” (Transcript of On Trial, July 24, 1986, pp. 647–648) To me, and to all or most of the jury I’m sure, the thought of the extremely proper and straight-laced Quaker lady with the rimless glasses conspiring to kill an ant or flower, much less a president, was laughable, and my amusement was apparently picked up by the camera. Paine’s biographer, Thomas Mallon, writes, “Spence walks around with a giant photo of Oswald and throws everything he can at Ruth, even the suggestion she might be a KGB agent.” (As seen, he suggested much more than this.) Mallon goes on to write that the camera shows “Bugliosi, by contrast...beaming with delight [an exaggeration—only a measured smile] as Ruth gently forbears Spence’s assault. The prosecutor takes no advantage of several obvious opportunities to object, clearly preferring to let his opponent’s aggression backfire.” (Mallon, Mrs. Paine’s Garage, p. 147) While Mallon’s assessment of my strategy was correct, even if the majority of jurors felt the way I did, if Spence could muddy the waters to the extent of creating a reasonable doubt in the mind of just one of the jurors, he would have succeeded in creating a hung jury.

* When I saw the “room” on a trip to Dallas on September 22, 2004, I wondered how anyone could possibly use this small room as any type of functional study. The current tenant, John Thompson, who has lived there for four years, was kind enough to measure the room for me. It’s three feet nine inches by four feet five inches, a room he uses as a closet to put his “junk.” Incidentally, the door leading out of this small room to the outside, which enabled Oswald to come and go without Marina knowing, is no longer there.

* Sometime in the “late spring or early summer of 1963,” a Dallas police officer, W. R. Finigan, who was posted on the corner of Main and Ervay not far from Jagers-Chiles-Stovall, spotted a man across the street passing out literature. He had a sign on his back (probably the placard Oswald wore around his neck) reading, “Viva Castro.” When Finigan’s superior, Sergeant D. V. Harkness, stopped to talk to Finigan for a moment, the man removed the “Viva Castro” sign, ran into a department store, and disappeared. Harkness told Finigan to forget about it. A passerby who had seen the leaflet peddler close up reported to the police that the guy had muttered, “Oh hell, here come the cops” as he fled. (CE 1409, 22 H 796, Letter from Finigan to J. R. Curry, May 15, 1964)

‡New Yorker writer Albert H. Newman, in his fine book The Assassination of John F. Kennedy: The Reasons Why, argues that all of this activity by Oswald, as early as March of 1963, revolved around a desire to get to Cuba and be recognized as a hero of the Cuban Revolution (Newman, Assassination of John F. Kennedy, p. 329), a plan he had first broached years before with Nelson Delgado, his buddy in the Marine Corps at El Toro. And Marina testified to Oswald's interest in Cuba and Castro's revolution while they were still in the Soviet Union (1 H 24; CE 944, 18 H 631–632). Newman noticed the likelihood that Oswald was listening to nightly broadcasts of shortwave radio from Cuba, something the Warren Commission overlooked. The Commission sent the small Russian radio found in Oswald's rooming house after the assassination to the National Security Agency at Fort Meade, which reported that the radio "appears to be a normal receiver and there's no evidence of its use for any other purpose" (CE 2768, 26 H 155). Newman, a shortwave listener himself, easily determined that Oswald's "tourist" brand radio was capable of receiving Radio Havana's twice-nightly English-language broadcasts on both the normal broadcast and the shortwave band. Oswald was certainly familiar with the shortwave band and Soviet attempts to jam it. He wrote in his notes on the Soviet Union, "But the jamming frequencies are only half those of the 'Radio Moscow' propaganda programs, which may be heard on any short wave radio in the United States and without jamming" (CE 95, 16 H 406). He also referred to a Voice of America broadcast he had heard in Minsk in a letter to his brother Robert (CE 316, 16 H 875). Mr. Johnson, the landlord of Oswald's final residence in the Oak Cliff rooming house, said that Oswald retired early and listened to his small radio (Hugh Aynesworth, "Oswald Rented Room under Alias," Dallas Morning News, November 23, 1963, p. 6).

In the summer of 1966, Newman used the cheapest portable, transistor shortwave radio he could find—it cost less than twelve dollars—to check Radio Havana's signal in Dallas and found it to be consistently the strongest on the forty-nine-meter band (at 6.135 megacycles), three times stronger than it was in New York. Newman, in referring to Cuban radio, writes, "If soap and cigarettes can be sold over radio, so can hatred of the United States, its policies and its leaders." (Newman, Assassination of John F. Kennedy, pp. 23–27)

* The April 8, 1963, edition of the Militant to which Oswald subscribed carried a story datelined Denver, March 27, and headlined “United Picket Line in Denver Greets ‘Night Riding’ Walker” and mentioned that Walker had challenged President Kennedy to drop the Eighty-second Airborne Division on Cuba and get rid of Fidel Castro (Newman, Assassination of John F. Kennedy, p. 342). It cannot be known whether Oswald got his copy of the edition on April 9, or before he left to shoot Walker on April 10, or sometime thereafter.

* Coleman lived in the house on the other side of the church parking lot and apparently was the only witness to have heard the sound of the rifle shot, though he originally thought it was a car backfire. Coleman told the FBI that he ran out to his backyard, stepped up on a bicycle, and looked into the floodlit church parking lot, where he saw about eight cars parked and a man hurrying to one of them, a white or beige 1950 Ford, with its headlights on and its motor running. The man was a white male, nineteen to twenty years old, about five feet ten inches tall and weighing around 130 pounds, “real skinny,” and had dark bushy hair, a thin face, and a large nose. A second man was walking to a 1958 black-over-white Chevrolet sedan. This man, also a white male, was around six feet one inch tall and weighed about 200 pounds. The first man got into the Ford and drove out of the lot, he said, at a “normal rate of speed” to Turtle Creek Boulevard—this is probably the car Walker saw as he came down the stairs with his pistol. The second man went to the Chevy, pushed the driver’s seat forward, and leaned into the backseat. At that point Coleman went back into the house and saw no more. (CE 2958, 26 H 437–438, FBI interview of Walter Coleman on June 3, 1964; position of cars in lot: CE 953-B, C, D, 23 H 773–775)

* Marina told her biographer, Priscilla McMillan, that the incident took place on Thursday morning, April 11, the day after the attempt on Walker's life (McMillan, Marina and Lee, pp. 356–358). However, earlier, on July 24, 1964, just eight months after the event, Marina clearly told the Warren Commission that this incident took place “three days after this [attempt on Walker] happened.” Question: “Three days after he shot at General Walker you saw him destroy the [notebook], is that correct?” “Yes.” (11 H 292)

* When Dr. Vincent Guinn made his neutron activation analysis of the bullet for the HSCA, he determined that it was “extremely likely” that the Walker bullet was a Mannlicher-Carcano bullet manufactured by the Western Cartridge Company, the same as the ammunition used in the Kennedy assassination (1 HSCA 502, HSCA testimony of Dr. Guinn on September 8, 1978). The Dallas Police Department’s “General Offense Report” on April 10, 1963, its first report on the Walker shooting, described the bullet as a “steel-jacketed bullet” (CE 2001, 24 H 39), whereas the 6.5-millimeter Mannlicher-Carcano bullets were copper-jacketed. Frazier told the Warren Commission that “some individuals commonly refer to rifle bullets as steel-jacketed bullets, when they actually in fact just have a copper alloy jacket” (3 H 439).

* - Not only could the bathroom door be locked only from the inside, but also critics point out that most bathroom doors open inward. If this one did (as of September 22, 2004, when I visited the apartment, the door did, but it is unknown whether this was the same door that was on the hinges forty-one years earlier), and Marina was pushing forward, as she said she was, unless Oswald got so caught up in the moment that he forgot to turn the knob (in which case there wouldn't have even been a struggle), she would only be pushing the door open, not keeping it closed. Hence, the critics question Marina's story about the entire incident (e.g., Summers, Not in Your Lifetime, p. 124).

* - In addition to the Murrets, who were Lee's relatives on his mother's side, Lee had many other aunts and cousins in the New Orleans area, all on his father's side. But other than Aunt Hazel, all of them told the FBI they had never met him and could furnish no information concerning him. (CD 107, pp.14-16, January 13, 1964)

* - The letter was not reproduced in the Warren Commission volumes.

‡ On a lighter note, Marina wrote that she and Lee had recently been to the French Quarter in the evening. “It’s a shame you didn’t manage to get there in the evening. For me it was especially interesting as it was the first time in my life I had seen such. There were many nightclubs there. Through the open doors were visible barely covered dancing girls (so as not to say entirely unclothed). Most of them had really very pretty, rare figures and if one doesn’t think about too many things, then one can like them very much” (CE 408, 17 H 89).

* The publications he would continue to receive which he had been subscribing to included the Worker, the Militant, and Soviet Belorussia, an organ of the Soviet government. It's noteworthy that in an April 19, 1963, speech by President Kennedy reported in the Militant, he said that "in five years time" it was likely that Castro would be deposed, and the April 29, 1963, edition of the Militant quoted a statement by Robert F. Kennedy on April 22, that "we can't just snap our fingers and make Castro go away. But we can fight for this. We can dedicate all our energy and best possible brains to that effort." (McMillan, Marina and Lee, pp.399–400, 611–612 note 2)

It was clear to Oswald that the Kennedy administration wanted to overthrow his hero, Fidel Castro.

* On his own membership card, Lee signed his name, then instructed Marina to sign the name "A. J. Hidell" above the typed words "Chapter President." When Marina, perplexed, said, "You have selected this name because it sounds like Fidel," Lee blushed, then said, "Shut-up, it is none of your business." Marina was convinced Hidell was nothing but an "altered Fidel," and she laughed in his face at such foolishness. If it wasn't Fidel, she pressed him, then who was Hidell? He was stuck and muttered the contradiction that Hidell "was his own name and that there is no Hidell in existence." Oh, Marina said, taunting him, so you have "two names?" "Yes," he said, with nowhere else to go. He finally recovered his mental equilibrium and said it was necessary to use this fictitious name so "people will think I have a big organization." Marina played her husband's silly game and wrote the name A. J. Hidell on the card, as Lee insisted she do. (5 H 401, 1 H 64, WCT Marina N. Oswald)

* On the Certificate of Vaccination document, Oswald used his rubber-stamp kit to imprint the name of “Dr. A. J. Hideel,” whose office he listed as P.O. Box 30016, New Orleans. He failed to notice his misspelling of his favorite alias, “Hidell.” More seriously, he misprinted Dr. Hideel’s post office box address, reversing the last two numbers, an error he repeated, more consequentially, when he stamped some of his handbills—if any potential recruit did try to get in touch with the New Orleans chapter of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee, Oswald might never have known about it. The rubber-stamped location on his handbills exists in two versions, one giving A. J. Hidell’s name and the incorrect post office box number “30016, New Orleans, LA” under “Location” and the other stamped “L. H. Oswald” and giving his correct 4907 Magazine Street address. (Cadigan Exhibit No. 23, 19 H 296–297; CE 2966-A and B, 26 H 448)

* - Hosty had been doing the usual things to pick up Oswald's trace, and learned in May that Lee and Marina had apparently left the Dallas area (4 H 443, WCT James P. Hosty Jr.).

* The shortness of this period of personal neglect is evidenced by the fact that Adrian Alba, the operator of the garage next door to the coffee company where Lee spent so many of his work breaks, apparently doesn't recall it at all. His only recollection of Oswald in this regard is that he couldn't figure out how someone whose job was an oiler "was always extremely neat and clean. At anytime during the day his pants had a neat crease in them and his shirt was always clean—no oil on them at all" (HSCA Record 180-10072-10047, HSCA staff interview of Adrian Alba on January 24, 1978, p.2).

*- No wonder. A hundred dollars was about all Lee and Marina had to their names. They never had a bank account or safe-deposit box during their marriage and Marina said that in New Orleans Lee put the family savings in a wallet he kept at their home. She estimated that there “might be $100” or two hundred dollars at the most in the wallet. Since he had no source of income other than the modest compensation he received while working, Oswald could never adequately provide for his family, and he felt shamed by this. Marina said that she was aware of the shame he felt and therefore very seldom spoke to him about finances or money or finding a job. Speaking of the New Orleans period, Lillian Murret, Oswald’s aunt, said, “Lee was very poor. They were practically starving.” (CE 1781, 23 H 387, FBI interview of Marina Oswald on November 28, 1963; HSCA Record 180-10075-10352, HSCA deposition of Lillian Murret on November 6, 1978, p.15) The situation did not improve much in Dallas. When I asked Ruth Paine at the London trial, “How would you characterize the financial condition of the Oswalds?” she responded, “They were very poor” (Transcript of On Trial, July 24, 1986, p.627).

* Vincent T. Lee later told the Warren Commission that he decided to quit corresponding with Oswald. “He had gone ahead and acted on his own without any authorization [to set up a New Orleans chapter]...and then, when somebody goes off like this, violating all the rules that you send him, it comes as quite a disappointment because you have had hopes. Obviously, this man was not operating in an official capacity for the organization” (10 H 90).
The hapless Lee was the only member of the “New Orleans branch” of the FPCC, a branch that had never been chartered by the national committee.

* After the FBI confirmed Oswald's residence at 4907 Magazine Street, Mrs. Lena Garner, Oswald's landlady, recalled that the agent, Milton Kaack (one of two New Orleans FBI agents—the other, Warren de Brueys—assigned to monitor Oswald's activities), asked her "different little things about if I had seen him go out and did he have company and all this and that." Concerned, she asked Kaack, "I hope I don't have the wrong type of person in my house," and he told her, "Oh, no." He gave her his phone number and told her to call him if any unusual activities pertaining to Oswald took place. (CE 826, 17 H 755, xxii, FBI report of SA Milton Kaack on October 31, 1963; HSCA Record 180-10104-10364, Testimony of Lena Garner before HSCA on May 5, 1978, pp.8–10; HSCA staff interview of Mrs. Jesse Garner on February 20, 1978) Though Agent Hosty had lost Oswald's trail in Dallas, the New York City FBI office learned from an informant that on June 26, Oswald, with a post office box numbered 30061 in New Orleans, had corresponded with the Worker in New York, and this information was passed on to the New Orleans office of the FBI. Another informant (almost undoubtedly a New Orleans post office employee) advised the New Orleans FBI office on July 23 that Oswald's post office box had been rented on June 3, and Oswald had given his address as 657 French Street (as indicated, the Murrets lived at 757 French Street) in New Orleans. It is not clear from the record how the FBI got Oswald's address on Magazine Street since the Murrets never indicated the FBI came to their door until after Labor Day. (CE 833, 17 H 794; CE 826, 17 H 754–755; 8 H 146–147, WCT Lillian Murret)

* Film, which few Americans have ever seen, was shot of this incident. Sixteen-year-old Jim Doyle, walking with his parents on Canal Street, tried out his birthday present, an 8-millimeter camera. The film is somewhat murky, but the participants are clearly identifiable. The footage of Oswald passing out literature that is usually shown to illustrate this incident in television documentaries was actually shot a week later in a different location and without the involvement of any anti-Castro Cubans.

* - Why Lee would want to talk to the FBI, whom he had tried to elude in Fort Worth and Dallas, and for whom he had a dislike, is not known. The FBI agent who interviewed him, when asked that question, could only say that “frequently, persons who are in custody of local authorities...like to talk to the FBI” (4 H 435, WCT John Lester Quigley).

‡ We have seen that, per Marina, Oswald's alias Hidell was derived from Castro's first name, Fidel. The "A." on the membership card was the initial for Alek, which appeared on the forged Selective Service card Oswald had in his wallet at the time of his arrest ("Alex James Hidell"), and probably came from his Russian nickname Alik.

* - Oswald's choice of the Trade Mart, located on Camp Street in a busy part of downtown New Orleans, was a logical one, since his whole plea involved Cuba, and the Trade Mart housed many import and export companies that did business with Latin America. Before the trade embargo on Cuba by the American government, many of such companies did business with Cuba. (Letter from Johann Rush to author dated January 5, 2000)

* The frames of Oswald in front of the Trade Mart also show him shaven and clean-cut with a white shirt and tie and dark trousers (see photo section), clearly the old Oswald once again after the brief spell at the greasing job at the coffee company.

* Although it doesn't make too much sense, I am forced by the evidence to conclude that Oswald probably wrote this letter before he even went on Stuckey's show. Stuckey is positive that the taped interview with Oswald took place around 5:00 p.m. on Saturday, August 17, 1963, a few hours before his regular Saturday night show at 7:30 p.m. (11 H 160, 162, 165, WCT William Kirk Stuckey). Yet Oswald's August 17 letter to Lee is postmarked, "New Orleans, L.A. 6:06 p.m. 17 AUG 1963" (Lee [Vincent T.] Exhibit No. 7, 20 H 531). There is no way Oswald could have had the long, thirty-seven-minute interview with Stuckey at 5:00 p.m., a discussion with him thereafter, gotten home (presumably by bus), written the letter, and had it postmarked 6:06 p.m. Either he wrote the letter before the interview (his saying the interview lasted only fifteen minutes when it lasted thirty-seven minutes is further evidence it was written before the interview), or Oswald was right about the interview being at 4:00 p.m., not 5:00 p.m. as Stuckey said, and Oswald, who would still, even with this additional hour, be very pressed for time, managed to get home on time to write the letter and get it off at a substation of the post office in his area for the postmarked time of 6:06 p.m. But this is still unlikely since it appears that the various post office substations in New Orleans closed at 5:45 p.m. (CE 2132, 24 H 716), the postmark being made at the post office after the mail was picked up. Oswald most likely put his letter in a mailbox or delivered it to a substation at some earlier time in the day.

* In 1985 and 1986, researchers for London Weekend Television interviewed Stuckey several times by phone at his hotel in Seattle. Stuckey had long since given up on his Latin America specialty and had become something of a gypsy, wandering from university to university in the land picking up stories to write in science journals. They asked him to be a witness in the trial, but he wanted to be paid a substantial fee, and the production company wasn't paying witnesses. Indeed, he wanted $5,000 just to loan out his copy of the tape of the WDSU radio debate. Stuckey said if he were to testify he should be placed into the category of a "character witness for Oswald." He was impressed by Oswald, believing him to be intelligent, sincere, and articulate, and called Oswald's performance on the show "the best run-down of a national liberation philosophy I've heard in a long time." Speaking of how conservative and anti-Communist New Orleans was at the time, and the fact that it was populated by many anti-Castro Cubans, he couldn't get over how Oswald could "go handing out left-wing pamphlets downtown. He was begging for a bullet." Stuckey himself felt isolated from the typical New Orleans scene. He and his French wife had wanted to see Oswald socially after the debate, and were going to invite him to the beach with them, but decided not to, as it would be inviting trouble. (Telephone interviews of Bill Stuckey by London Weekend Television researchers on September 4, 1985, and June 9 and 25, 1986)

* Priscilla McMillan, in talking over many years with Marina and others who knew Oswald, wrote, “Stingy as he was, and forever saving up in little ways, Lee did not want a lot of money for himself. That was not where his ambition lay. As with virtually everyone who knew him, Marina, too, believes that her husband could not have been ‘bought’” (McMillan, Marina and Lee, p.457).

* But of course someone had to unpack the package when Ruth arrived in Texas a few days later, and it was her husband Michael, whom she had called to help her. He was perplexed by the weight and feel of the contents of the package, thoughts like “camping equipment” and “an iron pipe” entering his mind. These guesses didn’t seem quite accurate to him, but being the “polite” Quaker he was, and aware of Oswald’s “rights to privacy,” he never snooped. He would later say he was satisfied it was Oswald’s rifle. (2 H 414–415, 417, 419, 9 H 436–441, WCT Michael R. Paine)

* When the FBI first ran Osborne down in February of 1964 near Russellville, Alabama, where he was staying at the residence of one Wylie Uptain, he was going under the name John Howard Bowen, with a bogus Social Security card as well as credit cards under that name, and said he was planning to leave for Laredo by way of New Orleans. He told them he had been born in Chester, Pennsylvania, in 1885 and raised in an orphanage in Philadelphia. That all of his relatives were deceased. That he completed the equivalent of two years of college by correspondence courses and completed a course in theology in 1914. He said he was ordained by the Plymouth Brethren in Trenton, New Jersey, and also by the Northern Baptist Convention in Binghamton, New York. And, he added, he was recognized as an ordained minister by the Missionary Baptist Convention. He said he worked for a time with juvenile delinquents in Knoxville, Tennessee, and had traveled extensively, but had never been to Canada or England. He considered his home to be the Saint Anthony Hotel in Laredo, Texas, where he had resided “intermittently” for twenty years. He told the FBI that Albert Osborne was another Baptist preacher he met in 1958 when they were staying at the same hotel in Oaxaco, Mexico. He said Osborne was about his same size and age.

It took a very long time and dogged footwork for FBI agents to sort out this convoluted fiction. They eventually turned up Albert Osborne’s birth certificate at Somerset House in England (where all births, deaths, and marriages in England are recorded) and a clutch of Osborne’s equally elderly brothers and sisters, all of whom readily identified him from photographs. However, many of the questions about Osborne-Bowen remain unanswered. (CE 2195, 25 H 25–74; CE 2196, 25 H 75)

* The other passengers on the bus were of the opinion that Oswald and Osborne did not know each other. For example, Pamela Mumford told the FBI it was her opinion that Oswald “had had no previous contact with any of the English-speaking people on the bus” including Osborne (11 H 220–221). And the McFarlands told me that from what they could gather from pieces of conversation they picked up between Oswald and Osborne, they got the “impression” the two didn’t know each other (Telephone interview of the McFarlands by the author on May 12, 1986).

* Oswald probably gained admission by using Silvia Duran's name when he spoke to the gatekeeper. It is not known where Oswald went to get his photographs. The FBI checked seven photo studios located within the vicinities of the Cuban and Russian embassies and could find no negative of Oswald. (CE 2449, 25 H 589–590) The negative for the photo stapled to Oswald's application for a visa was found among his effects after the assassination. The Warren Commission speculated that Oswald may have had the photos with him when he came to Mexico. (WR, pp.304, 734)

* Duran gave her recollection of the incident to the Mexican Federal Security Police in 1963 and the HSCA in 1978. She said that when Azcue refused to give Oswald his visa, Oswald became “highly agitated and angry,” insisting that he “was a friend of the Cuban Revolution, that he had already been in jail for the Cuban Revolution...He was red and he was almost crying and, uh, he was insisting and insisting, so Azcue told him to go away because if he didn’t go away at that moment he was going to kick him, or something like that. So, Azcue went to the door, he opened the door and told Oswald to go away...I was feeling pity for him [Oswald] because he looked desperate.” Duran said that at some point during Azcue’s argument with Oswald, Azcue had told Oswald that “a person like you, [instead] of aiding the Cuban Revolution, are doing it harm.” (3 HSCA 47–49, 51; CE 2121, 24 H 589–590; CE 2445, 25 H 586; see also Interview of Duran, Transcript of “Who Was Lee Harvey Oswald?” Frontline, PBS, November 16, 1993, p.28)

Before Oswald left, Duran gave him a piece of paper with her name and the Cuban consulate’s phone number so he could inquire at a later time about the decision in Havana regarding his visa application.

* In his 1995 book, Oswald's Tale, Norman Mailer writes that an interviewer employed by him asked Nechiporenko how it was possible that a responsible KGB agent would give back not only a gun but also the bullets to someone as disturbed in appearance as Oswald. "Nechiporenko shrugged. It had happened, he said. He could not speak for why. Yatskov had done it, but it did not seem exceptional at the time. They just had not been afraid that this man Oswald would go out on the street and cause trouble with his gun." Interestingly, when Nechiporenko was further asked if "this same episode had taken place in London, would any of you have returned the bullets?" Nechiporenko responded, "Never," from which Mailer infers "that these three KGB men had served in Mexico long enough to feel it was wrong to deprive a man of his gun. That, by the Mexican logic of the cantinas, was equal to emasculation." (Mailer, Oswald's Tale, p.640)

* One thing we do know he did (from CIA monitoring of telephone conversations at the Russian embassy) is that at 10:45 Tuesday morning, October 1, Oswald telephoned the embassy. After identifying himself by name, and saying he was at the embassy on Saturday, he said, “They said they’d send a telegram to Washington so I wanted to find out if you have anything new.” Oswald was informed that “nothing has been received as yet.” (CIA Document CSCI-3778826, November 25, 1963, JFK Document 000169) It is not known to whom in Washington the Soviets had told Oswald they would send the telegram, or for what purpose.

* - There is no record of any letter from the Soviets to Marina informing her of their decision.

* As previously noted, the Beckley address, like the unit he rented on North Marsalis, was in the Oak Cliff area of Dallas, an area Oswald obviously showed a preference for, the two places on Elsbeth and Neely he lived in with Marina also being in Oak Cliff. His taste for Oak Cliff, apart from the rents being affordable to him, was understandable. For the most part Oak Cliff is a moderately hilly, homey, and pridefully old residential area of Dallas. Just across the Trinity River, the tall buildings of downtown Dallas appear to be quite close. Indeed, they are. Oswald's rooming house was only 1.9 miles from where he worked at the Book Depository Building on the edge of downtown Dallas. (Assassination researcher Ken Holmes recorded 1.9 miles on the odometer in his vehicle on the evening of September 22, 2004, during my trip to Dallas.)

* - That Lee's small Russian radio had a shortwave capacity was virtually confirmed in his letter to his brother Robert written when Lee was in Minsk, in which he said he had "heard a Voice of America" broadcast about "the Russians releasing [Gary] Powers" (CE 316, 16 H 875).

* - As with the decision by the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs on October 7 refusing Marina's request to reenter the Soviet Union, the actual Soviet letter of rejection of Oswald's request to reenter the Soviet Union has never surfaced. At least neither had been received by Marina and Lee as late as November 9. On this date, Oswald wrote, as we shall see, to the Soviet embassy in Washington asking the embassy to inform him and his wife of the arrival of their Soviet entrance visas "as soon as they come." (CE 15, 16 H 33)

* An insolvable mystery attaches to this book. The Shark and the Sardines is the only book Oswald failed to return to the Dallas library on time—it was due on November 13. It was not found among his possessions either at Ruth Paine's house or at his North Beckley rooming house after the assassination. Three months after the assassination, the book had not been returned. (CE 2642, 25 H 901–902) Years later, author Albert H. Newman checked with the library and found to his astonishment that the book had indeed been returned; he had gone to the Oak Cliff branch of the library and held it in his hand. But the library kept no records of when and by whom. (Newman, Assassination of John F. Kennedy, pp.107–108) Either the library made a mistake when it listed the book as delinquent, which would not be an uncommon error, and is probably what happened, or someone returned it after Oswald's death. The latter opens the possibility that Oswald himself passed the book on to an ideologically like-minded acquaintance who perhaps did not want his association with the assassin to become known but who was sufficiently civic-minded to return the book discreetly to the library long after the assassination. The question is unlikely to ever be answered.

* - Ruth Paine, after discussing the previous weekend of November 2 and 3, testified, “Then he told me, it must have been the following weekend, that same weekend of the 9th.” At this point, instead of letting her say what Oswald told her about the note he had left at the FBI office and trying to firm up the date, Warren Commission counsel completely changed the subject by asking her, “Did he say anything when you gave him Agent Hosty’s name on the telephone?” (Paine had handed Oswald the paper with Hosty’s name and phone number on it, not told him over the phone.) “No,” Ruth said. Question: “Nothing at all?” “I don’t recall anything Lee said.” Paine then returned, on her own, to relating what Oswald had told her about the note. (3 H 18)

* - He didn't miss a day of work from the day he started, October 16, through November 22 (CE 1949, 23 H 749-751).

* - Though we were not present in the garage, when we look at all the evidence, we can know, with every confidence, that each of the above actions took place precisely as stated, for the simple reason they had to take place.

* In a handwritten narrative prepared by Marina at the request of the Warren Commission, Marina, again displaying her brutal honesty, lamented, “Of course, if I had known what was going to happen, I would have agreed without further thought. Perhaps (if Lee was planning anything) he staked everything on a card. That is, if I agreed to his proposal to go with him to Dallas, he would not do what he planned, and, if I did not, then he would” (CE 994, 18 H 638).

One well-recognized exception to the rule of evidence that hearsay (a statement made outside of court that is offered into evidence to prove not merely that the statement was made but that it is true) is not admissible in a legal proceeding because of its untrustworthiness (not under oath, not subject to cross-examination at the time the statement was made) is when the statement made is against the declarant’s own interest, the reasoning being that people may lie to hurt others, but not themselves, thereby investing the statement with an inherent trustworthiness. If saying something (as Marina did) that, in effect, places the blame for the murder of a president on your shoulders is not a sufficient reason to believe it, few other things would be. And if we believe Marina’s rendition of what took place the evening before the president’s murder, as all sensible people must, then two things would necessarily seem to follow: one, that Oswald’s decision to kill Kennedy was tentative—that he would not have killed Kennedy if Marina had agreed to come back to him; and two, by this fact alone, the likelihood of his being a part of a conspiracy to murder Kennedy, in which others got him to do what he did, is virtually nonexistent.

* At the London trial, Ruth Paine testified that when she entered the garage around 9:00 p.m. and saw the overhead light on, she knew it wasn't she who had left it on because she hadn't been in the garage earlier in the evening. What about the possibility of Marina? I asked. She answered, "It couldn't have been Marina. She was very good at turning out the lights whenever she went in there, and then I could hear her moving about. I knew where she was during the evening. So as I walked into the garage and found the light on, it was my clear impression that Oswald had been there and left it on carelessly." (Transcript of On Trial, July 24, 1986, pp.617–618)

* In America, the caliber of a firearm is the diameter of the interior of its barrel, and with American weapons it is expressed in inches. Thus, a .30 caliber weapon is one whose interior barrel is thirty-hundredths, or three-tenths, of one inch in diameter. The caliber of continental European weapons like Oswald's is measured not in inches but in millimeters. Therefore, his 6.5-millimeter Carcano would be the same as an American .257 caliber weapon, the interior barrel diameter being about one-fourth of an inch.

Oswald's bolt-action, clip-fed military rifle had many markings on it, among which were "MADE IN ITALY" "TERNI," referring to being manufactured and tested at the Terni Army Plant in Terni, Italy; "CAL. 6.5," to the rifle's caliber; "1940" and "40," to the year of manufacture; and "2766," to the weapon's serial number. The scope was stamped "4 × 18 COATED," "ORDNANCE OPTICS INC," "HOLLYWOOD CALIFORNIA," and "MADE IN JAPAN." The ammunition clip, which did not come with the rifle, bore the letters "SMI" (for "Soc. Metallurgica Italiana") and the number "952" (a part of the full code number "Partita No. 1A/1/1952").

After the Second World War, when the Italian army switched to a different rifle, the Carcano was imported into this country from Italy as surplus military equipment and was fairly common in America at the time. (WR, pp.81, 553–555; 3 H 392–396, 398, WCT Robert A. Frazier; Trask, Pictures of the Pain, pp.549–550; clip did not come with rifle: 3 H 398, WCT Robert A. Frazier); Fuhrman, Simple Act of Murder, p.46)

* Handwriting identification, though not as conclusive as fingerprint identification, is nonetheless considered to be definitive when done by qualified experts, and is “based upon the principle that every handwriting is distinctive.” However, since any single distinctive characteristic in handwriting as well as hand printing may not be unique to one person, in order to make an identification the handwriting expert (normally referred to as a “questioned-documents” expert or examiner) must find a sufficient number of corresponding distinctive characteristics (and a general absence of distinctive differences) between the known writing of the person and the writing on the document in question. The possibility that one person can imitate the handwriting of another and successfully deceive an expert document examiner is considered to be very remote, though it has been done. Not only does the forger have the problem of simulating every distinctive characteristic, but the forger is drawing, not writing. Forged writing is therefore distinguished by defects such as “tremor, waver, patching, retouching, noncontinuous lines, [and] pen lifts in awkward and unusual places.” (4 H 364, 372, WCT Alwyn Cole)

The two experts who compared handwriting and printing exemplars or “standards” of Oswald’s (i.e., known writing of Oswald’s, such as endorsements on his payroll checks, applications for employment, for a passport, for membership in the American Civil Liberties Union, and letters to the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the Marine Corps, the State Department, and the American embassy in Russia) with the writing on the postal money order were Alwyn Cole, a questioned-documents examiner for the U.S. Treasury Department with twenty-eight years of experience, and James C. Cadigan, an FBI agent and examiner of questioned documents in the FBI laboratory in Washington, D.C., for over twenty-three years. (WR, pp.566, 569)

* In one of the leading books on rifles and other small arms, the author writes that the Mannlicher-Carcano is even “known occasionally as the Mauser Paravicino” and is, in fact, “a modified Mauser” (Smith, Small Arms of the World, p.474). FBI firearms expert Robert A. Frazier testified that “the Mauser was one of the earliest, if not the earliest,” of “bolt-action” rifles “from which many others were copied. And since [the Mannlicher-Carcano] uses the same type of bolt system, it may have been [erroneously] referred to as a Mauser for that reason” (3 H 394, WCT Robert A. Frazier).

* Although the HSCA did not exclude Oswald, the committee was unable to conclude whether it was he, Marina, or de Mohrenschildt who had written the phrase “Hunter of Fascists, ha, ha, ha” (12 HSCA 52–53).

‡ The HSCA was careful to point out that Groden was “not a member of the committee’s photographic evidence panel,” but was a consultant (unpaid at that) providing background information on the issues that had been raised by Warren Commission critics in the area of photographic evidence (6 HSCA 294; unpaid: Trask, National Nightmare, p.208).

‡ The killer of Nicole Brown and Ron Goldman had left bloody shoe prints as he walked away from the murder scene on the evening of June 12, 1994. The shoe (sole) prints were those of the rare, Italian-made Bruno Magli shoe.

* - Simpson's dismissive characterization of the shoes, saying he'd never wear such shoes.

* The only other time Oswald had come out to Irving on a day other than Friday was on Monday, October 21, but that was when he visited Marina in the hospital after the birth of their second child (3 H 40, WCT Ruth Hyde Paine).

‡ The overall length of the Carcano rifle, when fully assembled, is $40 \frac{1}{5}$ inches (3 H 395, WCT Robert A. Frazier).

* Further evidence showing that Oswald was in physical possession of the Carcano is that a tuft of several cotton fibers of dark blue, gray-black, and orange-yellow shades were found in the crevice of the butt plate of the rifle, and the FBI laboratory found that the colors and even the twist of the fibers matched perfectly with the shirt Oswald was wearing at the time of his arrest, the same shirt the Warren Commission believed he was wearing when he was on the sixth floor in the sniper's nest. The FBI expert testified that the fibers "were clean, they had good color to them, there was no grease on them and they were not fragmented," causing him to conclude they "had just been picked up...in the recent past," although at another point he couldn't categorically say they had not been there for a long time. However, the Warren Commission noted that "the fact that on the morning of the assassination Oswald was wearing the shirt from which these relatively fresh fibers most probably originated provides some evidence that they transferred to the rifle that day since there was limited, if any, opportunity for Oswald to handle the weapon during the two months prior to November 22." (WR, pp.124-125; 4 H 82-87, WCT Paul Morgan Stombaugh; CE 673, 17 H 330; CE 674, 17 H 331) Indeed, when Marina was first asked whether she knew what shirt her husband was wearing on the morning of the assassination, she answered, "I don't remember." But when she was shown Commission Exhibit No. 150, the shirt he was wearing at the time of his arrest, and was asked if she recalled him wearing it on the morning of November 22, she answered, "Yes, it was a dark shirt" (which Commission Exhibit No. 150 is). Question: "You think that was the one?" Answer: "Yes." (1 H 121, WCT Marina N. Oswald) In any event, the tufts of fibers certainly are further substantive evidence that Oswald was at least in possession of the Carcano at some point, as opposed to merely owning it.

* It's no secret that the Dallas police were put off by the intrusion of federal law enforcement and the federal request to turn over all of the physical evidence to the FBI for analysis. The implication, of course, was that the federal government thought the Dallas police were not equipped to resolve the basic facts of the assassination, or worse, were incompetent. Early in the afternoon of the assassination, Dallas crime-lab detective W. E. "Pete" Barnes said he was approached by a Secret Service agent who wanted Barnes to turn the rifle over to him "to make sure we didn't mess up the prints on it." Barnes told him, "Pardner, I'll bet I've dusted more fingerprint powder than you've ever seen in your lifetime." (Savage, JFK First Day Evidence, pp.80–81) Later in the evening, and before Day received instructions from Captain Doughty, Secret Service agent Forrest Sorrels approached Day and warned him, "The FBI is trying to get that gun." Day told him it was fine with him if they wanted to work on it. Yet the request must have been a blow to the twenty-three-year veteran crime-lab lieutenant who had amassed fifteen years of experience reading fingerprints for the Dallas Police Department's Identification Bureau. (4 H 249–250, WCT J. C. Day)

*-Fingerprint analysis in this country dates back to 1903 in New York. The FBI “went into the fingerprint business in 1924.” The French (with its famous Bertillon system), British, and Argentinians were into fingerprint analysis as early as the 1880s, and the first article believed to have been published on establishing identity by fingerprints was written by a Scottish doctor in 1880 and titled, “On the Skin-Furrows of the Hand.” (Moenssens and Inbau, Scientific Evidence in Criminal Cases, pp.350–351; 1903 and 1924 dates: 4 H 14–15, WCT Sebastian F. Latona)

Latent fingerprints (as opposed to a fingerprint exemplar, which is the model for comparison taken in ink at the police station) is the technical term for fingerprints left on everyday objects. These prints are transmitted to the surfaces of objects by a residue of oil secreted from the body, and are eventually “lifted” from the objects by fingerprint specialists. Contrary to popular belief, the perspiration from one’s fingers and palms contains no such oily substance. The fingers and palms acquire that residue of oil when they come into contact with parts of the body that do have such secretions, such as the hair and face. Fingerprints are more popularly known than palm prints, most likely because people generally touch objects with their fingers rather than their palms.

Most American law enforcement agencies consider ten “points of similarity” (between the latent prints and those on the exemplar) enough for a fingerprint expert to give an unqualified conclusion. In Europe, the minimum requirements are usually higher, going all the way up to sixteen at Scotland Yard. The FBI has never accepted the minimum-requirement doctrine, and the FBI expert in the Kennedy case, Sebastian F. Latona, told the Warren Commission he has given an opinion in court as to identity with as few as seven points of similarity. Arthur Mandella, a fingerprint expert for the New York Police Department who also compared the latent prints in the Kennedy assassination with Oswald’s exemplar, also said that no given minimum number of points of similarity is necessary for a conclusion. “A sufficient amount determined by the expert is the important factor,” he said, though he added that the usual range for him has been between eight and twelve. (4 H 13–14, WCT Sebastian F. Latona; 4 H 53, WCT Arthur Mandella; WR, p.563)

The FBI found twelve points of similarity between Oswald’s right-palm-print exemplar and the latent palm print found “off underside gun barrel near end of foregrip” (CE 640, 17 H 292).

* - Craig also claimed to have been present during an Oswald interrogation, though he was not. See later text.

* By 1975, the space between the shells had grown from one inch to “no more than two inches” (Letter, Roger Craig to Ed Tatro, April 9, 1975, p.2). A year later, conspiracy authors J. Gary Shaw and Larry Ray Harris tacked on an additional inch to the spread—“about three inches apart” (Shaw with Harris, Cover-Up, p.28).

‡ A third set of lead fragments (CE 840), found under the left jump seat occupied by Mrs. Connally, were too small to connect to Oswald's rifle. They were, however, linked to the shooting through neutron activation analysis. (See later text.)

* In the common vernacular, and in books, television shows, and movies, a firearms identification test for a suspect weapon is almost always erroneously referred to as a “ballistics test.” But in the real world, very few criminal cases involve ballistics, which is a highly specialized branch of firearms identification dealing with the motion of a fired bullet through the barrel of a gun (interior ballistics), its movement and trajectory once it leaves the muzzle to its point of impact (exterior ballistics), and its movement after impact (terminal or wound ballistics). In the Kennedy case, of course, the issues of the trajectory of the bullets fired and their movement after impact do have enormous significance. But an expert in ballistics may be untrained in (and hence incapable of) identifying, from the striations (markings) on the surface of a bullet, whether it was fired from a particular gun.

* The FBI laboratory “determined that the bullets used in the assassination of President Kennedy on November 22, 1963, were a military type manufactured by the Western Cartridge Company, East Alton, Illinois” (CD 107, p.2, January 13, 1964; 3 H 399, WCT Robert A. Frazier). The cartridges, which include the cases enclosing the bullets, were also manufactured by the same company, and were, as previously indicated, 6.5-millimeter Mannlicher-Carcano cartridges (3 H 399, WCT Robert A. Frazier).

‡ Also, though no photograph of the bullet from the National Archives reflects it, visual inspection reveals it is “somewhat flattened in its lower half” (DOJCD Record 186-10006-10449, June 3, 1996, p.4). And my firearms expert at the London trial, Monty Lutz, who was also a member of the HSCA firearms panel, saw the bullet close up at the National Archives and testified at the London trial that “there was a slight curving to that bullet” (Transcript of On Trial, July 24, 1986, p.444).

‡ The HSCA’s wound ballistics expert, Larry Sturdivan, told the committee that extrusion of lead from the base is the first thing that happens when a bullet begins to deform. Under great pressure, the metal jacket begins to peel off and “the softer lead core is extruded through the only opening, that is, the opening in the base.” (1 HSCA 411–412)

* Unlike other areas (like firearms and ballistics) where the HSCA conducted its own tests, the committee elected not to undertake further tests to determine if the stretcher bullet could have caused the wounds it did and end up in the condition it did. It did consider doing so, contacting the H. P. White Laboratory in Bel Air, Maryland, but was told that the “number of shots required to produce the chance result of Commission Exhibit 399 could range from one up to infinity.” And the first series of tests alone would cost $20,000, a lot for the austere budget of the HSCA. Because the number of shots fired to obtain a match or “statistical sample” could not be “reasonably determined,” plus the expense and the further realization that the “results of tests with materials other than human bodies could always be theoretically questioned by those who would quarrel with [the] results,” the HSCA decided to rely on the Warren Commission tests and Sturdivan’s testimonial interpretation and elucidation of them. (1 HSCA 382–383)

‡ In Sturdivan's 2005 book, The JFK Myths, he elaborates on and refines his HSCA testimony, adding, from an evaluation of the damage to the bullet and the wounds to Kennedy and Connally, the orientation of the bullet at the various points along its path. Starting with a muzzle velocity of 2,160 feet per second, at impact on Kennedy's upper back it was traveling 2,015 feet per second, give or take 30 feet, and its orientation was nose first. At impact on Connally's back it had lost 175 feet per second in velocity and was traveling 1,830 feet per second, give or take 50 feet, and its orientation was 60 degrees. Upon striking Connally's right rib the bullet was traveling 1,450 feet per second, give or take 100 feet, and its orientation was sideways. At impact with Connally's right wrist it was traveling 500 feet per second, give or take 100 feet, and its orientation was nearly backward. At impact with Connally's left thigh, its velocity all but spent, it was traveling 135 feet per second, give or take 20 feet, and its orientation was backward. (Sturdivan, JFK Myths, p.144)

* - Two years later, in 1966, the FBI established an NAA group within the FBI laboratory (1 HSCA 559).

‡ There were small differences in the tiny samples (taken from the fragments) examined by Guinn as opposed to the samples examined by the FBI, which were no longer available, owing to the fact that some of the 1964 FBI tests, those carried out by emission spectrography, were partly destructive in nature, and the FBI disposed of the rest of the minuscule samples (HSCA Report, p.599 note 33). As you might have guessed, conspiracy theorists chalk the discrepancies up to more evidence tampering by an ever-expanding list of conspirators. Partially addressing myself to this issue, I elicited from Guinn at the London trial that James Geer, of the National Archives in Washington, flew out to California and personally delivered the fragments to him. Question: “What security measures were taken to guard the evidence while in the state of California?” “Well, all the time that I was working with the samples, every place that I went with samples in my possession, I had two armed guards [U.S. marshals] on either side of me.” (Transcript of On Trial, July 24, 1986, p.501)

* The nuclear reactor I saw at the University of California at Irvine, where Guinn was headquartered, was purchased in 1967 at a cost of around $350,000. It is still there and is submerged in a pool of water twenty-five feet deep and ten-by-fifteen feet in size. The reactor itself is only a four-by-four-foot cylinder, but with auxiliary equipment and pipes heading to it, it takes up a good part of the pool.

* - There is another piece of circumstantial evidence pointing to the stretcher bullet as the bullet that passed through Kennedy's and Connally's bodies. If it weren't, then what happened to that bullet, which, its velocity nearly spent, barely penetrated the governor's left thigh? Since we know that the FBI and Secret Service scoured the limousine for evidence and even found several small bullet fragments, surely they would have found the bullet, inside the limousine, that dropped from the governor's left thigh. As author Larry Sturdivan writes, it would be "inevitable that the bullet that worked its way out of the governor's thigh would be found" in the search (Sturdivan, JFK Myths, p.132 footnote 62). The fact that no such bullet was found in the presidential limousine is fairly strong circumstantial evidence that that bullet is the same one found on the governor's stretcher.

* Because of space limitations and the comparatively lesser importance of the Tippit murder in proving Oswald's guilt for Kennedy's murder, plus the fact that there were actual eyewitnesses to Oswald killing Tippit, this book has not gone into the same depth on the Tippit slaying as it has on the president's murder. Although there are hundreds of books on the Kennedy assassination, remarkably only one, Dale Myers's With Malice, has ever been written on the Tippit murder, and it fortunately provides an in-depth, detailed, and excellent analysis of the entire case. Since the Warren Commission and the HSCA did not examine the Tippit case in the depth they should have, Myers performed a singular service for the historical record by his work on this important and integral part of the case.

* - The HSCA neglected to have its handwriting experts, who examined the Carcano purchase documents and many others, examine the revolver purchase documents (8 HSCA 230).

* - Givens and his fellow workers almost assuredly came down to lunch at least five or more minutes after when he says they did. Not only would 11:45 a.m. be very early for the lunch break at noon, but their supervisor, William Shelly, didn't come down until around 11:50 a.m. (6 H 328, WCT William H. Shelley), and they would not likely have left for lunch before he did. Also, Givens's coworkers testified they came down for lunch later than 11:45 a.m. (see text).

‡ Only the west elevator could be called, by push button, to any floor, but only as long as the two gates on it were closed. The east elevator required someone to be onboard to operate it by hand pedal. (3 H 171, WCT Bonnie Ray Williams)

* - The FBI policy in 1963 was not to tape-record interviews, only to take notes. That remained the bureau's policy for many years thereafter, although today, FBI agents do tape-record many interviews.

* - FBI firearms expert Cortlandt Cunningham testified that Oswald's rifle could be assembled in a little over two minutes using a screwdriver. It could also be assembled, though more slowly, with virtually "any object that would fit the slots on the five screws that retain the stock to the action," including a dime. Cunningham then proceeded to demonstrate the process for the Warren Commission using a ten-cent piece, assembling the rifle in six minutes. (2 H 252)

* - Detective Robert Lee Studebaker, who lifted the print with Day at the crime scene, marked it as a “Left Palm” print. But later at the crime lab Lieutenant Day determined from a closer examination that it was a right palm print. (CE 649, 17 H 297)

* - Author Gus Russo reported that an FBI source told him in 1993 that the unidentified palm print belonged to Dallas police homicide captain Will Fritz, who didn't have his own prints compared with the carton prints back in 1964. Fritz reportedly had his prints taken shortly before his death in 1984, allowing the FBI to do the comparison. (Russo, Live by the Sword, p.583, appendix A, note 2) The National Archives, which is now the repository of all FBI documents related to the assassination, says, "We have not been able to locate any documentation to substantiate the claim made by Gus Russo in his book" (Letter from James R. Mathis, archivist, special access and FOIA staff, to author dated September 24, 2004). Since the FBI would have every reason to make it known that the palm print belonged to Fritz, and no reason to keep it a secret, Russo's FBI source was probably not a good one.

* - In fact, James Jarman and Harold Norman found that the west elevator was still on the first floor thirty-five minutes later, when they used it to ascend to the fifth floor to watch the motorcade (3 H 210, WCT James Jarman Jr.).

* Secret Service inspector Thomas Kelley also recalls, like Fritz, that Oswald said he had lunch with the two black employees (Kelley Exhibit A, 20 H 440). However, FBI agent James Bookhout, who was also present during the interrogation of Oswald, recalls Oswald's covering his bases by saying that "possibly" Jarman and another black employee "walked through" the first-floor lunchroom while he was there (WR, p.622).

* Oswald's telling Fritz this was understandable, since, as previously indicated, the domino room is where the stock boys normally had their lunch—that is, with the exception of this day, when, in anticipation of the president's motorcade coming by, most employees apparently took their lunch outside or to a window facing Elm Street, (e.g., 6 H 383, WCT Eddie Piper; 6 H 338, WCT Billy Nolan Lovelady; 3 H 168–169, WCT Bonnie Ray Williams).

* Although there was some slight ambiguity in Rowland's previous statements as to precisely which window he allegedly saw the man with the rifle in, the matter was clarified in his testimony before the Commission when he placed an arrow on a photograph of the Book Depository Building at the window where he claimed to have seen the man. In the first pair of windows, it was the second window to the east on the westernmost side of the sixth floor. (2 H 169; CE 356, 16 H 952)

* Case Closed author Gerald Posner concluded that after Oswald left the sniper's nest, he "hurried diagonally across the sixth floor, toward the rear staircase" (Posner, Case Closed, p.264). An illustration in the back of Posner's book (pp.480–481) also depicts this conclusion. But Oswald could not have cut diagonally across the sixth floor because of the numerous boxes stacked throughout the floor, a fact demonstrated by virtually every photograph and film taken on the sixth floor that weekend (e.g., CE 719, 17 H 502; CE 723, 17 H 504).

* At the London trial, I asked Baker if, before he ran into the building, he paused “at all to survey the situation on Elm.” Baker: “Yes, sir.” Question: “How long would you estimate you paused?” “Oh, two to three minutes. Just a short time.” Question: “Two to three minutes or two to three seconds?” “Two to three seconds.” He then said that as he “was going into the building, there were a lot of people going in with me that couldn’t get in.” Question: “So that slowed you down a little bit?” “Yes, it did.” Because of these things, he said the simulated reconstruction was not precise. (Transcript of On Trial, July 23, 1986, pp.170–171, 176)

‡ Though Gerry Spence’s question at the London trial called for an inadmissible conclusion, the judge permitted Spence, on cross-examination of Baker, to ask Baker if Oswald acted like a man “who had just, seconds before, killed the president of the United States.” Baker answered, “No, sir.” (Transcript of On Trial, July 23, 1986, p.190)

* - Is there any inconsistency between Oswald being calm in front of Baker, yet, as we saw earlier, somewhat frantic at the Russian and Cuban consulates in Mexico City when he couldn't get his visa to Moscow and an in-transit visa to Cuba? No. Being stopped by a police officer moments after killing the president of the United States is a real crisis, and one that can't be compared with having your request for a visa turned down, which is not a crisis situation at all, only one that induces anger and disappointment. Moreover, this ability to be calm in a crisis frequently exists in the very people you wouldn't expect to be that way—excitable and high-strung people.

‡ Even in the Marines back in 1959, Lieutenant John Donovan, Oswald's superior in the Air Control Squadron in Santa Ana, California, noticed that in his job in front of the radar screen as a "radar plotter," Oswald appeared to be "very cool and deliberate under periods of tension." He said that emergency conditions (referred to as "May Day") discovered by radar plotters would arise, and that "on at least one occasion [which was] identified as an emergency," Oswald responded in a "matter-of-fact voice, did not get excited, and did the right thing at the right time." (CD 87, pp.2-3, Secret Service interview of John Donovan on December 4, 1963)

* Although the evidence is overwhelming that Oswald was a very independent person who disliked being led by others, at the heart of the conspiracy lore is the belief that he was the opposite and was used by the true conspirators in the assassination. New Orleans district attorney Jim Garrison, saying what most conspiracy theorists say, told an interviewer that Oswald “was influenced and manipulated rather easily by his older and more sophisticated superiors in the conspiracy” (“Playboy Interview: Jim Garrison,” p.163).

‡ That Oswald was a “patsy” is one of the most widely accepted and popular of all conspiracy dogma. But at least one conspiracy theorist elevated the patsy argument to a new level, believing that the CIA used drugs, hypnosis, and mind control to program Oswald to kill Kennedy, Oswald being completely unaware he was a Manchurian candidate (Leonard, Perfect Assassin, pp.1–2, 17, 21).

* I guess one could make the argument that if Oswald truly was completely unaware that Kennedy was to be murdered, and was a completely unwitting patsy, the conspirators wouldn't have had any reason thereafter to have Ruby "silence" Oswald, as conspiracists believe. But the conspiracy community also believes that Oswald had been associated with those who set him up, like David Ferrie and Clay Shaw, so that his connection with Kennedy's killers would alone be enough to silence him.

* Though usually referred to as a picket fence, technically the structure is not a picket fence. As Gary Mack, curator of the Sixth Floor Museum since 1994, points out, “In a picket fence, the wooden slats are not touching each other across the width of the fence. Here, they are. The fence is more properly referred to as a stockade fence” (Telephone interview of Gary Mack by author on August 18, 2005). However, in this book, since the term picket fence is the one that nearly all Americans know the fence by, I will use the terms picket and stockade fence interchangeably.

The picket (stockade) fence is five feet high (5 HSCA 603). Starting near the northeast tip of the Triple Underpass, the fence, which has been called “the most famous fence in the world,” runs in an easterly direction parallel to Elm Street for around 125 feet and then turns in a northerly direction for around 40 feet. When I spoke to Mack in 1999, he said that “the original fence—as far as the metal posts, brackets, and hardware, such as clamps and cross-bars—is still there, but the pickets, the wood, have been replaced many, many times” (Telephone interview of Gary Mack by author on December 17, 1999). The next year the fence was torn down (because of considerable deterioration) and replaced by the present replica fence.

* Surprisingly, although we have the testimony of many Dealey Plaza witnesses that it was their opinion, based on their auditory senses, that the shots came from the Book Depository Building, grassy knoll, or some other direction, we have virtually no photographic evidence capturing their bodies responding to their minds' message as to the origin of the shots. One exception is arguably the most famous Dealey Plaza photograph taken, by AP photographer James Altgens around the time of the second shot. As can be seen in the photo section, Secret Service agents on the right running board of the follow-up car to the presidential limousine, as well as several of the spectators on the north side of Elm Street, are seen looking backward, indicating a shot from the rear.

* I'm not a hunter, but more than one whom I have asked has told me that if there are several people out in the forest and there's a sudden gunshot, it's very common for them to have diverging opinions as to the direction the shot came from.

* Thompson noted that 10 witnesses heard “two or three” shots and 5 heard “three or four shots.” When Thompson included these 15 witness reports under “three shots,” he calculated a total of 88 percent; excluding all of these reports yielded a figure of 79 percent. Thompson split the difference and reported a figure of 83.4 percent hearing three shots. (Thompson, Six Seconds in Dallas, p.23 footnote)

‡ In the HSCA study, “7 other witnesses reported [hearing] 1, 4–5, 5, 6 or 8 shots” (2 HSCA 122).

* Although a railroad spur of the Union Terminal Railroad Company ran in a southwesterly, diagonal position across the “railroad yards” behind the fence, this area was used as a lot for cars, which parked on both sides of the spur.

‡ Warren Commission witness S. M. Holland told the Warren Commission he saw “about a hundred foot tracks” just behind the picket fence (6 H 246), and told author Josiah Thompson he saw “four to five hundred footprints” there (Thompson, Six Seconds in Dallas, p.122). Between Holland’s observation (which is ludicrous on its face, and he is the only witness who ever said he saw any footprints right behind the picket fence) and Boone’s observation, the latter should have far more credibility.

* - In the December 1994 issue of Vanity Fair, conspiracy theorists Anthony and Robbyn Summers wrote, “We now have an FBI report revealing that at 7:30 on the morning after the assassination, ‘a snub nose thirty eight caliber Smith and Wesson, Serial Number 893265, with the word “England” on the cylinder was found...in a brown paper sack in the general area of where the assassination took place.’ It is a scandal that the public had to wait 30 years to learn that a second gun was found at the scene of the crime” (Summers and Summers, “Ghosts of November,” p.100). But the FBI report on the recovered revolver contains information the Summers didn’t tell their readers: “On 11-23-63, Patrolman J. Raz brought into the Homicide and Robbery Bureau, Dallas PD, a brown paper sack which contained a snub-nosed .38 caliber Smith & Wesson, SN 893265. This gun had the word ‘England’ on the cylinder and had been found at approximately 7:30 A.M. in a brown paper sack, together with an apple and an orange, near the curb at the corner of Ross and Lamar Streets and was turned in by one Willie Flat, white male, 9221 Metz Drive, employed at 4770 Memphis, to the Dallas PD” (FBI Record 124-10005-10210, November 25, 1963). The corner of Ross and Lamar streets is about five blocks northeast of the Book Depository Building and Dealey Plaza, hardly “the scene of the crime.”

* Author Larry M. Sturdivan explained the absence of this evidence in his pithy observation that “nonevents leave no evidence” (Sturdivan, JFK Myths, p.249).

* As Dr. Cyril Wecht, the most prominent medical doctor for the conspiracy theorists, told me, “Whichever direction the bullet was traveling in, it passed through soft tissue. There was no bony or cartilaginous damage in the neck and throat area of the president” (Telephone interview of Dr. Cyril Wecht by author on December 14, 1999). At the trial in London, Wecht testified that the bullet “did not strike any dense bone. There was nothing to deflect it whatsoever. Nothing to alter its path. When it exited from the front of the president’s throat, it would have continued on a straight line” (Transcript of On Trial, July 25, 1986, p.728; see also Wecht’s testimony before the HSCA, 1 HSCA 344).

‡ Not only didn't any bullet hit anyone on the south side of Elm Street, but no one reported hearing the sound of any bullet passing by. If the speed of the alleged bullet from the grassy knoll area were faster than the speed of sound (around 1,100 feet per second)—for instance, the Carcano bullet traveled in excess of 2,000 feet per second—this supersonic speed would have caused a “high-pitched sonic cracking sound” (not the report of the weapon being fired) as it passed by people on the north and south sides of Elm Street, which would not be loud but “clearly audible.” Even a subsonic speeding bullet causes a lesser sound called a “ballistic wind” due to the movement of air being displaced by the traveling bullet, which would also have been audible to someone whom the bullet passed by. (Telephone interview of LAPD firearms expert by author on August 26, 2002)

* - He wasn't, for example, like John Hinckley, who tried to assassinate President Ronald Reagan in 1981. Hinckley shot at Reagan in plain view of many witnesses and made no attempt to escape.

‡ Since your location would immediately expose you as the assassin, the great likelihood is that you wouldn't be able to escape from the building. The considerable number of law enforcement personnel in Dealey Plaza would immediately surround the building and it would be sealed off before you could get from the sixth floor down to the ground level to escape from the building.

* Dr. Wecht's consistent disagreements with the other forensic pathology panel members was such that in its final report, the HSCA was constrained to say that "in all references to conclusions of the [forensic pathology] panel, unless it is specifically stated that it was unanimous, it should be assumed that Dr. Wecht dissented" (HSCA Report, p.43 note). In a parting shot to his colleagues on the panel, Wecht wrote to G. Robert Blakey, the HSCA's chief counsel, that "I do not intend to sign the final report of the Forensic Pathology Panel." After setting forth a litany of disagreements with his colleagues on the panel, he closed by saying, "Serving as a member of the HSCA's Forensic Pathology Panel has not been a pleasant or satisfying experience for me, and I continue to be disgusted and appalled at the manner in which this entire matter has been handled. I believe that the record will clearly show the partisan bias of the members of the House Committee, staff (with individual exceptions), and the Forensic Pathology Panel. I plan to continue my criticisms of the original Warren Commission Report and all the subsequent sycophantic reports that have followed under the imprimatur of the Federal Government." (HSCA Record 180-10109-10256, Letter from Dr. Cyril Wecht to G. Robert Blakey, December 15, 1978, pp.1-4)

One of the panel members, Dade County (Miami, Florida) medical examiner Dr. Joseph H. Davis, wrote Wecht a personal letter expressing his umbrage at Wecht's suggestion that he had not been impartial in his findings. "Most assuredly," Davis wrote, "if I felt there to be a preponderance of scientific evidence to support your conclusions, I would have so stated. The X-rays, photographs and other relevant evidence furnished to the panel cannot be interpreted by me as supportive of your conclusion." Davis went on to say that Wecht's suggestion that he had not been impartial, an absolute requisite of all scientific professions, was "a libelous attack most unworthy of our profession." (Letter from Dr. Joseph H. Davis to Dr. Cyril Wecht, October 30, 1978, pp.1-2)

* But Wecht added that based on the trajectory of that bullet through the president's body, it could not have been fired from as high up as the sniper's nest on the sixth floor of the Depository Building. It had to be from a lower floor, and possibly from the Dal-Tex Building. This latter observation was not a new one for Dr. Wecht; he has maintained this for years. See earlier text.

‡ On cross-examination of Dr. Wecht at the trial in London, I made the point about the utter improbability of synchronized shots. If there were synchronized shots, the two shooters would have had to know, in advance, that the presidential limousine would be passing within their cross-hairs at the agreed-upon time, which they could never know (i.e., at the agreed upon time, the limo could have been on Main or Houston, or past Elm onto the Stemmons Freeway). Even if they were to have this unachievable foreknowledge, there would virtually be no way for the two shooters, in different locations, to fire at the same, precise time. Since a gunman can't look at his watch and fire simultaneously, a watch would literally have to somehow be attached to the cross-hairs. To add to the extreme improbability of such an occurrence, the shot from the grassy knoll would have to have hit Kennedy's head at the precise point where the bullet from behind was exiting. (Transcript of On Trial, July 25, 1986, pp.778–780)

* The terms parking lot and railroad yards behind the stockade fence are used constantly in assassination literature. Are they one and the same? For the most part, yes. “The parking lot was on railroad property, and at least one railroad track passed through the parking lot.” (Telephone interview of Gary Mack by author on August 18, 2005) Of course, there is a considerable area behind the stockade fence that is part of the railroad yards but is not a parking lot.

* It has been widely assumed throughout the years that that person was NBC reporter Robert MacNeil. Indeed, in his book The Right Place at the Right Time, MacNeil says that as he ran up the steps of the Book Depository Building right after the shooting, he asked a young man in shirt sleeves who was coming out of the building where there was a phone, and the man pointed to another man inside who was talking on a phone and said, "Better ask him." He adds that although it is "possible" that Oswald was the man he encountered, he had "no way of confirming" that he had spoken to Oswald, and when he saw Oswald on television later that day, "there was no leap of recognition" on his part. "My hair was very short then and I was wearing a White House press badge [Oswald] may have mistaken for Secret Service ID." (MacNeil, Right Place at the Right Time, pp.208, 213)

Although it is not important just whom Oswald spoke to that day, there is a possibility it was someone other than MacNeil. On January 29, 1964, the Secret Service interviewed Pierce Allman, who was a reporter for Dallas TV station WFAA at the time of the assassination. Allman was described in the report as a "white male" with a "crew cut." The Secret Service report reads that Allman also ran into the Book Depository Building right after the shooting, "where he met a white male whom he could not further identify. He asked this white male for the location of a telephone...The person pointed out a phone to him which was located in an open area on the first floor of the building." The interview report's "Synopsis" is that Allman is "believed to be [the] one mentioned by Lee Harvey Oswald as identifying himself as a Secret Service agent." (CD 354, p.2, Secret Service File 00-2-34,030) Gary Mack, curator at the Sixth Floor Museum in Dallas, agrees: "Photos of MacNeil on November 22 [1963] show he had short hair, but it definitely was not a crew cut. Allman's the guy Oswald spoke to" (Telephone interview of Gary Mack by author on April 20, 2000).

* As Dealey Plaza spectator James L. Simmons told the Warren Commission, “Immediately after the shots were fired, people were running in every direction through the whole area, and there was a scene of mass confusion” (CE 1416, 22 H 833).

‡ Regarding this cuckoo bird phenomenon, let's look at what just a few among many have said about the death of Elvis Presley on August 17, 1977, in Memphis, Tennessee, at the age of forty-two. The following are from letters written to Ann Landers that were published in her syndicated column of October 23, 1988. From Stamford, Connecticut: "The King lives! I attended his funeral and lingered at the casket for quite awhile before the guards made me move on. Elvis was not in that casket. It was a wax dummy. I stood very close and had the opportunity to look at him for a long time. I would bet my life on it." From Henderson, Kentucky: "My uncle works in a place that manufactures coffins. The elaborate coffin that Elvis was buried in can be obtained only by special order because it takes a long time to construct. Elvis' coffin was ordered several weeks in advance, which proves that his 'death' was planned long before the public was told that he died." From Bismarck, North Dakota: "My sister's niece works in the courthouse where Elvis' death certificate was processed. The original certificate stated that the body weighed 170 pounds. The paramedics who picked him up said he weighed at least 250 pounds. Looks like there were two corpses, doesn't it? To add to the mystery, the first death certificate disappeared and was never found."

* In 1986, Hoffman changed the clothing of the men considerably. He told conspiracy theorist Jim Marrs that the man with the rifle was “wearing a dark suit, tie and overcoat” and the second man “was wearing light coveralls and a railroad worker’s hat” (Coverups, March 1986, no. 25, p.1).

* Hoffman sent a letter on October 3, 1975, to JFK's brother, Senator Edward Kennedy, telling him of his observations on the day of the assassination, and adding in broken syntax, "I talked F.B.I.'s office in Dallas last 1968 or can't remember date and year ago. If you will find to see F.B.I.'s report about I talked them. I guess, maybe F.B.I. did not know understand what I talked a thing, because I am deafness and hard to talk F.B.I.... If you will help me and tell some things. Thank you much. Respectfully, Virgil Edward Hoffman."

Kennedy replied on November 19, 1975: "My family has been aware of various theories concerning the death of President Kennedy...I am sure that it is understood that the continual speculation [about the case] is painful for members of my family. We have always accepted the findings of the Warren Commission Report...Our feeling is that, if there is sufficient evidence to re-examine the circumstances concerning the death of President Kennedy...this judgment would have to be made by the legal authorities responsible for such further examination." (FBI Record 124-10163-10464, pp.5-6)

‡ When the interviewer pressed Hill as to what kind of dog it was, she said she didn't know but it was "white and fuzzy" (6 H 214, WCT Jean Lollis Hill). Since there was no dog in the president's car, Hill took a lot of ribbing for this, and in later years conspiracy theorists tried to restore her credibility on this point by claiming that photographs taken at Love Field show that Mrs. Kennedy had been given a white, stuffed toy representing the famous Sheri Lewis TV puppet Lamb Chop. The claim, however, was based on poor-quality images posted on the Internet. High-quality images show that what critics thought was a Lamb Chop toy was, in fact, a bouquet of white flowers (asters) that someone in the greeting party at Love Field (it is not known who) had given the First Lady in addition to a larger bouquet of red roses given to her by the mayor's wife. (Trask, That Day in Dallas, pp.27, 29) In Richard Trask's 1994 invaluable book, Pictures of the Pain, he said film footage showed that Mrs. Kennedy "was apparently presented with a small stuffed animal... She may have kept the stuffed toy among the roses with which she was also presented" (Trask, Pictures of the Pain, p.260 footnote 17). However, no photo of the interior of the car ever showed the toy, and such a toy never surfaced. Four years later, in his 1998 book, That Day in Dallas, Trask corrected himself and noted that the "stuffed toy" among the red roses was really a "gift bouquet of white asters" (Trask, That Day in Dallas, p.29).

* Spence was even more so, telling the jury in his summation that “Mr. Bugliosi can laugh him out of the courtroom,” but actually “old Tom Tilson” was a believable witness, a really genuine, salt-of-the-earth type of person who “would be one of my best friends...if I lived in Dallas...We’d go out...He’s the kind of people I would congregate with” (Transcript of On Trial, July 25, 1986, pp.1016–1017).

* Indeed, Dealey Plaza witness Amos Lee Euins, though not seeing anyone emerge from the back of the building, said that shortly after the shooting he heard someone tell a police officer “he seen a man run out the back” (2 H 205–206).

* - However, on November 27, 1963, when the FBI showed Miss Mercer photos of Ruby and Oswald, she could not identify either as the two men she saw, saying only that the driver had a round face like Ruby, and the one with the alleged gun case was the same general build, size, and age as Oswald (12 HSCA 17).

* If you've been there, as I have, Mack's man would only be about twenty feet to the left rear of the main alleged grassy knoll assassin, both men behind the fence and each necessarily aware of the other's presence, since nothing but the ground would be between them. Hence, if there was a grassy knoll assassin where most conspiracy theorists and the HSCA say he was, and Mack's man was where Mack says he was, the grassy knoll assassin and Mack's man (who Mack believes may be the grassy knoll assassin) had to be co-conspirators. (I say "may be" because although the conspiracy community seems to have the impression that Mack believes the man was the grassy knoll assassin, in a 2006 letter to me Mack expressly wrote, "I've never said that Badge Man was the knoll assassin, but I have said he's a possibility, that's all" (Letter from Gary Mack to author dated August 10, 2006, p.1).

*- Curiously, over four months after Golz published his article, U.S. Senator Ralph Yarborough called Golz and told him, “Immediately on the firing of the first shot I saw the man you interviewed throw himself on the ground. He was down within a second of the time the shot was fired and I thought to myself, there’s a combat veteran who knows how to act when weapons start firing” (Earl Golz, “Panel Leaves Question of Imposters,” Dallas Morning News, December 31, 1978, p.2A). Conspiracy theorists say this confirms Arnold’s presence on the knoll. But it almost certainly does not. At the time of the first shot, the presidential limousine, we know, had just turned from Houston on to Elm. Yarborough’s car, two cars behind Kennedy’s, would have been right at the intersection of Houston and Elm, and from that position the pergola wall would have completely blocked Yarborough’s view of the place where Arnold claims he was. So Yarborough did not see Arnold for two reasons. One, photographs and film show that Arnold was not there, and two, even if he were, Yarborough couldn’t have seen him. It is difficult to know whom Yarborough saw, since several people dropped to the ground immediately. He may have been referring to Bill Newman, who testified for me in London. Newman was at the bottom of the knoll on the north side (picket fence side) of Elm and would have been visible to Yarborough at the time of the first shot. However, Newman didn’t drop to the ground until after the third shot. Also, if Yarborough were referring to Newman, it’s hard to believe he wouldn’t have mentioned Newman’s wife and their two young children, all of whom dropped to the ground together.

* - If not, since the Back Up man, per Mack, was not in a police uniform, then who was the person kicking Arnold? Another co-conspirator of the Badge Man who was dressed in a police uniform? This is all terribly silly.

* In Craig's Warren Commission testimony he said the station wagon he saw was a "Nash Rambler" and "it looked white to me" (6 H 267). But actually, Ruth Paine owned a green Chevrolet station wagon (2 H 506, WCT Ruth Hyde Paine; CE 2125, 24 H 697). This, apparently, created a problem for Craig. Seven years later, in his 1971 unpublished book manuscript, "When They Kill a President," he wrote that the Rambler station wagon was "light green" in color (p.12).

‡ Deputy Sheriff Lewis, now deceased, submitted a report to his office on the afternoon of the assassination concerning his activities and observations that day and made no mention of seeing what Craig allegedly saw (Decker Exhibit No. 5323, 19 H 513).

* - Craig not only volunteered to testify for Garrison but also privately started investigating the case for him. An example of his work: knowing that one of Garrison's zany theories was that a vast homosexual ring conspired to kill Kennedy, Craig wrote a December 7, 1967, memo to Garrison stating that Marina Oswald's personal physician in Dallas was associated at a hospital there with four doctors (whom Craig identifies by name), all of whom, Craig says, "are reported homosexuals."

* Per Ken Holmes, president of Southwestern Historical Inc., which runs tours of all the Kennedy assassination sites, the official words on the plaque next to the underpass are “Union Terminal Underpass,” but he said most people in Dallas refer to it as the “Triple Underpass” (Telephone interview of Ken Holmes by author on March 11, 2004). However, assassination literature is filled with references to the site as the “triple overpass,” including, for instance, by the two Dallas officers who were assigned to positions above the underpass on November 22, 1963 (6 H 249, WCT J. W. Foster; 6 H 254, WCT J. C. White). For purposes of this book I use the term “Triple Underpass” to refer to the convergence of the three roads of Commerce, Main, and Elm, and “railroad overpass” to the railroad tracks (and walkway) on top of the three converging roads.

‡ Clemon Earl Johnson, a machinist for the Union Terminal Company who was on the overpass with Holland, also said he saw “white smoke,” but it was “near the pavillion” (which some people, including Sixth Floor Museum curator Gary Mack, feel is not part of the “grassy knoll”). Further, Johnson felt the smoke came not from a shot but “from a motorcycle abandoned near the spot by a Dallas policeman.” (CE 1422, 22 H 836) Another Union Terminal Company employee (described as a “hostler helper”) atop the railroad overpass on Elm who saw smoke was Nolan H. Potter, but Potter told the FBI that the smoke he saw was “in front of the Texas School Book Depository Building rising from the trees” (FBI Record 124-10026-10153, FBI interview of Nolan H. Potter on March 17, 1964).

‡ However, in a clearer copy sent to me by Steven Tilley of the National Archives, who reproduced the negative for me with special equipment, Holland's markings on the photograph can be made out, although just barely, and not clear enough for reproduction in this book.

* Holland told the Warren Commission that “immediately after the shots were fired,” he ran behind the picket fence to see if he “could see anyone...behind the fence,” but he saw no one. He said by the time he got there “there were twelve or fifteen policemen and plainclothesmen” there, and “we looked for empty shells around there for quite awhile.” Though they found no shells, he did see several cars parked behind the picket fence, including “a station wagon backed up toward the fence” and in “one little spot” around there in an area of three by two feet, it looked to him “like somebody had been standing there for a long time.” Remarkably, and as alluded to earlier, he said there were about “a hundred foot tracks in that little spot.” (6 H 245–247) I should think this would be impossible enough, but in a taped interview with author Josiah Thompson on November 30, 1966, Holland said there were “four or five hundred footprints” in the area behind the station wagon (Thompson, Six Seconds in Dallas, p.122). Apparently, the conspirators who had Kennedy killed didn’t bring in just one assassin to shoot Kennedy from behind the picket fence, but imported the Russian army. If Holland’s testimony about footprints was strange, the testimony of Seymour Weitzman, the Dallas deputy constable who misidentified the Carcano, was close. He said that “in the railroad yards” used as a parking lot behind the picket fence, “we noticed numerous kinds [of] footprints that did not make sense because they were going in different directions” (7 H 107). Say what? It’s a parking lot for cars yet all footprints are supposed to be going in the same direction?

* - At least out at Love Field, the Department of Commerce records reflect that the wind was going in an easterly direction. But more than one witness in Dealey Plaza felt it was going in a northerly direction.

‡ One wonders how to reconcile these undoubtedly accurate on-site testimonials from Dealey Plaza witnesses as to the stiffness of the wind at the time of the assassination, with Weather Bureau records from the U.S. Department of Commerce, which show that the velocity of the wind at 12:30 p.m. on November 22, 1963, at nearby Love Field in Dallas, where the measurements were taken, was 13 knots, translating (a knot equals about 1.15 statute miles per hour) to around 15 miles per hour, a good but not a strong wind (U.S. Department of Commerce, Weather Bureau, Local Climatological Data, Dallas, Texas, Love Field, November 22, 1963, p.3; see also HSCA Record 180-10104-10458, November 1, 1978). When I posed this question to William Brown, a research meteorologist at the Department of Commerce Weather Bureau in Asheville, North Carolina, he said, “I’ve been to Dealey Plaza, and as you know there are many tall buildings in the area. When wind, like water, is funneled through a smaller channel—here, between buildings—the wind will always speed up, sometimes considerably. You’re forcing the same volume of air through a smaller area. It’s simple physics. In a water example, a wide river may not flow rapidly, but when funneled through a narrow canyon its velocity picks up immediately” (Telephone interview of William Brown by author on January 9, 2003). In other words, prairie winds, which are famous, are not strong because of the prairie, but because they are simply strong. A strong wind in the prairies surrounding Oklahoma City, for instance, will be even stronger in the city, not less strong.

* The fact that Bowers had a very busy day controlling trains on thirteen separate tracks that passed in front of the tower causes one assassination researcher to wonder whether Bowers was even at the window as he says he was. Jim Moore, author of Conspiracy of One, lives in Dallas and over the years has spent much time examining Dealey Plaza and the surrounding area. He makes this telling observation in his book: “[Bowers’s] work position required him to throw signal switches located on a panel in the center of the room. Sitting at the panel, Bowers could not have seen the area at the apex of the wooden fence where [Mark] Lane and [Sylvia] Meagher [conspiracy authors], among others, place their mythical assassin. Bowers, in order to view the area in question from a window somewhat removed from his control panel, would have had to leave his switches and walk over to the window. By all accounts, Bowers was a good employee, not a shirker of duty. It is inconceivable to me that he walked away from his control panel at a particularly busy time to stare at the back of a picket fence. Indeed, Bowers testified that he ‘threw red-on-red’—a signal that effectively blocked all trains—just after the fatal shot. He had to be sitting at his control panel to take this action.” (Moore, Conspiracy of One, p.32)

* - The HSCA, in an allusion to Bowers as well as Holland, said that “none of the photographs of the grassy knoll that were analyzed by the photographic evidence panel revealed any evidence of a puff of smoke or flash of light” (HSCA Report, p.86).

‡ I say “almost” because it’s not uncommon for a person, when first asked about something, to be unable to recall it or some of the details, but when given help in the form of linkage by the questioner, the person finally does recall it. For example, “Do you recall telling Joe that _____?” “No.” “Don’t you remember he said to you that _____ and then you started laughing and said to him _____?” “Oh yes, I do remember telling him that now.” In the legal context, this is called “refreshing the memory,” and is usually achieved by documents the person is shown on the witness stand.

* Rivele said he was told that the two assassins to the president's rear were firing regular bullets, but Sarti, from the grassy knoll, fired (naturally) a frangible bullet. Four bullets were fired. The first bullet was fired from the rear and struck the president in the back, and the second bullet, also fired from the rear, hit Connally. (As we know, the Warren Commission was originally perplexed by whether or not the shot that hit Kennedy went on to hit Connally, but finally concluded that it did—the single-bullet theory. David and Nicoli, however, debunked the single-bullet theory out of hand. How they would know this [i.e., how would even the alleged assassin who fired the bullet that entered Kennedy's back know it did not go on to strike Connally?] Rivele does not tell the TV audience.) The third bullet, Rivele said, was the fatal head shot that was fired from the grassy knoll, and the fourth bullet, fired from Kennedy's rear, missed.

* - So we know this is a phony story to begin with, but did David even tell it to the Hollywood scriptwriter, Rivele? Someone who should know says he doesn't believe he did. Jim Lesar, the scholarly head of the Assassination Archives and Research Center in Washington, D.C., was the lawyer Rivele got to try to prevent David's extradition back to France. In a last-ditch effort, he almost succeeded. Lesar actually accompanied Rivele on three separate trips to France for Rivele's interviews of David at La Santé prison, and says that although David and Rivele conversed in French, and Lesar's French is very limited, it's his impression that Rivele "inferred" the identity of the three gunmen from what David said, "putting two and two together."

Even though David had previously said that two of the three killers Rivele names in the movie were innocent, David has supposedly written a letter in which he names all three presidential assassins. It is not known who they are (and therefore whether the two he previously exonerated are among the three) since David's Parisian lawyer, Henri Juramy, has the letter, and as recently as the fall of 2003, Rivele told Lesar that he hadn't been able to get Juramy to furnish him with a copy of it. (Telephone interviews of Jim Lesar by author on February 3, 2004, and February 18, 2006; FBI Record 124-10001-10390, March 7, 1988, pp.1-3) Like Rivele, I can't wait to see who the chosen three are. Because of David's earlier exoneration of two of the three killers Rivele named, a French publisher whom Rivele had a contract with to publish his story, withdrew, and Rivele has never found an American publisher for his book. I can't imagine why. Years later, Rivele got the book published in Spanish by Ediciones B, a small Madrid publishing house. In great despair over the total disintegration of his case over in Europe, Rivele returned to the United States only to find that his wife was divorcing him, in whole or in part because of his madcap adventure, which had brought him to the brink of bankruptcy, and Rivele contemplated suicide. But he made a comeback, co-writing the script for Oliver Stone's movie Nixon, for which he was nominated for an Academy Award. (Telephone interview of Jim Lesar by author on February 3, 2004)

*- However, as to Sarti they found that on the day of the shooting, “he was undergoing serious medical treatment in France.” Whether that was inside or outside of Fort Ha prison in Bordeaux was not stated in the London Sunday Times report on the investigation. (London Sunday Times, November 24, 1991) The Manchester Guardian Weekly reported that on the day of the assassination, Sarti “was apparently on sick leave from his job as a dockwasher, following the loss of an eye” (Manchester Guardian Weekly, November 6, 1988, Le Monde sect., p.13).

‡ Though Central Television's franchise was ultimately not revoked for presenting untruthful broadcasts, producer-director Nigel Turner did not fare so well. Turner "was censured by members of the British Parliament." And the British regulatory agency, the Independent Broadcasting Authority, directed Central Television to present another broadcast devoted solely to exposing Turner's misleading show and the lack of ethics he used in producing it. Called a "studio crucifixion" of Turner, the program, which was taped in Washington, D.C., was aired only in Britain on November 16, 1988, and was the first time that the British regulatory agency had ever compelled such an action. (Manchester Guardian, December 7, 1988; <http://mcadams.posc.mu.edu/holland3.htm>)

* In an earlier, June 13, 1976, article by Meskill in the Daily News, he quotes Lorenz as claiming that in the fall of 1960, Frank Sturgis (real name, Frank Angelo Fiorini), one of the Watergate burglars and an alleged CIA operative, gave her two capsules of poisoned powder that she was supposed to put in Castro's food, but she said that after entering Cuba on her secret mission, the capsules dissolved while concealed in a jar of cold cream in Castro's room at the Havana Hilton, to which she still had a key from the previous year. In her autobiography, she says one of the two capsules slipped out of her hand and fell into the bidet and she flushed the other one down, realizing, since she still loved Fidel, how "utterly preposterous" it was for her to be there to "kill this man." She says when Castro later returned to his suite and found her there, he asked her if she had come for him or to kill him (she acknowledged the latter) before they made love. (Lorenz with Schwarz, Marita, pp.77, 80–83; 10 HSCA 156) Gaeton Fonzi, an HSCA investigator who was assigned to investigate Lorenz's claims about the Kennedy assassination, describes her as someone who has always "lived on the edge," and the dominant characteristics of her life were "change and turmoil." Because of her penchant for intrigue and strong anti-Castro sentiments, Fonzi believes she has been an informant at times for the FBI, U.S. Customs, and the DEA. (Fonzi, Last Investigation, pp.87–88)

‡ Hemming is a right-wing, ex-Marine soldier of fortune who keeps popping up in assassination literature. Like Sturgis and others, he went to Cuba to help Castro's rebels overthrow Batista, and ended up trying to overthrow Castro with his own group of fellow adventurers, Interpen (Intercontinental Penetration Forces, which shunned CIA funds and control), when he discovered Castro was pink.

* By 1993, fifteen years later, Lorenz had apparently forgotten her earlier lie, and told a new one. In her autobiography she wrote that “the weaponry we carried” in the two cars en route to Dallas “would only be used for a murderous mission. The rifles were excellent assassination tools for fairly long range...I knew we were [going to Dallas] to kill somebody” (Lorenz with Schwarz, Marita, pp.131, 134).

‡ It is not known what polygraph examination Sturgis was referring to, but three years earlier, when counsel for the Rockefeller Commission asked Sturgis if he were involved in any way in Kennedy's death, he said, "No, sir," and then proceeded to offer to take a polygraph examination on his denial. There is no suggestion in the record that the Commission gave Sturgis such a test. (SSCIA 157-10005-10126, Deposition of Sturgis before Rockefeller Commission, April 4, 1975, pp.10, 14–15)

* Marchetti also predicted in his article that the CIA, during the HSCA hearings, “may go so far as to ‘admit’ that there were three gunmen shooting at Kennedy.” Where, pray tell, did Marchetti get all this “inside” information? At his deposition in Hunt’s lawsuit against him and Liberty Lobby for libel, he was forced to acknowledge that it came from two sources outside the CIA (which, I suppose, is the reliable way to get inside information, right?), one of whom was the loony conspiracy theorist A. J. Weberman. (Lane, Plausible Denial, p.145)

Six days after the Spotlight article, Joseph Trento, a reporter for the Wilmington, Delaware, Sunday News Journal, perhaps parroting without attribution the Spotlight article, wrote in his paper about the existence of the 1966 memo. When Lane took Trento’s deposition in the Spotlight lawsuit on June 28, 1984, Trento said he got his information about the memo from “sources within the agency [CIA] and outside the agency,” but refused to disclose their identity. On cross-examination he claimed he had actually seen the memo and it was initialed by CIA officials James Jesus Angleton and Richard Helms. (Lane, Plausible Denial, pp.162–163, 167) Apparently Angleton and Helms, both notorious masters of deceit and secrecy, not only wanted to put the CIA’s cover-up of Hunt’s participation in Kennedy’s murder in writing, but they wanted to make double sure, by their initials, that they got whatever credit they had coming for the cover-up.

* - There was an earlier trial in 1981, after which the jury returned a verdict of $100,000 compensatory and $550,000 punitive damages in favor of Hunt, but the judgment was reversed by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit (Case 82-5321).

*- Conspiracy theorists maintain that Roscoe White was a Dallas police officer on November 22, 1963. Indeed, conspiracy icon Beverly Oliver said that she saw White, in his police uniform, walking away from the grassy knoll after the shooting in Dealey Plaza. But on November 22, 1963, White was only a Dallas police officer in a technical sense. Dallas police records show that although White was hired as an apprentice policeman on October 7, 1963, he didn't even start his police training at the police academy until December 4, 1963, graduating from Class 79 on February 28, 1964, so he would not have been in any Dallas police uniform on November 22, 1963. White resigned from the force on October 7, 1965, exactly two years after he was hired, going to work for Page Drugs in Dallas.

‡ Roscoe White certainly had the background of someone one would expect to be a top-level CIA operative assigned to murder the president. He entered the U.S. Marine Corps, at the age of twenty-two, on February 19, 1957, and received his honorable discharge as a corporal on December 4, 1962. While in the military, he was trained as an auto mechanic and in artillery ballistic meteorology, and received a Good Conduct medal during his time in the corps. When he was discharged, and before he became a Dallas police officer, he worked in Dallas selling life insurance door to door for the American National Insurance Company and as a part-time agent for Farmers Insurance Company.

* West and Vernon are the ones who started the whole Files story and got it out there. It is noteworthy that on September 5, 1992, West wrote to Files, “When I get your songs, I’m going to show them to a friend of mine who is a music producer and see if there is anything he can do with them. He was Fats Domino’s manager for over ten years.” There are no references to songs in West’s and Files’s letters to each other, so Files wanting help with his songs must have been discussed when West met Files at the Stateville Correctional Center (Files was not incarcerated in the much more famous Joliet State Prison across the river, which was closed in 2002) for the first time about three weeks earlier, on August 17, 1992. Shortly after Bob Vernon took over the Files case from Joe West on March 10, 1993, he wrote a letter (date of letter not known, but it was on March 10 or a day or so thereafter) to Files. On March 15, 1993, in Files’s very first letter to Vernon, he writes, “I received your letter with ‘Earlene’s’ [Joe West’s widow] this past Saturday evening. Thank you for writing to me... Thank you for wanting to help with my music. It would be really nice to hear some of my songs over the radio.” (Dankbaar, Files on JFK, pp.360, 392, 394) It could very well be that part of Files’s motivation for telling his phony “Kennedy assassin” tale was not just his fifteen minutes of fame, but fifteen or more minutes of turntable time on the radio for his songs.

* Files said he had met Oswald earlier in New Orleans, and when Oswald was in Clinton, Louisiana, Files said he “was running semi-automatic 45 caliber submachine guns” down to Oswald for CIA agent David Atlee Phillips, who he said introduced him to Oswald (Dankbaar, Files on JFK, pp.51, 173–174).

* One of the things that convinced Sample and Collom that Factor was telling the truth and was on the sixth floor that day is his telling them he saw a “table saw” on the sixth floor, and they say that the late Harold Norman told Sample in 1993 that there was a table saw on the sixth floor. How could Factor have known this if he wasn’t there? But assassination researcher Dave Perry, who specializes in poking holes in the more-far-out conspiracy allegations, said he and Gary Mack, the curator of the Sixth Floor Museum, looked over film footage and many photographs taken on the sixth floor after the assassination and saw no table saw. (Los Angeles Times, Orange County edition, January 16, 1996, p.E5; Telephone interview of Dave Perry by author on December 20, 2004)

‡ Factor said he never saw anyone when he entered the building and proceeded to the sixth floor, or when he descended the stairs and exited the building. Many Book Depository Building employees gave statements to the FBI that they saw no strangers in the building on the day of the assassination. Ruth Ann, Factor, and Wallace, all strangers, must have done a good job hiding not only their physical form inside the building that day, but also the rifles that one or more of them apparently carried into and out of the building that day.

‡ Although Collom and Sample's book is silly beyond belief, British conspiracy theorist Robin Ramsay couldn't be more impressed with the authors, asserting that they "solved the case" (Ramsay, Who Shot JFK? p.67).

* In Estes' later memoir, Billie Sol Estes, he makes the same incredible charges, suggesting that the reason for all these murders was that all of the victims were "associated with me. Each of these victims could have revealed my connection to Lyndon Johnson" (Estes, Billie Sol Estes, pp.90, 98). If this is true, Billie, why didn't LBJ have you killed? Wouldn't you be the most dangerous to LBJ of all people in his eyes?

‡ In a September 18, 1964, letter to the Warren Commission's general counsel, J. Lee Rankin, FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover wrote that "on our efforts to identify the latent fingerprints and palm prints [on the four cardboard boxes inside the sniper's nest]...only one latent palm print remains to be identified" (CE 3131, 26 H 799, 809). As we have seen, apart from the prints of Oswald found on the cartons, of the nineteen other fingerprints and six palm prints on the four cartons, all except the one palm print were found to belong to either Dallas detective Robert Lee Studebaker or FBI clerk Forest L. Lucy, both of whom handled the cartons during the investigation (CE 3131, 26 H 809; WR, p.249).

* - The author says that Wallace's first wife was Mary Andre Dubose Barton, and there is a "possible connection with Clark's family line. They share a common name, that of Dubose," and "while the connection [between Wallace and Clark] cannot be made from this, the possibility cannot be excluded."

‡ Actually, there is a likelihood that LBJ had at least a passing acquaintance with Wallace, though this in no way supports the outrageous and foundationless allegations in McClellan's book. Apparently McClellan was unaware that in 1986, Horace Busby, an LBJ aide, told the Dallas Times Herald that around 1949 or 1950, Wallace and Josefa, LBJ's sister, "were having a relationship" in Washington, D.C., and "she may have moved in with him or he moved in with her" (Dallas Times Herald, March 31, 1986, p.11A). Also, Busby said that Johnson had met Wallace once, when Cliff Carter had taken Wallace to Johnson's home in Washington, D.C., presumably during this same period of time (Dallas Morning News, March 23, 1984, p.5A).

*- McClellan was convicted of forging a $35,000 deed of trust in 1982 and the “criminal charges were dismissed” in 1992 (McClellan, Blood, Money and Power, pp.292–294). As of February 19, 2006, he was not listed as a member of the Texas State Bar.

* - The only weapon any Secret Service agent accompanying the president had on his person in Dealey Plaza was his handgun, a four-inch revolver. In the presidential follow-up car there was also a shotgun inside a compartment in front of the jump seats, and the AR-15 automatic rifle lying on the floor of the rear seat between Agents George Hickey and Glen Bennett (2 H 69, WCT Roy H. Kellerman; 2 H 134–135, WCT Clinton J. Hill; CE 1024, 18 H 760).

‡ Though Donahue believes that Secret Service agent George Hickey accidentally shot Kennedy with a fatal shot to the head from behind, two young Canadian sleuths, Ray Dupois and Jason Amelotte, are “positive” that another Secret Service agent, William Greer, the driver of the presidential limousine, intentionally fired a fatal shot into Kennedy’s head from the front. Dupois and Amelotte find it “hard to believe that more people” haven’t come to this conclusion, since “the evidence is obvious.” What is that evidence? They say that if you watch the Zapruder film closely, when the limousine slows down on Elm after Kennedy is shot in the back, Greer can be seen turning around in his seat holding a handgun in his left hand, with which, they say, he fired the fatal shot. So it may have been Greer, not Hickey, who actually killed Kennedy. But Dupois and Amelotte can’t take full credit for finally solving the twentieth century’s biggest murder mystery. As indicated earlier, author Milton William Cooper, in his book Behold a Pale Horse, is the first one to have caught Greer in the act of killing Kennedy. (“Did Chauffeur Murder JFK?” Windsor (Ontario) Star, November 22, 1993)

* The only reference to Hickey having fired the gun was really no reference at all. When Secret Service agent Winston G. Lawson, riding in the lead car (directly in front of the presidential limousine), heard three shots coming from his rear, he turned around and saw Hickey standing up with the AR-15 in his hand. He testified, “The first thing that flashed through my mind...was that he had fired because this was the only weapon I had seen up to that time” (4 H 352–353).

* The first reference in print to the three men came in the April 6, 1964, Warren Commission testimony of Lee Bowers, the Union Terminal switchman, who said he had “held off the trains [from continuing on] until they could be examined, and there was some transients taken [off] at least one train” (6 H 288). The first reference to “tramps” came in the April 9, 1964, testimony of D. V. Harkness, one of the five Dallas police officers who arrested the three men at the boxcar, referring to them as “tramps” (6 H 312).

‡ On the other hand, Wise said they were “smelly” and the photos didn’t really show how “dirty” they were. Indeed, a female reporter is being seen in a Dallas Morning News photo covering her nose as they walked by.

* The commission concluded that Sturgis “was not an employee or agent of the CIA either in 1963 or at any other time.” Nor was he an “informant or other operative.” Sturgis himself testified before the commission that he had never been a CIA agent but that he had engaged in several “adventures” relating to Cuba which he believed to have been organized and financed by the CIA.

* Although the Rockefeller Commission, headed by Vice President Nelson A. Rockefeller, and consisting of many distinguished Americans such as C. Douglas Dillon, Erwin N. Griswold, Lane Kirkland, Lyman L. Lemnitzer, and Ronald Reagan, was a blue-chip body, it clearly made a mistake in appointing former Warren Commission assistant counsel David Belin as its executive director, not because he wasn't more than qualified, but because of the appearance of a potential conflict of interest, Belin being one of the strongest and most vocal defenders of the conclusions of the Warren Commission.

* In a 2001 book, The Making of a Bum, Gedney said that for years up to and including the day of the assassination, he was “a bona fide bum, tramp, hobo, rounder, and all-around drunken scoundrel...A scum-bag [who] lived in doorways and cardboard boxes, begged for money to buy a meal but used it for cigarettes or wine...My only allegiance was to the bottle” (Gedney, Making of a Bum, Preface, p.116).

* - Corpus delicti is not, as many lay people believe, the dead body in a homicide case, but rather the body or elements of the crime.

*- Dr. Renatus Hartogs, the psychiatrist who examined Oswald in New York City when Lee was thirteen, offered a few possibilities of why Oswald killed Kennedy. Remarkably, if we're to believe Hartogs, one is that Oswald, by his act, may have been shrieking to the world, "I have been deprived of a father, which is every man's birthright, who would have taken care of me and protected me from my wild impulses, and now I will deprive everyone else of a father, too," the president being the father of the nation. As far-out as this was, Hartogs wasn't through. He went on to say that Oswald's act may also have been "his unconscious attempt to castrate his father," the "top man in his life as a child [Oswald's father was already dead at the time Oswald was born], the man who is his rival for his mother. His 'place in history' may have meant what he believed to be his rightful 'place' in his mother's bed, . . . the secret wish to commit what he unconsciously believed to be the highest of forbidden pleasures—incest." (Hartogs and Freeman, Two Assassins, pp.188–189) So it was all about the Freudian Oedipus complex. Oswald was just trying to retroactively have sex with his mother, Marguerite. My question is, What can society do to protect itself from such psychiatric silliness?

‡ One circumstance militating against the conclusion that Oswald knew precisely why he killed Kennedy is that his decision did not appear to be thought-out, but seemed to culminate more from a potpourri of hemorrhaging emotions. Some have defined emotion as that which is devoid of reason. That may be too simplistic, but surely an extremely emotional act, as killing the president has to be, isn't grounded too much in reason. Two facts, among others, suggest that Oswald's killing of Kennedy was not too premeditated: First, as known from earlier in the book, he left a threatening, inflammatory note at FBI headquarters about two weeks before the assassination. It seems very, very unlikely he would have done that (or would have even concerned himself with a minor matter like being upset with FBI agent James Hosty) if he at that time (two weeks before the assassination) was right in the midst of his plans to murder the president of the United States. Second, and also mentioned earlier, he didn't take his revolver with him on the morning of the assassination to aid in his escape, going back to his rooming house to get it after he shot Kennedy.

* The three prior assassinations of American presidents are compatible with the political motivation factor. Abraham Lincoln's assassin (assassination on April 14, 1865), John Wilkes Booth, was a Confederate sympathizer. So were all of his co-conspirators. James A. Garfield's assassin (July 2, 1881), Charles J. Guiteau, was a would-be officeholder who earlier had unsuccessfully sought to be appointed U.S. ambassador to Austria. Guiteau became enraged when Garfield failed to appoint him as ambassador to Austria. William McKinley's assassin (September 6, 1901), Leon F. Czolgosz, was an avowed anarchist. (HSCA Report, pp.21–23; WR, pp.506–510)

It should be noted that there is no such crime known as assassination, though by definition an assassination necessarily includes murder, which, next to treason, is the ultimate crime. The word assassination has come to mean the murder of a public official (e.g., Julius Caesar, Lincoln) or a public figure (e.g., Pancho Villa, Leon Trotsky), and hence, unlike a murder, its occurrence affects the lives of hundreds of thousands, sometimes millions of people, and often the course of public policy and events. Because of this reality, and because of the empirical evidence, we can safely say that most assassinations have, as their primary motive, the changing of history. A personal hatred of the victim by the killer, present in the majority of murders, is frequently absent or of secondary importance in assassinations. Oswald's killing of Kennedy was, of course, a classic assassination. Though we don't know his motive, the evidence is lacking that he "hated" Kennedy.

‡ Oswald's brother Robert believed that he had gotten this trait from his mother, Marguerite, who he said "had an extraordinary idea of her ability and importance" and felt "the world should recognize her as somebody special and important" (Oswald with Land and Land, Lee, pp.23, 48). Marguerite, he said, "had certain characteristics that were so much like Lee. The time and circumstances always seemed to be against her...She wanted to be somebody. I think this was passed on to Lee" (Transcript of "Who Was Lee Harvey Oswald?" Frontline, PBS, November 16, 1993, p.4).

* However, as indicated earlier in the book, it is not clear from the context whether Oswald himself used the “ten thousand years” phrase, or Thornley came up with the words to convey the impression Oswald left with him.

* Although Oswald may have liked Kennedy (see later discussion on why he would murder someone he may have liked), he revered Castro, and in any clash of interests in his mind, Castro obviously would have prevailed. “Fidel Castro was his hero,” Marina Oswald said about her husband (2 HSCA 252). Oswald was so taken by Castro, he even kept a picture of him on the mantel in his apartment in New Orleans (8 H 187, WCT Charles Murret). An anti-Castro Cuban in New Orleans, Celso Macario, recalls seeing a small placard around Oswald’s waist on which was written, “Viva Fidel” (HSCA Record 180-10030-10062). Indeed, as indicated earlier, Marina says that the alias “Hidell” was just a variation he used of “Fidel” (1 H 64).

‡ American Assassins author James W. Clarke feels Oswald had more than one motive for the assassination, one being that he “hoped to prove his value to the Cubans by killing a president who had effectively intimidated and threatened their small nation.” Clarke broke down American assassins and would-be assassins into four classifications, Oswald, he said, falling into type two, assassins “with overwhelming and aggressive egocentric needs for acceptance, recognition and status.” Lincoln’s assassin, John Wilkes Booth, was put into type one, assassins who “view their acts as a probable sacrifice for a political ideal.” (Clarke, American Assassins, pp.126, 14)

* Remarkably, many major books on the assassination by Warren Commission critics and conspiracy theorists don't even mention Oswald's attempt to murder Walker. Not one word. A few examples: James Fetzer, Murder in Dealey Plaza; Jim Garrison, On the Trail of the Assassins; David Lifton, Best Evidence; David Scheim, Contract on America; Jerome Kroth, Conspiracy in Camelot; and so on.

Many books mention the Walker shooting but treat it dismissively in a few sentences. For example, in Mafia Kingfish, John Davis says that "someone took a shot" at Walker, and Marina Oswald "later claimed" that it was her husband, but this contention "has never been conclusively proved" (Davis, Mafia Kingfish, p.135). Period. Michael Kurtz, in his book Crime of the Century, says only that the Warren Report stated that Oswald had tried to kill Walker, then adds, "The story of the attempt on General Walker's life is beyond the scope of this book." Why? "Obviously," he writes, "it has little bearing on the question of whether or not Oswald shot President Kennedy over seven months later." (Kurtz, Crime of the Century, p.124) Yes, indeed.

* - Writer Dwight Macdonald says that “the one real success in Oswald’s whole life seems to have been the assassination of President Kennedy” (Macdonald, “Critique of the Warren Report,” p.137).

* However, Rome may be overgeneralizing here since, although dyslexia is primarily a reading disability and it is very unusual for a dyslexic to be an avid reader, we know Oswald read voraciously throughout his abbreviated adult life, and there is nothing in the record to suggest he had a difficult time reading the many books he got from the library. The only manifestation of his dyslexia seems to have been in his spelling of words. Indeed, whatever reading disability he may have had in his early youth, it was clear that by the age of thirteen, as shown in the Wechsler Intelligence Scale for Children, Oswald had overcome it, showing no retardation in reading speed and comprehension. (WR, p.381)

* But whatever the ambiguity, there is little question that Oswald liked many things about Kennedy. Paul Gregory, a member of the Russian-speaking community in Dallas, said that Oswald “expressed admiration of Kennedy. Both he and Marina would say, ‘Nice young man’” (9 H 148, WCT Dr. Paul Roderick Gregory). George de Mohrenschildt testified that Oswald said Kennedy was “an excellent President, young, full of energy, full of good ideas” (9 H 255, WCT George de Mohrenschildt), and Oswald’s aunt, Lillian Murret, told the Warren Commission, “I think he said he liked him [Kennedy]” (8 H 153).

* - That Walker was Kennedy's opposite was made clear in many pronouncements by the right-wing zealot. For instance, in a speech before the Annual Leadership Conference of the White Citizens' Council of America on October 25, 1963, in Jackson, Mississippi, Walker declared, "The Kennedys have liquidated the government of the United States. It no longer exists...The best definition I can find today for Communism is Kennedy liberalism...He is the greatest leader of the anti-Christ movement that we have had as a president of the United States."

‡ I am assuming here that Kennedy's fierce opposition to Cuba was not enough, by itself, to cause Oswald to kill Kennedy, which it may very well have been. Author Jean Davison, in her fine book, Oswald's Game, perceptively points out what nearly all assassination writers have failed to do: although General Walker was on the Far Right and Kennedy was a moderate, even a liberal in the area of civil rights, they both were identical in one very important way to Oswald—their outspokenly strident opposition to his beloved Castro and Cuba. And if we know Oswald tried to kill Walker, most likely because of Walker's belligerence toward Cuba, as they say in the law, a fortiori (all the more so) he would be willing to try to murder Kennedy, who, unlike Walker, had the capability to physically remove Castro from power. Did Oswald try to kill Walker over Cuba? Oswald, of course, hated anti-Communists. But Walker is the only anti-Communist (other than Kennedy) whom Oswald tried to kill. What set Walker apart from other anti-Communists? It may very well have been the emphasis in Walker's heated rhetoric of overthrowing Castro, which Oswald, a diligent reader of the daily newspapers, would have known. The January 22, 1963, issue of the Dallas Morning News (the day after a federal judge in Mississippi dismissed charges against Walker for helping to incite the desegregation riots at the University of Mississippi the previous fall) quoted Walker as saying, "I am glad to be vindicated... Today my hopes returned to the Cubans... who long to return to their homes." The February 17, 1963, issue of the newspaper quotes Walker at length remonstrating against Cuba, calling Cuba "very significant" and the Cuban situation "unacceptable" to America. The caption for a March 6, 1963, article from the same paper (just over one month prior to Oswald's attempt to murder Walker on April 10, 1963) was "One U.S. Division Could Free Cuba, Walker Claims." The article read in part, "Former Major General Edwin A. Walker has called upon President Kennedy to oust Fidel Castro from Cuba. 'I challenge the commander in chief of the United States of America to take one U.S. Army division, the 82nd Airborne Division at Ft. Bragg, N.C., properly supported and joined by Cubans who want to be free, and liquidate the scourge that has descended upon the island of Cuba.'" Those would be frightening words to a devoted and fanatical follower of Castro like Oswald.

Notwithstanding the above, though Oswald would have detested everything about the right-wing extremist Walker, he did not appear to dislike Kennedy, and in fact admired him in some ways. And this is why I felt "I needed something more."

* Even if we were to reduce, for the sake of argument, the proof of Oswald's guilt from absolute and conclusive (which it actually is) to only probable, as British author John Sparrow points out about Oswald's guilt, "In order not to believe in the probable, there is so much of the improbable that [one] has to believe in" (Sparrow, After the Assassination, p.43).

‡ Prosecutors like to argue in their final summation to the jury that “looking at the evidence as a whole” (or “the totality of the evidence,” or “all the evidence”) makes it clear the defendant is guilty. But in the case against Oswald, one doesn’t have to look at all or even most of the evidence to reach the conclusion he is guilty. Indeed, there are many individual things he did, like immediately fleeing the Book Depository Building after the shooting, killing Officer Tippit, et cetera, which by themselves point clearly to his guilt.

* For instance, since we know that Oswald shot and killed Kennedy, we also know that questions such as, What is the small object resembling a bullet fragment that Dr. David Mantik has become obsessed with, believing it was planted in an autopsy X-ray to frame Oswald by indicating a shot from the rear? Whatever happened to the missing autopsy photos? Was Oswald a good shot or not? Why wasn't Commission Exhibit No. 399 damaged more than it was? Whom did Roger Craig see running out of the Book Depository Building fifteen minutes after the assassination and getting into a Nash Rambler? Did Oswald have time to get to Tenth and Patton from his rooming house in time to kill Officer Tippit? Why, Drs. Gary Aguilar, Cyril Wecht, and Rex Bradford want to know, did a test bullet fired through a test skull cause more damage to the right side of the skull than Commission Exhibit No. 399 caused to the right side of Kennedy's skull? What is the reason for the sharp dent on the lip of one of the three cartridge cases found on the floor of the sniper's nest, which Josiah Thompson believes would have prevented it from being loaded into Oswald's rifle?—and hundreds upon hundreds of other questions and problems the critics have with the case against Oswald—are all irrelevant. Why? Because we know that Oswald killed Kennedy. So by definition, there has to be a satisfactory answer for all of these questions and perceived discrepancies and problems with the case. This is not an opinion I am giving. This is an incontrovertible fact of life and logic. They would have relevance only if the guilt of Oswald hadn't already been established beyond all doubt. But it has.

* In a related matter, conspiracy theorists are fond of saying that there are just “too many problems and discrepancies” with the Kennedy case for Oswald to be guilty or for there to be no conspiracy. But actually, most of the “problems and discrepancies” in the case are not real but invented by the theorists. In any event, there are, as is normal and can be expected in all complex murder cases, some problems and apparent discrepancies—for example, some Dealey Plaza witnesses thinking the shots came from the grassy knoll. But you know what these same conspiracy theorists would argue if there wasn’t one problem or discrepancy in the case? That this was abnormal, that there are problems with all cases, that the case was “too perfect,” and for this to happen the case against Oswald must have been contrived by the authorities.

* For years, conspiracy theorists have attempted to explain away Oswald's fleeing the Book Depository Building by saying he probably "sensed" that he was being set up as a patsy. But when you ask them what evidence they have to support their speculation, or even what evidence they are aware of that may have caused Oswald to believe this, the silence is deafening. A typical example of this defense of Oswald comes from conspiracy theorist Susan Sloate, who writes that "anyone, realizing the President had been shot and that he himself might be blamed for it, would be frightened and insecure," justifying, per Sloate, Oswald "leaving the scene of the crime at the first opportunity [and] going home to get a revolver, his only means of protecting himself" (Fourth Decade, January 1995, p.22). But Ms. Sloate doesn't bother to say why she believes Oswald had this realization. She is apparently opposed to even trying to support her fantasy with some evidence.

In the book High Treason, the authors nakedly speculate that Oswald "knew he had been set up as the patsy, and so went home," not being nice enough to their readers to say what basis they had for their speculation (Groden and Livingstone, High Treason, p.153).

* Even without all the independent evidence proving that Oswald killed Kennedy, it was obvious that Oswald's murder of Tippit alone proved it was he who murdered Kennedy. So obvious, indeed, that one of the arresting officers at the Texas Theater who had pursued Oswald to the theater because of Tippit's murder, yelled at Oswald, "Kill the president, will you," and another officer called in to police headquarters from the theater that "I think we have got our man on both accounts." The HSCA "concluded that Oswald shot and killed Officer Tippit. The committee further concluded that this crime, committed while fleeing the scene of the assassination, was consistent with a finding that Oswald assassinated the President" (HSCA Report, p.59).

* - This palm print could have been placed on this portion of the rifle only when disassembled, since the wooden foregrip of the rifle covers the barrel at this point (WR, p.124; 4 H 260, WCT J. C. Day; Telephone interview of C. Day by author on August 29, 2002). And, of course, we know that Oswald's Carcano had been disassembled when he took it to work in the paper bag on the morning of the assassination.

‡ Recall that other than Oswald's Carcano and the three expended shells from the Carcano being found on the sixth floor of the Book Depository Building, no other weapon, or even shells from another weapon, were found or seen anywhere else in Dealey Plaza.

* Just one further observation about the .38 caliber revolver that was used to kill Tippit: As we know, many conspiracy theorists allege, without any evidence to support their allegation, that Oswald's Carcano rifle was planted on the sixth floor of the Book Depository Building by those who, they claim, framed Oswald for Kennedy's murder. But what about the .38 caliber revolver? Oswald himself admitted during his interrogation that after the shooting in Dealey Plaza he went back to his rooming house and got the revolver, the same one he had on his person at the time of his arrest at the Texas Theater. Do conspiracy theorists want us to believe that the framers of Oswald stole Oswald's revolver from him after he left his rooming house with it, murdered Tippit with the revolver, and then between the time of Tippit's murder and Oswald's arrest at the theater somehow got that revolver back into the hands of Oswald, where it was at the time of his arrest? But look, anything is possible.

* Since you can't frame a guilty person, what I'm about to say is unnecessary, but one of the very first thoughts I had when I started preparing for the London trial, I ended up articulating for the jury in my final summation. The backdrop is that my opposing counsel, Gerry Spence, was suggesting to the jury that Oswald was framed by sophisticated people; and there were the two facts that although Oswald was a good shot, he was not an expert rifleman, and though the Carcano was a decent rifle, it was not a great rifle. I argued in my final summation to the jury in London, "I ask Mr. Spence, if the conspirators who [supposedly] framed Oswald were so sophisticated and intelligent, wouldn't they make sure that the person they framed was someone whose skill with a rifle was absolutely beyond question, and wouldn't they also make sure that the person they were seeking to frame possessed a modern, expensive rifle that unquestionably had the capacity to get the job done? Wouldn't they have to know, in advance, that failing to do either one of these things would automatically raise a question about whether the person they were seeking to frame was guilty, and therefore be self-defeating? You don't have to have a PhD in logic to know this. Even someone with not too much furniture upstairs would know this. Mr. Spence can't have it both ways. If the people who set Oswald up were so sophisticated as to come up with this incredibly elaborate conspiracy—I mean, to the point where they had people, according to Mr. Spence, who could superimpose Oswald's head on someone else's body, they had imposters down in Mexico City, and so forth—if they were that bright, why weren't they intelligent enough to know the most obvious thing of all? That you don't attempt to frame a man of questionable marksmanship ability who possesses a nineteen-dollar mail-order rifle?" (Transcript of On Trial, July 25, 1986, pp.1056–1057)

* One frequently hears that “it is impossible to prove a negative.” But this, of course, is pure myth. In some situations, as in the murder of President Kennedy, it is impossible, but in many situations in life it is very easy. For instance, in a criminal case where a defendant says he did not commit the robbery or burglary, or what have you, because he was somewhere else at the time, the prosecution routinely proves the negative (that he was not somewhere else) by establishing through witnesses, fingerprints, DNA, or sometimes even film, that he did commit the crime and was not where he said he was at the time it happened.

On an even more obvious level, if someone were to say, “I have [or do not have] pancreatic cancer,” medical tests can disprove this (i.e., prove the negative), if such be the case.

In the Kennedy case, I believe the absence of a conspiracy can be proved to a virtual certainty.

* For instance, in the Kennedy case, if a brilliant man like Great Britain's Bertrand Russell, a towering figure in the field of mathematical philosophy and intellectual thought (whose fourth wife, Lady Russell, never forgave a friend who said on television that Russell did not outshine Plato), can say with conviction that "an innocent man [referring to Oswald] was framed and gunned down" (Lewis, "Tragedy of Bertrand Russell," pp.30, 32), you know the idiocy over this case has not discriminated against any mental category of people.

* - A far more mundane reason may simply be that the masses, trying to make some sense out of events that are not to their liking, find that a conspiracy theory they can easily understand or adopt, and which fits a bias of theirs, often explains things very well.

* For conspiracy theorists, all discrepancies, contradictions, anomalies, et cetera, are suspicious, and are the heart and soul of the conspiracy movement. In their universe, everything proceeds perfectly and there is no such thing as human error, incompetence, coincidence, or failure of memory. There are no innocent, benign explanations for anything.

With respect to contradictions, a godsend to all conspiracy researchers, eyewitness authority Elizabeth Loftus writes, “If a hundred people were to see the same automobile accident, no two reports [of this] would be identical” on all the details (Loftus, Eyewitness Testimony, p.153). This reality of human cognition, that different people see and hear the same event differently, has proved to be the richest of troves for the scavenging Warren Commission critics and conspiracy theorists.

Author Quentin Reynolds writes in his book Courtroom, “No two persons will give the same account of an incident they both witnessed. They will paint a door black, blue and green, and give more varieties of weather for the same day than the weather bureau does for all the days of the year. They vary the time of the day by minutes or hours. They differ in their measurement of space by inches, feet and miles” (Reynolds, Courtroom, p.186). As psychologist and philosopher William James said, “Whilst part of what we perceive comes from the object before us, another part always comes out of our mind.”

Warren Commission counsel David Belin points out that because our eyes are not perfect cameras that can recall exactly what took place in a matter of seconds, “if you get two conflicting stories with two witnesses, you can imagine how many arise when there are hundreds of witnesses to a sudden event, as there were in Dealey Plaza on November 22, 1963. Almost anyone who wants to concoct a theory can find one or two witnesses who might support his theory” (Belin, Final Disclosure, p.14). A substantial majority of the conspiracy community is also extremely gullible, believing every story they hear without bothering to check it to see if it is accurate or makes any sense. As long as the story helps their theory, they buy it. They would improve the quality of their research appreciably by simply embracing rule number one of the journalistic profession: “If your mama says she loves you, check it out.”

* Morgan added, “I don’t think he knew these people [Cabell and Brown] except to shake hands with—but he knew them all at least that far. He used to say to me, ‘You know, Pat, considering my background, it’s really amazing I have come so far’” (Wills and Demaris, Jack Ruby, p.43).

‡To dilute the connection even further, Ferrie was not an investigator for Carlos Marcello. He was an investigator for lawyer G. Wray Gill, and Gill had Ferrie work on an immigration lawsuit against Marcello in which Gill was representing Marcello. Also, there is no credible evidence that Ferrie was ever a boyhood friend of Oswald's or was with Oswald in the summer of 1963. But even if these assertions were true, so what? They certainly don't add up to a conspiracy to commit murder.

* Or we'll say, "What a coincidence," or "What are the odds of this happening?" But in the world of conspiracy theorists, happenstance and coincidences don't exist. What appears to be a random coincidence is really always complicity. Indeed, perhaps the only coincidence they will acknowledge is that the words coincidence and complicity each start with the letter C and each has four syllables.

* - It has to be noted that along with the allegation of planted evidence, the other main conspiracy argument conspiracy theorists have made over and over again is that much of the evidence against Oswald was forged or tampered with by the authorities. But not once have the theorists ever proved this allegation. Yet, the very group always shouting forgery and tampering has been caught on many occasions forging documents to make its point in the assassination debate. (See endnote discussion.)

‡Millions of Americans through the years have mouthed these or similar beliefs. Here's just one example, from President Kennedy's own longtime personal secretary, no less: In an October 7, 1994, letter to Richard Duncan, a high school teacher in Roanoke, Virginia, who had inquired of her state of mind vis-à-vis the assassination, Evelyn Lincoln wrote, "It is my belief that there was a conspiracy because there were those that disliked him and felt the only way to get rid of him was to assassinate him. These five conspirators, in my opinion, were Lyndon B. Johnson, J. Edgar Hoover, the mafia, the CIA, and the Cubans in Florida" (Duncan sent me a copy of the letter on January 23, 1997).

This mind-numbing phenomenon is actually more the rule than the exception with everyday people who watch events from afar. At a reception following a speech I gave around the time of Princess Diana's fatal car crash in Paris, a fifty-ish, well-coiffed woman with a doctorate in psychology told me, without batting an eye, that the Royal Family was behind Princess Di's death. How, I inquired, had she come to this rather startling conclusion? "If Di married Dodi and had a son, the son would be half Arab and might someday become king, something they couldn't abide." "Oh, I see," I said, fighting back a smile. I certainly had no difficulty picturing the Queen Mother and her family, aghast at such a possibility, deciding that "Di had to go," and Prince Philip, perhaps, making the arrangements by calling in someone the family normally employs to "take care" of such problems.

* Fourteen years before Stone's movie came out, another Hollywood director made light of what Stone would take so seriously. In his 1977 picture Annie Hall, Woody Allen has his character Alvie ask Allison, "How is it possible for Oswald to have fired from two angles at once?...I'll tell you this. He was not marksman enough to hit a moving target at that range. But if there was a second assassin, that's it." Allison responds in exasperation, "Then everybody's in on the conspiracy—the FBI, CIA, J. Edgar Hoover, and the oil companies and the Pentagon and the men's room attendant at the White House?" Alvie: "I would leave out the men's room attendant."

* Indeed, a national Gallup Poll that started on the day of the assassination and continued through November 27 showed that the first instinct of most Americans was that Kennedy had died as a result of a conspiracy, 52 percent believing “some group or element was responsible,” 29 percent believing the “assassin acted on his own,” and 19 percent being “uncertain.” As indicated in the introduction to this book, this sentiment was reversed the following year with the publication of the Warren Report, a September 1964 Harris Poll showing 55.5 percent of Americans believing Oswald acted alone, 31.6 percent believing he had accomplices, and 13 percent being unsure.

* The very first book written on the assassination was the little-known Red Roses from Texas by the British author Nerin E. Gun. Published by Frederick Muller in London in February 1964 (and by R. Julliard in France), before the Warren Report came out, it wasn't a conspiracy book at all, over half of its 208 pages not even dealing with the assassination, but with the short period leading up to it. And the assassination part of the book is more a series of claims gathered from rumors, newspapers, tabloids, and newspaper articles on the case (since testimony before the Warren Commission was in private and, as indicated, not yet published). Many were inaccurate, such as that a doctor examining President Kennedy at Parkland Hospital found a bullet on his stretcher; that Dallas deputy sheriff Buddy Walthers found a "fourth bullet" in the grass near the Triple Underpass; that Oswald was not advised of his constitutional rights and not allowed to telephone a lawyer; that the presidential limousine shot down the Stemmons Freeway toward Parkland Hospital at 100 miles per hour. (Gun, Red Roses from Texas, pp.111–112, 127, 204–205; see also CE 2580, 25 H 851–852) Because it is the first book on the case, and because it is so rare, I'm told a copy of Red Roses from Texas is worth $750.

* Another book published after Whitewash but before Rush to Judgment has been erroneously classified by some as a conspiracy book, but it is not. Sylvan Fox's Unanswered Questions about President Kennedy's Assassination, published in October of 1965, is merely a very superficial critique of the Warren Report. After asking boilerplate questions like what was Oswald's motive in killing Kennedy, and how many shots were fired in Dealey Plaza, and from what direction, the author, who posits the possibility of conspiracy, concludes that the only certainty in the case is that "Oswald participated in the assassination of President Kennedy, either alone or in concert with others." (Fox, Unanswered Questions about President Kennedy's Assassination, pp.24, 44, 192)

* The early conspiracy theorists were encouraged and abetted by the Russian press and intellectuals across the water, such as Britain's Hugh Trevor-Roper, Bertrand Russell, and Arnold Toynbee—even London's conservative Daily Mail editorialized on November 27, 1963, that “facts can be produced that a right-wing plot against the President had caused his death”—as well as French publications like Le Figaro, L'Express, and Le Monde, France's leading paper.

‡ Many of the early researchers considered themselves liberal, which is why they weren't prepared for the disdain or indifference they received from even the liberal establishment and media (such as the estimable Nation magazine and leading lights of the Left like Alexander Cockburn and I. F. Stone), who, apart from other reasons to support the findings of such an august body as the Warren Commission, were reticent about attacking a Commission whose chairman, Chief Justice Warren, had become a liberal icon for the civil rights' rulings of his court, and who had been the subject of vitriolic attacks by the nation's right wing. Indeed, a liberal like Vince Salandria was astonished to find his message of questioning the Warren Commission resonating more with Republican groups than with those to the left of center. (Trillin, "Buffs," p.46)

* The barrage of books prompted the New York Times to comment in an editorial that “debate on the accuracy and adequacy of the Warren Commission’s work is now approaching the dimensions of a lively small industry in this country” (New York Times, September 1, 1966, p.34; “Playboy Interview: Mark Lane,” p.42).

* - Why the members of the conspiracy community so loathe the appellation buff and consider it as pejorative as they do is not clear, since it's not a new word that applies only to them. For many years before the assassination the word had been used, without a negative connotation, to describe a devotee or well-informed student of some subject, like a Civil War, opera, or trolley-car buff.

‡Garrison also had the nation's attention on New Orleans, nearly two out of three Americans telling a nationwide Harris Poll in late May 1967 that they were following the investigation. And Garrison was winning in the court of public opinion. In an earlier Harris Poll conducted in February, 44 percent thought there was a conspiracy, 35 percent thought Oswald acted alone, and 21 percent weren't sure. But the late-May poll, just three months into Garrison's probe, found 66 percent believing there was a conspiracy. Only 19 percent did not believe there was a conspiracy, and 15 percent didn't know. ("66% in Poll Accept Kennedy Plot View," New York Times, May 30, 1967, p.19)

* The 1980s didn't get off to a good start for the conspiracy theorists. British conspiracy author Michael Eddowes, convinced that an imposter was buried in Oswald's Fort Worth grave, actually succeeded in having the body exhumed on October 4, 1981, and examined by medical experts. The buffs had their fingers crossed but the body turned out to be Lee Harvey Oswald.

* Some of these neophytes have elbowed their mentors out of the way and have themselves become part of a new wave of Warren Commission critics presently comprising the dominant force in the conspiracy movement. They include theorist James Fetzer, who has wisely gathered the best technical minds in the conspiracy community to write scholarly scientific essays in books that he edits. Other members of the new wave include, but are not limited to, Walt Brown, Drs. Gary Aguilar and David Mantik, James DiEugenio, Vincent Palamara, and John Newman. One of the best examples of the old school working with the new is that of Josiah Thompson, one of the most respected Warren Commission critics ever, becoming a friend to and colleague of Aguilar's, who seems to be following Thompson's footsteps in terms of rigorous, high-quality research.

In this book I use the terms Warren Commission critic and conspiracy theorist somewhat interchangeably, not because they are linguistically so, but because in the context of the assassination they essentially are. One could certainly be a critic of the Warren Commission without being a conspiracy theorist, and some have been, in an article or column. But show me a critic of the Warren Commission down through the years who isn't also attached to one or more conspiracy theories or the general notion of conspiracy in the assassination. For the most part I use one or the other term for a person to describe what I perceive to be his or her primary interest—conspiracy, or being a critic of the Warren Commission's work.

*—Book One has already examined some allegations that, if true, spell conspiracy, such as that one or more of the shots came from the grassy knoll, and that the Zapruder film was altered. I made the decision to include them in Book One because they were an intrinsic and inseparable area of inquiry that more properly fit into the subject of discussion—for example, grassy knoll, to the murder of the president in Dealey Plaza; Zapruder alteration, to the Zapruder film.

* - Ray originally pleaded guilty to the murder of Martin Luther King, but at the time Lane was representing him in 1978 he had recanted his confession, denied his guilt, and declared he was an innocent victim of a large conspiracy. In defense of Ray, Lane alleged that the HSCA's investigators and their agents had suborned perjury, criminally received stolen property, and unlawfully tape-recorded telephone conversations, all to prevent Ray from receiving a fair hearing before the HSCA, which, along with Kennedy's murder, was reinvestigating the assassination of King. Lane added that the HSCA itself had engaged in conduct which was part of a "conspiracy" to prevent a fair investigation. (Anthony Marro, "Mark Lane Charges Panel Conspiracy," New York Times, August 8, 1978, p.A10)

* - With respect to the above four witnesses, conspiracy-leaning author Henry Hurt, who overall is not nearly as bad as Lane, doesn't mention their names either in his best-selling book, Reasonable Doubt, much less say they identified Oswald as being at or running from the Tippit murder scene with a revolver in his hand.

‡Some further examples, among many, of Lane's suggestion that the Warren Commission not only was completely unobjective about the facts of the assassination ("the Commission was biased toward its conclusion before the facts were known... The Commission worked from the a priori assumption that Oswald was on the sixth floor, was the assassin, and acted alone" [Lane, Rush to Judgment, p.71]), but actually attempted to frame Oswald: "[The Commission considered] only such testimony as did not endanger [its] case" "the symphony of conformity arranged by the most active Commission members, Warren, Dulles and Ford, their counsel Rankin, and their eager accomplices among the younger lawyers, David Belin and Arlen Specter" "In attempting to" prove that no shots came from the grassy knoll, the Warren Commission, in its report, "ignored and reshaped evidence" "evidence against [Oswald] was magnified, while that in his favor was depreciated, misrepresented or ignored" (Lane, Rush to Judgment, pp.193, xxxvi, 45, 378). In a related vein: "Thus, the Commission met its mandate to attempt to quell the many rumors about Jack Ruby, but it did so, apparently, by deliberately suppressing the truth" (Lane, Rush to Judgment, p.xiii).

* Although he couldn't represent Oswald's interests before the Commission, Lane continued to be retained by Marguerite, and he and she made several joint appearances together, including one at a New York City town hall meeting on February 18, 1964 (FBI memorandum from Mr. Branigan to Mr. Sullivan, March 13, 1964). Marguerite dismissed Lane as her attorney on April 1, 1964 (New York Times, April 2, 1964, p.37).

* Lane's "attorney-client" privilege and "working papers" arguments were legally indefensible. This is why, I am quite sure, he came up with a completely new legal argument in his book to shore up his legacy on this point; but his new story didn't hold water either. Lane wrote, "Had the Commission been motivated by an authentic desire to know the truth, surely it would have directed me to give the tape recording up. I was eager to furnish this evidence, but I was reluctant to break the law, for to make and divulge a recording of a telephone conversation may be a violation of the Federal Communications Act," and Lane said he feared being prosecuted (Lane, Rush to Judgment, pp.181–182). But number one, at the time the Warren Commission asked Lane for the tape, he had already disclosed its contents, and number two, if Lane knew enough about the law to quote the Federal Communications Act (47 USC § 605), then he almost assuredly also knew that under the act it is not prohibited and not a crime for a party to a telephonic communication to tape the conversation, even without the knowledge of the other party, and to furnish this tape and/or divulge its contents to a third party. Such a taping does not involve an "interception" of the telephone message, which would be prohibited by the act. (Rathbun v. United States, 355 U.S. 107, 110 [1957]; see also U.S. v. McGuire, 381 F.2d 306, 314 [1967])

* Lane claims he voluntarily decided to turn over his tape to the Warren Commission (“Playboy Interview: Mark Lane,” p.55).

* I debated Lane three times, the last time in San Francisco in the late 1980s or early 1990s at a California Trial Lawyers convention. Only the first debate, in Boston, was at night, with no limitation on time. The Long Island debate was during the noon recess at the college, as I recall, and there was a time limitation in San Francisco. At our first debate, when I confronted Lane with Jack Ruby's "there was no conspiracy" omission in his book, he had no answer at all. How could he? Neither did he have any answer for the fact that witnesses whose testimony clearly point to Oswald's guilt, such as Johnny Brewer and Officer McDonald, weren't even mentioned in his book. I was surprised at the poor quality of his presentation. It predictably consisted of one misrepresentation of the facts after another, and I had no difficulty exposing these misrepresentations to the audience. Lane, who is very intelligent, did better at the Long Island and San Francisco debates, where he increased the number of allegations and misrepresentations and I had insufficient time to respond to all of them.

* - If Ruby had been involved, as Lane suggests, in a conspiracy with Weissman to murder Kennedy, it is more than highly unlikely that, as we've seen is the case, Ruby would have called so much attention to Weissman and his anti-Kennedy advertisement on Friday and Saturday, November 22 and 23, 1963 (WR, p.369). But Lane has never been deterred by such commonsense observations.

* Jones became so obsessed with the assassination that his small, rundown farmhouse in the countryside near Waxahachie, Texas, overflowing with books on the assassination and with the obligatory movie projector to show visitors the Zapruder film, became the headquarters for his crusade to prove Kennedy was killed as a result of a conspiracy. Caught up in this passion, he neglected his newspaper and in the early 1980s began publishing a conspiracy newsletter, the Continuing Inquiry, for conspiracy buffs. Not infrequently, he would disappear from his newspaper duties for weeks at a time to chase down witnesses and track rumors. Once, he even crawled through a storm sewer beneath Elm Street to prove that Kennedy's assassin could have fired to Kennedy's front from a gutter opening on Elm. (Brad Bailey, "The Obsessed," Dallas Morning News, November 20, 1983, p.55)

"Penn Jones hated me," former Dallas assistant district attorney Bill Alexander told me with a chuckle. "He thought I was a member of the killing team that was doing away with Warren Commission witnesses" (Telephone interview of William Alexander by author on December 11, 2001). The diminutive (5-foot-2½-inch) Jones, who fought as an infantry officer at the battles of Salerno and Anzio in the Second World War, was almost assuredly motivated by patriotism in his assassination research. The only problem was that his beliefs were, to be generous, irrational.

* Kilgallen was best known for her daily newspaper column, “The Voice of Broadway,” and for starring on the popular television show What’s My Line?, which had a seventeen-year run on CBS.

* - Sam Ruby, one of Jack Ruby's brothers, told the Warren Commission that while Ruby was in custody, "his mental condition has deteriorated very rapidly. He keeps saying that people are being killed in the streets and he hears screams in the building of people being slaughtered" (14 H 501). Another brother, Earl, told the Commission, "As of now, he [Jack Ruby] don't even think I'm alive. He thinks they killed me and my family, my children" (14 H 428).

‡In his distinguished career as an investigative reporter, Aynesworth was nominated six other times for this prize and was a finalist five times. “I’m kind of the Susan Lucci of investigative journalism,” he chuckles. He was the only reporter to have been at all four major scenes of the assassination: in Dealey Plaza at the time of the shooting; the Tippit murder scene shortly after Tippit was killed; the Texas Theater when Oswald was arrested; and the police basement when Ruby shot Oswald. (Telephone interview of Hugh Aynesworth by author on January 11, 2000)

* - The first conspiracy theorist to raise the issue of impersonation was Léo Sauvage in an article in Commentary in the spring of 1964. The Warren Commission treated all of the unlikely or impossible Oswald sightings as either cases of mistaken identity or deliberate falsehoods.

* On November 23, 1959, Mosby, from Paris, wrote a condensed version of the long interview that was sent out over the wires to hundreds of newspapers throughout the land, and apparently a few (e.g., New York World Telegram, November 24, 1959, p.9) erroneously typed up “North Dakota” instead of “New Orleans,” furnishing fuel for the Stanley, North Dakota, myth. Oswald’s brother Robert informed the FBI his brother Lee had never lived in North Dakota. (FBI Record 124-10010-10361, Letter from J. Edgar Hoover to SACS Phoenix, Dallas, Minneapolis, December 20, 1963)

*- Unless, as some theorists believe, the impersonator was also the actual killer of Kennedy, in which case the conspirators would have had an even more implausible task to meet: find someone who not only looked almost exactly like Oswald but also was willing to kill the president for them.

* Before he recanted his story, the thoroughly discredited Deslatte had come up with an unnumbered (making its validity impossible to check) price quote sheet dated January 20, 1961, with the name "Oswald" written on it by him in the upper right corner. Each Ford truck, if sold, would sell for $2,088.32. Interestingly, Friends of Democratic Cuba Inc. was an anti-Castro group incorporated in New Orleans on January 6, 1961, whose board of directors included the right-wing Guy Banister (see later text for discussion on Banister) and whose vice president was one Gerard F. Tujague, the owner of a New Orleans shipping company whom Oswald worked for as a messenger boy between November 10, 1955, and January 14, 1956, when he was sixteen. Tujague knew and remembered Oswald (10 HSCA 134, note 64; CE 2227, 25 H 128), so if the group, for whatever reason, wanted its purchaser of the trucks to use a fictitious name, Oswald is a name that was not unfamiliar to at least one member of the group.

* - The Austin Selective Service files listed fifteen Oswalds in the state of Texas.

‡The only possible exception doesn't quite rise to the dignity of an Oswald sighting. Mrs. Lovell T. Penn, who lived with her husband on a farm near Dallas, Texas, told the FBI on December 2, 1963, that on October 6, 1963, she saw three men in her cow pasture. One had a rifle and was firing it. When she threatened to call the police, they left. Although she took down the license plate number on their car, she threw it away. She made no reference to Lee Harvey Oswald being one of the three men. Two days later the FBI interviewed her again and this time she said the man with the rifle "might have been Oswald." (CE 2944, 26 H 406; CE 2449, 25 H 588) Penn located one spent shell, a Mannlicher-Carcano cartridge case, that the man with the rifle had fired, but after tests the FBI concluded it could not have been fired from Oswald's Carcano because of "differences in firing pin and breech face marks" (CD 205, p.182).

* Ryder's credibility was weak enough without author Gerald Posner distorting Ryder's statement and testimony. In Case Closed, Posner dismisses Ryder's tale, writing that "subsequent investigation found that...the gun store tag was in [Ryder's] handwriting, not in Oswald's" (Posner, Case Closed, p.214 footnote), implying that Ryder attempted to lead authorities to believe that the handwriting was Oswald's. But Ryder, in his very first interview with the FBI on November 25, acknowledged he had written the name "Oswald" on the tag (CE 1325, 22 H 523, FBI interview of Dial D. Ryder on November 25, 1963). Worse, Posner goes on to say that Ryder "refused to take a polygraph" (Posner, Case Closed, p.214 note). The opposite is true. The only polygraph issue that arose was limited to whether Ryder had or had not given the details of his story to a Dallas Times reporter, which Ryder denied. The reporter offered to take a polygraph test and Ryder testified that "I'm not one to volunteer for anything, [but] I'll take the thing if you want me to take it" (11 H 238).

* Payroll records at the Book Depository Building show that Oswald worked continuously at the Depository from October 16 up to the time of the assassination, working full eight-hour days (8:00 a.m. to 4:45 p.m., with lunch from 12:00 to 12:45 p.m.) Monday through Friday, not missing one day of work. (The payroll records erroneously credited Oswald with a full day's work on November 22, 1963. In view of what happened at the Depository that day, this type of error is more than understandable.) Conspiracy theorists have made much of the fact that since the Depository employees did not punch a time clock, there's no way to know if Oswald was absent from work for a few hours here and there. But this ignores the fact that Book Depository Building supervisors kept fairly close tabs on their employees, making "a notation" if the employee was present at the start of the workday and another notation if he was still at work at the end of the day. Further, the supervisors reported to the payroll department any absence during the day for a period longer than that authorized (such as for lunch), and the time was deducted from the employee's pay. (CE 1334, 22 H 537; CE 2454, 25 H 601-602) No evidence has ever emerged from anyone at the Book Depository Building that Oswald was absent from work at any time during the period between October 16 and November 22, 1963.

* As we have seen, the Irving Sports Shop impersonation and furniture store sighting of Oswald simply “don’t go anywhere.” Yet conspiracy theorists predictably aren’t cognizant of this fact. For instance, conspiracy theorist Michael Kurtz, who believes it was the real Oswald at both places, condemns the Warren Commission for not accepting the stories of Ryder and the two middle-aged women, saying this was a “rejection of evidence” (Kurtz, Crime of the Century, pp.147–148). But Kurtz doesn’t bother to ask the obvious question, “evidence of what?” Even if it were Oswald at both places, what would this prove?

* It should be noted that contrary to popular belief, a polygraph does not show whether or not one is telling the truth, only whether he believes he is; that is, the test, if it is accurate (which law enforcement feels it normally is when administered by a competent operator), measures the presence or absence of deception from the physiological response (breathing, pulse, perspiration, etc.) to the questions. Sociopaths (those who have no conscience or feeling of guilt or contrition for what they have done) often are able to lie on the test without the lie being betrayed by a physiological response.

* - Marina told the FBI that her husband never told her he had seen or spoken to anyone about buying a car (CE 1403, 22 H 780, FBI interview of Marina Oswald on December 16, 1963). But since Oswald was notoriously secretive about everything in his life, not too much weight can be given to this.

* Unless—and this is a real possibility that the conspiracy theorists should start writing books about—there was a group of conspirators out to frame the conspirators who were framing Oswald.

* Two of the aforementioned witnesses said that “Oswald” came to the range with a companion, one saying the companion was around five feet nine inches (10 H 393, WCT Sterling Charles Wood), and the other saying he was a “tall boy” (10 H 381, WCT Garland Glenwill Slack). Several witnesses noted a bearded man at the range and one witness thought the man and Oswald were together, but the bearded man (one Michael Murph) was located by the FBI and found to have no connection to Oswald (CE 2897–2898, 26 H 350–351).

* Per Tippit's wife, Tippit voted for Kennedy in the 1960 election, and those who knew him said he seemed to have no interest in politics (CE 2985, 26 H 486–488).

‡The above discussion would be academic if Oswald, as some believe, had been walking west on Tenth Street before the Tippit confrontation, and changed his direction, possibly when he spotted Tippit's police car driving eastbound on Tenth toward him. (See discussion in endnote section.) If, indeed, Oswald's original direction was westbound on Tenth, the Redbird Airport, as well as Ruby's apartment at 223 South Ewing Street, both of which were to the east of Tenth and Patton (Walker's home, at 4011 Turtle Creek Boulevard, was to the northeast), would be eliminated as Oswald's intended destination.

‡ As discussed in detail in the Oswald biography, Oswald was living in New Orleans throughout the months of July and August and most of September in 1963.

* In his book Live by the Sword, Russo quotes FBI agent Jim Hosty telling him in 1994 that the FBI investigation revealed there was a plane revving up at Redbird (Russo doesn't mention a time for this) that took off around 3:00 p.m. Hosty told Russo, "We ran [the investigation] out but it got nowhere." And the air traffic controller at Redbird, Louis Gaudin, told Russo about three well-dressed people flying out of Redbird in a Comanche-type aircraft somewhere between 2:30 and 3:00 p.m. on the afternoon of the assassination, returning forty minutes later with only two occupants, and being met by a part-time employee at the airport who was moonlighting (in the afternoon?) from the Dallas Police Department. (Russo, Live by the Sword, pp. 308–309) Gaudin told the FBI on March 7, 1963, that the plane took off between 2:00 and 2:30 p.m. (Smith, JFK: The Second Plot, p.279). But I thought the assassination happened at 12:30 p.m. on November 22, 1963. A plane departing a full two to two and a half hours later wouldn't be that suspicious, would it? I also thought that Redbird Airport was a functioning municipal airport in November of 1963 and actually had planes departing and landing all the time. When they did, under what theory is this suspicious or unusual?

* - Oswald's autopsy report gave his height as five feet nine inches (CE 1981, 24 H 7).

* - One advantage of being a conspiracy theorist is you don't need any evidence to support your charge. Theories and speculations will do. Eddowes said, "My theory [nothing else, folks, just a theory, no evidence] is that...the KGB had substituted a forged print card in the FBI fingerprint files [which contained Oswald's Marine Corps prints], the forgery substituting the imposter's prints in place of [Oswald's]" (Eddowes, Oswald File, p.139).

* Fifteen people witnessed the examination, including the four team members, four doctors who assisted them, three lawyers and their assistants, and a court reporter (Dallas Morning News, October 5, 1981).

* We know that people observing the same person or event can almost be expected to give different descriptions. Here, although Duran recalled the American at the consulate to have light blond hair, Azcue recalled the very same man to have dark blond hair (3 HSCA 136). Oswald himself described his hair color as “medium brown” (WR, p.614). As to Duran’s description of Oswald as being around five feet six inches and 125 pounds, Oswald’s autopsy report, as previously indicated, reads he was five feet nine inches. His “estimated weight” was 150. (CE 1981, 24 H 7) The estimation of weight seems high. At the time of his interrogation following the assassination Oswald himself gave his weight as 140 pounds (WR, p.614). Virtually every photo of Oswald shows him to be of slight frame. See photo section for a picture of the slender Oswald taken in front of the New Orleans Trade Mart in August 1963, the month before he went to Mexico City. Marina felt he looked like a “skeleton” during this period (McMillan, Marina and Lee, p.460). Alfredo Mirabal Diaz, a Mexican consulate employee, recalled Oswald as being “a rather small man, medium height or somewhat less, narrow shoulders” (3 HSCA 177).

* - Consistent with the confusion and errors Hoover, and many others, made in the immediate wake of the assassination, in a 1:48 p.m. memo to his staff on the afternoon of the assassination, Hoover wrote, “The President and the Governor were shot at the corner of Elm and Commerce Streets” and that he had been told “the shots came from the fourth floor” of the Book Depository Building (FBI Record 124-10012-10169); in a 2:21 p.m. memo to his staff he said that he advised James W. Rowley, chief of the Secret Service, “that one of the Secret Service agents reportedly had been killed, and [Rowley] stated he did not know this” (FBI Record 124-10012-10167); in a 4:01 p.m. memo to his staff he relayed that after Oswald left the Book Depository Building he “ran into two police officers...a block or two away...and thinking they were going to arrest him, shot at them and killed one of them with a sidearm” (FBI Record 124-10012-10170).

* Mexico City, at the time, “had the most comprehensive, extensive telephone tap facilities...of any [CIA] station in the world,” said John Scelso, chief of the WH (Western Hemisphere) 3 branch of clandestine operations at CIA headquarters to whom the CIA station in Mexico City reported. There was only one problem, he said. “They had far more material to deal with than they could possibly handle...like ten times.” (HSCA Record 180-10131-10330, Testimony of John Scelso before HSCA on May 16, 1978, pp.4, 17, 58)

‡ Most of the trial preparation I did with my witnesses, who were living around the country (Phillips in Bethesda, Maryland), was by written correspondence and over the telephone from my home in Los Angeles, although once we all got to London, I interviewed each of them again in person before the trial started.

* At the London trial, although I was able to impeach Lopez's credibility as a witness by other means, I didn't have his own report to the HSCA, since, as indicated, it wasn't released to the public until 1996, ten years after the trial. So when Lopez testified on direct examination by Gerry Spence that he had concluded that Oswald "had not" been to the Cuban consulate and Russian embassy in Mexico City and agreed with Spence's assertion "that there must have been an imposter there," I didn't have Lopez's own report to refute his testimony. However, I did have the conclusion of his employer, the HSCA (HSCA Report, pp.251–252), that it was the real Lee Harvey Oswald at the Cuban consulate and Russian embassy in Mexico City, which I introduced to the jury on cross-examination of Lopez. (Transcript of On Trial, July 25, 1986, pp.877, 894)

* On cross-examination of Lopez at the London trial, I brought out that he was a young law student without one day of law enforcement investigative experience when he was hired by HSCA chief counsel Robert Blakey, a law professor at Cornell University who met Lopez while the latter was attending law school there. The CIA submitted a formal complaint to the HSCA about Lopez showing up at CIA headquarters in shorts and jeans, and Lopez changed his attire thereafter. Knowing Lopez was a very shaky witness, I deliberately gave him free reign to self-destruct on the witness stand in front of the jury's eyes, and he gladly obliged. Lopez told the jury he had his own opinion of who actually killed Kennedy and it wasn't Oswald. "Just for the record," I asked him, "could we have this chap's name?" Lopez answered, "No, because I [am] under a secrecy oath [at the HSCA] never to disclose that name." Unbelievably, Lopez, an otherwise pleasant and intelligent young man, said he and his colleagues at the HSCA received information from "a reliable source" that there was an actual photograph of this person shooting at Kennedy, but they weren't able to get the photograph, and the FBI and CIA wouldn't let him and his colleagues question Kennedy's killer. I said, "You told me [in a pretrial interview] that this fellow was an agent for Castro, the CIA, and the FBI, but none of them knew this, is that correct?" "They probably know it by now, but they didn't know it back then." "So you're a twenty-one-year-old kid out of Cornell, and the CIA, the FBI and Castro are using this guy and they don't know he is an agent for all three of them, but Edwin Lopez knows?" When Lopez said yes and offered to tell why, I had run out of my allotted time on cross-examination, so I suggested he tell his lawyer, Mr. Spence, on redirect. But Spence, wanting to get Lopez off the stand as quickly as possible before he embarrassed and hurt the defense more than he already had, elected not to ask one single question of Lopez on redirect. (Transcript of On Trial, July 25, 1986, pp.892, 897, 903, 916-919)

This is but another example of what happened when conspiracy icons in the Kennedy assassination like Lopez, who had never been cross-examined on the case, were subjected to cross-examination at the London trial. Some of the icons, like Jean Hill (who wanted to testify for the defense very badly at the London trial) and Delphine Roberts, were so pathetically bad that the defense in London decided to not call them to the witness stand, period. By the way, I defy anyone to come up with any witness I called to the stand for the prosecution at the London trial who was made to look ridiculous or noncredible on cross-examination. Since none were either of these, I don't believe you will be able to.

* The CIA moved its headquarters from downtown Washington, D.C., to Langley, Virginia, on September 20, 1961, although John McCone, the first CIA director to occupy Langley headquarters, didn't move in until November 29, 1961. However, the CIA, in testimony by its agents and in other ways, has continued to refer to its headquarters as being in "Washington," Langley-assigned agents even saying they are stationed in "Washington." In fact, to this very day, the mailing address for CIA headquarters is "Washington, D.C., 20505."

‡Phillips told me (as he said in his book) that the CIA case officer at the Mexico City station who was in charge of Soviet operations (he couldn't recall his last name, but said his first name was Craig) was the first person at the station who became aware of Oswald seeking to go to Russia ostensibly by way of Cuba. Craig, Phillips said, should have routinely cabled CIA headquarters in Washington asking for a file check on Oswald.

* Per a CIA memorandum, three photos of the unknown American male were taken by CIA cameras in front of the Soviet embassy around “12:17 hours” (12:17 p.m.) on October 1, 1963; five photos of him, in the same location, around “11:32 hours” on October 4, 1963; and two photos of the same male in front of the Cuban embassy on October 15, 1963. The CIA turned over all ten photographs to the FBI in Mexico City on the afternoon of the assassination. According to the CIA, “CIA did not have a known photograph of Oswald in its files before the assassination of President Kennedy either in Washington or abroad.” (CIA Document 1993.6.29.13:15:59:560410, pp.2–4, Undated draft of CIA memorandum re: Garrison Allegations Re CIA Photograph in Warren Commission Report—The Facts, JFK box OSW17, vol.5, folder IV, National Archives)

‡Garrison and others believe the CIA was behind the assassination and that Oswald was working for the agency as a member of U.S. intelligence, yet it framed him for the assassination as its patsy. But there's a problem with this. If Oswald was actually working for the CIA, why would it bother to send an Oswald imposter to the Cuban consulate and Russian embassy to make Oswald look like a leftist or Marxist in league with the Cubans and Russians just prior to the assassination? Instead of sending an imposter to Mexico City to set Oswald up for the assassination, why not send Oswald himself to these places? But if, for whatever reason, the CIA wanted to send an Oswald impersonator, obviously it would have to send someone who looks very much like Oswald, right? Since the photos that the CIA took of its Oswald impersonator (the one it supposedly used to help frame Oswald) clearly show that he bears no resemblance to Oswald, wouldn't this only serve to defeat the CIA's whole impersonation, frame-up scheme?

* - Elvis sightings have been reported in forty out of the fifty states. For instance, he's been seen, since his death, on a parachute ride at a carnival in Denton, Texas; ordering food at a Burger King in Philadelphia; living in a secluded cabin in Orlando, Florida; listening to a rock band in a bar in Riverhead, New York; in a hotel lounge in Atlanta, Georgia; in a 1969 Plymouth with Colorado tags in Tennessee; and at a laundromat in East Lansing, Michigan. Author Gail Brewer-Giorgio compiled all the evidence of Elvis still being alive in her 1988 book Elvis Alive, which remarkably got up to number eight on the New York Times best-seller list. With all these sightings, many Elvis fans are all shook up, believing the King of Rock and Roll is still among us. Following Brewer-Giorgio's August 6, 1988, appearance on Fox TV's Late Show, viewers were asked to call in and vote whether Elvis was alive or dead. Of 30,000 calls, more than 25,000, or 84 percent, believed Elvis was not dead. (Karen Ridgeway, "Fans Say Elvis Is Popping Up All Over," USA Today, August 16, 1988)

* “I never got married,” Lifton told a reporter in 1993, because “there always came a point when the woman realized I was more interested in the president’s body than in her body” (Solomon, “True Disbelievers,” p.96).

* At the beginning of Lifton's immersion in the Kennedy assassination and before he started to write his book focusing on the alteration of the wounds, he had an equally grand theory: that the grassy knoll assassins installed an artificial tree on the knoll prior to the assassination, and camouflaged snipers fired at the president from it. Lifton then magnified, up to twenty times, photos of the trees and shrubbery on the knoll. In the greenery, he saw "several forms which he [interpreted] as assassins firing at the motorcade. One of them looks as if he is wearing a Kaiser Wilhelm helmet. Others wear electronic headsets and man periscopes and machine guns on a platform operated by hydraulic lifts. One of his imagined finds resembles General Douglas MacArthur" (Lewis, Scavengers and Critics of the Warren Report, pp.145–146). From this auspicious beginning, Lifton launched into his theory and a book that is paradoxically scholarly yet ridiculous.

* - As author Jim Moore very logically surmises, Humes was most likely “unprepared for the massive head wound Kennedy had suffered” (Moore, Conspiracy of One, p.97 footnote). Most people would have been. Therefore, a spontaneous, incorrect assessment is understandable.

‡Dr. Michael Baden told me that “since we know what incisions were made to the president’s body at Parkland and by the autopsy surgeons, the photographs and X-rays taken at the time of the autopsy clearly show that no additional incisions were made anywhere on his body after it left Parkland and prior to the autopsy at Bethesda. That’s flat and categorical.” Baden added that his forensic pathology panel’s interviews with the Parkland doctors and autopsy surgeons helped to corroborate this conclusion by his panel. (Telephone interview of Michael Baden by author on January 8, 2000)

* - Lifton asserts in his book that “it would hardly be possible to implement” the scenario he describes “without the involvement of some Secret Service personnel.” He doesn’t even speculate why Secret Service agents, who are trained to literally “take a bullet” to save a president’s life, would want to be part of a conspiracy to murder him. Was anyone else involved? Lifton says a “sophisticated appraisal of the evidence must force one to the conclusion that there was a plot involving the executive branch of the government...Some government officials must have been recruited into the plot.” (Lifton, Best Evidence, p.697) Since the president heads up the executive branch, apparently some of Kennedy’s own underlings decided to murder him. Lifton doesn’t say who these people are or why they’d want to murder their chief.

‡Gerald Posner, in his book Case Closed, writes that the president's casket "had an air-lock mechanism that, when turned, hermetically sealed the lid on the casket. It was sealed at Parkland. Aboard Air Force One it had been strapped to the floor. To get the body out, the conspirators would have had to unstrap the coffin and unscrew the lock, allowing the unit to unseal itself. After removing the President's body, something of similar weight would likely have to be placed inside, so people handling the casket would not notice it was too light. Finally, the casket would have to be resealed and strapped back into its original position" (Posner, Case Closed, p.298). The reason I have footnoted the above is that Posner gave no citation as a source for this. Though there was a device on the bottom of the casket that "automatically pins a coffin to the floor of a modern hearse," and "there was a catch which released the lock," this device may have been damaged and become inoperable after JFK's aides, who "didn't see it," forcibly removed the casket from the hearse when they lifted it onto Air Force One at Love Field (Manchester, Death of a President, p.308).

* - When did Air Force One land at Andrews Air Force Base? Although Lifton was very meticulous in trying to nail down every detail to the *n*th degree, he was uncharacteristically imprecise (particularly since time is of the essence in his madcap scenario) when it came to answering this question. Indeed, on page 681 of his book he quotes one Secret Service agent as saying the plane landed with the body at Andrews at 6:05 p.m., but later on the same page, and without quoting a source, he has the plane landing moments before 6:00 p.m. and the body arriving at Walter Reed hospital for alterations, thirteen miles away, at 6:05 p.m. On page 690 he quotes Marie Fehmer, Lyndon Johnson's personal secretary, as noting on a piece of paper that the plane landed at 5:58 p.m. The latter time is the same time that a different Secret Service agent had the plane landing. (CE 1024, 18 H 757) UPI's Merriman Smith, on the flight, records the plane landing at 5:59 p.m. EST (United Press International, Four Days, p.33).

* On November 26, 1963, J. H. Stover Jr., commanding officer at the U.S. Naval Medical School, sent a letter to all interested parties that “you are reminded that you are under verbal orders of the Surgeon General, United States Navy, to discuss with no one events connected with your official duties on the evening of 22 November–23 November 1963. This letter constitutes official notification and reiteration of these verbal orders. You are warned that infraction of these orders makes you liable to Court Martial proceedings under appropriate articles of the Uniform Code of Military Justice.” This order of silence was lifted for the HSCA inquiry by Secretary of Defense Harold Brown in 1978.

‡ This is not quite the type of situation where a follow-up question can be, “How would they know to ask you this if you didn’t tell them what you knew?” because a considerable number of other people were present at the autopsy, and a witness like O’Connor could say, “I assumed they already knew since many other people saw the same thing.”

* I am here to report that years later I came into possession of another HSCA document containing an interview of O'Connor conducted by HSCA investigators at an earlier time, August 25, 1977, in which O'Connor did tell them that there was "nothing left in the [president's] cranium but splattered brain matter" (HSCA Record 180-10107-10448, p.2). O'Connor, in London, had apparently forgotten he had told HSCA investigators this earlier and hence did not correct me during my cross-examination of him. Though my misleading cross-examination of him in London was unintentional on my part—only being in possession of his 1978 interview—I owe him an apology, which I am herein giving. But the point also has to be made that he did not reiterate (as he might be expected to do about such an incredible discovery [no brain] that meant so much to him) his observation when he was interviewed in 1978. Even before acquiring the 1977 interview, my overall sense of O'Connor is that his unquestioned error about the president's brain being gone was more the result of confusion than duplicity on his part. His recollection of what took place on the night of the autopsy is very poor, to say the least. Just one more example: in the aforementioned 1978 interview he told the investigators that the autopsy surgeons had not done "a Y incision," but we know they did (CE 387, 16 H 982).

*- I can see bloody sheets being peeled off the president's body, but how do you peel off a body bag?

* Ruby probably had less than four minutes to get to the police basement. The time clock that stamped the money order and receipt rotated on a minute-to-minute basis. (13 H 224, WCT Doyle E. Lane) So the actual time the transaction was completed would have been somewhere between 11:17:00 and 11:17:59.

* A Dallas police detective, C. N. Dhority, testified before the Warren Commission that during the Sunday-morning interrogation session of Oswald, “I don’t think Mr. Holmes talked to him too much” (7 H 155). Dhority may be correct only in the sense that the interrogation covered a whole range of issues and matters, and Holmes probably only participated in the portion of it dealing with Oswald’s post office boxes. But as to the latter, not only do we have Holmes’s testimony that he asked the many questions dealing with the post office boxes, and not only would he be the one to naturally ask those questions, not anyone else, but also Captain Fritz testified, “Mr. Holmes did most of the talking to him [Oswald] about the boxes” (4 H 229).

* - Author Gerald Posner makes the good observation that if there was such a conspiracy, and the morning's events before the shooting were only contrived to "provide Ruby" with the "defense" at his trial that his murder of Oswald wasn't premeditated (which would actually protect the conspirators more than Ruby, since lack of premeditation would only save Ruby from a sentence of death, not a conviction of murder, whereas lack of premeditation would mean Ruby hadn't conspired with anyone, conspiracy necessarily involving premeditation), the conspiracy would include "Karen Carlin, whose plea for money took [Ruby] to the Western Union office..., George Senator, for confirming the Carlin story..., postal inspector Harry Holmes, for delaying the transfer with his questions, police chief Curry and Captain Fritz, for selecting the basement..., Lt. Rio Pierce, for driving his car up the ramp a minute before Oswald was taken from the jail; and Officer Vaughn, for turning his back when Ruby walked down the ramp" (Posner, Case Closed, p.397 footnote).

* As indicated earlier in the book, Ruby's affection for the police was not one-sided. Although many of his police friends and acquaintances tried to disassociate themselves from him once he shot Oswald (9 HSCA 1120 note 49), there can be no question about the relatively close relationship Ruby had with Dallas law enforcement. In fact, the gun that Ruby used to kill Oswald, a .38 Colt Cobra, was registered to a friend of his, Dallas police detective Joe Cody! Rather than buying a wall safe at his club, which Cody told him would cost, with wiring, a couple of thousand dollars, Ruby took Cody's suggestion to "just get a pistol" as protection for when he carried the day's receipts home with him. About a year or so before the assassination, Cody and Ruby went to a hardware store in West Dallas that sold guns (Ray Brantley's hardware store), and to save Ruby the eight or nine dollars in sales tax, a tax police didn't have to pay when they bought guns in Texas at the time, Cody paid the $62.50 purchase price himself and Ruby reimbursed him. After Cody heard the announcement that Ruby had shot Oswald, he said, "It all hit me that Jack Ruby was a friend of mine and that I had bought that pistol for him, and the pistol was in my name." (Sneed, No More Silence, pp.470-471)

* The Rubensteins were almost as nomadic as the Oswalds, though, unlike the Oswalds, the changes of address were always to another place in the same city, Chicago. Between 1911, when Jack was born, and 1933, a period of just twenty-two years, the Rubenstein family had moved ten times (CE 1185, 22 H 304).

‡All the books on Ruby say he grew up in Chicago's "west side," and those who grew up with him in Chicago told the FBI that Ruby "grew up in the neighborhood of the west side" (CE 1266, 22 H 371). Ruby himself said he was born on the west side of Chicago and grew up there (Hall [C. Ray] Exhibit No. 1, 20 H 37). Yet, his brother Earl told the Warren Commission that the Rubenstein family grew up in "what is known as the east side of Chicago" (14 H 366). Richard Lindberg, a Chicago author and historian who has written eleven books on Chicago's crime and history, says that Ruby's brother, who had long since moved out of Chicago, "spoke loosely and his words should not be interpreted literally. Ruby grew up in Chicago's 'near west side,' the word near meaning close to the downtown Chicago area. Back then, and for years, Chicago had no east side. If the term was used at all, it referred, jokingly, to Lake Michigan. The term east side was coined in the 1980s by real estate people who created a little development near the Gold Coast, the affluent lakefront area of Chicago." Lindberg did allow that the Maxwell Street area was on the "eastern side of Chicago's near west side," the dividing line between the west side and the commercial development area of Chicago's downtown area being Halsted Street. (Telephone interview of Richard Lindberg by author on February 11, 2005)

* Joseph lived away from home for fifteen years, part of the time with another woman, before returning. Since he worked very sporadically and since Fannie only did crocheting for some shops for a limited period, Jack and his siblings, for the most part, had to support their parents with money they earned from whatever jobs they could get, and Joseph having a separate apartment increased the burden, causing them to ask him to move back home in 1936, which he did. (CE 1281, 22 H 392; CE 1281, 22 H 407) Even when Ruby was in the military, he arranged for a deduction from his pay to be sent to his parents (CE 1706, 23 H 185).

* The prophet Mohammed said, “Tell me you can move a mountain, but don’t tell me that people change.” As we’ve seen earlier in this book, Jack Ruby, the Chicago street hustler, was selling “twistboards” around the time he murdered Lee Harvey Oswald some forty years later.

‡A boyhood friend of Jack's whom he idolized, Barney Ross, was so good with his fists that he became the welterweight champion of the world in the late 1930s, by all accounts one of the greatest Jewish fighters in boxing history (15 H 21, WCT Hyman Rubenstein).

‡ Ruby hung around with hustlers because that's what he was. When the FBI, days after the assassination, interviewed a series of old friends of Ruby's from his Chicago days, the words that kept coming up to describe him were "hustler" and "ticket scalper," but never "criminal" (FBI Record 124-10070-10295, November 26, 1963, pp.1-2, 4, 6).

* A boyhood friend of Jack's remembers the incident more clearly. Jack, he said, was probably around fifteen at the time, and was struck hard on the head by a policeman who caught Jack trying to sneak into one of the most famous fights in boxing history, the "long count" heavyweight championship fight in 1927 at Chicago's Soldier Field between Jack Dempsey and Gene Tunney. In the seventh round, Dempsey knocked Tunney down but didn't immediately go to a neutral corner, as required. The referee didn't start counting until four or five seconds later, which, some claim, gave Tunney time to recuperate. (Others say that if the count had started when it should have, Tunney would have simply gotten up earlier.) Tunney went on to win in a unanimous ten-round decision. And Ruby went on, his friend seems to recall, to having a metal plate installed in his head because of the severe injury. (CE 1191, 22 H 311)

* That mental illness ran in the Ruby family is clear. Jack himself, we all know, had considerable mental and emotional problems. His brother Earl said that Jack received psychiatric help when he was ten (14 H 414–415, WCT Earl Ruby), though this has never been confirmed. Earl himself was hospitalized in August of 1960 harboring thoughts of self-destruction by sleeping pills, gun, or asphyxiation (FBI Record 124-10062-10290, January 13, 1964, p.1).

* Jack's sister Eileen often felt that Jack was her mother's favorite child (15 H 278 WCT Eileen Kaminsky; see also 14 H 120, WCT Alice Reaves Nichols).

When Jack's father died many years later, while Jack was living in Dallas, Jack, not a devout Orthodox Jew, and accustomed to attending synagogue services only on high holidays, attended the synagogue twice daily for eleven months (CE 1183, 22 H 296, Interview of Rabbi Hillel Silverman by Warren Commission staff member Murray J. Laulicht on July 20, 1964).

* The Damon Runyon allusion was an apropos one. Runyon, the legendary Broadway reporter and writer, captured in his short stories the era between the 1930s and the 1950s. His stories were populated by smalltime crooks, broads, hustlers, and cops on the beat operating in a street world of neon lights, burlesque joints, racetracks, and boxing clubs. Some of these stories were adapted to Broadway and the movies (e.g., Guys and Dolls), and one might say that Runyon had been writing the story of Ruby's life right up to the moment Jack fired the shot that forever plucked him out of that world.

* - The Carousel was one of three burlesque houses in downtown Dallas, the other two being the Theatre Lounge and the Colony Club (13 H 319, WCT Andrew Armstrong Jr.; 15 H 212, WCT Thomas Stewart Palmer).

* Everyone agreed that Ruby was, as former Dallas assistant district attorney Bill Alexander said, “a publicity seeker.” As an example, Alexander said, “When they had boxing matches at the city auditorium, Jack would come in after the preliminary, just before the main event, and while the house lights were on, he’d walk down the aisles greeting everybody and inviting them to the club that night. He made sure that everybody saw that he was seated ringside.” (Sneed, No More Silence, pp.549–550)

* The items found in Jack Ruby's white, two-door, 1960 Oldsmobile, with Texas license plate number PD-768, after it was impounded on November 24, 1963, following his shooting of Oswald, were listed in great detail in eighteen pages of an FBI report. Reading through the items found in the glove compartment, trunk, and interior of his car conjures up visions of a homeless person's car overflowing with all of his life's belongings. It is comical, and inevitably sad. To give the reader an idea of what was contained in Ruby's rolling, low-brow thrift shop, the following incomplete list is offered: numerous business cards, notebooks, unpaid traffic tickets, newspapers and clippings, paint bucket and paddle, bars of soap, pistol holder, adding machine, dog muzzle, phonograph records, door threshold molding, old telegrams, yellow legal pads, income tax book, three American Express traveler's checks, transcript of a radio show, a paper sack containing $837.50, box of razor blades, staples, blanket, bathing cap, umbrella, roll of toilet paper, receipts, golf shoes, several golf balls, jar of Coffee-Mate, jar of dietary food, two spotlight lenses, several "Twist Waist Exercisers," bail bond cards, a suit and pair of slacks, sport coat, empty wallet, several Dallas Morning News newspapers, extension cord, four photographs (including one of the "Impeach Earl Warren" signs), partially filled can of varnish stain, chrome fender molding strip, maps, rubber tips for chair legs, microphone, blank bank drafts, book of stamps, bottle of deodorant, one pair of ladies' gloves, car insurance policy, two beer-can openers, twelve cigarette butts, two packets of tooth space cleaners, leather belt, pair of horn-rimmed glasses, two tie clasps, two pairs of aluminum knuckles, various items of advertising, a wristwatch, address book, magazines, box of hardware, box of stationery, box of handkerchiefs, gooney bird in plastic bag, forty-two permanent pass cards to the Carousel to be laminated, another seventeen permanent pass cards, numerous scraps of paper with writing on them, and much more, including a carton of several hundred glossy 8 × 10 photos of exotic dancer Jada. And even with all this, there was still room in his trunk for the spare tire and jack! (CE 1322, 22 H 501–514; see also CE 2417, 25 H 518–520)

* The twistboard was the latest gadget Jack was selling, and he was very serious about it. His roommate, George Senator, said that in the last few weeks before the assassination, Ruby had been getting up many mornings at eight or nine o'clock, earlier than normal, to visit department stores in Dallas in an effort to promote the board (CD 106, p.89, FBI interview of George Senator on December 19, 1963). Just, of course, what you would expect a big mob hit man to be doing in the weeks and days leading up to the biggest day of his mob career, when he would be "silencing" Oswald for them.

* - One big reason Ruby had for cozying up to the police over and above any fondness for them (one member of law enforcement thought it was the reason) was to protect perhaps his most valuable asset, his liquor license, commonly referred to as the “beer license” because beer was by far the main alcoholic beverage sold at the Carousel (which also, as noted earlier, sold champagne) and other clubs in Dallas. The beer license had to be renewed every year, and the Dallas Police Department was one of five agencies (it would seem the most important one) that recommended whether the license should be approved or disapproved. (Sneed, No More Silence, pp.540–541)

* Although Ruby never maintained to anyone that he had gotten away with anything because of his association with the Dallas Police Department, an acquaintance of Ruby's did tell the FBI that "he did not personally like Ruby as Ruby always attempted to be the big shot and boasted not only to him but to other people in his presence that he could do anything he wanted in Dallas as he had enough information on the Police Department and judges that he could not be convicted" (CE 1746, 23 H 354, FBI interview of Walter Clewis on November 27, 1963). This is pure braggadocio, of course. Whatever Ruby may have learned about the private peccadillos of some officers or judges could never compromise and immobilize the entire Dallas Police Department and Dallas judiciary.

* Though Jack Ruby was no more of a mobster than you or I, he liked to intimate that he had contacts with underworld figures. “Jack would like to put on a facade that he was connected,” said former Dallas police sergeant Patrick Dean, who was friendly with Ruby (HSCA Record 180-10073-10050, November 15, 1977, p.19). At least one Ruby acquaintance, Irvin Charles Mazzei, the regional director for the American Guild of Variety Artists, said that on one occasion Ruby actually told him he was connected with the “Syndicate” in Chicago and used to work for it. But Ruby, at the time, was trying hard to get Mazzei to stop Ruby’s nightclub competition, Abe and Barney Weinstein, from using amateurs as strippers at their club (see later discussion), and Mazzei felt that Ruby was always trying to impress him, Ruby also showing Mazzei a gun he carried in his belt and an honorary Dallas Police Department membership card, and telling Mazzei he had “ins” with the Dallas Police Department. (CE 1543, 23 H 34–35) He also told a business associate, with whom he had had a fist fight and many disagreements, that he had contacts with various underworld figures, but only mentioned one by name, Los Angeles mobster Mickey Cohen, saying he used to know Cohen (CE 1228, 22 H 336). Ruby also tried to create the impression he was a “tough guy.” Lawyer Luis Kutner, who knew Ruby from his Chicago days, recalled Ruby wearing “sharp” suits back then as well as a pearl gray fedora with the broad brim turned down in front, a style Al Capone had made a hoodlum fad (New York Times, November 26, 1963, p.15). But was Ruby, in fact, a tough guy? “He wasn’t a tough guy,” says Chicago police captain Louis Capparelli, the longtime commander of the Maxwell District of Chicago, where Ruby was born. “But he was a very aggressive salesman when he was selling something.” (New York Times, November 26, 1963, p.15)

‡ Jones was just one of about twenty Chicago mobsters who were sent to Dallas in 1946 to open up the city for them. One of them was a reputed friend of Ruby's from Chicago's west side named Paul Labriola, who was slain in 1954. (New York Times, November 26, 1963, p.15; Scheim, Contract on America, pp.81–83)

* All of Ruby's long-distance calls from his home and from the Carousel Club between September 26, 1963, and November 22, 1963, are set forth by the Warren Commission in Commission Exhibit No. 2303 (25 H 237-245).

* - Indeed, Earl Ruby told author Gerald Posner, “I gave Irwin Weiner’s number to my brother. I had gone to school with Weiner...He was a big bondsman for everyone, and he handled the Mafia...I thought he might be able to help Jack with the union. Jack didn’t even know Weiner, for God’s sake” (Posner, Case Closed, p.363). However, in Earl Ruby’s testimony before the HSCA years earlier, in 1978, he did not mention, as one would have expected him to, that he had advised his brother to call Weiner in 1963 (9 HSCA 1043).

* Not that Baker needs any support, but anti-conspiracy author Posner says that Baker's telling the FBI in 1964 about the subject of his conversation with Ruby, independent of knowing that Ruby had also told the police that the conversation was about his labor problems, confirms that that was what the conversation was really about (Posner, Case Closed, p.364). But that presupposes the very point in issue—that Ruby's call to Baker had nothing to do with the assassination. I mean, if it was about the assassination, we could expect Ruby and Baker to be on the same page as to the alleged subject matter of this conversation.

‡In Case Closed, Posner writes that the Warren Commission did not place those like “Weiner, Pecora, or Baker under oath. However, the telephone calls are not evidence of a conspiracy to kill JFK, since most of the calls were made before the President’s trip to Dallas was even announced” (Posner, Case Closed, p.365 footnote). This is a little misleading in that although many phone calls fell into that category, the calls he cites, the same ones the HSCA found troubling, were made on October 26, October 30, and November 7 and 8, all after the president’s trip to Texas was announced on September 26, 1963 (CE 1368–1369, 22 H 620–621).

* The Warren Commission said it found it “difficult to attach credence to a newspaper reporter’s contrary statement [to the FBI] that his undisclosed ‘syndicate sources’ revealed Ruby was connected with organized crime and confidence games” (WR, p.790; newspaper reporter: CE 1321, 22 H 495–496). There are several reasons for rejecting this. It is totally at odds with what others have said about Jack Ruby and with everything we know about Ruby. Also, the reporter, a crime writer for the Chicago Daily News, apparently never thought enough of the information to write about it in his own newspaper (apparently this reporter was the one out of a thousand reporters who didn’t like scoops), and finally, he refused to identify his sources. We know that the information provided by the “sources” was incorrect in two instances. They told the reporter that Ruby had been arrested in Milwaukee on bookmaking charges and in Chicago on charges of “confidence games,” but there is no evidence of either of these arrests. He was also told by his “sources” that Ruby was part of a group of Chicago mobsters who went to Dallas in 1947 to take over gambling. This is an old charge that we have seen has been proved false.

* Author Gerald Posner agrees with the conspiracy theorists that the Warren Commission “underplayed Jack Ruby’s underworld associations” (Posner, Case Closed, p.411). But it would have been hard for the Commission to underplay those associations when none were of any significance to underplay. If any were, what were they? Even the HSCA never came up with anything. And even assuming, for the sake of argument, that the Warren Commission underplayed Ruby’s underworld associations, it couldn’t have been, as many conspiracy theorists allege, intentional. To believe that, one would have to believe that the seven distinguished Commission members were trying to protect the American Mafia and cover up their possible involvement in the assassination. Though this is a more subtle point, since a Mafia connection with Ruby in the killing of Oswald necessarily bespeaks premeditation, if the Warren Commission were trying to protect the mob (which is a thought unworthy of even being considered), anything that showed a lack of premeditation on Ruby’s part would of course help them. Yet, although the Warren Report adequately shows Ruby’s propensity for violence, it negligently fails (though the Commission’s volumes don’t) to focus in on the spontaneity of that violence and Ruby’s extreme volatility, which would tend to be supportive of an unpremeditated act, and hence, away from the conclusion that Ruby was a part of any conspiracy to kill Oswald.

‡ Although several of Ruby's friends and acquaintances noted that he engaged in playing cards and attended the horse races, Ruby did not consider himself to be a gambler (CE 1536, 23 H 27; CE 1559, 23 H 48; CE 1742, 23 H 351; 5 H 201, WCT Jack L. Ruby). Jack's longtime girlfriend of nine years plus, Alice Nichols, stated that he gambled on occasion, but that she did not believe Jack gambled with any large amounts of money, and that he confined his gambling to card games (Nichols [Alice R.] Exhibit No. 5355, 20 H 673, 679). Another acquaintance, though, remembers Jack as betting "heavily" with frequent telephone bets on horse races and basketball games (CE 1505, 22 H 924).

* - Particularly Sinatra, who much evidence shows was very friendly with leading mob figures like Lucky Luciano and Sam Giancana for years (e.g., see Summers and Swan, Sinatra, pp.130–133, 252–255).

* Three tourists from Chicago told the FBI they saw Ruby at the Tropicana during Labor Day Weekend. However, the FBI was unable to verify their story through a search of records at the hotel in Miami Beach they said they stayed at before leaving for Cuba. The airline they said they flew on from Key West to Havana was no longer in existence and the location of the airline records was unknown. (CE 1765–1774, 23 H 375–379, 381–382)

* “Was Jack concerned about baldness?” Warren Commission counsel asked George Senator, Ruby’s roommate. “Oh, you should only know. He used to drive me crazy.” Senator went on to tell of Ruby’s going somewhere for “treatments” for his growing baldness and “the stuff” Ruby would “rub into his head.” (14 H 288)

* - Ruby's brother Sam was the only other sibling who lived in Dallas, but except for seeing him on Jewish holidays and speaking over the phone occasionally, he was not close to him. All his other siblings lived in Chicago or Detroit. (WR, p.803)

* Barney Weinstein, one of Ruby's competitors with his nearby Theatre Lounge, nonetheless had a soft spot for Jack and knew him well. He would later say, "Jack had to be there, even when he wasn't wanted." Weinstein said he once put on a benefit for a performer of his who died and Jack offered to sell ten tickets. "But he never let well enough alone. He met people as they came in that night and tried to get them to buy more tickets. I said, 'Jack, leave them alone. They already bought their tickets.' So then he wanted to sell special tickets for the best seats; he wanted to be my usher; he wanted to help, and he only got in the way. Once he dropped by when my houseman had not come in. He said, 'Don't worry, I'll stay and take care of any trouble.' I told him, 'I don't want you to, Jack.' You know, he doesn't stop trouble, he starts it...Jack had seven fights a week. I've had three fights in thirty years...But he stayed anyway. He had a wonderful heart. When he hardly knew me, he read about my mother's funeral in the newspapers and came to it. He just had to get into everything, including the excitement of that weekend Kennedy died." (Wills and Demaris, Jack Ruby, pp.13-14)

‡ Just the previous day, Ruby approached Joseph P. Rossi, who was engaged in the real estate business and had known Jack for eleven years. Shortly after Oswald's murder Rossi told the FBI that Ruby had discussed opening a new club and wanted Rossi to invest money in the club and perhaps help in management of the venture. Ruby talked of future plans in a manner that indicated he did not anticipate getting into any kind of trouble. (FBI Record 124-10062-10290, January 13, 1964, pp.1-2; see also 15 H 237, WCT Joseph Rossi)

* In his torrent of words, Ruby obviously misspoke here, from the context probably meaning that prior to this thought of killing Oswald on Sunday morning he had no previous thought to kill him. This likelihood is further increased by Ruby's being notorious for misusing words. Malicious doesn't mean an intent to kill, but malice aforethought, a term most lay people have heard, does, and this could have been the source of Ruby's incorrect selection of the word malicious. Of course, there is also the possibility that Ruby wasn't confused at all, and in his mind, the further back in time his hatred for Oswald and decision to kill him commenced (i.e., Friday afternoon), the more likely he'd get the death penalty because of the longer premeditation.

* This was not the first time Ruby said he acted alone in killing Oswald. He told the FBI on the very day he killed Oswald that he was not involved in any conspiracy with anyone, that no one asked him or suggested to him that he shoot Oswald (Hall [C. Ray] Exhibit No. 2, 20 H 44). On December 21, 1963, he told the FBI, "I told no one I was going to kill him. No one knew I was going to shoot him. I didn't discuss anything with anyone about shooting him" (Hall [C. Ray] Exhibit No. 3, 20 H 57).

* - Before the test was administered to Ruby, his lawyer, Joe Tonahill, said on the record that “when I entered the defense of Jack Ruby back in December of 1963 with Mr. Belli, at that time we insisted before undertaking his defense that he agree to a polygraph test and truth serum test or any other scientific test that would reflect whether or not there was a connection between him and Lee Harvey Oswald or in any respect a conspiracy. He agreed and insisted at that time that there was no such conspiracy...[and] he did not know Lee Harvey Oswald and there was no connection between them and that he would undertake any type of a scientific test that we could have made available for him. Jack Ruby has insisted on those tests ever since. We have from time to time proposed to the FBI...that a lie detector test be given Mr. Ruby. We have filed motions to obtain scientific tests” (14 H 507, WCT Jack L. Ruby).

* Though he did not personally know Ruby, Ralph Salerno, the chief consultant to the HSCA on organized crime who spent twenty years with the New York Police Department investigating the Mafia, told the HSCA, “Jack Ruby cannot be characterized as an organized crime figure in any way in my estimation. Jack Ruby would not have made a pimple on the back of the neck of a real organized crime figure” (5 HSCA 464).

* - At the trial, I had no time to go into the issue of whether Kantor was confusing seeing Ruby at Parkland with his seeing him elsewhere. Moreover, I was in no position to prove Kantor was wrong, so my questions assumed that Kantor had seen Ruby at Parkland.

‡The ramming of his head against the wall on April 26, 1964, was not a little game Ruby was playing. He was knocked unconscious and had to be hospitalized. (HSCA Record 180-10113-10493, May 29, 1964) Ruby's conviction for Oswald's murder thrust him into great despair, triggering a hastening of the mental degenerative process and causing him to lose all hope for a successful appeal and to not cooperate with his lawyers, who were seeking to reverse his conviction on appeal. To protect Ruby from himself, Sheriff Decker assigned two round-the-clock guards to watch over Ruby, who slept on a mattress on the bare floor, lights always shining directly on him. When his sister Eva would visit him, he would urge her to do away with herself because he said his whole family was in jeopardy. His visions of his brother Earl and his children being dismembered were so clear that Eva said that since she wasn't in daily contact with the rest of the family, she had "to sort of tell real lies, that I just got through talking" with them "and everything was okay." He also told her that "25 million Jews have been slaughtered" and sometimes he could hear planes overhead bombing the Jews, and also saw Jews being boiled in oil. (Belli with Carroll, Dallas Justice, pp.261–264; 14 H 471, WCT Eva Grant; Kantor, Ruby Cover-Up, pp.316–319)

Not everyone was convinced of the sincerity of Ruby's delusions. When he'd sometimes put his ear to the wall and say to his guards, "Shhh. Do you hear the screams? They are torturing the Jews again down in the basement," they would tell him, "O.K., Jack, cut the crap or we won't play cards with you anymore." (Wills and Demaris, Jack Ruby, pp. 255–256)

After Ruby's sentence of death, Ruby's lawyers had a psychiatrist, Dr. Louis Jolyon West, examine Ruby for them, and the judge, Judge Brown, assigned another psychiatrist (R. L. Stubblefield) to examine Ruby for the court. West's conclusion was that Ruby was "obviously psychotic" and "completely preoccupied with his delusions of persecution of the Jews," believing that "all the Jews in America were now being slaughtered" because "the president's assassination and its aftermath were now being blamed on him," a Jew. West was convinced Ruby was not feigning psychosis, giving several reasons, among which were that West doubted "that someone unfamiliar with technical psychiatry could play the part of a paranoid delusional psychotic person with such accuracy, consistency, and typical detail." Also, he said Ruby doesn't want "to go to a mental hospital...and violently rejects the idea that he is mentally ill," whereas "the true malingerer usually grasps eagerly" at such a diagnosis. Stubblefield agreed that Ruby had "an acute psychiatric illness" and also did not believe that he was feigning mental illness. (HSCA Record 180-10113-10493, May 29, 1964)

* - It is not 100 percent certain that the incident described by Cox took place on the afternoon of the assassination, although a situation similar to the one Cox describes (absent Ruby's crying) may have taken place at some previous time. The citation Kantor gives for this incident is an interview he had with Cox in Dallas on August 3, 1976, thirteen years after the assassination. But a very detailed chronology and reconstruction by the HSCA of all of Ruby's known movements on the afternoon of the assassination, anchored by many witnesses and phone records, does not show any visit by Ruby to any bank on that afternoon (9 HSCA 1099-1100, 1102-1105).

Indeed, it's not certain that this incident (like countless other incidents in the case) ever took place. To me, it doesn't have a ring of truth to it. For starters, since Cox apparently never told Kantor that he asked Ruby, or that Ruby volunteered the information, how would Cox know the exact or even approximate amount of currency Ruby was holding in his hands? And why would Ruby be holding all this currency in his hands in the first place, particularly since he didn't deposit any of it? Moreover, what was Ruby doing in line in the first place? Merchants State Bank records showed that the only activity on the Carousel Club's account that day was a $31.87 withdrawal by check to pay a city water bill. (Dallas Morning News, October 12, 1978, p.16A)

* I had Rabbi Hillel Silverman waiting in the wings in London to call as a rebuttal witness, if needed. But he wasn't, and I wanted to save time so we'd have more time for our final summations. The rabbi took his not being called to the stand graciously.

‡The “Four Days in November” section covered in a fair amount of detail Ruby’s conduct and activities on the three days leading up to his killing of Oswald, on the premise that, as the Warren Commission said, “if Jack Ruby were involved in a conspiracy, his activities and associations during this period would, in some way, have reflected the conspiratorial relationship” (WR, p.333). Not just with his sandwiches, but with everything else he said and did, it couldn’t be more clear that Ruby wasn’t involved with organized crime or anyone else in his killing of Oswald. Indeed, as previously indicated, on the afternoon of the assassination he was so distraught that he wanted to fly back to Chicago that night to be with his sister, Eileen Kaminsky, but she talked him out of it, telling him that their infirm sister, Eva, needed him in Dallas (15 H 283, WCT Eileen Kaminsky).

* The latest Gallup Poll (November 10–12, 2003) showed that 37 percent of Americans believed the Mafia was involved in Kennedy's assassination, and 34 percent believed the CIA was. Among other leading people or entities believed to be involved in the assassination were Lyndon Johnson, 18 percent; Castro's Cuba, 15 percent; and the Soviet Union, 15 percent. The reason these numbers add up to more than 100 percent is that many people believed that more than one of these persons or groups were involved in the assassination. As noted earlier in the book, the Gallup Poll showed that 75 percent of all Americans believed there was a conspiracy in the assassination, only 19 percent believed that the assassin acted alone, and 6 percent had no opinion.

‡The letters refer to an old Sicilian death slogan, Morte Alla Francia Italia Anala—“Death to the French Is Italy’s Cry”—which arose out of the French invasion of Sicily in 1282, although the word Mafia would later come to mean “manly” in Sicily.

* Capone rose to power in Chicago through gang wars with his rivals, during which upwards of five hundred murders took place in the last half of the 1920s, the most famous being the Saint Valentine's Day massacre in 1929, when Capone's killers, dressed as policemen, lined seven members of rival Bugsy Moran's North Side gang up against a garage wall and machine-gunned them down.

* - Other cardinal commandments of the Mafia have come to light through the years, two of which are that “a mafioso must obey implicitly the orders of a council of brothers senior to him,” and “a mafioso may never, under any circumstances, appeal to the police, the courts, or any other governmental authority for redress” (Sondern, Brotherhood of Evil, p.54).

‡Once nationwide, it is believed that today only one “Outfit” in Chicago and New York City’s five organized-crime families remain. They are “about all that’s left,” says mob historian Selwyn Raab. However, as recently as 2002, federal court records show that the Bonanno family in New York City, still with about one hundred members (about half their traditional strength), was considering whether to induct ten new mob wannabes. Joseph Coffee, who pursued the mob as a New York City police detective for over thirty years, believes the aura and lifestyle of the Mafia will continue to attract new members irrespective of how many mob leaders are convicted and imprisoned. “It’s the high life, the nightclubs, the bimbos, the easy money,” he says. “It’s always been that.” (Richard Willing, “The Sopranos, the Mafia,” USA Today, March 10–12, 2006, pp.1A–2A)

* According to an obituary on Mario Puzo, the term godfather, the title of his book, which became one of the biggest-selling novels of all time, is not a Mafia term. “In fact, the term ‘godfather’ as a synonym for a Mafia don did not exist before Puzo made it up.” (Obituary of Puzo, Newsday, July 3, 1999, p.A3) However, it apparently was a Mafia term but not a synonym for a Mafia don. Rather, new Mafia members were assigned to someone who was designated as their “godfather,” a person who was “responsible” for the new member and was his “gombah.” (New York Times, October 2, 1963, p.28; Maas, Valachi Papers, p.96) Goombah or compare is also a term for a mobster’s buddy, who isn’t necessarily a mob member (USA Today, March 10, 2006, p.4A).

* The boss of bosses, Luciano, got his start in major crime by importing narcotics under Arnold (“A. R.”) Rothstein, the most influential figure in the New York underworld before his murder in 1928. Rothstein was famous for fixing the 1919 World Series between the Chicago White Sox and the Cincinnati Reds. Indeed, Luciano’s first criminal arrest was for selling opium to an undercover agent in 1916. (Siacca, Luciano, pp.7–8, 23, 45)

‡The Bureau of Internal Revenue (later, Internal Revenue Service) estimated Capone's annual income in the late 1920s, mostly from the sale of alcohol, as being close to $100 million—$50 million from bootlegging, $25 million from gambling, $10 million from organized prostitution, and about the same from narcotics distribution (Sondern, Brotherhood of Evil, pp.76–77). While many Americans know that the still-legendary mob figure (whose name to this day is identified with the Windy City probably more than even Michael Jordan's) was convicted of federal income tax evasion, effectively ending his criminal career, what most don't know is that the man who is credited with his downfall, Elliot Ness, had very little to do with it, not even participating in Capone's trial. Ness, whose greatly exaggerated exploits were chronicled in The Untouchables, a book and TV series based thereon, was a federal Prohibition agent in the Department of Justice, and he did, indeed, lead successful (though not debilitating) raids on Capone's breweries. He was also, by all accounts, honest and incorruptible. But it was the accountants of the Bureau of Internal Revenue of the Treasury Department, led by Frank J. Wilson, an agent in the intelligence unit of the bureau, whose investigation of Capone for not paying taxes on the income derived from his sale of alcohol, who finally brought Capone down. Capone was convicted in 1931 and sentenced to eleven years in the federal penitentiary. He served eight years and was paroled in 1939, suffering from syphilis. Al Capone died from a brain hemorrhage at his Palm Island, Florida, home in 1947 at the age of forty-eight after suffering a stroke followed by a bout of pneumonia. (Bergreen, Capone, pp.44, 272, 484, 486, 571, 604–605)

* Though never confirmed, it is believed by many that Luciano (together, some say, with Vito Genovese, Luciano's underling at the time) had a hand in both Maranzano's and Masseria's deaths, guiding his then boss, Masseria (whom he was unable to stop fighting with Maranzano), to an Italian restaurant on Coney Island on April 15, 1931, where he was ambushed and murdered by men believed to be from his own gang. Luciano had excused himself to go to the restroom just before the murder took place. When Maranzano, who viewed himself as the new "boss of bosses," felt that he also could not coexist with Luciano, who had taken over Masseria's gang, or Vito Genovese, on September 10, 1931, he lured Luciano and Genovese to his office to be murdered by Vincent "Mad Dog" Coll, who at age twenty-two was already a notorious executioner, but Luciano learned what was in store for him, and instead Maranzano was met by four of Meyer Lansky's gunmen, who shot him to death. (New York Times, October 3, 1963, p.24; Nelli, Business of Crime, pp.203–206)

Whether or not Luciano was behind the murders of Masseria and Maranzano, mob historians believe that their deaths marked the end of the dominance of the Mafia by old-time, tradition-beholden mafiosi, to whom the town one came from in Sicily was just as important, or more, than making money, which was the only concern of Luciano and Lansky.

‡If it was Luciano, credited by mob historian Frederic Sondern as being “second only to Al Capone in organizational genius,” who created the corporate-like structure of the Mafia with rules and by-laws, it was, by common consensus, his boyhood friend Meyer Lansky who, as mob writer Nicholas Gage said, “developed the worldwide network of couriers, middlemen, bankers, and frontmen that [allowed] the underworld to take profits from illegal enterprises, send them halfway around the world, and then have the money come back laundered clean to be invested in legitimate businesses” (Gage, “Little Big Man Who Laughs at the Law,” p.65). Lansky was called the “Little Man,” and Luciano would always tell his followers to “listen to him.” Luciano once said, “I learned...that Meyer Lansky understood the Italian brain almost better than I did...I used to tell Meyer that he may’ve had a Jewish mother, but someplace he must’ve been wet-nursed by a Sicilian.” An FBI agent who pursued Lansky said, “He would have been chairman of the board of General Motors if he’d gone into legitimate business.” (Court TV Crime Library, Criminal Minds and Methods, http://www.crimelibrary.com/gangsters_outlaws/mob_bosses/index.html; New York Times, January 16, 1983, p.29) The five-foot four-inch Lansky, who led a very quiet, unpretentious family life in Miami, sent one of his sons to West Point, made contributions to charitable causes, and never had bodyguards—relying for protection instead on the FBI agents who followed him everywhere, even slowing his car down when they fell too far behind—had a personal net worth estimated between $100 and $300 million in the early 1970s. Unlike most of his mob friends, who were either murdered, deported, or deposed, Lansky died in 1983 of natural causes at the age of eighty-one in Miami Beach, Florida. (Gage, “Little Big Man Who Laughs at the Law,” pp.62–65; death of Lansky: New York Times, January 16, 1983, p.29)

Lansky’s earlier counterpart was Jacob “Greasy Thumb” Guzik, who was Al Capone’s minister of finance for his Chicago mob in the 1920s. Though Jews were common mob associates in the early years, by the 1960s and 1970s there were few Jews (or any non-Italians) high up in organized crime. New Jersey mobster Angelo DeCarlo, in an FBI wired phone conversation in the 1960s, referred to Lansky as the most respected non-Italian in the underworld. “There’s only two Jews recognized in the whole country today,” he said. “That’s Meyer and...Moe Dalitz [the head of the so-called Cleveland syndicate], but Dalitz ain’t got much recognition.” (Gage, “Little Big Man Who Laughs at the Law,” p.65)

As big as Lansky was in the underworld, he was, after all, not Italian, and mob historian Selwyn Raab puts Lansky’s stature in perspective when he notes that although “Lansky accompanied Luciano to Mafia conventions, [he] was never allowed to sit in on discussions” (Raab, Five Families, p.40).

* Although the power and influence of the American Mafia has been in steady decline, the nation's fascination with the Mafia continues. As Joanne Weintraub of the Milwaukee Journal writes, "Unlike many of our cultural preoccupations which come and go, America's interest in the Mafia seems to be as constant and nearly as voracious as our appetite for lasagna, linguine, and biscotti." Mario Puzo, whose book The Godfather sold an incredible 21 million copies, observed, "Just because a guy's a murderer, he can't have endearing traits?" I guess I'd have to agree. I mean, while the furnaces were blazing in places like Auschwitz, Treblinka, and Chelmno, the smell of burning human flesh permeating the countryside, Adolf Hitler, in the rarefied atmosphere of Berchtesgaden high in the Bavarian Alps, was, historians tell us, very concerned about the health of his dog Blondi. All sarcasm aside, the interesting and arguably revealing thing is that Americans are apparently not even turned off by the non-endearing traits of the Mafia, like killing people who don't want to die. I haven't seen The Sopranos, but I assume the killings are for the most part internecine (killing other mafiosi, and never killing innocent people outside the Mafia, which would never go over well) and probably always have an element of revenge, which at its core is a raw form of justice, not a pejorative notion. So it's all fun and games. As USA Today reported on viewers' enthrallment with the show, making murder fun, "Who gets whacked in Sopranos? Is Adriana really dead? Will Christopher get whacked? Or is crazy Tony B. next? Fans have been debating possible murders and floating plot lines for HBO's hit Mob show, The Sopranos" (USA Today, June 4, 2004, p.9E).

* The first published rumor about Hoover's sexual orientation was a Collier's magazine article of August 19, 1933, that only vaguely alluded to his sexuality: "In appearance," the article read, "Mr. Hoover looks utterly unlike the storybook sleuth...He dresses fastidiously, with Eleanor blue as the favored color for the matched shades of his tie, handkerchief and socks...He is short, fat, businesslike, and walks with a mincing step" (Gentry, J. Edgar Hoover, pp.158-159). For years the rumor was rampant in Washington, D.C., social circles.

* Many of Hoover's defenders say that his life was so consumed by the FBI that he was asexual. Even someone like William Turner, a ten-year veteran of the FBI who definitely was not a Hoover apologist, wrote, "My impression is that Hoover was a misanthrope devoid of erotic impulses, that he was frigid, and that he felt no passion either way" (Turner, Rearview Mirror, p.8).

* And, indeed, in New York, local prosecutor Thomas Dewey had temporarily broken up Lucky Luciano's Mafia family in 1936. But Hoover had to know that in Chicago it took a federal counterpart of his, the Treasury Department, to end Al Capone's career in 1931. That DeLoach was correct about Hoover's state of mind is supported by Hoover's testimony under oath before the House Appropriations Subcommittee in 1961. Addressing himself to the issue of his bureau's not giving as much assistance to fighting organized crime as some people would like, Hoover criticized those who sought "fantastic panaceas as to how to solve local crimes." (Schlesinger, Robert Kennedy and His Times, p.264)

* In particular, RFK led the assault on Jimmy Hoffa, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters' president since 1957, and his union, the nation's largest and most powerful union at the time, establishing that organized crime had helped Hoffa control and dominate the Teamsters, being complicit in the beatings and perhaps murders of Hoffa's opponents in the union. RFK's Justice Department ultimately convicted Hoffa in 1964 of jury tampering and defrauding the union's pension fund out of almost $2 million. His thirteen-year prison sentence, which he started to serve in 1967, ended four years later when President Nixon signed an Executive Grant of Clemency. Actually, the Teamsters had been the subject of scrutiny by the Senate's Permanent Investigations Subcommittee as early as December of 1956, when the committee's chief accountant, Carmine Bellino, and chief counsel, Robert F. Kennedy, looked into the misuse of Teamster funds by Hoffa's predecessor, Dave Beck, resulting in Beck's conviction and removal from office. (McClellan, Crime without Punishment, pp.3, 13, 14; Kennedy, Enemy Within, pp.3-4, 24; Sheridan, Fall and Rise of Jimmy Hoffa, pp.3, 7, 32-33, 210)

* It was common knowledge that Joseph Kennedy was spending whatever was necessary out of his fortune to get his son into 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, and JFK would facetiously deflect criticism about this. For instance, during his campaign for the presidency in 1960, he told the press at the annual Gridiron Club dinner in Washington, D.C., that “I have just received the following wire from my generous daddy: ‘Dear Jack—Don’t buy a single vote more than is necessary. I’ll be damned if I’m going to pay for a landslide.’” (Parmet, Jack, p.439)

* The HSCA added, however, that “an individual organized crime leader who was planning an assassination conspiracy against President Kennedy might well have avoided making the plan known to the commission or seeking approval for it from commission members. Such a course of unilateral action seemed to the committee to have been particularly possible in the case of powerful organized crime leaders who were well established, with firm control over their jurisdictions” (HSCA Report, p.167). But all of this is not only pure speculation, but extremely unreasonable speculation at that. The HSCA came up with only one leader in the history of organized crime subsequent to the establishment of the national commission in the early 1930s who acted in matters of murder without first seeking commission approval. In 1957, New York mob leader Vito Genovese engineered the assassination of fellow mafioso Albert Anastasia while he was seated in a barber’s chair near Central Park, and six months earlier a Genovese hit man had shot at and attempted to murder Mafia leader Frank Costello without the knowledge or consent of the commission. (Genovese did seek and obtain commission approval for the murder and attempted murder after the fact.) (HSCA Report, pp.167–168) But this clearly was highly exceptional behavior—by just one leader in one year. More importantly, one can’t begin to compare (as the HSCA did without appropriate comment) killing a fellow mafioso without commission approval, an act that would not bring any retribution by the U.S. government against organized crime, with killing the president of the United States, which, as previously indicated, would bring a retaliation against them by the federal government of an unprecedented magnitude. In any event, the only two mob leaders the HSCA could think of who might possibly act unilaterally were Carlos Marcello and Santo Trafficante, and the committee proceeded to say that it was unlikely that either had done so in this case (see later discussion).

* Not that there weren't loose and meaningless ventings before the assassination by individual mafiosi—the type you could expect to hear from thousands of everyday Americans who have a deep hostility for a particular president. On October 31, 1963, an FBI bug picked up the following conversation between Peter Magaddino and his brother Stefano, the mob boss in upstate New York. Peter: “President Kennedy, he should drop dead.” Stefano: “They should kill the whole family, the mother and father, too.” And on May 2, 1962, an FBI bug picked up Michelino Clemente, a member of the Vito Genovese family in New York City, saying, “Bob Kennedy won't stop today until he puts us all in jail all over the country. Until the commission meets and puts its foot down, things will be at a standstill.” Around this same time, an unidentified Genovese family member is heard saying, “I want the President indicted because I know he was whacking all those broads. Sinatra brought them out. I'd like to hit Kennedy. I would gladly go to the penitentiary for the rest of my life, believe me.” (Davis, Mafia Kingfish, pp.315–316)

* - The author of a book on the Sicilian Mafia said that the list of political figures mobsters have killed “is staggering” (Pantaleone, Mafia and Politics, p.202).

* - One conspiracy theorist is not satisfied having Marcello merely being “behind” the assassination. In his book The Elite Serial Killers of Lincoln, JFK, RFK, and MLK, author Robert Gaylon Ross writes that there were eleven members of the “death squad” at Dealey Plaza, but the “control point” was on the second floor of the Book Depository Building, where he says Carlos Marcello was one of three gunmen firing at Kennedy (Ross, Elite Serial Killers, p.103).

‡As just one example of the help I received from so many people in the writing of this book, I knew I couldn't write intelligently about Becker without talking to him personally. But how would I go about locating someone like him? If anyone knew how, I knew who it would be—Chicago's Jim Agnew, the former publisher of Real Crime Book Digest who had helped me many times in the past. Jim is almost a character out of fiction who looks exactly like you would expect an Irish cop walking the beat on a New York street in an old Bing Crosby movie to look. Whatever is going on in this country that's being written about, particularly in the area of crime, Jim somehow knows about it. And he has many contacts who can get him all types of information. I called Jim and asked him if he could locate Becker for me. A half hour later, Jim called back with Becker's unlisted home phone number, no less, in Las Vegas.

*- The U.S. government had been seeking to deport Marcello (true name, Calogero Minacore), who was born in Tunis, North Africa, to Sicilian-born parents and had never become a naturalized American citizen, since 1953. But a 1953 order to deport Marcello as an “undesirable alien” wasn’t implemented until Attorney General Robert Kennedy did so on April 4, 1961, the INS arresting Marcello when he walked into an INS office in New Orleans on a regular visit to report as an alien, and flying him in an INS airplane to Guatemala, from which he illegally reentered the United States less than two weeks later. (9 HSCA 62, 71–72; 1953 deportation order: Davis, Mafia Kingfish, p.176)

‡ Inasmuch as the sequence is so critical here, it was reassuring to me when I later played an old Frontline documentary in which Becker was one of several people interviewed by host Jack Newfield. Newfield: “Did he [Marcello] actually say that he was going to get a nut to do the assassination so it can’t be traced to him?” Becker: “Yeah, yeah. Well, I said to him [that if Kennedy were killed] ‘right away they know it’s you. I mean, you’ve got everything going for you. The one that hates him. Everybody knows it.’ He said ‘Don’t worry, you get a nut to do this thing and nobody’s looking at you.’” (“JFK, Hoffa and the Mob,” Frontline, PBS, November 17, 1992)

‡ One step conspiracy theorists say Marcello would not have had to take is to get permission from the national commission of the Mafia to kill the president. As indicated earlier, the first “family” of the Mafia came from Sicily and settled in New Orleans in 1875. A “highly reliable source” told the FBI in 1972 that “inasmuch as this ‘family’ was the predecessor of all subsequent ‘families,’ it has been afforded the highest respect and esteem, and because of its exalted position, the New Orleans ‘family’ could make decisions on its own without going to the ‘Commission’” (FBI report, October 24, 1972, La Cosa Nostra file, Bureau No. 92-6054-3176; HSCA Report, p.172). Patrick Collins, an FBI agent who investigated Marcello and his organization in the 1960s, formed the same view, telling the HSCA that the New Orleans Mafia family “was unique among all the mobs” in that it “didn’t have to consult the commission in the same way as the other families did. There was a unique independence of sorts” (9 HSCA 66; HSCA staff interview of Patrick J. Collins on November 15, 1978). However, on a crime of the monumental magnitude of murdering the president, I think we can assume that Marcello, if he had had such thoughts, would know that his privileged exemption from reporting to the commission would not apply.

* Even assuming Becker is telling the truth, he has made contradictory statements—probably out of confusion or lack of memory—about one point. He told HSCA investigators that he never told the FBI about Marcello’s Kennedy threats because he was “afraid” Marcello or his associates might learn he had done so (9 HSCA 83). This makes sense. And in my first conversation with him on August 13, 1999, he told me the first time he had ever told the authorities about Marcello’s threats was to the HSCA in 1978. But in a later conversation he said he did start to tell the FBI about the threats, “but they weren’t interested. They were agents who were only working on the Billie Sol Estes case.” In any event, none of the FBI reports of interviews with or about Becker make any reference to Marcello’s threats against Kennedy, and all deal with the Billie Sol Estes case.

* - An example of “mob talk,” from a federal wiretap of a telephone conversation between gangster Johnny Formosa and Chicago mob boss Sam Giancana over the failure of Giancana’s friend Frank Sinatra to have President Kennedy stop the authorities from prosecuting Giancana: Formosa: “Let’s show ’em. Let’s show those [obscenity] Hollywood fruitcakes that they can’t get away with it as if nothing’s happened. Let’s hit Sinatra. Or I could whack out a couple of those other guys. [Peter] Lawford and that [Dean] Martin, and I could take the nigger [Sammy Davis Jr.] and put his other eye out.” Giancana: “No...I’ve got other plans for them.” (Kelley, His Way, pp.296, 531)

‡The other mob boss the FBI found difficult to penetrate was Santo Trafficante, but the bureau was able to conduct some electronic eavesdropping on him (HSCA Report, p.175). A Cuban exile, José Aleman, claimed that Trafficante (who admitted, in his testimony before the HSCA, to participating in the unsuccessful CIA conspiracy to assassinate Fidel Castro) told him that Kennedy was “going to be hit.” The HSCA investigated the claim and concluded that “the relationship between Trafficante and Aleman, a business acquaintance, does not seem to have been close enough for Trafficante to have mentioned or alluded to such a murder plot.” In addition to there being no evidence that Trafficante, or Marcello, or any other mob figure, had actually had the president killed—as opposed to uncorroborated allegations that they talked about doing it—the HSCA said that “as with Marcello, the committee noted that Trafficante’s cautious character is inconsistent with his taking the risk of being involved in an assassination plot against the President.” (HSCA Report, p.175) For a more in-depth discussion of the Aleman-Trafficante issue, see the FBI conspiracy section.

* Life magazine reported in 1967 that Marcello controlled “illegal but wide-open gambling casinos in Jennings, Lafayette, Bossier City, West Baton Rouge and Morgan City, Louisiana” (Smith, “Carlos Marcello,” p.94). None of these, by the way, were within New Orleans DA Jim Garrison’s jurisdiction. Marcello was believed to be worth in excess of $25 million from his gambling enterprises. Like so many on the wrong side of the law have demonstrated, they can possess some traits that more on the right side should have. For instance, among Marcello’s charities, Life reported that he contributed $100,000 to agencies helping victims of Hurricane Betsy in 1965 and gave $10,000 to the Girl Scouts. When New Orleans was looking for a site to build a domed stadium for its new NFL team, the Saints, Marcello offered to give the city (in return for the parking concession) two hundred acres of his Churchill Farms estate to build the arena. The city declined.

* If Marcello liked to scare people in the absence of being actually violent, he also wanted people to believe he had more power than he did. There's no evidence to support the degree of power and influence he suggested in several of the aforementioned BRILAB tapes while talking to undercover FBI agents and his friend and attorney Vincent Marinello: "It takes time to get where I'm at. To know all these people—governors, business, the [state] attorney general, they know me" "Yeah, I got 'em all where I want 'em" "I had [Louisiana] Governor McKeithen for eight years" "Maybe I can make a phone call to the attorney general. Now I'm not saying I can do it. I gotta man can do it" "We own de teamsters" "I got the only man in the United States can tell 'em [the Teamsters leadership] what the fuck to do" "No matter who gets in there, you know I'm a find a way to get to 'em." (Davis, Mafia Kingfish, pp.577–578)

* - When I say “other than,” is this analogous to “other than that, Mrs Lincoln, how was the play?” No. Booth ruined everything, whereas as sophomoric and irresponsible (because it was essentially foundationless) as the fourth-bullet conspiracy conclusion of the HSCA was, the HSCA still did a commendable job overall under Blakey’s counsel.

* In November of 1992, Ragano told essentially the same story to a national audience in a Frontline TV special, but he said the conversation took place not at the Marble Palace Hotel but in Hoffa's office at the Teamsters headquarters in Washington, D.C. Marble Palace Hotel? Jimmy's office? Better make up your mind, Frankie. ("JFK, Hoffa and the Mob," Frontline, PBS, November 17, 1992)

‡Ragano also writes in his book that in 1972, when Jimmy Hoffa, who had been released after serving four years of a thirteen-year sentence for labor racketeering and jury tampering, was unsuccessful in wresting control of the Teamsters back from his handpicked successor, Frank Fitzsimmons, who he felt had “double-crossed” him, he asked Ragano to ask Trafficante “to get rid of that fucking Fitz” for him. Ragano writes that when he passed the request on to Trafficante, Trafficante said impassively, “Just tell him that it will be done.’ Santo was obviously annoyed at Jimmy’s demands and had no intention of getting entangled with him.” (Ragano and Raab, Mob Lawyer, pp.267–268)

* Though he probably had, as many people who never kill do, murderous instincts. The bantam Hoffa, at a dinner he had with RFK at his lawyer's home in Washington, D.C., before they became bitter enemies, told RFK, "I do to others what they do to me, only worse" (Kennedy, Enemy Within, p.41).

* Even former Florida senator George Smathers, a close friend of JFK's who, during JFK's Senate years, flew off to places like the Riviera and Havana with the married JFK for "bachelor holidays" of easy living, acknowledged to author Michael Beschloss that he personally saw Judith Campbell Exner being taken into the president's private quarters at the White House by William Thompson, a railroad lobbyist who had gone with Kennedy and Smathers on their 1958 pleasure trip to Havana (Beschloss, Crisis Years, p.141). With respect to Kennedy's women, Beschloss writes that "Kennedy's Choate School friend Le Moyne Billings felt that in the late 1940's after Kennedy's beloved sister Kathleen [with whom, among all his siblings, he was the closest] was killed in an air crash and he was told that he too might soon die of Addison's disease, 'he just figured there was no sense in planning ahead anymore. The only thing that made sense...was to live for the moment, treating each day as if it were his last, demanding of life constant intensity, adventure, and pleasure.' [Of course, several years before Kathleen's death, and with avoidance of war being a simple matter given the power and influence of his father, Joe, John Kennedy enlisted in the navy and risked his life, becoming a war hero.] Even as President, Kennedy's tomorrow-we-die streak remained, evinced by his promiscuity with women and his indifference to physical risk. Secret Service men complained that he was 'a notoriously poor driver who drove through red lights and took many unnecessary chances.' Sometimes he dismissed the agents, saying, 'Whoever wants to get me, will get me'" (Beschloss, Crisis Years, p.10).

But at least as to JFK's legendary womanizing, his latest biographer, Robert Dallek, points out that long before the diagnosis of Addison's disease and the death of his sister Kathleen in 1948, and the death of his brother Joe Jr. in 1944 when his plane exploded in midair crossing the English Channel, JFK was unable to exercise any restraint when it came to women, and started accumulating an impressive list of conquests by his late teens. "He had so many women, he could not remember their names," Dallek writes. While it is easy enough for a man to be a womanizer on his own, with JFK it was an accepted family tradition, an "entitlement" of his privileged background, if you will. His father, a natural role model for a young man, took licentiousness to new levels, the former ambassador to Great Britain trying to get in bed one night with one of his daughter's friends who was staying over. (Dallek, Unfinished Life, pp.47-49)

* I mean, it's not as if the mob did not have access to electronic surveillance equipment. It did. Indeed, in October 1960 Giancana himself arranged for the bugging of the Las Vegas apartment of comedian Dan Rowan to find out if his then girlfriend, singer Phyllis McGuire, was being unfaithful to him with Rowan (Blakey and Billings, Plot to Kill the President, p.381; Gentry, J. Edgar Hoover, p.486; see also 10 HSCA 174).

* - It is true, however, that in the immediate wake of the assassination, Kennedy's brother Robert had understandable suspicions about CIA involvement in his brother's death, as he did about Castro and organized crime. RFK's aide, Walter Sheridan, said that RFK had told him, "You know, at the time I asked [CIA Director John] McCone...if they [CIA] had killed my brother, and I asked him in a way that he couldn't lie to me. And they hadn't" (Interview of Walter Sheridan by Roberta Greene on June 12, 1970, for RFK Oral History Program, John F. Kennedy library).

* On June 23, 1976, the U.S. Senate's Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities (popularly known as the Church Committee after its chairman, Senator Frank Church of Idaho) released its report dated April 23, 1976, in which it stated that "between 1960 and early 1963 the CIA attempted to use underworld figures for [Castro's] assassination," but found no connection between these attempts and Kennedy's assassination. Although the committee reached no final conclusion and recommended further investigation, it said it could find no CIA complicity in the assassination (Church Committee Report, pp.2-3, 6). The moving force behind investigating whether the CIA was involved in Kennedy's assassination was Senator Richard Schweiker of Pennsylvania, and the chairman of the committee assigned Schweiker and Senator Gary Hart of Colorado to head up, as a subcommittee, the investigation of this issue. This is why this particular report (the Church Committee had a broader mandate) is often referred to as the Schweiker or Schweiker-Hart Subcommittee Report. This book refers to it as the Church Committee Report.

* The fear was deeper than that. Only those who lived through it can accurately recall it. Michael Burke, the chief of covert operations for the CIA in Germany for part of the cold war (he went on to head the New York Yankees), says, “The Cold War in those days was a very real thing with hundreds of thousands of Soviet troops, tanks and planes poised on the East German border, capable of moving to the English Channel in forty-eight hours.” Another CIA official at the time, Hugh Cunningham, perhaps expressed it the best. Survival itself was at stake, he remembers. “What you were made to feel was that the country was in desperate peril and we had to do whatever it took to save it.” (Marks, Search for the “Manchurian Candidate”, p.28)

‡To those who find humor in incongruity, as I can, the image of highly educated and urbane Ivy League types dressed in Brooks Brothers suits and speaking ferociously grammatical English (down to the forms of the verb “to be”), sitting around a table sipping martinis and casually musing about the best way to do in, say, Fidel Castro, might induce a smile.

* - It wasn't the Karl Marx, Friedrich Engels brand of Communism that America feared so much, but the Russian, totalitarian kind, symbolized by the erection of the Berlin Wall in the summer of 1961. The wall, built by the Communists not to keep people from getting in but to keep them from getting out (those who tried were often shot on the spot by armed guards atop the concrete and barbed-wire structure), spoke more eloquently, all by itself, than the millions of words being written at the time on both sides of the Iron Curtain trying to sell the virtues of democracy vis-à-vis Communism, and vice versa. Capitalism, with all its inevitable sins, was a saint next to Russia among all freedom-loving people.

* Under 61 Stat. 495 Chapter 343 (The National Security Act of 1947), Section 102 created the Central Intelligence Agency. Section 102 (d) (3) provided “that the Agency shall have no...internal [domestic] security functions.” Prior to the creation of the CIA, in 1940 the FBI started conducting foreign intelligence operations in Central and South America to gather information on the Nazis during the Second World War. This was terminated with the creation of the CIA as the lead federal agency in the gathering of foreign intelligence. (Whitehead, FBI Story, pp.15, 211–212; HSCA Report, p.241)

‡ Often referred to as “the first genuine foreign intelligence agency in U.S. history” (Powers, Man Who Kept the Secrets, p.25), it was not. The Special Intelligence Service, a branch of the FBI formed in 1940, apparently was. (See endnote discussion.)

* Partnerships and relationships formed by the OSS with allies before the war ended (e.g., future CIA counterintelligence head James Angleton with British counterintelligence chief Kim Philby), and with prior enemies immediately afterward (e.g., Nazi General Reinhard Gehlen, who, knowing Germany was about to fall and planning to reinvent himself as anti-Nazi, moved fifty steel containers of his intelligence files on Russia from the Russian front back to a secure location underground in the German state of Bavaria and offered them to the OSS and his American captors), would carry far into the cold war struggle between the United States and the Soviet Union. Some were helpful (Gehlen, through his National German Intelligence Service [BND], which worked closely with U.S. intelligence) and others not (Philby). (Helms with Hood, Look over My Shoulder, pp.83–85; Trento, Secret History of the CIA, pp.22–23; Powers, Man Who Kept the Secrets, pp.28, 85–86; Ashley, CIA Spy Master, p.61)

‡The National Security Council was also created by the National Security Act. Its members are the president, vice president, and secretaries of state and defense, with advisory members being the director of the CIA and chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

*- The reader should realize that many in the conspiracy community would give their right arm if they could prove that Oswald was a CIA agent. If they could do this, it would be the answer to their most wondrous dreams, the solution, at last, to the Kennedy assassination. This is because they are too blind when it comes to the assassination to realize that even if Oswald were a CIA agent, it would only be one step in their quest for the Holy Grail. They'd still have to prove that the reason why the CIA lied about Oswald's relationship with the agency was not because it didn't want the world to know that one of its agents murdered the president (as, on a lesser scale, a religious order would not want it to be known that one of its priests was a child molester), but because number one, the CIA decided to murder Kennedy, and number two, the agency got Oswald to murder Kennedy for it.

* Many conspiracy theorists take their theory about rogue or maverick agents even further and allege, without having the courtesy of providing an iota of evidence, that the CIA leadership found out what the rogue agents did and covered up for them to protect the CIA from extinction. But this is ludicrous. If the nation found out that some rogue CIA agents had murdered the president, there would be extreme shock, but the CIA itself would very likely survive. But if the CIA leadership covered up the awful deed and the nation found out, not only would this most certainly sound the death knell for the CIA, but the CIA leaders would have their reputations and careers destroyed and they'd be prosecuted for being accessories after the fact to Kennedy's murder.

* - The ARRB “examined extensive CIA records concerning the history and operations of the CIA in or against the Soviet Union in the late 1950s and early to mid 1960s. The Review Board found no records that suggested that Oswald had ever worked for the CIA in any capacity, nor did any records suggest that Oswald’s trip and defection to the Soviet Union served any intelligence purpose” (Final Report of the ARRB, p.85).

* If he did, he certainly would have had a difficult time doing so, he and his wife having left Dallas to live in Haiti (where he had a contract with the Haitian government) at the end of May in 1963, almost a half year before the assassination (9 H 167, 276, WCT George S. de Mohrenschildt). And as I understand it, communication facilities (which would have been needed to stay in touch with Oswald) in Papa Doc Duvalier's dump of an island were not noted for their efficiency.

* On December 12, 1963, de Mohrenschildt wrote a letter from Port-au-Prince, Haiti, to “Mrs. Janet Lee Auchincloss, 3044 O Street N.W., Washington D.C.,” the salutation of “Dear Janet” certainly indicating familiarity. “I ask you,” he wrote, “to express my deepest sympathy to your daughter and tell her that both my brother and I will always remember her as a charming little girl from East Hampton.” He alludes to “the strange fate which made me know Jackie when she was a little girl” and adds, in an indelicate aside, that this fate “made me also know the assassin (or presumable [sic] assassin), his wife and child. And your daughter has been of such help to the Cystic Fibrosis Research Foundation which we had started in Texas several years ago. [De Mohrenschildt’s only son died in 1960 of cystic fibrosis.] She was an honorary chairman of this Foundation.” De Mohrenschildt proceeded to become even more indelicate, no, insensitive, by saying, “I still have a lingering doubt, notwithstanding all the evidence, of Oswald’s guilt.” (De Mohrenschildt Exhibit Nos. 13 and 14, 19 H 556–557) Mrs. Auchincloss turned the letter over to the Warren Commission (9 H 275, WCT George S. de Mohrenschildt).

* When de Mohrenschildt wasn't asking questions instead of giving answers, and was not talking in circles, he was refreshingly informational. For instance, Oltmans said de Mohrenschildt told him a group of people killed Kennedy, but he didn't know if Oswald was one of the shooters. "I am still not sure," he said, "whether Oswald shot himself or not. I have never been able to ascertain that." And he said governmental agencies were involved in the assassination. "I think he said it was the CIA and FBI," Oltmans told the HSCA, adding that George had told him "the proof of that is in my manuscript." That disjointed manuscript of de Mohrenschildt's relationship with Oswald did not have, of course, any such proof. What it did have was more of George's haziness. For instance, at one point he says, "I never, never worked for CIA...I cannot say that I never was a CIA agent, I cannot prove it. I cannot prove either that I ever was. Nobody can." George de Mohrenschildt, his inherited sense of noblesse oblige still intact, was just trying to be helpful. (12 HSCA 314)

Before HSCA counsel Tanenbaum's questions exposed Oltmans as having nothing to say, Oltmans, because he was a journalist, received a lot of national exposure, giving "various morning press and television interviews," including on the aforementioned Good Morning America show and an NBC show, as well as a front-page story in the New York Times (New York Times, April 2, 1977, pp.1, 12; see also New York Times, April 4, 1977, p.50). The Times, wondering about the "flurry of publicity created by Oltmans" with his oblique hearsay charges, decided to call the Netherlands to find out just who Oltmans was. "He is half journalist, half showman. Nobody takes him very seriously," said Peter d'Hamacourt, whom the Times described as being "widely regarded as one of the best investigative reporters in the Netherlands." D'Hamacourt said that Oltmans's work consisted of "a lot of guessing stories," adding, "You don't know where his facts end and his imagination begins." The news director of a large daily in Rotterdam described Oltmans to the Times as "the stuntman of Dutch journalism. He has great skill in moving in on a small story and working on it until he builds it up into an exclusive big deal. He pumps up all his stories, and we think him not to be very reliable." (New York Times, April 12, 1977, p.18)

‡De Mohrenschildt's daughter, Alexandra, would later tell a reporter for the New York Times that her father was “mentally and physically afraid” of Oltmans, and “he felt he had been drugged in Amsterdam” (New York Times, April 4, 1977, p.50).

‡ Among the papers later found in de Mohrenschildt's attaché case was a two-page personal affidavit written by him in Brussels, Belgium, dated March 11, 1977, attesting to his friendship with Lee Harvey Oswald (Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office Death Investigation Report on George de Mohrenschildt, April 4, 1977, p.4).

* - If what the conspiracy theorists say is true, almost by definition the CIA would have had to put de Mohrenschildt on to Oswald. But if we're to believe de Mohrenschildt's widow, Jeanne, that's not what happened. "We had been hearing for months that some American Marine idiot that defected to Russia had come back with a Russian wife... The Russian Colony, as we called it, was talking about him. Somehow they didn't like him at all. He was poor. I told George to go to Fort Worth and bring him over here. He was reluctant because he was tired... But he went... That's how we met them [the Oswalds]." (Jim Marrs, "Widow Disputes Suicide," Fort Worth Star-Telegram, May 11, 1978)

* - Another possibility is that he was simply giving Epstein something for his money. Epstein had already paid de Mohrenschildt two thousand of his four-thousand-dollar fee (Epstein, Assassination Chronicles, p.557).

* On October 29, 1976, just a week and a half before his commitment at Parkland, de Mohrenschildt went to a Dallas psychiatrist, telling him, "I am depressed. I am killing myself," and asked that he be committed as a mental patient to Terrell State Hospital in Terrell, Texas, near Dallas. Four days later, after the psychiatrist had made arrangements for admitting him voluntarily, de Mohrenschildt changed his mind and decided not to go to Terrell. (Earl Golz, "Oswald Friend Vowed Suicide, Psychiatrist Claimed," Dallas Morning News, April 1, 1977, p.20A)

* The inimitable Mark Lane, however, perpetually up to his conspiratorial patter, found sounds indicating, to him, foul play. He wrote in the November 1977 edition of Gallery magazine that he attended de Mohrenschildt's coroner's inquest (which ruled that de Mohrenschildt's death was a suicide, the medical examiner who conducted the autopsy, Dr. Gabino Cuevas, testifying to his belief that the gunshot was self-inflicted) and that "the various servants testified that an alarm system installed by the owner of the house caused a bell to ring...whenever an outside door or window was opened. The courtroom became silent as the tape recording was played. Just after a commercial...a gentle bell was heard, and then the shotgun blast." (Mark Lane, Gallery, November 1977) Detective Neighbors (now a lieutenant) told me that he too was at the inquest. He said that when any door or window at the Tilton mansion was opened, a "beeping sound," not a bell, was heard, that a beeping sound was heard on the tape just before the shotgun blast, but he had determined it was caused by the live-in maintenance man, Coley Wimbley, walking out the backdoor of the home. "The next beeping sound on the tape was at least ten minutes later. An assassin would be expected to get out of there long before that." Neighbors said he meticulously went over the movements of everyone coming in and out of the house and "no beeps were unaccounted for." Neighbors said he had no doubt de Mohrenschildt had committed suicide. "He was a very disturbed individual at the end. He was hiding from the world, thinking the world was against him." (Telephone interview of Thomas Neighbors by author on November 6, 2000)

* - If the CIA were in any way involved, one could reasonably expect the agency to try to divert the Warren Commission's investigation from certain potentially incriminating areas by invoking the "national security" argument. But when the HSCA asked J. Lee Rankin, general counsel for the Warren Commission, "To your recollection did the CIA ever indicate to you, to the Chief Justice, or to the Commission in general that you should not pursue a line of investigation because of national security reasons?" Rankin answered, "They never did to me and they never did to any member of the Commission that I know of." Question: "Did you ever have a feeling that the CIA was trying to encourage you to go in a particular direction in your investigation?" Answer: "No." (HSCA Record 180-10105-10332, HSCA deposition of J. Lee Rankin on August 17, 1978, p.66)

* - A January 27, 1964, article in the Nation by Harold Feldman repeated the charges.

*- Hudkins wrote in his Post article, “Was Lee Harvey Oswald a stool pigeon for a federal government agency?...If the answer is ‘yes,’ then the 24-year-old accused...slayer of President Kennedy pulled one of the biggest and certainly the most embarrassing double-crosses in the nation’s history. And if the answer is ‘no,’ it will go down as just another one of the fantastic rumors floating around in official and unofficial circles in Dallas” (Lonnie Hudkins, “Oswald Rumored as Informant for U.S.,” Houston Post, January 1, 1964).

* - The FBI first opened a file on Oswald on October 31, 1959, when a United Press International release reported that Oswald had defected to the Soviet Union (CE 833, 17 H 787-789; CE 834, 17 H 804).

* It is not clear whether this was the first time Alba told this story. In Anthony Summers's book Conspiracy, he says Alba related this incident to him when he interviewed Alba in 1978, the same year as Alba's HSCA deposition, but Summers gives no month or day. Summers says Alba thought the FBI agent was "visiting New Orleans from Washington," and said Alba told him the agent returned the car to the garage in a few days. (Summers, Conspiracy, pp.282–283)

* - Former New Orleans FBI agent Warren de Brueys said that Alba's story that an FBI agent was driving a Secret Service car "sounds sort of asinine" because the FBI in New Orleans had its "own garage, separate and apart from the Secret Service. I don't know if that's ever happened where an FBI agent would be driving a Secret Service car. I am not saying it couldn't happen, but the odds were a million to one against those sort of facts existing" (Earl Goltz, "Oswald Allegedly Given Envelope," Dallas Morning News, August 7, 1978, p.4D).

‡It was the conventional wisdom in Washington (RFK had mentioned it to too many people) that President Kennedy did not intend to waive Hoover's compulsory retirement date (Gentry, J. Edgar Hoover, p.536). William Hundley, the chief of the Justice Department's organized-crime section under William Rogers, told author Ovid Demaris, "We all got the message that they were going to retire him after Jack got re-elected and Hoover hit seventy. And it got back to him [Hoover]" (Demaris, Director, p.143). William Sullivan, Hoover's number-three man, told author Curt Gentry that when Hoover learned he was going to be retired, "he was very, very unhappy about it" (Gentry, J. Edgar Hoover, p.536). On May 8, 1964, President Johnson signed Executive Order 11154 waiving Hoover's mandatory retirement. In a Rose Garden ceremony attended by leaders of both parties, Johnson told the assembled guests and media that Hoover was a "hero to millions of decent citizens, and an anathema to evil men." Saying Hoover was a "quiet, humble and magnificent public servant," he told Hoover the nation needed him, and hence, exempted him from compulsory retirement for an "indefinite period of time," tantamount to a lifetime appointment (New York Times, May 9, 1964, p.12). Hoover remained FBI director for eight more years, until his death from a heart attack on May 2, 1972, at the age of seventy-seven.

* Not all Mafia bosses were coarse and uneducated. Perhaps the biggest exception was Johnny Torrio, Al Capone's mentor (whose own mentor was Chicago's first big crime boss, "Diamond Jim" Colosimo), who, even during Capone's heyday in Chicago, some believed was in control of Capone. Torrio's enormous influence was not limited to the Chicago mob; he was also very influential with Lucky Luciano and the New York families. Torrio, a soft-spoken family man, spoke five languages, "actually read most of the books in his extensive library," loved the opera, and was a friend of the great Enrico Caruso. (Sciacca, Luciano, p.20)

†Castro would soon allow the casinos to reopen, but not under mob control. Eventually, the Cuban government took over all the hotels (5 HSCA 26) and gambling was prohibited.

* - As author Curt Gentry puts it, “The switch from bullets to ballots” by Aleman undoubtedly came because Aleman “feared possible reprisal from the Trafficante organization” (Gentry, J. Edgar Hoover, p.496 footnote). Aleman told the HSCA that since the Washington Post story, “I have been very much worried. I am very much concerned about my safety...I [have] been in my house because I mean Santos Trafficante can try to do anything at any moment” (5 HSCA 322–323).

*- North gives no citation of authority for this that makes any sense. He first lists the “Washington Post, 2-13-62,” which is seven months before the alleged conversation between Aleman and Trafficante ever took place, then spends the rest of the note he cites as authority for the Trafficante-Aleman incident talking not about Trafficante and Aleman, but Carlos Marcello and Ed Becker, alleging, without proof, that Hoover also had knowledge of Marcello’s plan to murder Kennedy (North, Act of Treason, pp.604–605 note 3). When an assertion like the one North makes is the key point of your book, you obviously have to have a lot of support for what you are saying. North has nothing.

*- Like a typical mobster, Trafficante took the Fifth Amendment as to all questions (including “Did you ever discuss with any individuals plans to assassinate President Kennedy prior to his assassination?”) when he was first called to the stand (HSCA Record 180-10114-10180, Testimony of Santos Trafficante before HSCA on March 16, 1977, pp.7–15), but the HSCA subsequently compelled his testimony by an order it got from the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia conferring immunity on Trafficante from having anything he said under oath being used against him. The immunity order did not extend to perjury by Trafficante. (5 HSCA 346–348) Though conspiracy theorists like to cite Trafficante’s refusal to answer the question of whether he had ever discussed plans to murder Kennedy (e.g., Davis, Mafia Kingfish, pp.427–428), not too much should be read into this. The conspiracists don’t point out that before Trafficante was granted immunity, he also took the Fifth when asked, “Will you tell us when and where you were born?” (5 HSCA 346, Testimony of Santos Trafficante before HSCA on September 28, 1978)

* Of course, as with the alleged Marcello-Becker conversation, if Trafficante had nothing to do with the assassination, such loose talk by him to Aleman would be unremarkable and of no significance.

* In 1983 in Miami, Aleman, who had become convinced that his 1978 HSCA testimony against Trafficante had prevented his financial recovery and adversely marked him and his family for the rest of their lives, was penniless and despondent. For no apparent reason, he went berserk, shooting and killing his sixty-nine-year-old aunt and seriously wounding three cousins. Police were called to the scene, and in the ensuing shootout where four Miami Police Department SWAT team members were wounded, Aleman committed suicide by shooting himself in the temple. (Davis, Mafia Kingfish, p.446; Benson, Who's Who in the JFK Assassination, p.6)

* The number-one G-man (the name coined by gangster George “Machine Gun” Kelly for government men) loved the ponies, and at one time or another visited and bet at virtually every major racetrack in the country, even having a number of horses named after him, but didn’t cash that many winning tickets. “Edgar is a sucker at the track,” a friend said. “He’ll let somebody tout him a horse with information he would throw out the window back at the FBI.” (Knebel, “J. Edgar Hoover,” p.30; G-men coined by Kelly: Whitehead, FBI Story, p.15)

‡Purvis, still enormously popular with the American public, wrote a memoir, American Agent, lent his name to product endorsements, and became “the voice of an unofficial radio adventure, Top Secrets of the FBI.” Author Richard Powers writes, “For the rest of Purvis’ life, the Bureau quietly sabotaged his efforts to build a second career either in entertainment or in the security field...When Purvis committed suicide in 1960 with his Bureau revolver, Hoover’s executive council debated and then rejected the idea of sending a letter to the widow. [She] telegraphed Hoover, ‘We are honored that you ignored Melvin’s death. Your jealousy hurt him very much, but until the end I think he loved you.’” (Powers, Broken, pp.154–155)

‡ Remarkably, or coincidentally, Dillinger, Floyd, Barker, and Nelson were all hunted down and killed by the FBI within a mere six-month period, making heroes in the public eye of Hoover and his G-men almost overnight, and marking the year, 1934, as the biggest one in the bureau's fabled history. FBI chronicler Richard Powers writes that Hollywood also helped turn the FBI "into American legend through movies about the Bureau's gangbusting cases, beginning with James Cagney's G-Men, in 1935. [Later films included The FBI Story starring Jimmy Stewart in 1959 and television's The FBI from 1965 to 1974.] There was FBI entertainment in every media: radio shows, pulp magazines, and even bubble gum cards." The overall effect was to persuade the public "that all crime was local and the Bureau's job was to take over cases that were too difficult for the local police." (Powers, Broken, photo section; Theoharis with Poveda, Rosenfeld, and Powers, FBI, pp.176–177) Though still admired as a competent and clean law enforcement agency, because of an accumulation of events, including the revelations in the 1970s and 1980s of Hoover's abuse of power, today's FBI no longer enjoys the mythical status it once did in the nation's eyes, and being the nation's lead agency against terrorism within our shores, the bureau took a serious blow after the destruction of the twin towers of the World Trade Center in New York City on September 11, 2001.

* It was one thing for the FBI, acting within its jurisdiction to investigate domestic subversion, to use illegal means to do so. But prior to investigative reporter Seymour Hersh's front-page article in the December 23 and 24, 1974, editions of the New York Times, it was not publicly known that the CIA, with no jurisdiction domestically, had been illegally spying on American citizens since the Nixon administration. Hersh's articles caused President Gerald Ford to order CIA Director William Colby to report to him "within a matter of days" on the published allegations. (New York Times, December 23, 1974, pp.1, 19; New York Times, December 24, 1974, pp.1, 4) Hersh's explosive revelations are widely credited with Ford's creation of the Rockefeller Commission on January 4, 1975, to determine whether the CIA was exceeding its statutory authority.

* - These dalliances started before his presidency, with his affair in 1941 with the married (separated) and beautiful, honey-blond Inga Arvad (former Miss Denmark and Miss Europe), who for a time was erroneously suspected of being a Nazi spy, and continued into 1962 with Judith Campbell Exner, and 1963 with a stunning, Elizabeth Taylor–resembling call girl, Ellen Rometsch, whom Bobby Kennedy quietly deported back to Germany.

* If the truth be told, many in Dallas, the most conservative large city in Texas, viewed Kennedy as a “pinko” (colloquial for Communist) and didn’t even want him to come. (But as long as he was coming, they, the conservatives, wanted to be in charge.) How could Kennedy possibly be viewed as a Communist? In these circles, said Dallas Democratic political organizer Elizabeth Forsling Harris, “anybody who had any interest in what might be called social equality,” or thought the government should serve “the needs of all the people, was, ipso facto, a Commie” (HSCA Record 180-10078-10272, Deposition of Elizabeth Forsling Harris before HSCA on August 16, 1978, pp.8, 49).

‡The decision may have been helped by a report from Winston G. Lawson, the Secret Service White House advance agent for the trip, to Gerald Behn. Although he did not make a recommendation for the Trade Mart over the Women's Building, after visiting both buildings on the morning of November 13 Lawson told Behn that the Trade Mart had two security advantages over the Women's Building. Number one, the internal security system at the Mart barred entry to everyone other than lessees of commercial space at the building and their customers. Number two, there was no kitchen at the Women's Building, so the food would have to be brought in from the outside. (4 H 336–338, WCT Winston G. Lawson; 11 HSCA 517)

* - The murder of Kennedy remains the only murder ever of a president who was under Secret Service protection.

* In 1963 it was not the practice of the Secret Service to check out, in advance, buildings along the routes a presidential motorcade took (HSCA Record 180-10074-10392, HSCA interview of Dallas SAC Forrest Sorrels on March 15, 1978, p.4; WR, p.664). James Rowley, the chief of the Service, told the Warren Commission, “Except for [an] inauguration or other parades involving foreign dignitaries accompanied by the president in Washington, it has not been the practice of the Secret Service to make surveys or checks of buildings along the route of a presidential motorcade... With the number of men available to the Secret Service and the time available, surveys of hundreds of buildings and thousands of windows is not practical... In accordance with its regular procedure, no survey or other check was made by the Secret Service, or by any other law enforcement agency at its request, of the Texas School Book Depository Building... prior to the time the president was shot.” Rowley went on to say that since the assassination, “there has been a change in this regard.” (5 H 467)

Interestingly, Forrest Sorrels recalls that while driving the motorcade route with Winston Lawson prior to the actual motorcade, when they turned from Main Street to Houston, Lawson “was startled to see the building facing us. He asked me what building it was and I told him it was the book warehouse” (HSCA Record 180-10074-10392, HSCA interview of Forrest Sorrels on March 15, 1978, p.4).

‡ Contrary to the suggestion of Palamara, and the belief of many, even if the bubbletop had been on the limousine it would not have prevented the assassination because, as noted earlier in the book, it was only a plastic shield at that time, furnishing protection only against inclement weather (WR, p.2; HSCA Report, p.183 note 2). The decision not to use the bubbletop was made at Love Field right after Air Force One landed there from Fort Worth. Secret Service agents wanted the bubbletop to be used because they were expecting rain, but Kennedy didn't want the bubbletop, and presidential assistant Bill Moyers, on the phone from Austin, Texas, told the Secret Service, "Get that Goddamned bubble [top] off unless it's pouring rain." (HSCA Record 180-10078-10272, Deposition of Elizabeth Forsling Harris before HSCA on August 16, 1978, p.28)

Remarkably, although the FBI had a bulletproof car for its director in 1963, the Secret Service did not have the foresight or common sense to have one for the president of the United States (LBJ Record 177-10001-10237, Telephone conversation between LBJ and J. Edgar Hoover, November 29, 1963, pp.7-8).

* In his 1973 book, 20 Years in the Secret Service: My Life with Five Presidents, Rufus W. Youngblood, one of sixteen Secret Service agents in the Dallas motorcade, writes that “as a Secret Service agent you are constantly on the alert for the individual who somehow does not fit” (Youngblood, 20 Years in the Secret Service, p.12).

* Fourteen months later, Gerald Behn, the special agent in charge of the White House's Secret Service detail at the time of the assassination, was demoted by Rowley. It is not known whether the demotion was related to the assassination, but a demotion right after the assassination would have been more likely to be construed that way, and if, indeed, Behn was demoted because of the assassination, this may have been the reason why Rowley waited over a year.

* In fact, at the time Khrushchev was ousted as Soviet premier on October 15, 1964, informed sources said that his constant rift with Peking (now Beijing), which gave every indication of heading toward a showdown, was the pivotal issue in his downfall. Not that the Soviet hierarchy wanted to get muscular with the West, but clearly China did not like Khrushchev, subjecting him to vitriolic personal attacks, and his successor, Leonid I. Brezhnev, a protégé of Khrushchev's, said even before he became premier that the Soviet-Sino split had to end. (New York Times, October 16, 1964, p.14; New York Times, October 17, 1964, p.1)

* - In what has to be one of the most interesting and, at least to me, funny lines ever to come out of the CIA's storied history, the CIA director himself, William Colby, after calling Angleton "supersensitive," had to confess that although he did not suspect Angleton and his staff of engaging in improper activities, he "just could not figure out what they were doing at all" (Colby and Forbath, Honorable Men, pp.334, 364). Colby would eventually fire Angleton, after the latter's thirty years with the agency. Author David Martin would say of Angleton that he fulfilled public fantasies of the master spy, looking and sounding like a character out of a Graham Greene or John le Carré novel. (Martin, Wilderness of Mirrors, photo section, pp.211-214).

‡ However, Angleton did not believe—nor is there any evidence that Golitsyn tried to convince him—that Oswald was acting under the control of the KGB when he killed Kennedy.

* Among other things, the CIA has acknowledged that Nosenko was confined (at one time, in a ten-by-ten-foot cell) at secure CIA locations from April 1964 through October 1967, during which time he was intermittently interrogated, was under “constant visual observation,” and “did not have access to TV, radio or newspapers.” Nosenko was in “solitary confinement” during this three-and-a-half-year period. (Los Angeles Times, March 8, 1976, p.1; ten-by-ten-foot cell: Gest, Shapiro, Bowermaster, and Geier, “JFK: The Untold Story of the Warren Commission,” p.37). His contact with other people “was limited to Agency personnel from April 1964–December 1968” (12 HSCA 544–545). Richard Helms, the CIA deputy director of plans and CIA director during this period, wrote that “despite what has been reported in some of the literature, [Nosenko] was never drugged or subjected to any form of physical abuse, and was regularly examined by an Agency doctor” (Helms with Hood, Look over My Shoulder, p.243).

* That this “reliable” informant seemed to have good information was corroborated by Thomas Hughes, the director of intelligence and research at the State Department, who sent a memo to Secretary of State Dean Rusk the day after the assassination setting forth what his office had picked up from its international sources. In addition to saying that “the Soviet Union and the Eastern European countries displayed the same sense of shock as the rest of the world at the assassination of President Kennedy” and that “Soviet media gave considerable and sympathetic coverage to the tragedy, including for the first time a Telstar transmission,” he said that “at the same time there were signs of uncertainty about the course which President Johnson will follow” (WC Record 179-40005-10409, November 23, 1963).

What little the Soviets could have known of Johnson from his few public pronouncements could not have sounded, to them, too congenial to their interests. For instance, on June 2, 1960, in Washington, D.C., Johnson said, “Mr. Khrushchev does not understand that Americans of whatever their political creed—Republican or Democrat—will stand united against him in his effort to divide the country and weaken the hopes of freedom.” And in Berlin, on August 19, 1961, he said, “The Communist dictatorship has the power temporarily to seal a border, but no tyranny can survive beyond the shadow of its own evil strength.” (New York Times, November 24, 1963, p.7)

* As Soviet premier Nikita Khrushchev said in a Teletyped letter to Washington at the height of the Cuban missile crisis in 1962, “Only lunatics or suicides, who themselves want to perish,” would risk a nuclear war (Thomas, “Bobby at the Brink,” p.56).

Few knew the character of the Russian bear as well as George Kennan, the American diplomat who studied the Soviet Union and its leadership for years. In his famous “Long Telegram” from the American embassy in Moscow in 1946 to his superiors at the State Department in Washington, D.C., he said, “Soviet power, unlike that of Hitlerite Germany is...not adventuristic...It does not take unnecessary risks” (Kennan, Memoirs, 1925–1950, p.557).

* Kennedy's brother RFK, the nation's attorney general, was always more outspoken and passionate about civil rights than the president, turning the power of his office to the vigorous enforcement of civil rights laws in the South after his original emphasis on organized crime.

From all I have read, it seems that JFK was much more easy-going and less intense than his younger brother, Bobby, for whom the adjective "ruthless" was frequently used, and who had his severe detractors as well as his even more dedicated followers. On the matter of RFK's being intense and passionate, syndicated columnist David Broder wrote, "His distinguished quality was his capacity for what can only be called moral outrage. 'That is unacceptable,' he said of many conditions that most of us accepted as inevitable—so long as we and ours were spared their damage. Poverty, illiteracy, malnutrition, prejudice, crookedness, conniving—all such accepted evils were a personal affront to him. . . . He cared passionately about his family, his country, and this world, and he was prepared to play his part in the drama of his times, no matter what it might be or what it might cost" (David Broder, "The Legacy of Robert Kennedy," Dallas Times Herald, May 31, 1978). Tom Billings, JFK's close friend, recalled that when RFK gave a stirring civil rights speech in May of 1961 at the University of Georgia at Athens, JFK "wasn't too happy. . . . He said it wouldn't do him any good to bring that kind of civil rights talk directly into the heart of the South" (Beschloss, Crisis Years, p.304). On the other hand, Look senior editor Laura Berquist wrote, "I first began trailing [Kennedy] in 1956, just after he'd lost the nomination for Vice-President. Democratic insiders pooh-poohed his quest for the presidency as impossible—he was too rich, too glamorous, had too much father. . . . But in Columbia, South Carolina, a conservative bastion, I heard him [Berquist doesn't give the year] speak out on civil rights with a ferocious, startling candor. I knew then he was better than the glamour image that dogged and often irked him" (Berquist, "John Fitzgerald Kennedy," p.35).

* Because of the speech's importance, for those who are interested, most of its text appears in an endnote. What made the speech particularly remarkable is that, as indicated, it was prepared within just hours of its delivery, 8:00 p.m. EST. Earlier in the day, JFK had been watching television reruns of U.S. Deputy Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach's encounter in 100-degree heat with the Alabama segregationist Governor George Wallace "at the schoolhouse door" of the University of Alabama at Tuscaloosa. Katzenbach was seeking the peaceful admission, pursuant to a court order, of two black students to the all-white university, and Wallace, who had campaigned for governor on the slogan of "segregation now, segregation tomorrow, segregation forever," refused to step aside. (Kennedy federalized the Alabama National Guard in the late morning and Wallace stepped aside only when an Alabama National Guard brigadier general, Henry Graham, confronted Wallace at the door in midafternoon and said, "Governor Wallace, it is my sad duty to inform you that the National Guard has been federalized. Please stand aside so that the order of the court may be accomplished.") Kennedy decided, "I want to go on television tonight." As late as one hour before the speech, Kennedy was asking his aides to help him with ideas and articulations for his address. (Reeves, President Kennedy, pp.518–521; HSCA Report, p.32)

Kennedy had already let the good folks of Alabama know that its segregationist philosophy did not sit well with him. Nothing is more important to Alabamians, even today, than the fortunes of their college football team at Tuscaloosa. And before the 1963 Orange Bowl in Miami, President Kennedy visited the locker room of the integrated Oklahoma Sooners. He did not visit Coach Bear Bryant's Crimson Tide, which was still all-white. (Will, "Eleven Men and Sic 'Em," p.88)

‡ Kennedy tried to discourage Martin Luther King from holding the march, “fearing that it would lead to violence, looting and—more important—a mark against his Administration.” Despite the entreaties of King and other civil rights leaders, Kennedy did not participate in the march. However, when the march, which was peaceful and did not ignite any violence, was over, he invited King and others to the White House “where he congratulated them—in private” (Los Angeles Times, November 22, 1993, p.A11).

‡ Indeed, it went further than that. One of the biggest apparent misconceptions that has developed about the passage of these two acts is that they were pushed through Congress only by the strength of Johnson's personality and the deepness of his commitment. Neither Johnson's congressional magic nor his strong support for civil rights can be denied, but according to those who should know—the congressional leaders of both parties—this simply was not true. Though unquestionably the assassination speeded up the passage of Kennedy's legislative program (not just the civil rights bill, but the proposed tax cut to stimulate the economy, both of which were being delayed—the civil rights bill by the House Judiciary Committee, the tax-cut bill by the Senate Finance Committee), they say Kennedy's bill would have passed, with or without Johnson.

Among a plethora of Kennedy initiatives in the areas of mental illness, trade, mass transportation, juvenile delinquency, antipoverty (Kennedy started the movement to eradicate poverty in America three days before his assassination, calling it an "attack on poverty," Johnson changing the name to the "war on poverty"), the biggest ones at the moment of his death were his civil rights bill and tax reduction bill. Speaking primarily of these two bills, Senator Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.), the leader of the Senate majority, said in November of 1964, "The assassination made no real difference. Adoption of [Kennedy's] tax bill and the civil rights bill might have taken a little longer, but they would have been adopted." His counterpart in the Senate, Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.), said, "This program was on the way before November 22, 1963. Its time had come." In the House, Representative Carl Albert (D-Okla.), the leader of the House majority said, "The pressure behind this program had become so great that it would have been adopted in essentially the same form whether Kennedy lived or died." His counterpart, Representative Charles A. Hallek (R-Ind.), said, "The assassination made no difference. The program was already made."

The head of Kennedy's legislative team, Lawrence F. O'Brien, who carried on in the same capacity for Johnson, said, "If we were ever sure of anything, it was that the tax bill and the civil rights bill would be passed." (Wilson, "What Happened to the Kennedy Program?" pp.117–121; delay by House Judiciary Committee and Senate Finance Committee: Reeves, President Kennedy, p.658) Without slighting LBJ's considerable contributions in the least, it is hard to ignore the reality that LBJ was carrying out the vision and reform agenda of JFK.

* Emblematic of right-wing extremism in parts of Dallas and the South prior to the assassination, Walker gave a speech to the Annual Leadership Conference of the White Citizens' Council of America in Jackson, Mississippi, a little less than a month before the tragedy in Dealey Plaza. A few excerpts: "The Kennedys have liquidated the government of the United States. It no longer exists. The nation has no government. The Constitution is well on the way to destruction...Ladies and gentlemen, your State Department is...well infiltrated with Communists...and it has been for a long time, Republican or Democrat, Eisenhower or Kennedy...The best definition I can find today for Communism is 'Kennedy liberalism,' or 'Kennedy socialism'...[Kennedy] is the greatest leader of the anti-Christ movement that we have had as a president of the United States...I have seen this country being sold out, lock, stock, and barrel by a bunch of sophisticated, professor, Harvard liberals...It's interesting that the Communists killed first the people that helped them in their revolution...So we've got something to look forward to, ladies and gentlemen [i.e., the Communists taking over and killing the Kennedys]...Now, I'm not a fanatic, but I do get mad and angry when the truth can't be told in this country. And I'm not an extremist either." Walker said that when people ask him why he went to Mississippi, his response is, "I'll go to Kalamazoo next or Alaska, if that's where the Russians and Communists want to enter next. It just happened that they entered Mississippi and then they entered Alabama." (Transcript of Walker's speech in Jackson, Mississippi, on October 25 or 26, 1963, published in the Fourth Decade, January 2001, pp.17-19, 21, 26-27)

‡ “Messages were crisscrossing this town [Dallas] that something was going to happen and the right wing was going to be blamed for it,” General Walker would later recall to a Texas reporter. “I made sure I was out of Dallas that day. It drove them [the authorities] crazy that I was in New Orleans, Oswald’s old stomping ground. I was on a plane flying from New Orleans to Shreveport when the pilot announced that Kennedy had been killed. I’ve got the plane and everyone who was on it, if you want to check.” Walker added, “They asked me if I wanted to cancel my speech that night, and I said ‘Hell, no.’” (Cartwright, “Old Soldier,” p.59)

* In desperation, the conspiracy theorists have tried (e.g., Shaw with Harris, Cover-Up, p.167) to connect Hunt to Kennedy's murder by pointing out that one of his sons, Nelson "Bunker" Hunt, admitted to the FBI that he contributed between two and three hundred dollars toward payment of the negative "Welcome Mr. Kennedy" advertisement in the Dallas Morning News on the morning of the assassination, which asked Kennedy twelve "why" questions (see earlier text) (CE 1885, 23 H 690, FBI interview of Nelson Bunker Hunt on May 15, 1964; CE 1031, 18 H 835). You see, Bunker was probably in on the conspiracy himself, and being so, he wanted to advertise his complicity by helping to pay for the advertisement. By the way, the advertisement was a reasonably dignified criticism of Kennedy's policies, which the ad suggested gave aid and comfort to international Communism. The ad was signed by one Bernard Weissman, "chairman" of the "American Fact-Finding Committee." Weissman had recently been discharged from the U.S. Army in Germany, where he and two men who served with him agreed to form a politically conservative organization when they returned to the states. (WR, p.295; 5 H 489-497, WCT Bernard Weissman)

‡ Although Hunt was a “social Darwinist” who believed minorities, like blacks, did not do well because they were innately less advantaged, he had no reputation for racial hatred, and certainly was no fanatic about keeping the black man down (Hurt, Texas Rich, pp.30–31).

* Accompanying the letter was a typed note in Spanish saying that the sender, who signed his name as “P.S.,” had sent a copy of the letter to the FBI in late 1974 but had not heard back from the bureau. “Señor P.S.,” as the sender became known, said that fearing what might happen to him, he intended to go into hiding for awhile, but left a return address of “Insurgentes Sud, No. 309, Mexico, Df, Mexico.” Number 309 South Insurgentes in Mexico City at the time was a four-story white stone apartment building containing a number of lower-middle-class flats. On the first floor of the building were low-quality clothing stores and a shop that sold lottery tickets. Two other assassination researchers, Harold Weisberg and Howard Roffman, also received copies of the handwritten letter to Hunt in the mail. Each wrote letters to the Mexico City return address on the envelope, but received no answer, though their letters were not returned as undelivered. (New York Times, April 4, 1977, p.50)

* - To their credit, Gary Shaw and Larry Harris, in Cover-Up, did not.

* The FBI report of the interview on November 27, 1963, says that “Milteer emphatically denies ever making threats to assassinate President Kennedy or participating in any such assassination. He stated he has never heard anyone make such threats...He stated he does not know, nor has he ever been in the presence of Lee Harvey Oswald or Jack Ruby” (CD 20, p.1, December 1, 1963).

* JFK biographer Richard Reeves writes that “more than once the President had chewed out his own people for making fun of Johnson” (Reeves, President Kennedy, p.118). Sam Houston Johnson, LBJ’s brother, wrote in his book that the Kennedy people made his brother’s stay in the vice presidency “the most miserable three years of his life. He wasn’t the number two man in the administration; he was the lowest man on the totem pole...I know him well enough to know he felt humiliated time and time again, that he was openly snubbed by second-echelon White House staffers who snickered at him behind his back and called him ‘Uncle Cornpone’” (Johnson, My Brother Lyndon, p.108). And at the center of it all, LBJ believed, was RFK, whom he disliked not just for Bobby’s notorious brusqueness (LBJ, coarse in his own right, was nonetheless a highly sensitive soul), but for his lack of respect for him. Bobby rarely invited Johnson to the frequent social gatherings of the Kennedy clan and administration at his Hickory Hill estate in McLean, Virginia. Johnson was particularly resentful of Bobby’s access to the president. “Every time they have a conference,” LBJ complained to a reporter for the Associated Press, “don’t tell me about who is the top adviser. It isn’t McNamara, the chief of staff, or anybody like that. Bobby is first in, last out. And Bobby is the boy he [JFK] listens to.” (Shesol, Mutual Contempt, pp.107–110)

On the other hand, though LBJ’s and RFK’s animus for each other was mutual and well known (“[Robert] Kennedy’s hatred of LBJ was...primitive and unreasoning” [Thomas, Robert Kennedy, p.292]), it is not clear that there was hostility between Johnson and the president himself, as opposed to the president’s staff. Indeed, JFK assistant and historian Arthur Schlesinger Jr., who should know, says, “John Kennedy always had a certain fondness for Lyndon Johnson. He saw his Vice President, with perhaps the merest touch of condescension, as an American original, a figure out of Mark Twain...The President, Ben Bradlee observed in 1963, ‘really likes his roguish qualities, respects him enormously as a political operator.’” And a prominent political analyst at the time, William S. White, said that LBJ “had a cordial relationship with President Kennedy.” How did LBJ feel about Kennedy? Schlesinger says Johnson told Dean Rusk, “He’s done much better by me than I would have done by him under the same circumstances. Kennedy always treated me fairly and considerately.” (Schlesinger, Robert Kennedy and His Times, pp.621–622; William White observation: NBC News, Seventy Hours and Thirty Minutes, p.107) And LBJ was under the impression that JFK “likes me,” but knew that RFK did not (Thomas, Robert Kennedy, p.278).

* - Conspiracy researcher Vincent Palamara makes the same allegation as Zirbel, stating that Yarborough said that Secret Service agent Rufus W. Youngblood “and LBJ were listening to a walkie-talkie with the volume set too low for the Senator to hear what they were picking up” and that presidential assistant Dave Powers “agreed with Yarborough” (Vince Palamara, “The ‘Breakdown’ of the Infrastructure of the Secret Service on November 22, 1963,” Fourth Decade, September 1997, p.20). And Palamara, as opposed to Zirbel, does give a source, but the source he gives doesn’t support what he says. Palamara’s source, page 166 of The Death of a President by William Manchester, reads, “According to Johnson, Rufus Youngblood hurled him to the floor before the fatal shot. Youngblood himself doubts that he moved that quickly. Ralph Yarborough goes further: he insists that Youngblood never left the front seat. It is the Senator’s recollection that the agent merely leaned over the seat and talked to Johnson in an undertone. He contends that there was insufficient space in the rear for Youngblood. Dave Powers, who glanced back, confirms the Senator.” Where Palamara gets his “listening to a walkie-talkie” from this quote, I don’t know.

* On June 18, 1987, the son, Steven Mark Brown, filed a $10.5 million lawsuit against Lady Bird Johnson, claiming, “My legal birthrights have been violated and a conspiracy was formed to deprive me of my legal heirship.” The suit was dismissed in 1989 when Steven, then a naval operations specialist, “failed to appear in court.” (Dave Perry, “Texas in the Imagination,” self-published article, October 26, 2002, pp.10–11; Dallas Morning News, June 19, 1987, p.34A; Dallas Morning News, October 3, 1990, p.A33, obituary of Steven Mark Brown)

* Brown says LBJ invited her to attend the victory party at the Driskill Hotel in Austin, which she did. “He had an apartment in the Driskill,” she said, “and we routinely started having an affair.” (Brown, Texas in the Morning, pp.9, 14; affair at Driskill: Affidavit by Madeleine Brown in lawsuit filed by her son against Mrs. Johnson, Dallas Morning News, June 19, 1987, p.34A) She said the affair continued until 1969 (Dallas Morning News, October 3, 1990, p.A33).

* “I was there,” says Jack Valenti, a former top aide to LBJ, “when President Johnson ruminated about the assassination, and the urgency to enlist the most prestigious citizens within the Republic to inspect this murder carefully, objectively, swiftly” (Bernard Weinraub, “Valenti Calls [movie] ‘J.F.K.’ ‘Hoax’ and ‘Smear,’” New York Times, April 2, 1992, pp.C15, C24).

* Though LBJ blamed Castro for Kennedy's murder, if the Kennedy family ever entertained such thoughts, the sentiment was never picked up by JFK Jr., an extreme unlikelihood if the family had such beliefs. JFK Jr. sought out and had a social dinner with Castro at the Council of Ministers in Havana on the evening of October 27, 1997. And at the end of the very long evening, during which the Bearded One delivered one of his rambling but eloquent multi-hour performances, for which he is famous, JFK Jr. thanked Castro for the evening and said, "I'll bring my wife the next time I come." Does one have such a dinner and conversation with someone he suspects of having had his father murdered? The only reference to the assassination Castro made to JFK Jr. came at the end, when they were leaving the dining room. "You know, Lee Harvey Oswald was trying to come here," Castro said, half a question, half declaration. (As we know, in late September 1963 Oswald had applied for a visa at the Cuban consulate in Mexico City, but his request had been denied.) "Yes, I did know that," JFK Jr. replied. Castro paused, then said, "It was a difficult time, and you know we didn't let many Americans into Cuba." "Yes," JFK Jr. said quietly. It would clearly appear that Castro was offering a veiled apology. He knew that if Oswald had been allowed into Cuba when he applied for the visa, almost assuredly he would not have been in Dallas less than two months later. (George Magazine, October 1999, p.158 et seq.)

‡ “What was your reaction to [being asked to kill] President Castro?” Trafficante was asked in his testimony before the HSCA. Trafficante: “Well, at that time I think it was a good thing because he had established a Communistic base ninety miles from the United States, and being that the government of the United States wanted it done, I’d go along with it, the same thing as a war. I figure it was like war.” (5 HSCA 358)

There are many, like Johnny Roselli, who believe that Trafficante never made any attempt to kill Castro. Another who held this belief was Trafficante’s lawyer, Frank Ragano. Ragano says that when the CIA asked Trafficante to kill Castro, he just played along, believing it would be impossible to kill Castro without the killer or killers getting killed themselves. Even though Castro had caused Trafficante and the mob to lose millions of dollars when he closed down the mob-run casinos in Havana, and the mob had every desire to regain control and ownership of its very profitable gambling empire, Trafficante, Ragano said, was “realistic and philosophical,” viewing it as a “lost cause, especially after the Bay of Pigs,” and had no intention of going after Castro for the CIA. “It was just a big scam. There was no intention, no effort whatsoever to assassinate Fidel Castro.” Ragano said Trafficante told him he lied to the HSCA in 1978 when he testified he had tried to kill Castro. (Interview of Frank Ragano, “JFK, Hoffa and the Mob,” Frontline, PBS, November 17, 1992; see also a long endnote to the section “Cover-Up by the CIA and FBI in the Warren Commission’s Investigation of the Assassination,” on whether JFK authorized the CIA plots to kill Castro)

* Giancana, age sixty-six, was shot twice in the head, once in the region of the mouth, and six times in the neck on June 19, 1975, while he was preparing a late-night snack of his favorite dish, Italian sausage and escarole, in the basement kitchen of his home in the Oak Park area of Chicago. A June 21, 1975, headline story in the Chicago Tribune reported that the Oak Park Police Department had been “watching” Giancana’s home at the time of the murder and “the killer who shot Giancana may have passed directly under the gaze of lawmen.” Earlier on the day of the murder, staff members of the Church Committee had arrived in Chicago to make arrangements with Giancana for his scheduled appearance before the committee in Washington, D.C., on June 24, five days away. That morning’s Chicago Tribune captioned an article “Report CIA Scheme to Poison Castro” that said “the assassination plot...was directed by Sam Giancana and John Roselli.”

At the time of Giancana’s execution-style murder, he no longer controlled the Chicago mob, having lived in exile in Mexico from 1966 to July 18, 1974, when Mexico deported him, and the Chicago “Outfit” had excluded him from all its activities, “believing that the investigations he had inspired had crimped mob business in Chicago.” However, a federal grand jury in Chicago had recently questioned Giancana about mob activities there, and although he hadn’t yet told the grand jury anything of value, the Chicago mob may have feared he eventually would. Time magazine said that “the gang-slaying theory was lent credence by a shadowy report that on hearing of the shooting, the Mafia’s boss of bosses, Carlo Gambino, promptly passed word that Giancana’s killer was to be executed...a frequent Mafia precaution after a major ‘hit.’” (“Demise of a Don,” p.26; Washington Post, June 21, 1975, p.1; Giancana, Hughes, and Jobe, JFK and Sam, pp.65–66; Blakey and Billings, Plot to Kill the President, pp.390–391)

* - What a terrible irony that the person (Castro) whom Oswald may have killed Kennedy for (see discussion under “Motive”) was at that moment in time, unbeknownst to Oswald, wanting to establish a rapprochement with Kennedy, not murder him.

* - Castro himself, who took a law degree from the University of Havana in 1950 and briefly practiced law in Havana, almost exclusively representing the poor, often without fee, in cases with social and political implications, did not come from the poor of Cuba he sought to help. Born in 1926 in the eastern Cuban province of Oriente, his Spanish-born father fought in Cuba for the Spanish army during the War of Independence in 1898, and stayed on to become a sugar plantation owner of some means, leaving an estate of more than $500,000 when he died in 1956. (NARA Record 176-10011-100189, "Psychiatric Personality Study of Fidel Castro," Central Intelligence Agency, December 1, 1961, pp.7, 9, 12, 34; Meneses, Fidel Castro, pp.32-33, 37)

* Bolivar was the Venezuelan revolutionary leader of the early nineteenth century (1783–1830) who led several Spanish colonies in South America in their fight for independence from Spain. The region of northern South America in which he fought now comprises the countries of Bolivia (named in honor of Bolivar), Venezuela, Ecuador, Peru, and Colombia.

‡ That the U.S. government supported Batista and had a friendly relationship with him right up to (but not during or beyond) the point where Batista's government was about to fall to Castro's rebels in late 1958 cannot be disputed. See, for instance, Smith (U.S. ambassador to Batista's Cuba), Fourth Floor, pp.168–176.

* - Che Guevara's biographer, Jorge G. Castañeda, writes that the firing squad executions (mostly at Havana's La Cabaña fortress) have to be seen "within the context of the time. There was no bloodbath... After the excesses of Batista, and the unleashing of passions during those winter months, it is surprising that there were so few abuses and executions" (Castañeda, Compañero, pp.143-144). The chief person in charge of the executions was Castro's younger brother, Raul, described in a 1961 CIA psychiatric study on his brother, Fidel, as "sadistic" ("Cuba: Raul Castro Directly Responsible for 550 Executions," Truth Recovery Archive on Cuba, undated; NARA Record 176-10011-10189, "Psychiatric Personality Study of Fidel Castro," Central Intelligence Agency, December 1, 1961, p.5). The United States publicly deplored the mass executions of Batista's lieutenants, and Castro charged back that the United States had never voiced objections to killing and torture by Batista (HSCA Report, p.104).

‡ Remarkably, the United States did not object to the confiscation of property, per se, U.S. Ambassador Bonsal telling the Cuban minister of state on June 1, 1959, that the United States supported the Agrarian Reform Law “provided just and prompt compensation” was made. On June 11, the U.S. government told the Cuban government that the Reform Law “gives serious concern to the Government of the United States with regard to the adequacy of provision for compensation” to those whose property was expropriated. (HSCA Record 180-10075-10138, Sklar, U.S. Cuban Relations, 1959–1964, p.CRS-9)

* In March of 1959, the Cuban government took over the United States–owned Cuban Telephone Company. In May, in the first large-scale nationalization of foreign-owned companies and industries, the Cuban government began appropriating U.S. companies. By the summer of 1960, Castro had seized more than $700 million in U.S. property. (HSCA Report, p.104)

* - The letter contains fatherly asides to each one of his beloved children. To Sylvia he writes, “Do not abandon your literature. Persevere. Write a good book even though it takes you years.”

* Jeannine Ewing was the secretary to Harry Lane, the executive vice president of sales at National Chemsearch at the time of the assassination. She thinks that Sylvia Odio worked at the company, which had close to 150 employees, for “less than a year.” She went out to lunch several times with Odio and described her as “pleasant and very intelligent.” “Was there anything about her that you would say was goofy or unusual, either in her mannerisms or mentally?” I asked. “Oh, no,” Ewing answered. “But she did say several times that she hated President Kennedy.” Ewing did not personally see Odio faint at work that day, but she knew she did, and heard from others in the office that Odio had said, “I know who did it” just before she fainted. (Telephone interview of Jeannine Ewing by author on February 13, 2006)

‡ The FBI learned about the Odio incident through Odio's friend Lucille Connell (HSCA Record 180-10101-10283, April 5, 1976, pp.1-2), who had learned of the incident from Sylvia's sister Sarita (10 HSCA 28).

* In the FBI's first interview of Odio on December 18, 1963, she said the incident took place in "late September or early October, 1963" (CD 205, p.1).

‡ Checking bus, train, and airline schedules and records, the Secret Service and FBI were unable to firmly establish how Oswald got to Houston from New Orleans on the first day of his Mexico City trip, and whether he visited Dallas in between (WR, p.323; CE 2131, 24 H 717; CE 3086, 26 H 694–698; CE 3075, 26 H 675–678). A statement in the Warren Report that Oswald had told passengers on the bus to Laredo that “he had traveled from New Orleans by bus, and made no mention of an intervening trip to Dallas” (WR, p.324), is an overstatement. The main citation given for this is the affidavit of passengers Mr. and Mrs. John McFarland. Question: “Did he [Oswald] mention any names or places either in the United States or Mexico, in any connection whatsoever?” Answer: “Only New Orleans, whence he said he had come. In the course of conversation, we worked out he must have left New Orleans at about the same time we had left Jackson, Mississippi, i.e., 2:00 p.m. on Wednesday, September 25, 1963.” (11 H 214–215, WC affidavit of Mr. and Mrs. John McFarland) The FBI checked with Greyhound and Continental Trailways bus drivers of all trips out of New Orleans on September 25, 1963 (the date it is believed Oswald left New Orleans), whose destination could have taken Oswald to Laredo, Texas, and none of them were able to recall any passenger resembling Oswald on their trips (CE 2192, 25 H 8).

* When an interviewer from the HSCA spoke to Odio on January 16, 1976, and asked her about the possibility that the man at her door merely looked very much like Oswald, she replied, “When you see someone as close as I’m seeing you now, even closer because we were standing by my door for about fifteen minutes and the light was...coming down upon their faces, when I saw him on television I recognized him immediately. And this guy had a special grin, a kind of funny smirk” (HSCA Record 180-10101-10280, January 16, 1976, p.1), the smirk being an identifying characteristic of Oswald so many other people had commented on.

* - Some have argued that it's highly unlikely the Cubans would be trying to frame Oswald on September 24, 25, 26, or 27, 1963, when Kennedy's itinerary for his Texas visit wasn't announced until November 1, 1963, more than one month later. However, word that the president would be visiting the state first appeared in the Dallas papers on September 13, 1963, and Dallas being the state's second-largest city, it could be assumed that any trip by the president to Texas would probably include his coming to Dallas. Coincidentally, the September 26 edition of the Dallas Morning News had a front-page story on the president's planned trip to Texas. (HSCA Report, pp.37, 132)

‡ Conspiracy author Sylvia Meagher writes that Leopoldo “took pains to plant seeds which inevitably would incriminate Oswald in the assassination...so that an anonymous phone call [from framers] would be enough to send the police straight after [Oswald]” (Meagher, Accessories after the Fact, p.379). But Meagher doesn’t go on to point out that there is no evidence any such anonymous call was ever made.

* Many of those who escaped, after being repulsed on the beaches by Castro's militia, tanks, and planes, were able to get on small rowboats that drifted to one of the nearby keys, where they subsisted on coconuts, crabs, and salt water until they were picked up days later by an American destroyer (Aguilar, Operation Zapata, pp.309, 310). Brigade 2506 was named after the number of the last volunteer who was accepted in Miami to be part of the exile force, Carlos Rodriguez Santana. Santana died in an accident during training in Guatemala. (Rodriguez and Weisman, Shadow Warrior, p.54)

* By “involved,” the president apparently meant “fighting.” Certainly, we were “involved” to the extent that quite apart from the CIA having 588 personnel assigned to the project, as well as organizing and funding the invasion, five U.S. Navy destroyers and the aircraft carrier Essex escorted the anti-Cuban invasion force’s seven vessels (carrying the invasion troops and their supplies) to the beaches of the Bay of Pigs by protecting them in the event of attempted interdiction by Castro’s forces (Wyden, Bay of Pigs, pp.125, 210, 212, 216; 588 CIA personnel: Kornbluh, Bay of Pigs Declassified, p.46).

‡ “Cuba seems to have the same effect on American Administrations,” Wayne Smith, a former U.S. State Department officer in Havana, said, “as the full moon used to have on werewolves” (McKnight, Breach of Trust, p.330).

* - Actually, the first members of the brigade force (officially called the Cuban Expeditionary Force), led by Brigade Commander José Pérez San Román and two teams of six frogmen each, went ashore at Blue Beach at one hour and fifteen minutes past midnight on Monday morning, April 17 (Aguilar, Operation Zapata, p.21; Wyden, Bay of Pigs, pp.131, 217–220). Around sunup, 177 brigade paratroopers also landed, dropped from the sky by six brigade C-46s (Wyden, Bay of Pigs, p.232).

* - What Kennedy also did not authorize and only learned about nearly two years later is that on the morning of April 19, the third and final day of the invasion, CIA Deputy Director of Plans Richard Bissell, in a last-ditch effort to save the invasion, dispatched five American civilian pilots and one Cuban exile pilot, all flying B-26s, from the airfield at Puerto Cabezas, Nicaragua, to the Bay of Pigs, five hundred miles away. They were to provide air cover for the brigade already on the beach, fight Castro's pilots in the sky, and destroy any concentration of Cuban troops and equipment in the combat area. The pilots were all members of the 117th Tactical Reconnaissance Wing of the Alabama Air National Guard in Birmingham who had been enlisted by the CIA in early January of 1961. Twenty other members of a contingent from the Wing were also enlisted to train exile pilots at the Guatemalan air base at Retalhuleu near the Pacific Ocean in the southwestern part of the country and transport the Brigade 2506 invasion force from its training camps in Guatemala to Puerto Cabezas, Nicaragua, the departure point for the invasion. The five American pilots were Riley Shamburger (flying with his observer, Wade Gray—all of the observers were also from the Wing), Thomas "Pete" Ray (with observer Leo Baker), Don Gordon (with Jack Vernon), Bill Petersen (with an exile observer), and Hal McGee (with an unidentified flight engineer from the Wing). The observer for the Cuban exile pilot, Gonzalo Herrera, leaped from the aircraft onto the ground before flight at the Puerto Cabezas air base and fled into the woods, so Herrera flew alone. Though the B-26s inflicted some damage on Cuban forces and supplies on the ground, they were largely ineffective, and two of the American pilots, Shamburger and Ray, together with their observers, Gray and Baker, were shot down over the Bay of Pigs and died. (Persons, Bay of Pigs, pp.4–14, 17–18, 71–72, 89–95, 101, 156 [see also CIA on page 158 of book's index, where the author, a member of the Wing contingent, says his employment contract for the mission was with the CIA]; Thomas, Very Best Men, pp.261–262; on Bissell authorizing the last-minute effort without Kennedy's knowledge and Kennedy finding this out two years later: Wyden, Bay of Pigs, p.278) Ray's son, Thomas Ray Jr., a San Francisco attorney, told me that it wasn't until seventeen years after the invasion that his family got his father's remains back from Castro. Ray said his father and the other pilots worked "for the CIA," and that there was only one flight, but the CIA wouldn't acknowledge this lone flight by CIA pilots "for many years." (Interview of Thomas Ray Jr. by author on November 21, 1997)

* Author Haynes Johnson, in his book The Bay of Pigs, wrote that Castro spoke disparagingly of the brigade “as mercenaries, war criminals and sons of the jaded rich who were coming to regain their vast holdings at the expense of the workers. In reality, Brigade 2506 was a cross-section of Cuba. The men ranged in age from 16 to 61, with the average 29. There were peasants and fishermen as well as doctors, lawyers and bankers. A larger percentage of the men were married and had children, and there were a number of father-and-son pairs aboard the ships. By profession, students, with 240, were the largest group, but there were mechanics, teachers, artists, draftsmen, newspaper reporters, engineers, musicians, three Catholic priests and one Protestant minister, geologists, cattlemen and clerks. Some fifty of the men were Negroes and many more had Negro blood... While the vast majority were Catholics, there were also Protestants and even Jews in the Brigade. With the exception of 135 former professional soldiers—who had served both under Castro and Batista—most of the men had no previous military training or experience.” There were also two Americans in the brigade landing force at the Bay of Pigs, both of whom had helped train the force back at Camp Trax in Guatemala—Grayston “Gray” Lynch and William “Rip” Robertson. Gray and Rip, in fact, were the first to land, as frogmen, in the two beachheads of the invasion, Playa Girón and Playa Larga.

(Johnson with Artime et al., Bay of Pigs, pp.98–99, 103, 106, 221)

But there can be little question that many in the rebel invading force didn't just serve under Batista as a requirement of Cuban citizenship, but had been staunch supporters of him. Castro used this to his political advantage after the rebel invasion was repulsed. President Kennedy was aware of this liability and had ordered that Batista supporters be purged from the exile force. But according to informed rebel leaders, the CIA ignored the order, believing that these men had much needed military experience that outweighed their political background. (Tad Szulc, “Cuba Asserts U.S. Used Batista Men,” New York Times, April 26, 1961, p.2)

* In his speech to the nation's newspaper editors in Washington, D.C., which was carried by national radio and television, Kennedy defended himself from the assaults by many that if America had intervened militarily, the invasion would have succeeded, by noting that "we made it repeatedly clear that the armed forces of this country would not intervene in any way. Any unilateral American intervention in the absence of an external attack upon ourselves or an ally would have been contrary to our traditions."

‡ However, at an August 10, 1962, meeting of the Special Group (Augmented) in Secretary of State Rusk's office, someone, believed to be Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara, raised the issue, for discussion only, of the assassination of Castro being included in Operation Mongoose as an acceptable alternative way of overthrowing Castro's regime. Though memories differed and the minutes of the meeting were silent as to whether the issue was even raised, the consensus is that the suggestion was quickly discarded by the Special Group members, although Lansdale himself acknowledged that thereafter, he "thought it would be a possibility someplace down the road in which there would be some possible need to take action such as that [assassination]." (Alleged Assassination Plots, pp.161–167)

* Though RFK's total immersion in, and direction of, Operation Mongoose cannot be questioned, too many have assumed that he was likewise heavily involved in the Bay of Pigs invasion. But there is no evidence of this. The invasion took place just three months after RFK's brother was inaugurated on January 20, 1961, and although JFK gave his approval to the CIA operation, it had already been in existence for almost a year and barreling down the track when he did so. RFK was aware of the invasion plans, but he was first briefed on the operation by the CIA on April 12, 1961, just five days before the invasion. (Thomas, Robert Kennedy, p.120)

‡ Though all important decisions came from Washington and Langley, the day-to-day operations of Mongoose fell to the chief of the CIA's station at JM/WAVE, thirty-four-year-old Theodore Shackley, considered one of the agency's most promising young men, who was brought back from assignment in Berlin to head a team charged with preparing a "vulnerability and feasibility study" of Castro's regime and then to run JM/WAVE (Branch and Crile, "Kennedy Vendetta," pp.50–51).

* - The Cuban economy did, in fact, begin to deteriorate and weaken. And the paramilitary raids by the exiles caused a fear in Cuba that they foreshadowed another invasion. Arguably, one of the main reasons why Castro turned to Russia for economic support and military assistance was to offset the effects of Operation Mongoose. (Branch and Crile, "Kennedy Vendetta," p.61)

* Kennedy, wanting above all to avoid, if possible, a war of any kind with Russia, wasn't too partial to the aggressive LeMay, much less his suggestion. He told his aide Kenneth O'Donnell, "Those brass hats have one great advantage in their favor. If we...do what they want us to do, none of us will be alive later to tell them they're wrong." (Thomas, "Bobby at the Brink," p.52)

* - The word offensive was set forth in Kennedy's letter to Khrushchev the previous day, October 27. It was in this October 27 letter that Kennedy told Khrushchev that in return for the Soviet Union's removing offensive weapons from Cuba, he was willing to "give assurances against an invasion of Cuba."

‡ Though it has almost been universally accepted that in the confrontation between Kennedy and Khrushchev, Kennedy won (i.e., “Khrushchev blinked”), this depends somewhat on the perspective. In a series of taped interviews of Khrushchev at his dacha near Moscow in early 1967 (he was removed from power in October of 1964), Khrushchev said that the 1962 missile crisis had resulted in a victory for the Soviet Union, reasoning that he had sent missiles to Cuba to protect that country from American attack, and since there was no attack, his action served its purpose. “What was the American aim?” he asked. “They aimed to liquidate Socialist Cuba. The invasion by the Cuban emigres was part of the American plan. Our aim was to preserve Cuba, and Cuba still exists.” (New York Times, June 27, 1967, p.15)

* In fact, in a front-page Miami Herald headline story on November 10, 1963 (just twelve days before the assassination), captioned “War in Cuba: Fidel Battling an Iceberg,” the reporter, Al Burt, quoting unnamed sources of his in the Cuban exile community, wrote that “recent events make it undeniable that a secret war is being waged against Fidel Castro.” Saying that “the full size and scope of the war has not been revealed,” he analogized it to an iceberg, “the part that shows only hints at the part that doesn’t... What is known reveals a well-organized and equipped military operation that... keeps opposition alive inside the island... Sources point out that the war stepped up its pace in the last three months.” Burt also said that on October 21, 1963, “the Cuban Armed forces captured an armed band of infiltrators” who admitted that their mission was to “prepare the people for [an] armed uprising.” (Miami Herald, November 10, 1963, pp.A1, A16; see also Waldron with Hartmann, Ultimate Sacrifice, pp.231–232, 668–669, for discussion of article and its implications) If Burt’s sources were correct, the operation referred to virtually had to have been with U.S. knowledge and support. See also endnote discussion on what we do know was going on at the time—contingency plans for a U.S. invasion of Cuba if an uprising did, in fact, materialize.

‡ He also told them, again to wild applause, that “I can assure you that it is the strongest wish of the people of this country...that Cuba shall one day be free again, and when it is, this Brigade will deserve to march at the head of the first column.” Jackie Kennedy then told the throng, in nearly flawless Spanish, that the brigade members were “the bravest men in the world.”

* As already indicated, support for Kennedy remained strong among many in the exile community. In a 1976 interview with Miami News Latin community writer Hilda Inclan, Carlos Prío, the former president of Cuba, said, “When Kennedy was killed, Cuban exiles here [in Miami] who were active against Castro had not yet lost faith in the President. Cubans were still waiting for Kennedy to fulfill his promise to help free Cuba” (Miami Daily News, May 20, 1976).

Leopoldo, one of the two Cubans who appeared at Sylvia Odio’s door, told her in the telephone conversation the next day that the Cuban people bore no malice toward President Kennedy because of the Bay of Pigs episode (CD 205, p.1, December 18, 1963). This clearly was too broad a statement, of course.

* Indeed, nearly half of the brigade members who landed on the shores of the Bay of Pigs enlisted in the U.S. Army within two months after their liberation.

* - Former attorney general Nicholas Katzenbach told the HSCA that “Hoover resented criticism to a degree greater than any other person that I have ever known...[And] if the Bureau made any mistake or anything for which the public could criticize the bureau, the bureau would do its best to conceal the information from anybody” (3 HSCA 646, 700, Testimony of Nicholas Katzenbach before the HSCA on September 21, 1978). Time magazine went so far as to say that Hoover “cared less about crime than about perpetuating his...image” (“Truth about Hoover,” p.14).

* An internal FBI memorandum of November 27, 1963, from W. C. Sullivan to D. J. Brennan Jr. speaks of “Kostikov’s connection with the 13th Department of the KGB, which handles sabotage and assassinations.” The memorandum goes on to say that this information on Kostikov was “based on data developed both by the Bureau and CIA.”

* The December 20, 1963, report should not be construed to mean that the CIA's knowledge of and interest in Kostikov's possible role in the assassination only commenced weeks or even days after the assassination. Indeed, though a CIA report said there was "little in Headquarter's file on Kostikov," on November 23, 1963, the day after the assassination, the CIA was sufficiently interested in Kostikov to generate this directive from CIA headquarters in Washington, D.C., to its Mexico City station: "Urgently require info Valeriy Vladmirovich Kostikov travels outside Mexico, hour by hour whereabouts 22 Nov...any indications unusual activities involving KGB and Sovemb [Soviet embassy] personnel 17 through 30 Nov." A CIA Teletype from the Mexico City station to headquarters later that day (November 23) confirmed an earlier Teletype that Kostikov had only left Mexico once in September, and "no recent unusual KGB and Sovemb personnel activities 17 Nov to date." (CIA Record 104-10127-10207, "Mexico City Chronology," pp.6, 55)

* - There was no need for the CIA to inform the Warren Commission of the CIA's effort to overthrow Castro. Everyone already knew this. Indeed, President Kennedy even took full responsibility for the failure of the Bay of Pigs invasion back in 1961. What the CIA didn't tell the Warren Commission about was the CIA's plots to kill Castro, and as the Church Committee said, "It is unlikely that anyone in the Warren Commission knew of [the] CIA assassination efforts. Former Senator John Sherman Cooper, a member of the Commission, advised the Select Committee that the subject never came up in the Commission's deliberations. Lee Rankin, Chief Counsel for the Warren Commission, and Burt Griffin, Howard Willens, and David Belin of the Commission staff have all stated they were not aware of the CIA plots." (Church Committee Report, pp.67-68)

‡ The CIA-mob plot to kill Castro was separate and distinct from AMLASH, the code name for the Cuban figure close to Castro with whom the CIA conspired to overthrow Castro (HSCA Report, p.107). See endnote discussion on whether the AMLASH operation included plans for Castro's murder.

‡ When Helms testified before the HSCA three years later, in 1978, he responded similarly. When HSCA staff counsel asked him “why the Warren Commission was not told by you of the anti-Castro assassination plots,” Helms responded, “I [was] never asked to testify before the Warren Commission about our operations.” Question: “If the Warren Commission did not know of the operation, it certainly was not in a position to ask you about it. Is that not true?” “Yes, but how do you know they did not know about it? How do you know Mr. Dulles had not told them? How was I to know that? And besides, I was not the director of the agency, and in the CIA, you did not go traipsing around to the Warren Commission or to congressional committees or to anyplace else without the director’s permission.” “Did you ever discuss with the director whether the Warren Commission should be informed of the anti-Castro assassination plots?” “I did not, as far as I can recall.” (JFK Document 014710, Testimony of Richard Helms before Executive Session of HSCA on August 9, 1978, pp.30–31; 11 HSCA 482–483)

* I suppose it is possible that RFK assumed the Warren Commission already knew much more than he did. He might have assumed that Allen Dulles knew all about the attempts on Castro, and assumed that Dulles, as a part of the Commission, had informed the Commission about them.

* While agreeing to take such a test is a good sign, if you know you're 100 percent innocent but fear the test results might be unfavorable for whatever reason (e.g., the polygrapher is part of a team out to falsely accuse you, or he is incompetent, or you are understandably anxious), refusing to take such a test is not that relevant.

‡ The intelligent Shaw would later observe, in his own way, what so many others have: “People believe in a conspiracy because when death comes to the figure of a prince, as it did to Kennedy, struck down in his prime, it should come under a panoply of great tragedy with all the resulting high court intrigue—almost something out of Shakespeare—not from some poor little psychotic loser crouched with a mail-order rifle behind a stack of cardboard boxes in a warehouse” (Kirkwood, American Grottesque, p.28).

* Garrison's given name was Earling Carothers Garrison. The Iowan legally changed his name to Jim Garrison in the early 1950s.

* Where else but Louisiana would a sitting governor, Huey Long, the “kingfish” of “every man is a king” fame, feel free to joke that “one of these days the people of Louisiana are going to get good government—and they aren’t going to like it.” Long was the Depression-era Louisiana politician who, as governor and then U.S. senator, “dominated every level of Louisiana government by bullying or buying off anyone who got in his way.” He was shot to death in Baton Rouge in 1935 by a Baton Rouge doctor, the son-in-law of a judge who was a bitter enemy of Long’s, and against whom Long, then a U.S. senator, had engineered a bill that would have gerrymandered the judge into a district that would not reelect him. Huey’s brother, Earl, kept the Long dynasty going into the 1960s as a three-time governor, part of his last term being spent in a mental institution his wife had him committed to after he openly started romancing Blaze Starr, a stripper. Earl once said that the voters of Louisiana “don’t want good government. They want good entertainment.” Four-time Louisiana governor Edwin (“Fast Eddie”) Edwards, though not related to the Long family, was just as colorful. Despite his open gambling and deep suspicions of his corruption, the silver-haired, smooth-talking Edwards was very popular with the people, causing him to once boast that the only way he could lose at the polls was if he were “caught in bed with a dead girl or a live boy.” When he ran for reelection in 1991 against former Ku Klux Klan member David Duke, his supporters had bumper stickers that read, “Vote for the crook. It’s important.” After surviving twenty-two grand jury investigations and two trials, Edwards was finally convicted on corruption charges (taking bribes for riverboat gambling licenses) in 2000 and is now in federal prison. (Miguel Bustillo, “Louisiana Tires of Its Rogues,” Los Angeles Times, January 27, 2006, p.A24; Williams, Huey Long, pp.861, 865–866)

* - It all started in Havana in 1988. Stone was there to accept an award for his movie Salvador, to be presented by Colombia's Nobel laureate Gabriel García Márquez. In a "creaky" elevator of Havana's old and venerable Nacional Hotel, which once hosted a big conference of American Mafia leaders, Ellen Ray recognized Stone. She was the New York City publisher of Sheridan Square Press, a very small, now defunct house that published Garrison's book and the Covert Action Information Bulletin, which featured exposés on the CIA. She handed him a copy of On the Trail of the Assassins. Stone initially assumed Ray was "just another sandal-wearing advocate of a cause," but he took the book with him to the Philippines, where he was wrapping up filming for Born on the Fourth of July. The high-stakes tale woven by Garrison of a presidential assassination, with intrigue that in part reminded him of a Raymond Chandler thriller, immediately excited Stone, who thought it a great story. (Robert Scheer, "Oliver Stone Builds His Own Myths," Los Angeles Times, December 15, 1991, Calendar section, p.34; Lambert, False Witness, p.208) In its hardcover edition by Sheridan Square Press, Garrison's book made no splash at all and was mostly ignored by the critics. But the paperback edition by Warner Books, which came out in December of 1991 in virtual conjunction with the movie JFK, spent thirteen weeks on the New York Times best-seller list, several at number one, and has had twenty printings. (Lambert, False Witness, p.208 footnote 2)

* - Stone wrote the screenplay for JFK with Zachary Sklar, the editor of Garrison's book, On the Trail of the Assassins.

* The mesmerizing power to influence viewers that inheres in the movie experience is summed up in a joke comic Mort Sahl tells about a guy who went to see the late Nazi-hunter Simon Wiesenthal, and said, “The good news is that Oliver Stone wants to do a movie on your life. The bad news is that Kevin Costner is going to play Hitler” (USA Today, December 20, 1991).

* Stone's director of photography, Robert Richardson, said that he and Stone tried to create "a strong documentary feel" for much of the movie. In a diary entry during the filming, Richardson wrote, "Utilize the opening documentary material to establish a concrete foundation of factual reality. Let the audience move through the material, never doubting its authenticity." (Fisher, "Why and Hows of JFK," p.45)

‡ To convince his audience they were seeing the truth, Stone used every timeworn, cinematic trick in the book. Just one of many examples: As Entertainment Weekly pointed out, “In JFK’s hierarchy of good and evil, hero Jim Garrison and his staff are uniformly attractive, stalwart, earnest, and often bathed in golden light. Villains Shaw, Ferrie, Jack Ruby and Guy Banister are evasive, unsavory thugs with bad skin, often shown in shifty-eyed close-up” (Daly, “Camera Obscura,” p.17).

* Harry Connick Sr., who was the New Orleans district attorney at the time the movie was made, told me that before Stone started filming in New Orleans, he and Kevin Costner paid him a courtesy visit. Near the end of the visit, Stone asked him, “What about the Clay Shaw case? How do you feel about it?” Connick replied, “I think it stinks, a terrible abuse of prosecutorial power.” Stone, he says, became agitated by this, and fired back, “How do you explain someone being able to fire three rounds within...?” Connick forgets the number of seconds Stone mentioned, or the degree of accuracy Stone said Oswald supposedly had. Connick retorted, “I don’t know what that has to do with Mr. Garrison bringing charges against Mr. Shaw.” Connick said the conversation became heated (Costner, he recalls, said very little throughout and did not join in the dispute), and he tried to explain to Stone the role of a public prosecutor to be fair and seek justice, which, he told Stone, Garrison did not do. When I asked Connick if Stone was interested enough in the true facts of the Shaw case to ask if he and his people could look at whatever files the DA’s office had on it, he said, “No, he never asked me. It was clear he had his agenda, and his mind was already made up.” (Telephone interview of Harry Connick Sr. by author on March 13, 2000)

* Stone did have at least one legitimate and knowledgeable adviser during the filming in Dallas, Jim Leavelle, the Dallas police detective who headed up the Tippit investigation and to whom Oswald was handcuffed at the time he was shot by Ruby. The only problem is that Stone would never take Leavelle's advice. Leavelle said that Stone would ask him how something happened and then change the facts and film it differently. When Stone asked him one time whether he liked what Stone had done, Leavelle, who said he otherwise had a cordial relationship with Stone, told Stone, "It's okay if it's just a movie, but if you want to depict what actually happened, it's not worth a damn." Stone kept pestering Leavelle to play his own part in the movie but the respected former detective declined, telling Stone, "I don't want me or my name attached to the movie because someone might see it and think I approved of this picture." When I asked Leavelle, "I take it you didn't think very much of the movie?" he responded, "Well, they got the city right and the person killed right, but there's not much else that's correct." (Telephone interview of James Leavelle by author on April 11, 2002)

‡ Although there has been no prior in-depth analysis of Stone's movie JFK, which, as indicated, was built around New Orleans DA Jim Garrison's prosecution of Clay Shaw, Garrison's prosecution of Shaw has itself been the subject matter of several books in which Garrison's outrageous and foundationless pursuit of Shaw has been successfully eviscerated and exposed as a fraud. Actually, the first in-depth exposé of Garrison's case was an excellent, thirty-six-page article, "A Reporter at Large," by Edward Epstein in the July 13, 1968, edition of the New Yorker. The most in-depth examination of Garrison's entire fraudulent case against Shaw is Patricia Lambert's 1998 book, False Witness, which also has a very good section on the movie JFK. What follows in these pages concerning Garrison's investigation and prosecution of Shaw is a condensed history of the Garrison-Shaw affair with new material and many new inferences.

‡ For those who wonder why I didn't make it easier on myself by simply using Stone's JFK: The Book of the Film to get all of the dialogue and scenes in the movie as well as Stone's alleged evidentiary support for everything, The Book of the Film does not, as its title might suggest, contain the actual word-for-word dialogue in the movie. On unnumbered page sixteen of the book, Stone acknowledges that it's not a book of the film but of one of the earlier drafts of the script. I found it varied in a number of places from the words in the film, so it could not be relied on. As for Stone's evidentiary support, his chief researcher for the book as well as the film (Jane Rusconi, a recent Yale graduate) for the most part simply used statements made in the past by the very same kooks and nuts Stone presents in the movie, and relied on books and articles previously written by Stone's pro-conspiracy advisers and others of like mind, virtually ignoring the wealth of credible evidence to the contrary.

* - For any reader searching, item number 2 does not appear until page 1381.

‡It should be noted that Stone did find time in his movie to bring out to his audience not just once, but twice, the biographical fact that his hero, Garrison, was a pilot in World War II.

* - Because the States-Item disclosure on February 17 had caused Garrison to sharply curtail using DA funds to pursue his fantasy, on the very day he announced he had “solved” the case, February 24, a group of at least fifty New Orleans businessmen, calling their organization “Truth and Consequences, Inc.,” each pledged $100 per month to help Garrison fund his investigation (New York Times, February 25, 1967, p.56; Los Angeles Times, February 25, 1967, p.1).

* - In addition to all the various conspiracies to murder Kennedy that sprouted from Garrison's pregnant and paranoid mind, Garrison spoke of a massive and ever present second conspiracy by the U.S. government to suppress the truth from the American people. "It did not occur to me," he told a Dallas TV audience in December of 1967, "that the President [LBJ] would have federal agencies conceal the truth from the people. That they would frame a man, Oswald, who had never fired a shot, and that they would knowingly protect the assassins" (Interview of Jim Garrison by Murphy Martin, WFAA-TV, Dallas, Texas, on December 9, 1967). And in a May 29, 1968, press release from his office, Garrison said that "the federal government is a party with a special interest in this case. Our investigation has shown that the federal investigation was faked and the Warren Commission inquiry was faked to conceal the fact that President Kennedy was killed in a professionally executed ambush." Because Garrison's investigation and his allegation of a federal cover-up received national attention, what he was saying was affecting the views of many Americans. A national Harris Poll in early 1967, before Garrison's probe became well known, showed 44 percent of Americans believing Kennedy was murdered as a result of a conspiracy (Washington Post, March 6, 1967). By May of 1967, after three months of publicity about Garrison's charges, a Harris Poll showed 66 percent of Americans now believed there was a conspiracy (Washington Post, May 29, 1967), representing an increase of approximately 30 million Americans. (Epstein, Assassination Chronicles, p.276)

‡Garrison confided in greater detail to famed investigative journalist Jack Anderson, who interviewed him for six hours at Garrison's home in New Orleans. In a long verbal report to the FBI's Cartha D. DeLoach at FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C., on his interview of Garrison, Anderson said it was Garrison's firm belief that Shaw "had been approved by the CIA to engineer a plot that would result in the assassination of Fidel Castro." Garrison said Shaw and his partner Ferrie "conceived the idea of sending Oswald to Mexico in a fake attempt to reenter the Soviet Union" as a device to "gain ready access to Cuba," where Oswald had agreed to kill Castro. Garrison said Oswald returned to New Orleans from Mexico (Oswald went to Dallas, not New Orleans, after traveling to Mexico) and advised Ferrie and Shaw he was backing out of the Castro plot, whereupon Shaw and Ferrie, guided by several anti-Castro Cubans in their midst, then conceived the idea, mostly because of the Bay of Pigs debacle, of having Oswald go to Dallas for the purpose of being a "patsy" for their new plot to kill Kennedy. In a switch from the belief of almost all conspiracy theorists, Garrison told Anderson that Ferrie and Shaw, not organized crime, instructed Ruby to kill Oswald. (Memorandum from FBI Deputy Director C. D. DeLoach to Assistant Director Clyde Tolson, April 4, 1967, pp.1-2; New York Times, February 25, 1967, p.56)

* To get a fuller impression of just how crazy Garrison was, let's look at his December 9, 1967, interview by reporter Murphy Martin on WFAA-TV in Dallas for a further description of how the assassination from the sewer took place: "Just a little bit in front of where the president was killed there is a sewer opening. Dealey Plaza used to have a bunch of houses and they were taken down to make the plaza. You have a surface drainage system with pipes through which a man can crawl. The small ones are fifteen inches wide, and the large ones are thirty inches wide. One of the assassins went...through the subsurface drainage system...[He] was the one who killed the president, [the one] who fired the .45 from right by the side of the car and tore the president's head off. Now, we went into the sewer one morning early...and we found a man fits in there very easily. We also found that after shooting from it, it's easy to crawl under the street through the fifteen-inch pipe, then you're in the thirty-inch sewer which leads out of Dealey Plaza to another part of town. Entrance can be gained...to the sewer area...through a manhole." Garrison said he and some members of his staff had gone to the sewer area "in the dark hours of the morning, and waited till the sun came up, and...you could see so clearly to the occupants inside the [presidential] car." Garrison added that the Warren Commission "refused to look at the [Zapruder] film because they knew [Kennedy] was shot from the front at least twice...They fooled the American people, consciously, knowingly...They [the U.S. government] ratified the execution, and concealed evidence wherever possible. They destroyed evidence in every possible way."

* - With others? What others? Garrison had a grand jury indict Clay Shaw for conspiring with Oswald and Ferrie “and others,” but he at least named Oswald and Ferrie, two human beings. Here, the out-of-control Garrison didn’t even name one person Bradley had supposedly conspired with. Was he suggesting that Bradley had perhaps conspired with Shaw, Oswald, and Ferrie to murder Kennedy? If he was, why didn’t he add Bradley’s name to the existing indictment against Shaw? If he wasn’t saying that Bradley was conspiring with these three, was he suggesting that Bradley was a part of a separate, second conspiracy to murder Kennedy in Dallas? That Bradley and his conspirators just, fortuitously, decided to kill Kennedy at the very same time and place that another group of conspirators, who they didn’t even know existed, did?

* - An endnote to this paragraph sets forth most, but perhaps not all, of the people Garrison charged with crimes if they testified to anything, or did anything, that frustrated his case.

* Knowing the thrust of the NBC special, Garrison, the day before it aired, complained in a letter to the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) that NBC had the “calculated objective” of destroying his case, and asked the FCC to prevent the special from being shown, which the FCC declined to do (New York Times, June 19, 1967, p.27). On June 20, 1967, the day after the NBC special aired, Garrison lashed out at NBC as being a party to the “establishment” conspiracy to destroy him, and implied that the CIA had been behind and had financed the special. Garrison added, for good measure, that “all of the screaming and hollering now being heard is evidence that we have caught a very big fish...It is obvious that there are elements in Washington, D.C., which are desperate because we are in the process of uncovering their hoax.” (Times-Picayune [New Orleans], June 20 and 21, 1967; Epstein, Assassination Chronicles, p.245) Garrison demanded equal time (New York Times, July 5, 1967, p.83). He didn’t get it, but NBC did give him a half hour of prime time on the evening of July 15 to rebut the allegations against him. With an audience of 20 million listening, Garrison elected to not respond directly to the various charges made in the one-hour special (saying he wouldn’t “dignify” them), choosing instead to speak in general terms. “If our investigation was as haywire as they would like to have you think,” he said, “then you would not see such a coordinated barrage [against me] coming from the news centers in the East...As long as I am alive, no one is going to stop me from seeing that you obtain the full truth...and no fairy tales.” (Epstein, “Reporter at Large,” p.64)

* - Watching Shaw walk outside the sheriff's office in the New Orleans County Criminal Courts Building on March 16, 1967, Bundy told Assistant District Attorney John Volz, "That's him. I'm sure of it. He had the same limp when I saw him on the Lakefront" (Memorandum from John Volz to Jim Garrison, March 17, 1967).

* There simply is no space in this book to adequately cover Garrison's entire investigation of Shaw and Shaw's complete trial, although much is included in this book. As I have indicated, entire books have been written on this subject alone, and even these books can only highlight the investigation and trial. However, since the heart of Garrison's case against Shaw was Perry Russo, for those who are interested I have included an in-depth discussion of Perry Russo in an endnote that actually is longer than any discussion of Russo in any book on the case to date.

‡As it was later learned, the jury actually took two ballots. On the first ballot, a high school teacher, impressed with the witnesses from Clinton, Louisiana, who said they saw Oswald and Shaw together in their town (see endnote discussion), voted to convict. On the next ballot, the not-guilty vote was unanimous.

* Though he was found not guilty, the trial cost Shaw over $200,000, which he said was his life's savings, and ruined what had been his excellent reputation in New Orleans. Financially and emotionally broken from Garrison's fraudulent charges, Shaw died of lung cancer on August 14, 1974, before his $5 million civil action against Garrison (filed on February 28, 1970) for malicious prosecution came to trial. Shaw, the man Garrison said had conspired to murder Kennedy, said after the trial, "I was a great admirer of Kennedy. I thought he had given the nation a new turn after the rather drab Eisenhower years...I felt he was vitally concerned about social issues, which concerned me also. I thought he had youth, imagination, style, and élan. All in all, I considered him a splendid president." ("Clay Shaw," p.32)

Despite the overwhelmingly negative publicity, Garrison nonetheless was reelected DA later that same year by an "only in New Orleans" laissez-faire citizenry, but he lost his bid for reelection in 1973. However, he was elected to a ten-year term as an appellate judge on the Louisiana Fourth Circuit Court of Appeal in 1978 and was reelected in 1988. He died on October 21, 1992, at the age of seventy. The death certificate says the cause of death was "congestive heart failure," though his attending physician, Dr. Frank Minyard, said, "It was [the] Kennedy [case] that killed him." On his headstone at the cemetery in Metairie are the words "Let Justice Be Done, Though the Heavens Fall." (Mellen, Farewell to Justice, pp.368–369)

‡At a 1971 hearing, federal judge Herbert Christenberry took notice of the unusual nature of Garrison's conduct, writing, "No witness who testified before this court, including Garrison, could give another instance in which a defendant who took the stand and was acquitted was subsequently charged by Mr. Garrison with perjury" (Shaw v. Garrison, 328 F. Supp. 390, 400 [1971]).

* Garrison's chief investigator at the time, William Gurvich, had a slightly less flattering take on why Garrison continued on after Ferrie's death. He told Newsweek reporter Hugh Aynesworth that the reason Garrison didn't walk away from the case was that "he was already pumped up with the adoration of the conspiracy people and all. He was getting calls from all over the country, from Europe, even from Japan and Australia. He couldn't buy a meal in New Orleans. Or pay for a cab ride. He was exciting the whole town—and boy, was he caught up in it" (Aynesworth with Michaud, JFK: Breaking the News, pp.238–239).

‡After the Second World War, Garrison joined the army reserve. In 1951 his reserve unit was called to active duty for the Korean War, which had started the previous year. Garrison, after being hospitalized at the U.S. Army Hospital in Fort Sill, Oklahoma, and Brooke Army Hospital at Fort Sam in Houston, Texas, from August to October 1951, was discharged from active duty with the rank of captain on October 31, 1951, effective January 9, 1952, “by reason of physical disability.” Doctors at Brooke Army Hospital in Texas found that he was suffering from a chronic moderate “anxiety reaction,” manifested by chronic hypochondriasis (the psychiatric term for hypochondria, the abnormal condition characterized by a depressed emotional state and imaginary ill health), exhaustion syndrome, and gastrointestinal discomfort, and that he had a “severe and disabling psychoneurosis of long duration. It has interfered with his social and professional adjustment to a marked degree. He is considered totally disabled from the standpoint of military duty and moderately incapacitated in civilian adaptability. His illness existed long before his call to active duty, July 24, 1951, and is of the type that will require a long-term psychotherapeutic approach, which is not feasible in a military hospital.” (New York Times, December 30, 1967, p.28; Flammonde, Kennedy Conspiracy, pp.11–12; Rogers, “Persecution of Clay Shaw,” p.54; Lambert, False Witness, pp.13–14)

The story of Garrison’s psychiatric history first broke in a December 29, 1967, copyrighted article in the Chicago Tribune. Garrison fired back that same day through his chief assistant, Charles Ward, who said that army doctors had diagnosed his boss as having an “anxiety reaction during the Korean War. They subsequently concluded that if it was there, it’s gone now. The Army would not allow a man who had a psychiatric illness to hold the rank of lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserve” (New York Times, December 30, 1967, p.28).

* Garrison's constant charge was that the CIA (or rogue elements thereof) was behind the assassination. Yet, with Shaw on the witness stand and the golden opportunity to cross-examine him, Alcock never asked Shaw one single question dealing with his alleged association with the CIA or any other federal agency of U.S. intelligence.

* Garrison, the man who conducted one of the most fraudulent prosecutions in the annals of crime, did tell the jury, however, that “the government’s handling of the investigation of John Kennedy’s murder was a fraud. It was the greatest fraud in the history of our country. It probably was the greatest fraud ever perpetrated in the history of humankind.”

‡One additional benefit to Garrison of only charging Shaw with conspiracy is that under Louisiana law, instead of the normal requirement that all twelve jurors must concur in order to convict, when conspiracy alone is alleged, only nine out of twelve jurors must concur to render a guilty verdict (La. Stat. Ann., Code of Criminal Procedure, Art. 782). So Garrison only needed nine jurors to convict Shaw. He couldn't even get one.

‡ Since we know Garrison's conduct was inexcusable and he brought severe discredit to the prosecutorial profession, what does that say about his assistants who did not leave the office—as some of their colleagues did, out of disgust—but instead soldiered on to do Garrison's bidding for him? It would seem they were either remarkably simple-minded, or equally complicit with Garrison, or too weak of character to stand up to him. On October 11, 2000, I wrote the following letter to two of Garrison's principal assistants and spear-carriers against Shaw—lead trial prosecutor James Alcock, now a lawyer in private practice in Houma, Louisiana, and Andrew Sciambra, the assistant of Garrison's who was most responsible for the testimony of Garrison's principal witness against Shaw, Perry Russo. Sciambra is presently a magistrate judge of the Criminal District Court in New Orleans:

Dear Mr. Alcock (Mr. Sciambra),

I am a lawyer and author from Los Angeles who is presently in the process of writing a book about the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Although the focus of my book will not be the Garrison investigation and prosecution of Clay Shaw, I will be writing a certain amount about it. As a former prosecutor, I can tell you in all candor that I'm finding it very difficult to come up with anything good to say about the handling of the case by the New Orleans DA's office. Since you were an integral part of that investigation and prosecution, I'd like to interview you about your involvement in the case. It seems to me that if there was any legal or moral justification for the conduct of your office in this case, you would be one of the few people who would be in possession of this information, and I would be very interested, of course, in hearing it, and incorporating your account into my book. If you are inclined to grant me an interview, please write me at [my address] and I will then work with your secretary in setting up a time that will be convenient for you.

Sincerely,
Vincent Bugliosi

If you know that Garrison's and your investigation and prosecution of Clay Shaw are going to be critically examined in a major book, and if you know there is a good defense for your conduct, I would think you'd make sure that your defense would be presented in the book. But neither Mr. Alcock nor Mr. Sciambra responded to my letters.

* Although the New Orleans DA's office, and later, the HSCA, spelled her name "Cheremie," it's clear from her FBI rap sheet that when using this alias at the time of her many arrests, she invariably spelled her name without the "e" at the end (FBI Record 2 347 922).

* - In uncharacteristically sloppy scholarship, the HSCA wrote that Cherami reportedly told the police that she and the two men she was with were “transporting a quantity of heroin from Florida to Houston at [Jack] Ruby’s insistence” (10 HSCA 199). But there is no record of her having ever said this, and the HSCA listed, as its only source for this, an article in the March 1977 edition of Argosy magazine. The article’s author, without citing any source for his statement, wrote that “Rose Cherami and a companion were driving back from Florida with a shipment of dope that was bound for...Jack Ruby.” (Martindale, “Bizarre Deaths following JFK’s Murder,” p.52) Author Gerald Posner took the erroneous HSCA statement and made it worse by writing that Cherami had said “that she had been thrown out of the car by Ruby” (Posner, Case Closed, p.446).

* - Officer Andrews closed the case as an “accidental death,” though he felt it was curious that Cherami, if she was hitchhiking, would be on Highway 155 as opposed to “one of the U.S. Highways.” But Andrews, probably not familiar with Cherami’s background of narcotic stupors, would not have known that the disoriented Cherami may not have even known where she was.

* Not only was Oswald a committed Marxist to the day he died (“I’m a Marxist,” he told Captain Fritz on the morning he was killed by Ruby [Kelley Exhibit A, 20 H 443; CE 2064, 24 H 490]), but even though he was disillusioned with Russia, not believing the Russians were truly following the Marxist dream and blueprint, he remained much closer to Russia than to the United States. Ruth Paine told me, “He did not encourage Marina to learn English,” but because “she wanted to, she tried to read the labels on cans or read grocery ads where there were pictures to help her. He spoke to her only in Russian, and wouldn’t help her with English.” Indeed, she said, “If I started to talk to him in English he’d answer in Russian.” (July 13, 1986, typewritten response to author by Paine to questions 18 and 19(a), among 123 questions submitted by author to her)

* - As far as Oswald's palm print being found on the rifle, Stone shows a federal agent (presumably FBI) putting Oswald's palm print on the rifle when Oswald's body was at the morgue (see long endnote discussion).

‡ However, as Stone's Garrison tells the audience, even if it was Oswald who killed Tippit, it was only because he realized he was being set up as a patsy. And therefore, in the audience's mind, the killing was more in the nature of self-defense, and hence would not connect him to the assassination of Kennedy.

* I have no idea why sophisticated conspirators like the CIA, military-industrial complex, et cetera, would want so many killers and accomplices (ten to twelve) at the assassination scene, which would mean that not just one, but all ten or twelve would have to escape, thereby immeasurably increasing the likelihood of detection and apprehension.

* - As we know, the Warren Commission and the HSCA, as well as all the many forensic pathologists who either conducted the autopsy on the president or studied the autopsy photos and X-rays of his wounds, concluded that only two shots hit the president, and both struck him from the rear. Stone, of course, doesn't tell his audience any of this.

‡The famous photo of Witt sitting on the edge of the grass on the north side of Elm, his feet on the sidewalk and a black man to his right, was taken shortly after the shooting in Dealey Plaza (4 HSCA 432–435, 441).

‡ Portions of the opened, black umbrella can be seen fairly clearly to the right of the Stemmons Freeway sign in the lower left part of Zapruder frames 223–228.

* We can thank Oliver Stone for some small favors. At least he didn't put on screen the accusation by conspiracy theorist Robert B. Cutler in his 1975 self-published book, The Umbrella Man, that Witt's umbrella actually had a sophisticated, battery-powered, rocket-launcher attachment that fired a fléchette (a small, steel dart) containing a paralyzing chemical into the president's throat at Zapruder frame 183 (in a 1976 copyrighted diagram, Cutler changed the frame to 188) to neutralize him so that his head would be a stationary target during the shooting sequence by multiple assassins almost immediately thereafter. (4 HSCA 437; Benson, Who's Who in the JFK Assassination, p.97) This is too much even for conspiracy author David Wrone, who writes, "How does one aim a miniature fléchette hidden in an umbrella and at right angles to the target without a sight?" (Wrone, Zapruder Film, p.100)

‡ Quite apart from the fact that there was no credible evidence that Shaw used the alias Clay Bertrand, as Shaw would later say, “For about 17 or 18 years I had been managing director of the International Trade Mart here [in New Orleans], and in that capacity I was in the public eye a great deal. I was on television quite often and my picture had been in the local papers. I attended many civic affairs, luncheons, meetings. In addition, I’m a highly recognizable fellow. I’m rather outsized—6 ft., 4 inches tall—and I have a shock of prematurely grey hair that is almost white. In a town of this size, where I had made perhaps 500 speeches and knew literally thousands of people, the idea that I would go around here trying to use an alias is utterly fantastic.” (“Clay Shaw,” p.31)

* - At the Shaw trial, Eugene Davis testified that he had met Andrews at a gay bar in the Quarter around 1956 or 1957, and had known Andrews through the years. He testified he was never introduced to anyone as Clay Bertrand and had never used that name. Further, that he did not call nor have telephone contact with Andrews on the day of the assassination or any of the days immediately following the assassination. (FBI Record 124-10067-10035, FBI report of Eugene Davis's testimony at Clay Shaw trial on February 27, 1969, gathered from the New Orleans Times-Picayune, February 28, 1969, p.2) At the grand jury proceedings in the Shaw case, Davis testified that Andrews had represented him on two legal matters, that he, Davis, had never had or used an alias, had never known or met Lee Harvey Oswald, had no idea who Clay Bertrand was, if there was such a person, and had "never, never" attended any gay wedding. Davis said he had two sons and a daughter with a wife who had "run off with somebody else." At the end of his testimony, lamenting the fact that he had been dragged into the case with all the unfavorable publicity in the media, Davis said, "Whoever is using me as a black sheep, or whatever the thing is here, I sure would appreciate it, Mr. Garrison, if you would get to the bottom of this." (Transcript of testimony of Eugene Davis before Orleans Parish grand jury, June 28, 1967, pp.1, 4-6, 9, 14, 19-20, 24-25)

* - Indeed, Andrews told the grand jury that he had told Garrison personally that Shaw was not Bertrand. “I told the Jolly Green Giant [Garrison’s nickname] in Brennan’s [Broussard’s?] restaurant he wasn’t that.” Question: “You told Garrison that?” Answer: “Right. I told him that Clay Shaw was not Bertrand.” (Transcript of testimony of Dean Andrews before the Orleans Parish grand jury, June 28, 1967, p.12)

‡ Banister had been the special agent in charge of the Chicago office of the FBI in the late 1940s and early 1950s. After his retirement from the bureau in 1954 he moved to New Orleans and in the mid-1950s became the assistant superintendent of police with the New Orleans Police Department. In 1957, New Orleans mayor De Lesseps “Chep” Morrison fired Banister after he allegedly threatened a waiter at a New Orleans restaurant with his revolver. Shortly thereafter, he set up his own private detective agency in New Orleans, where he remained until his death from a heart attack in 1964. Although by all accounts he was sympathetic to right-wing causes, and stridently anti-Communist, Jim Garrison’s description of him as a “rigid exponent of law and order” probably defined who he was even better. That’s why he had index cards in his office not only on 27,000 Communists in the United States but also on members of the Nazi Party and Ku Klux Klan. (Garrison, On the Trail of the Assassins, p.2; HSCA Record 180-10072-10214, Interview of Joseph Newbrough Jr. by HSCA on April 10, 1978, p.1; 10 HSCA 126)

*- In 1993, a photograph surfaced of a Civil Air Patrol (CAP) cookout in New Orleans, showing Ferrie and Oswald in it, though not anywhere near each other. At the time the photo was taken, sometime in 1955, Oswald, who joined the CAP briefly on July 27, 1955, was clearly a member of the group, but Ferrie, a pilot who had previously commanded the group, was not, having been expelled from it on December 31, 1954. However, he apparently continued to be associated with the group in an unofficial capacity, and the HSCA was unable to determine if Ferrie and Oswald actually knew each other in the CAP. (9 HSCA 103–115) With respect to Ferrie having no recollection of ever having met Oswald, even if Ferrie had met Oswald at a CAP meeting, as the owner of the photo, John Ciravolo, told author Patricia Lambert in a July 9, 1997, interview, “I’m in the picture [too], and I’m sure David Ferrie wouldn’t remember me, either” (Lambert, False Witness, p.61). Prior to the emergence of the photograph, the person most cited as putting Oswald and Ferrie together at the CAP in New Orleans was Edward Voebel, a high school friend of Oswald’s in New Orleans who got Oswald interested in the CAP unit. Voebel testified before the Warren Commission that Oswald only attended “two or three meetings” and then “lost interest.” Voebel said, “I think [Captain Ferrie] was there when Lee attended one of those meetings, but I’m not sure of that.” (8 H 14)

* For many at the time, the sudden and untimely death of Ferrie, just four days after he had been identified in the media as a target of Garrison's investigation, seemed to confirm Garrison's allegation that powerful, unknown forces were behind the assassination, forces that would never permit Garrison to peel away the layers to the truth. "He sure took a bad time to die," Attorney General Ramsey Clark told President Johnson on the evening of Ferrie's death (Tape-recorded conversation between Clark and LBJ at 6:40 p.m., February 22, 1967, in Holland, Kennedy Assassination Tapes, p.402). To a media that was becoming impatient with Garrison for his failure to provide substantive evidence of his startling charges, Ferrie's death caused a heightened interest in the case. Maybe, the journalists thought, Garrison was on to something after all. The problem for Garrison was that, if we're to believe him, with Ferrie's death he had lost his main suspect in the Kennedy assassination. But Garrison was not about to let a little thing like death derail his determination to solve the assassination. Within three short days, he had a new chief suspect, Clay Shaw, and four days later, March 1, introduced Shaw to the world when he placed him under arrest for having conspired to murder Kennedy.

* Ferrie elaborated on the problem in an earlier interview with the FBI. He said he had been working as an investigator and law clerk for Gill since March of 1962. Martin began visiting him at Gill's office, and because Gill didn't want Martin "hanging around" his office, Ferrie admits he put Martin out of Gill's office in an undiplomatic manner. Since that time, Ferrie said, Martin had been out to hurt him "in every manner possible," including, finally, trying to connect him with the assassination. (CD 75, pp.287, 293, FBI interview of David Ferrie by SAs Ernest C. Wall Jr. and L. M. Shearer Jr. on November 25, 1963)

* I say “virtually” as opposed to “positively” because at a press conference on February 22, 1967, the coroner, Dr. Chetta, theorized the possibility of a link between Ferrie’s aneurysm and suicide if Ferrie ingested pills to kill himself and the pills induced such violent retching that it burst a blood vessel (Los Angeles Times, February 24, 1967, p.6). But this was before the negative toxicology report came out on February 24. On February 25, Chetta announced to the media that there was “no indication whatsoever of suicide or murder” in Ferrie’s death. (Times-Picayune [New Orleans], February 26, 1967; see also Los Angeles Times, February 24, 1967, pp.1, 6)

* But the person who Garrison says reignited his interest in investigating the assassination in the autumn of 1966 (and before he called Martin into his office) was the U.S. senator from Louisiana, Russell Long, whom he knew and whose father was Huey “Kingfish” Long, the most colorful and powerful politician in Louisiana history. In November of 1966, Garrison found himself, as noted earlier, seated on a plane next to Long on a flight from New Orleans to Washington, and when the subject turned to the Kennedy assassination, the senator expressed his doubts about the Warren Commission finding that Oswald had acted alone. He just didn’t believe that Oswald, using a cheap, bolt-action rifle with a defective scope, could have fired two out of three shots with deadly accuracy at a moving target. Someone else was also involved, Long told Garrison, who at that time had put the Kennedy assassination behind him. When Garrison asked Long who would have had a motive to kill Kennedy, Long replied, “I wouldn’t worry about motive until I find out if there appeared to be more than one gunman.” After returning to New Orleans, Garrison, who respected Long’s intelligence and stature, immediately ordered the entire set of Warren Commission volumes to study, and he was on his way. (Garrison, On the Trail of the Assassins, pp.13–15; Mann, Legacy to Power, pp.254–256; Morning Advocate [Baton Rouge], February 21, 1967)

* - Assassination researcher Gus Russo believes that when the national office of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee denied Oswald's request to set up a local chapter in New Orleans, he simply appropriated this address near where he worked to give the appearance of substance to his one-man operation (Russo, Live by the Sword, p.550 note 23).

* Even without Beverly Oliver's admission, it appears obvious from the Babushka Lady photo that Oliver was not she. Photos of Oliver at the time show her to be a teenager of average weight. But even though one can't see her face, the Babushka Lady gives every appearance of being heavier and much older, almost matronly.

* Beverly Oliver is so outrageous that in 1997 she contacted James Earl Ray's lawyers with some explosive information. Ray, in Memphis, Tennessee, had been arguing that a mysterious and long-sought figure he had met by the name of "Raoul" was the mastermind behind the assassination of Reverend Martin Luther King Jr., and it was Raoul, not he, who had shot and killed King on April 4, 1968, in Memphis. (Ray pled guilty in 1969 and was sentenced to ninety-nine years in prison, but in later years tried to set aside his conviction on the ground that he was innocent and had been coerced into pleading guilty.) Oliver told Ray's lawyers that at the time she met Oswald and Ferrie at Ruby's nightclub, Raoul was with them. (Michael Dorman, "Prosecutors Probe Claims by Ray's Lawyers about King Assassin," Newsday, December 10, 1997, p.A24)

* - Also historians agree that JFK and his brother RFK were of the same mind about virtually every issue pursued by the Kennedy administration. Indeed, as one author wrote, RFK was “his brother’s troubleshooter, lightning rod, spokesman, adviser, no-man [as in yes and no], eyes and ears (‘Little Brother Is Watching’), whiphand overseer of the FBI and CIA and [all of the] presidential wishes and thoughts that the President would not let himself be heard to speak” (Beschloss, Crisis Years, p.303). No one (except, perhaps, Oliver Stone’s X, who did not exist) was more aware of JFK’s disenchantment with the CIA over the Bay of Pigs than former CIA director Richard Helms, who was the CIA’s chief of operations at the time. In his memoirs, he writes that in the wake of the Bay of Pigs, “at the Agency [CIA] the impression was that Robert Kennedy...would serve as his brother’s vengeful hatchet man.” But Helms goes on to say that “whether it was the result of General [Maxwell] Taylor’s perceptive and levelheaded approach, the influence of Admiral Burke and Allen Dulles [JFK had appointed General Taylor to head the aforementioned executive inquiry as to why the Bay of Pigs invasion had failed, and Burke, chief of naval operations, and CIA Director Allen Dulles were on the committee], or his own findings, [Robert] Kennedy was to develop a more balanced view of the Agency than he had in the days after the collapse of the ZAPATA [code name for invasion] operation. In the weeks that followed, we were relieved to learn that he was a quick study. The two months of back-to-back interviews and briefings with the committee left Kennedy with an abiding interest in covert action and a measure of respect for the Agency.” Elsewhere, Helms, who worked very closely with RFK for over a year on Operation Mongoose, the administration’s effort to overthrow Castro, said about RFK, “as always speaking for his brother.” (Helms with Hood, Look over My Shoulder, pp.182, 205)

‡That the majority of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (one of whose members, Air Force Chief of Staff Curtis LeMay, Kennedy almost outwardly detested because of his crude bravado and hard-line, saber-rattling rhetoric) wanted our nation to militarily intervene in Vietnam has been established and is almost a given. That's usually, though not always, the military's mindset. As General George S. Patton Jr. wrote in a letter to his hero, General John J. (Black Jack) Pershing, at the time of the First World War, "War is the only place where a man really lives." Indeed, as far back as October of 1961, the Joint Chiefs of Staff took the position on Vietnam that "the time is now past when actions short of intervention by outside forces could reverse the rapidly worsening situation" (Joint Chiefs of Staff memorandum to Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara on October 5, 1961). It also is well known that Kennedy's relationship with the nation's military leaders was only lukewarm. Basically, he did not trust their judgment, particularly after the Bay of Pigs, where they had endorsed the CIA operation, and they weren't enamored with his overly cautious military instincts. But where is there any evidence in American history that when our military leaders wanted a war and their commander in chief wouldn't give it to them, they even thought about murdering him, much less actually doing it?

* Our military presence in Vietnam (opposing Communism), in the form of military advisers, arms, and equipment, dated back to the administration of President Eisenhower during the Indochina War between France and the Vietminh, the Communist-led Vietnamese nationalists. The war, which started in 1946, ended with the Geneva Accords of 1954 (which the United States refused to endorse) calling for the withdrawal of all French troops from Indochina (which included Vietnam [divided by the Accords at the 17th parallel into North and South Vietnam], Cambodia, Laos, Thailand, Malaya, and Burma), which the French had dominated and colonized since the mid-nineteenth century. By the end of the war, the United States had 342 military advisers in Indochina, mainly in Saigon, assisting the French Expeditionary Corps.

* Stone told the National Press Club that his movie JFK “suggests it was Vietnam that led to the assassination of John Kennedy, that he became too dangerous, too strong an advocate of changing the course of the Cold War, too clear a proponent of troop withdrawal for those who supported the idea of a war in Vietnam” (C-Span transcript of appearance by Oliver Stone before National Press Club on January 15, 1992, p.5).

‡NSAM 273 came out of the now famous “Honolulu Conference” of November 20, 1963, at CINCPAC (Commander in Chief of the Pacific) headquarters in Hawaii. There, President Kennedy’s top national security people, including Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara, Secretary of State Dean Rusk, CIA Director John McCone, and McGeorge Bundy met to formulate a post-Diem (South Vietnamese President Ngo Dinh Diem was assassinated on November 2) American foreign policy vis-à-vis Vietnam, the withdrawal plans for the 1,000 troops, and the increase in U.S. covert actions against the North Vietnamese. (Newman, JFK and Vietnam, pp.429–435; O’Leary and Seymour, Triangle of Death, p.49) Author Craig Roberts erroneously writes that the draft of NSAM 273 was “prepared for LBJ” (Roberts, Kill Zone, p.98). But not only was the draft prepared while Kennedy was still alive, but its language can only be interpreted as referring to President Kennedy, not LBJ.

* One thing that militates against Kennedy ever sending combat troops to Vietnam and, even if he decided he wanted to, to his not ordering U.S. soldiers to engage in armed conflict in Vietnam without an actual congressional declaration of war (as opposed to the mere congressional resolution in 1964 flowing from the Gulf of Tonkin incident, which was cited as support for our further military involvement in Vietnam) is that Kennedy, unlike so many of his predecessors and successors, understood that as president he did not have the constitutional right to engage the nation in war. Although Article II, Section 2 (1) does provide that “the President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States,” technically this only places the president at the head of this nation’s armed forces. It clearly envisions, as a predicate to his conducting war as the head of the nation’s armed forces, that war has been declared. And Article I, Section 8 (11) (“The Congress shall have power...to declare war”) exclusively and unambiguously gives that power to Congress, not the president. So much for the apparent intent of the framers of the Constitution. The reality is that throughout this nation’s history, presidents, with out the approval of Congress, have time and again committed American military forces abroad. In fact, only five times in the nation’s history has Congress declared war: the War of 1812; the Mexican War, 1846; the Spanish-American War, 1898; World War I, 1917; and World War II, 1941. Political commentator Russell Baker has wryly observed that “presidents now say, sure, the Constitution gives Congress the right to declare war, but it doesn’t forbid presidents to make war, so long as they don’t declare it. As a result, the declared war has become obsolete. Its successor is the undeclared war.”

In a March 1962 press conference, Kennedy said that if combat troops “in the generally understood sense of the word” (i.e., fighting soldiers, not advisers) were required in Vietnam, that would call for a “constitutional decision, [and] of course, I would go to Congress” (Schlesinger, Robert Kennedy and His Times, pp.708–709). Kennedy’s realization that a congressional declaration of war was truly necessary may have had at least some deterrent effect on him, if only in the sense that he knew that if he were going to follow the Constitution he could not commence war at his whim, but would have to negotiate a major, heavily publicized hurdle in Congress.

* “As is stated in the Pentagon Papers, NSAM 273, ... only three days after [Johnson] assumed the Presidency, was intended primarily to endorse the policies pursued by President Kennedy and to ratify provisional decisions reached in Honolulu just before the assassination” (Pentagon Papers, vol.3, p.2).

‡As George Lardner, national security reporter for the Washington Post, said, “There was no abrupt change in Vietnam policy after JFK’s death” (George Lardner Jr., “On the Set: Dallas in Wonderland—How Oliver Stone’s Version of the Kennedy Assassination Exploits the Edge of Paranoia,” Washington Post, May 19, 1991, p.D5).

* Ken O'Donnell, Kennedy's appointments secretary and political right hand, says that actually, Kennedy would have wanted to withdraw American troops before 1965, but, as he told Senator Mike Mansfield (who recommended to JFK that we withdraw from Vietnam after JFK sent him there in 1962 to assess the situation) during a meeting in the Oval Office in the spring of 1963, "I can't do it until 1965—after I'm reelected." O'Donnell quotes the president as telling him after Mansfield left the office, "In 1965, I'll become one of the most unpopular presidents in history. I'll be damned everywhere as a Communist appeaser. But I don't care. If I tried to pull out completely now from Vietnam, we would have another Joe McCarthy red scare on our hands, but I can do it after I'm reelected. So we had better make damned sure that I am reelected." (O'Donnell and Powers with McCarthy, Johnny, We Hardly Knew Ye, pp.16, 472)

* - A reference to the North Vietnamese Communist government (Democratic Republic of Vietnam) of President Ho Chi Minh in Hanoi, which supported militarily and manipulated the Vietcong in their joint effort to overthrow the South Vietnamese government (Republic of Vietnam) of President Ngo Dinh Diem in Saigon.

* As we know, the number of American combat troops in Vietnam would eventually swell to over 500,000, of whom 58,000 would die. The Vietnam War (called the American War by the Vietnamese) would claim an estimated 3.6 million Vietnamese lives. (David Shipler, “Robert McNamara and the Ghosts of Vietnam,” New York Times Magazine, August 10, 1997, pp.30, 50; the highest troop deployment was 529,000 in 1968: New York Times, January 28, 1973, p.1) Although the number of troops deployed and casualties were vastly greater in the Second World War (as well as the First World War), remarkably, by December of 1967, “the United States had dropped more tons of explosives—1,630,500—on North and South Vietnam than it did on all World War II targets (1,544,463) and twice as many tons as were dropped during the Korean War” (Wicker, JFK and LBJ, p.286).

America’s military involvement in Vietnam ended with the cease-fire agreement signed in Paris on January 27, 1973, by representatives of the United States, North Vietnam, South Vietnam, and the Vietcong (New York Times, January 28, 1973, pp.1, 24). On March 29, the last U.S. combat troops in Vietnam were withdrawn. However, the war continued between North and South Vietnam until Saigon, South Vietnam’s capital, fell to the Communists on April 30, 1975. Today, of course, there is no North and South Vietnam, just the one Communist nation of Vietnam, whose capital is Hanoi. Saigon was renamed Ho Chi Minh City.

* - See endnote for a discussion of the allegation that the Gulf of Tonkin incident was staged and used as a pretext by LBJ to go to war.

‡A classic day during this period wherein Johnson must have felt like he was the rope in a tug-of-war, being pulled from both sides, was July 1, 1965, which was after the war had begun but before the big buildup. Undersecretary of State George Ball, a lone dove among the Vietnam principals in the Johnson administration, sent LBJ a memo forcefully and presciently arguing that a massive intervention in Vietnam would inflict a terrible toll on this country. “The decision you face now, therefore, is crucial,” Ball said. “Once large numbers of U.S. troops are committed to direct combat they will begin to take heavy casualties in a war they are ill-equipped to fight in a non-cooperative if not downright hostile countryside. Once we suffer large casualties we will have started a well-nigh irreversible process. Our involvement will be so great that we cannot—without national humiliation—stop short of achieving our complete objectives. Of the two possibilities, I think humiliation would be more likely than the achievement of our objectives—even after we have paid terrible costs.” Ball recommended “cutting our losses” and withdrawing from Vietnam before it was too late, or making U.S. deployment there very limited. That same day Johnson received a memo from Ball’s superior, Dean Rusk, who had come over to the side of the hawks, arguing that South Vietnam had to be defended from Communist aggression with U.S. troops. “The integrity of the U.S. commitment is the principal pillar of peace throughout the world,” Rusk argued to LBJ. “If that commitment becomes unreliable, the communist world would draw conclusions that would lead to our ruin.” Rusk predicted that if the Communists in Vietnam were not stopped, it would “almost certainly” end in a “catastrophic war” for America. (Pentagon Papers, vol.4, pp.22–23; vol.3, p.415)

* Two other contravening dynamics were at play here, however, both of which involved pride and human weakness. Johnson knew that his cherished “Great Society,” the label given to his administration’s effort to eliminate poverty in America—the one, he thought, that would be “his passport to historical immortality”—would necessarily be compromised by the budget demands of a war in Vietnam. But he told his biographer, Doris Kearns, “Losing the Great Society was a terrible thought, but not so terrible as the thought of being responsible for America’s losing a war to the Communists. Nothing could possibly be worse than that.” (Kearns, Lyndon Johnson and the American Dream, pp.210–211, 259–260; see also Dallek, Flawed Giant, p.400, for Johnson pestering the director of the Bureau of the Budget, Charles Schultz, to cut back on reform programs) What Johnson wanted, of course, was to have it both ways, which he could do if he could find a peaceful resolution to the mushrooming conflict in Vietnam.

The other dynamic was a quite ironic one, particularly in the fact that, though it was coming from his political Left, it may possibly have been more influential on his ultimate decision to go to war than that which was coming from the war hawks on his Right, and that was “the almost obsessive intensity of Johnson’s feelings about Robert Kennedy,” which had been reciprocated by Kennedy, even more so, since the Democratic convention in 1960. Kearns writes that “Kennedy’s mere existence intensified Johnson’s terror of withdrawing from Vietnam. And when Kennedy became an open opponent of the war [this] only helped to stiffen his [Johnson’s] unwillingness” to yield in Vietnam. (Kearns, Lyndon Johnson and the American Dream, p.259)

‡Not only was LBJ depicted in the film as wanting war, but Stone makes it very clear in the film that he believes LBJ was part of the conspiracy to murder Kennedy. At the moment in the movie when X tells Garrison about “the perpetrators” of Kennedy’s assassination, Stone spotlights LBJ and the Joint Chiefs of Staff with real television footage. Indeed, he has Garrison tell his staff in the movie, “This was a military-style ambush from start to finish, a coup d’etat, with Lyndon Johnson waiting in the wings.”

If the old injunction “Put your money where your mouth is” has merit, and assuming, as some conspiracy theorists like Oliver Stone suggest, that the military-industrial complex conspired with the CIA and with LBJ to murder Kennedy, a 1965 CIA document titled “Cost Reduction Program” is not helpful to them on the CIA and LBJ part of the conspiracy. As indicated previously in an endnote to the “CIA” section, according to the document, the last CIA budget under Kennedy, in 1963, was $550 million. The very next year, under LBJ, it dropped to $517 million, and was $525 million in 1965. It dropped again to $505 million in 1966, an amount supplemented by $40 million for “Southeast Asia escalation.” Some thanks from LBJ to a group (CIA) that along with the military-industrial complex supposedly murdered Kennedy to make him president. Although the CIA would later tell Steven Aftergood, a senior research analyst at the Federation of American Scientists, that the 1964–1965 figures were “not accurate,” one wonders if the agency said that only because it was not ordered to disclose the budget for these years to Aftergood, as it was for 1963. After all, the 1964–1966 figures appear in an official CIA document titled “Cost Reduction Program, FY 1966, FY 1967, Central Intelligence Agency” dated September 1, 1965, that was declassified from Top Secret on March 10, 1998.

* Surely, one of the catalysts for Johnson's decision was the run for the Democratic nomination for president by Minnesota senator Eugene J. McCarthy. Although McCarthy's candidacy was at first thought to be quixotic, he inspired thousands of young people throughout the country with his strong anti-Vietnam War position and rhetoric, and they mobilized their support for him in the 1968 New Hampshire primary, "hordes of them" traveling there to knock on doors, stuff envelopes, and do whatever they could to help his cause. At the time, it was assumed that Johnson would seek reelection, though he had not formally declared and was not on the primary ballot. Alarmed by the increasingly popular campaign of McCarthy, New Hampshire Democratic leaders organized a major write-in campaign for Johnson and they were confident of victory. Johnson won, but not handily, getting 49 percent of the vote to McCarthy's 42 percent, a result that shocked the political world. The president's vulnerability suddenly becoming evident, just four days later Senator Robert F. Kennedy, who had decided earlier not to run, announced his candidacy. As with McCarthy, he tethered it to the antiwar movement. Just two weeks later, Johnson announced he would not seek reelection. (Art Pine, "Eugene McCarthy; Candidacy Inspired Antiwar Movement," Los Angeles Times, December 11, 2005, pp.A1, A34)

* But I understand. Stone simply didn't have room in his three-hour-and-eight-minute film for the additional seventeen words italicized above. Just like Ken Starr, in his September 9, 1998, report to Congress on the President Clinton–Monica Lewinsky scandal, couldn't find the space in his 452-page, 119,000-word report—one that was overflowing with one sexually explicit reference after another, many of which Starr found the space to repeat—to include these seventeen words of Ms. Lewinsky's testimony before a federal grand jury: “The president never asked me to lie, and no one promised me a job for my silence,” words that severely undercut Starr's obstruction-of-justice charge against Clinton. But again, I understand. There was a space problem. But I wonder if Starr would have managed to find room in his extensive report if Lewinsky had testified, “The president asked me to lie, and I was promised a job for my silence.”

* On the issue of what Kennedy would have done, if any politician at the time was more aware of the consequences of inaction when action was called for it was Kennedy. Indeed, in his senior year at Harvard, he wrote a thesis on the British and French appeasement of Hitler at Munich that was so well received by the faculty it enabled him to graduate cum laude even though he had previously been a mediocre student. He decided to expand the thesis into a book, Why England Slept, that became a best seller in the summer of 1940. So Kennedy could have been expected to have all tentacles out assessing the danger to America, if it existed, of withdrawing from Vietnam.

‡Someone who did know Kennedy fairly well, and whose job included studying Kennedy closely, was Sander Vanocur, the White House correspondent for NBC during the Kennedy administration. Vanocur said Kennedy “was, by temperament...a man governed at all times by a sense of restraint and proportion.” (Vanocur, “Kennedy’s Voyage of Discovery,” p.42)

‡ The late army colonel David H. Hackworth, who received seventy-eight combat awards during the Korean and Vietnam wars and was often referred to during his lifetime as “America’s most decorated living soldier,” said that “most combat vets pick their fights carefully. They look at their scars, remember the madness, and are always mindful of the fallout” (Los Angeles Times, May 6, 2005, p.B12).

* - Although as early as 1950, the Soviet Union and Communist China recognized Ho Chi Minh's revolutionary and Communist-controlled "Democratic Republic of Vietnam" as the sovereign government of Vietnam (Butwell, Southeast Asia, pp.23, 28), this doesn't alter the fact that the United States intervened in an essentially internal civil war between North and South Vietnam, not a war intended by North Vietnam to help spread global Communism. In fact, Ho Chi Minh, though a Communist, rose to power as the leader of a nationalist (not Communist) movement to resist France's continued rule in the country. (Butwell, Southeast Asia, p.23) And, as Leslie Gelb, a senior official in LBJ's administration, writes, with the defeat of South Vietnam "no dominoes fell." He goes on to say that three years after the fall of Saigon in 1975, "the standing and the power of the U.S. in Asia were greater than at any time since the end of World War II." (Gelb, "Would Defeat in Iraq Be So Bad?" p.40)

* “This treaty is not the millennium,” Kennedy would say about the treaty that banned nuclear testing “in the atmosphere, in outer space, and under water.” He said, “It will not resolve all conflicts, or cause the Communists to forgo their ambitions, or eliminate the dangers of war. It will not reduce our need for arms...But it is an important step—a step toward peace—a step toward reason—a step away from war.” The treaty, very reluctantly agreed to by Kennedy’s own Joint Chiefs of Staff, culminated five years of negotiation. It did not ban nuclear testing underground because of Soviet opposition to on-site inspection. (Joint Chiefs of Staff reluctantly agree: Schlesinger, Thousand Days, pp.896, 912–913) Kennedy viewed the test ban “the touchstone of his entire foreign policy,” and once told an aide who was very close to him that if he had to lose the 1964 election because of it, then he was “willing to pay the price.” (Vanocur, “Kennedy’s Voyage of Discovery,” p.45)

* - It is by no means certain that there was any missile gap at all. Indeed, there are those who believe that if there were such a gap, it was in America's favor, and Kennedy knew it, his political campaign allegation being disingenuous. However, this has not been proved.

* - LBJ's reference in an interview with Leo Janos to the CIA-backed attempted assassination of Fidel Castro (Janos, "Last Days of the President," p.39).

* Manchester writes that at Parkland Hospital in Dallas, Steve Landregan, the hospital administrator who was asked to call O'Neal's mortuary for a casket for the president, couldn't get an outside line because "Dallas' Southwestern Bell...was crippled by overloaded exchanges and circuits." He "ran from office to office, picking up receivers" until he finally got "a dial tone." (Manchester, Death of a President, p.291)

* This is what Stone's chief advisers on the movie have said about JFK: "The most accurate and influential depiction of the evidence in the Kennedy assassination since the Zapruder film was shown on 'Goodnight America'" (Grodan, Killing of a President, p.210); "What the movie has done is to annihilate the Warren Commission" (Prouty, "President Kennedy Was Killed by a Murder, Inc.," p.37).

‡In many interviews he has gone further. He told Time magazine in 1991, “We did a lot of homework.” He said his technical advisers went over the script with a “fine tooth-comb. Everything that we have in there we stand behind.” (Morrow and Smilgis, “Plunging into the Labyrinth,” p.76)

* There was one good fallout from the movie JFK. As noted earlier, it provoked an outcry by many of those who had seen the movie that all the files on the assassination be opened up and all documents be released to the American public, documents that otherwise were not scheduled to be released until the year 2039. Not just Congress, but the White House and the National Archives were inundated by phone calls and letters demanding that all assassination documents be released to the public. In fact, every Warren Commission assistant counsel still alive (twelve), as well as past presidents Richard M. Nixon and Gerald R. Ford, joined the chorus demanding the opening of the files, and Congress responded with “The President John F. Kennedy Assassination Records Collection Act of 1992,” which ordered the release of all assassination-related documents. (See long endnote discussion.) If Stone’s movie had been discredited by those who were knowledgeable about the assassination, it had achieved a measure of legitimacy, thanks to Congress. To the point, in fact, that even some who recognize Stone’s movie as being a cinematic fraud wonder aloud if, in the last analysis, the movie should be looked on positively. But using the same reasoning, perhaps we should give the Third Reich credit for the creation of the state of Israel.

‡ At bottom, what caused Stone to believe all these groups and people were involved in Kennedy's assassination? As I've said earlier in this book, he embraces the non sequitur that if someone has a motive to commit a crime, he must have done it. "If you understand 'why' [we believe] Kennedy was killed," he said while filming JFK, "then you begin to understand 'who' [killed him]" (Interview of Stone in Dallas Morning News, April 14, 1991, p.8C).

* - A major Hollywood studio doesn't normally fork over $40 million blindly to fund a picture, but that appears to be what happened here. Stone got a handshake deal for a $20 million budgeted movie (later increased to $40 million) before cappuccino was even served at a 1989 dinner at The Grill restaurant in Beverly Hills. Stone, accompanied by his CAA agent, Paula Wagner, made his "pitch" to Terry Semel, president and chief operating officer at Warner Bros., Bob Daly, chairman of the board and chief executive officer at the studio, and Bill Gerber, a studio production executive. Semel did read Garrison's book, at Stone's suggestion, and said he was "blown away by the fact that clearly something else happened" than what the Warren Commission had concluded. (Los Angeles Times, December 15, 1991, Calendar section, pp.5, 28, 33)

* - Apart from the fact that most people instinctively want to believe there was a conspiracy in the assassination, perhaps the biggest reason why the JFK conspiracy phenomenon will continue indefinitely is that nutty or huckster authors and television documentarians will keep it alive by seizing on one (or more) of the literally hundreds of erroneous and mostly ridiculous allegations that swarms of people have made in the past. The author or documentarian only has to negotiate three hurdles, two of which are disposed of in less than a second. First, the fact that the allegation is silly on its face, though it should be a problem, is no problem at all since most of the author's or documentarian's audience is predisposed to believing in the conspiracy theory of the assassination, and hence isn't likely to find the allegation ridiculous. The second problem—that the person making the allegation and the allegation itself have already been completely and thoroughly discredited—is easily handled simply by not mentioning this fact to the reading or viewing audience. The third and final problem the author or documentarian has to deal with is the one that takes all his time and energy. But if he is persistent, as most are, he invariably succeeds. He tries to find the original person (or persons) who made the allegation (or, if he or she has died, their children, spouse, and other surviving relatives) as well as other people who lend support to the allegation. In this latter regard there always are more than enough people out there who are either kooky themselves (like the original alleger) or not kooky but willing to make sufficiently irresponsible remarks that in some way support the allegation and therefore warrant their being mentioned in a book or scene in a TV documentary.

The above is the basic template for the continuing life of the conspiracy movement by way of new books and television documentaries. As with much of the past, it is my belief that almost every book, movie, or television documentary on the assassination in the future will be very likely to follow, in one form or another, this template.

* Here's a very small sampling of what all conspiracy theorists do—have to do—since they are unable to offer any evidence of a conspiracy. “I believe the CIA...role in the Kennedy assassination was this: they presented members of organized crime, who had a major bone to pick with the Kennedy administration, with the opportunity and plan. All the Mafia had to do was carry it out. And that's exactly what happened” (Wecht, Cause of Death, p.71). “Angry talk in the corporate boardrooms may have grown into deadly plots on golf courses...But oilmen...could not have moved against Kennedy on their own. They needed allies within government and within the intelligence community. Such allies were there—among the anti-Castro Cubans, in the CIA, organized crime, and within the federal government. All were most receptive to the idea of a change of leadership” (Marrs, Crossfire, p.278). “*My personal inclination is...*that Lee Harvey Oswald fired no shots at President Kennedy or Governor Connally and that he was...a patsy, set up to take the blame while the real assassins escaped” (Kurtz, Crime of the Century, p.xxvii). “My opinion...[is that] the Mafia joined forces with a few Kennedy haters from the CIA, radical anti-Castro Cuban exiles, and others in the extreme right wing, both civilian and military. A plan was formulated to assassinate the president... Hoover and Johnson were brought into the plot. Their role was to prevent a serious investigation of the crime” (Twyman, Bloody Treason, pp.832–833).

Not one of the above conspiracy “theorists,” and the thousands of others exactly like them, produced for their readers one speck of evidence to support their naked conjecture.

‡Note that peripheral figures in any conspiracy would be more likely to come forward because their limited role would not result in serious punishment—in fact, most likely no punishment at all because of a plea bargain in which they'd have to name higher-ups. And their inducement would be considerable financial rewards (books, TV movies based on their disclosures, etc.). And mere informants, who wouldn't be exposed to any legally adverse consequences, would only have financial rewards for coming forward.

* - In addition to the representatives of the group or groups (CIA, military-industrial complex, mob, etc.) the conspiracy theorists claim were behind the assassination, these original conspirators would be forced to enlist the cooperation and services of an ever-expanding group of conspirators to help them conceal and cover up their guilt, and what had actually happened, an expansion that would necessarily become bigger and bigger with the passage of time to the point of farce, the number of people required to be a part of the conspiracy ending up in the thousands, with only Yankee Stadium being able to accommodate one of their reunions.

For instance, if the conspiracy involved the framing of Oswald (as most conspiracy theorists believe), almost every individual piece of evidence against Oswald would itself require the complicity of several people in the conspiracy. Just one example: Firearms experts for the Warren Commission (four experts) and HSCA (five experts) concluded that the two bullets that struck and killed Kennedy were fired from Oswald's rifle. But if, in fact, Oswald's rifle wasn't the murder weapon, this means that the conspirators would have had to approach these nine experts and get them to lie, to say that it was the weapon. Now multiply this additional number of nine people many times over for many other pieces of evidence against Oswald (e.g., fingerprint experts, handwriting experts, witnesses who said they saw Oswald at the Tippit murder scene, the three autopsy surgeons and all the other pathologists who later concurred in their essential findings). Indeed, did the conspirators get Howard Brennan to say he saw Oswald firing a rifle in the sniper's nest, Dallas police officers to say Oswald pulled his gun on them when they approached him in the Texas Theater, even his wife, Marina, to say she felt positive he had killed Kennedy, and that he had confessed to her his attempted murder of General Walker? Et cetera, et cetera.

* “Here we were, seven men, I think five of us were Republicans,” Commission member John McCloy said. “We weren’t beholden to [the Johnson] Administration. Besides that, we had our own integrity to think of. You can rely on common sense. And you know that seven men aren’t going to get together, of that character, and concoct a conspiracy, with all the members of the staff we had [one general counsel, fourteen assistant counsels, eleven staff members], with all of the investigative agencies [working under us]. It would have been a conspiracy of a character so mammoth and so vast” (Transcript of CBS News Inquiry: The Warren Report, part IV, June 28, 1967, p.13, CBS Television Archives).

* Recall that Oswald told his wife he was “tired of living alone,” that he didn’t want her to remain with Ruth Paine any longer, and that if she were willing he would “rent an apartment in Dallas tomorrow” for the two of them and their children (1 H 65–66, WCT Marina N. Oswald).

‡Of course, using this type of “but for” causation, we could say that if someone had bought Hitler’s paintings in Vienna in 1913, perhaps the Second World War would not have taken place.

* This, in fact, is why he found the repressive Soviet system intolerable. Oswald's ability to hold down some menial jobs there and here in the United States, where the instructions were minimal and based not on the caprices of his supervisors but on the requirements of the job itself, and where his very survival (food and shelter), as well as that of his wife and children, depended on his employment, cannot be cited as an exception to the aforementioned character trait of independence that Oswald had.

* The Warren Commission, to check on the possibility of a conspiracy in the assassination, ordered an extremely thorough investigation of Oswald's finances by the IRS and the FBI, covering the period June 13, 1962, when he returned from the Soviet Union, up through the date of his arrest on November 22, 1963. Inquiries were made at banks in New Orleans, Fort Worth, Dallas, Houston, and Laredo for any record of a checking, savings, or loan account or a safe-deposit box in the name of Oswald, any of his aliases, or members of his immediate family. No such account or safe-deposit box was located. The FBI did find one bank account of Oswald's prior to the subject period. Before he left for the Soviet Union, and while he was stationed at the U.S. Marine Corps Air Station at El Toro, Oswald opened up a savings account at the West Side State Bank in Fort Worth with a deposit of $200.00 on December 8, 1958. Interest of $3.00 was credited to the account on June 3, 1959, and the account was closed on September 14, 1959, with the amount on deposit at the time being $203.00. Telegraph companies were also checked for the possibility of his having received money orders. Also, personnel at all locations where Oswald was known to have cashed payroll and unemployment checks were queried as to the possibility of his having cashed other checks. Further inquiries were made at Oswald's places of employment, at his residences, and with local credit associations, hospitals, utility companies, state and local government offices, post offices, employment agencies, et cetera, for any evidence of Oswald being in possession of extra money. Nothing turned up. And Marina testified she knew of no sources of income her husband had other than wages and unemployment compensation during this period. The Commission's investigation of Oswald's income and expenditures during this period was so comprehensive and precise that, remarkably, the amount its investigators and accountants estimated Oswald had on November 22, 1963, turned out to be within $19.00 of what he actually had. They found that Oswald received a total of $3,665.89 in cash during this period from wages, unemployment compensation, loans, and gifts from friends, and they estimated his expenditures to be $3,501.79, leaving a balance of $164.10. At the time of Oswald's arrest, he had, we know, $13.87 on his person and had left $170.00 behind for Marina at the Paine residence. (WR, pp.328, 745; 1 H 82-83, WCT Marina N. Oswald; see also, for example of inquiries into Oswald's finances, CE 1135, 22 H 114-115; CE 1141, 22 H 126-151; CE 1164, 22 H 215-222; Oswald's Fort Worth bank account: CE 1150, 22 H 180)

One amusing incident in the Commission's effort to find out where every penny came and went with Oswald was when staff member Richard Mosk called Time magazine to double-check on his $3.87 yearly subscription. A subscription employee asked Mosk, "Where is Mr. Oswald now?" (Gest, Shapiro, Bowermaster, and Geier, "JFK: The Untold Story of the Warren Commission," p.38)

* Oswald's 1962 federal income tax return listed a total income of $1,354.06, $727.81 in wages from Jagers-Chiles-Stovall and $626.25 from Leslie Welding Company; $57.40 in withholding tax was deducted from his wages. But even this $57.40 represented a significant amount of money to Oswald. He attached to his return a letter in which he said that in view of his having two dependents in 1962, "I believe if you check your records...you will find I should get a substantial refund from the taxes taken from my wages for fiscal 1962." (CD 107, pp.38-39, January 13, 1964) Though it wasn't much, Oswald did receive a 1962 income tax refund check from the federal government for $57.40 on April 2, 1963 (CE 1165, 22 H 224).

* Wounding rather than killing one's adversary is also militarily advantageous in that the wounded soldier requires, at an absolute minimum, at least one other soldier to take care of him, thus removing two of one's enemy from the battlefield.

‡ Most police departments use soft-point bullets, principally because they don't want their bullets to pass through the body of the intended target and kill innocent people nearby (1 HSCA 378).

* Per Gary Mack, curator at the Sixth Floor Museum at Dealey Plaza in Dallas, the building is no longer there, the Woodhall Rogers Freeway going right through the old location (Interview of Gary Mack by author on March 14, 2002).

* - Silencing Oswald by driving him to his execution after he left the Book Depository Building would have made infinitely more sense to the conspirators than waiting until he was in police custody to do so. With Oswald heavily guarded, they'd have to know it would be much more difficult and problematic that they'd be able to get close enough to Oswald to kill him, and even if they did, they'd know this second hit man of theirs would himself be immediately apprehended and grilled by the authorities.

* - The argument that Ruby later told the Warren Commission he did not have his revolver that night, that he had lied when he said he did to save his life (how?) (5 H 205, 14 H 553), is unavailing. Not only is it likely he did, since this was his first story, but even if he didn't, if he had been given the assignment by the mob to kill Oswald (obviously as soon as possible before further interrogation of Oswald continued) he would have been armed that Friday night.

* Ruby's killing of Oswald not only is no evidence that Ruby silenced Oswald for the mob as so many people believe, but actually is further evidence of no conspiracy in the assassination. Such an act by Ruby would have been extremely unwise for any group of conspirators, and this fact would have been very obvious to them. As I argued to the jury in London, "By having Ruby kill Oswald, they would be increasing the peril of their own apprehension" (Transcript of On Trial, July 25, 1986, p.1049). Since the killing took place right in front of over seventy Dallas law enforcement officers, the conspirators could be 100 percent certain that Ruby would be arrested immediately and grilled thereafter. Secondly, the conspirators would also know that if Ruby was unsuccessful in his effort to shoot Oswald (or even if he did succeed but Oswald managed to survive because of immediate medical attention), then they'd have to worry not just about one, but two people talking. And at that point, what possible reason would Oswald have for continuing to protect those who were behind his act once he learned they had tried to murder him? Even if we were to assume the optimum, that the conspirators somehow knew that Ruby would succeed in killing Oswald immediately, what would they gain by eliminating one conspirator (Oswald) when in the process they would automatically be turning over a new conspirator (Ruby) to the authorities? And let's not forget that the conspirators had to know (the thought would have had to have entered at least one of their minds) that by having someone kill Oswald, a great many people who were not even thinking of a conspiracy in the assassination would be now, thinking that a group of conspirators may have been behind Oswald's act and they decided to silence him. How could any conspirators possibly believe that drawing attention to the possibility of a conspiracy would have helped them?

* Not according to New Orleans DA Jim Garrison, who believed that elements of “the intelligence community” (primarily, he says, “individuals in the CIA’s covert operations apparatus”) were behind Kennedy’s murder. “As soon as the non-participating elements in the intelligence community saw that a coup d’etat had occurred, they moved quickly to support the official story. Motivated in some instances by self-preservation and in others by a belief that Kennedy had brought the assassination on himself by compromising too often with the Soviets, the remainder of the government—from high elected officials to heads of departments and agencies—lined up to add their solemn voices to the growing chorus chanting the great lie.” (Garrison, On the Trail of the Assassins, pp.324, 331) Can you imagine that, folks, “the remainder of the government”? If most conspiracy theorists had just one tiny speck of common sense about the assassination inside their brain, it would be extremely lonely.

* Although having nothing to do with the Kennedy assassination or his prosecution of Ruby or even his long career as a criminal prosecutor, ironically another case, and a civil one at that, has been more responsible for the fame of Wade's name, the 1973 U.S. Supreme Court abortion case of Roe v. Wade. In 1969, a Texas woman, unmarried and pregnant and using the pseudonym Jane Roe, filed a class-action suit in a federal court against Wade, seeking an injunction prohibiting Wade's office from enforcing the Texas law that made abortion a crime. Wade resisted and the case finally reached the U.S. Supreme Court, which, in a 7-2 ruling, struck down the abortion laws of Texas and Georgia (a companion case to Roe was also heard by the court) and legalized abortion throughout the land.

‡ Alexander referred to himself as the “chief prosecutor since...I put the prosecution’s case together. Henry Wade, of course, being the district attorney, sat in on it” (Sneed, No More Silence, p.542, interview of Bill Alexander).

* Howard told the media he had handled at least thirty-five capital cases “and I’ve never had a client executed” (New York Times, November 26, 1963, p.15). But the trial lawyer hasn’t been born who can get thirty-five life sentences (or acquittals) in thirty-five cases where the DA was seeking the death penalty—at least not in Texas. Indeed, it’s very unlikely that the coarse-tongued Howard, who was married to a woman who had shot and killed her lover, had even tried anywhere near thirty-five capital cases. Dallas prosecutor Jim Bowie said, “Tom Howard defends whores and pimps [and] does it damn well.” (Wills and Demaris, Jack Ruby, pp.83, 85)

* When Wally Weston, a comedian who worked at Ruby's Carousel Club as the master of ceremonies, went to visit Ruby in jail, he said the first thing Ruby said, and with a smile, was, "I got balls, ain't I, baby?" Weston responded, "Yeah, Jack, and they're going to hang you by them, too." (Transcript of "Who Was Lee Harvey Oswald?" Frontline, PBS, November 16, 1993, p.42)

‡Reportedly, the first big-name lawyer the Ruby family sought before Belli was the legendary Houston criminal defense attorney Percy Foreman. But Foreman wanted a guarantee of $75,000, which the Rubys were unwilling to pay, and additionally, he rubbed Earl Ruby the wrong way. (Aynesworth with Michaud, JFK: Breaking the News, p.171; “Good-by Belli,” p.19) I’ll never forget an appearance I had on The Merv Griffin Show years ago with Foreman, when Foreman told an open-mouthed Griffin, “Merv, all my clients are poor. They’re either poor when they walk in the door, or poor when they walk out. I take everything they have,” whereupon he proceeded to enumerate what he took. I don’t remember exactly what that included but I vaguely recall his saying their home, paintings on the wall, motorcycle, and so on.

‡ Everything about Belli, his clothing, his words, his lifestyle (he was married six times), even his law office, fell into this category. About the last he said, “Some say my office at 722 Montgomery Street looks like a gold-rush whorehouse, but actually it’s a museum of my life and travels. San Franciscans love to gawk in the windows. And the Gray Line has the office on one of its tours” (Belli with Kaiser, Melvin Belli, photo section).

* Pronounced “Bell-eye” “not Belli” as in one’s belly, he would lecture any members of the media who, perchance, were among the few who hadn’t heard his name pronounced before.

‡Belli, often called the “Father of Demonstrative Evidence,” started to popularize this method of presenting evidence to a jury in the early 1940s in San Francisco. His theory, undoubtedly true, was that in addition to telling a jury what the evidence was, if you could let them see and feel the evidence, even taste or smell it, your chances of favorably reaching the jury were enhanced.

* In fact, the New York Times had observed that Ruby's shooting of Oswald "marked the first time in 15 years around the globe that a real-life homicide had occurred in front of live cameras... The Dallas shooting [was] easily the most extraordinary moments of TV that a set owner ever watched" (New York Times, November 25, 1963, pp.1, 10).

* Before Belli's doctors examined Ruby, Dallas assistant DA Bill Alexander, who had known Ruby on a friendly basis for many years, took Dallas psychiatrist Dr. John Holbrook into Ruby's cell the day after he shot Oswald to examine Ruby. At a later bail hearing for Ruby, Alexander testified that when Ruby asked him, "Shall I talk to him, Bill? What would you do?" he said, "Jack, all we want is a fair, square psychiatric evaluation of you. If you're nuts, you ought to go to the state insane asylum, and if you're all right, we are going to have to prosecute you. I would talk to the man." In response to Ruby wondering if he was "getting into some kind of trap," Alexander testified he said, "No, Jack. I wouldn't let any friendship go down the drain just to mess you around." (Belli with Carroll, Dallas Justice, pp.58–59) (Alexander told me that on the stand he had "cleaned up a little" what he told Ruby. He said he actually told Ruby, "Jack, if you're crazy you need to go to the insane asylum. And if you're not crazy, we're going to try to burn your ass." Alexander also denied telling Ruby of their friendship. "I knew Ruby for ten or twelve years," he told me, "but we weren't friends. Never had a cup of coffee with him. Never went to his club. I used to bump into him at sporting events and around town. What I told Jack was 'I've known you too long to fuck you.'" [Telephone interview of William Alexander by author on December 11, 2001]) When Alexander was asked on the stand if, in fact, the very next day, after conferring with Holbrook and being assured that Ruby was not insane, he told the press that he intended to prosecute Ruby for murder and ask for the death penalty, Alexander answered, "I sure did." (Belli with Carroll, Dallas Justice, p.59; after conferring with Holbrook: Kaplan and Waltz, Trial of Jack Ruby, p.60)

Was it duplicitous of Alexander to encourage Ruby to talk to Holbrook? Not if you know Alexander the way I think I've gotten to know him. He's just a straight shooter who would prosecute his...well, you know whom I mean, if she ran afoul of the law. At the trial, Alexander, who once said that impeachment was too good for Earl Warren—he needed hanging—told reporters, "They want to examine Ruby's brain? We'll be glad to deliver it to them from Huntsville after we fry him." (Gertz, Moment of Madness, p.6) Frontier lore and legend have invariably focused on the marshals and sheriffs of the lawless West, not the prosecutors, but the tall, rawboned Alexander, with his gallows humor told with a slight grin, would have fit the mold precisely.

* In another appearance on The Merv Griffin Show I won't forget, this time with Belli, Griffin would ask Mel a question, he'd answer, then he'd ask me a question, and Mel would try to answer that question too. I'm pretty aggressive in a courtroom, but since this was not a trial or even a debate, I was more amused than anything else. I chuckled to Griffin during a break, "Merv, Mel loves the camera and I'm not going to compete with him for it. If you want me to be more involved you'll have to be more insistent that you want to hear from me." I forget just what happened during the next segment or two but my recollection is that I participated more.

* - Indeed, in his daily diary, one of the jurors, J. Waymon Rose, wrote that Ruby “looks pitiful and alone, as though he is a head of cabbage.” Elsewhere, he referred to “the pitiful, lost look” Ruby had in his eyes. (Dallas Morning News, August 3, 2002, p.30A)

* Despite this critical testimony by Dean against Ruby (whose truthfulness was challenged by a Warren Commission assistant counsel—see endnote discussion), Dean, who admitted being a friend of Ruby's and the recipient of a bottle of whiskey from him every Christmas, said that after the trial Ruby sent word he wanted to see him in his jail cell. "He hugged me and was glad to see me," Dean recalled. "I saw he had a pair of broken glasses, so I got the prescription and bought him a new pair." Eight months later Ruby gave Dean his copy of the Warren Commission Report with the inscription, "Your Buddy, Jack Ruby." (Earl Golz, "Ex-Officer Fears 'Set-up,'" Dallas Morning News, March 25, 1979, p.34A)

‡In fact, although prosecutor Bill Alexander told me he did not believe that Ruby was insane or even mentally ill, he acknowledged to me that Ruby was “wired up different.” Of course, for even a straight shooter like Alexander, it would be mighty difficult for him, as Ruby’s prosecutor, to acknowledge that Ruby was mentally ill. (Telephone interview of William Alexander by author on December 11, 2001)

As part of Ruby’s insanity defense, Belli attempted to introduce at the trial certified copies of the hospital commitments for mental illness of Ruby’s mother, Fanny, one of his brothers, Earl, and one of his sisters, Eileen, on the ground that mental illness ran in his client’s family and was hereditary, but Judge Brown ruled the documents were “not admissible...under Texas law.” However, in his direct examination of Dr. Martin Towler, Belli did sneak into the record that Ruby’s mother had been hospitalized for mental illness. (Kaplan and Waltz, Trial of Jack Ruby, pp.214, 225, 242; Earl Ruby’s hospitalization in a psychopathic ward: 14 H 372, WCT Earl Ruby)

* - The closest Belli came to establishing his point was not from the testimony by his psychiatrists and medical witnesses but from the testimony of one of Ruby's strippers at the Carousel Club, Penny Dollar (true name, Patricia Ann Kohs). Kohs said that one of Jack's fights at the Carousel Club was with a taxi driver. "Jack knocked him down the stairs," she told the jury. "Then we came down...Jack was beating his head on the sidewalk. Then he stopped all of a sudden and said, 'Did I do this?'" (Belli with Carroll, Dallas Justice, p.171)

* In the federal courts, as opposed to most states, when a defendant pleads not guilty by reason of insanity, the prosecution has the burden of proving, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant was sane at the time of his act. Most legal observers agree that this very high burden of proof in the federal courts was largely responsible for the not-guilty-by-reason-of-insanity verdict in the trial of William Hinckley for the attempted assassination of President Ronald Reagan in 1981.

‡ However, on cross-examination by prosecutor Alexander, Gibbs conceded he had “no opinion” as to whether Ruby was in the throes of an epileptic seizure at the time he shot Oswald that prevented him from knowing right from wrong or from understanding the nature and consequences of his act (Kaplan and Waltz, Trial of Jack Ruby, p.300).

* Many on the Ruby jury, after hearing all the evidence, came to the same conclusion. For instance, the wife of jury foreman Max Causey (deceased) said, “[My husband] really thought that Ruby thought he was going to be a hero because he was going to kill the guy who shot the president.” Juror Douglas Sowell said that “Ruby thought he’d be a hero in the public eye if he did it. I believe he thought that, I really do. I think that motivated him, that he thought that rather than being a murderer, he’d be a hero.” Juror R. J. “Bob” Flechtner said, “I think he just went down there and shot Oswald and thought he was going to be a hero. And he thought he was doing the right thing, and our society says he didn’t do the right thing.” (Dempsey, Jack Ruby Trial Revisited, pp.3–4, 159, 171) In a later, May 24, 1965, hearing in Dallas over Ruby’s legal representation, Ruby admitted as much, voluntarily taking the witness stand and saying, “I should have never tried to be heroic” (Dallas Morning News, May 25, 1965, p.1).

* Remarkably, Belli had neglected, in his summation, to do something that criminal defense attorneys do automatically (999 out of 1,000 times)—urge the jury, if they were disposed against Ruby on the facts and the law, to at least spare his life, which they had the power to do. In his summation, Belli did not have to put all his eggs in one basket and be imprisoned by his psychomotor epileptic defense. Not only didn't Belli ask the jury to give Ruby life imprisonment instead of death if they found him guilty of murder with malice, but since Judge Brown gave the jury an instruction on "murder without malice," where the punishment for a conviction thereunder was "no longer than five years" in prison, Belli had a fallback, alternative argument if the jury decided to reject the insanity defense. That he should have done so has been reflected upon by many, including the judge. "By [Belli's] dependence on his single, daring defense, Belli neglected other legal avenues he might have followed to save Jack Ruby from the electric chair" (Holloway, Dallas and the Jack Ruby Trial, p.8). Instead, Belli asked the jury to exonerate Ruby completely. "If you put a felony brand of any kind on Jack Ruby, he won't be eligible for Veteran's Administration [benefits]. He is now, being an ex-serviceman," he argued (Belli with Carroll, Dallas Justice, p.242). "Belli gave it to us by going for broke—all or nothing..." Bill Alexander said. "He told the jury it was acquittal or nothing. You can't give a jury that kind of dare. And all he had going for him was some fancy doctors' talk and a few mildly abnormal squiggles on a piece of paper" (Wills and Demaris, Jack Ruby, p.123).

* And Ruby would launch an appeal, but not with Belli as his lawyer. Within a week after the verdict, a letter signed by Ruby, but with his two sisters and three brothers behind it, was on its way to Belli's San Francisco law office firing him from the case. ("Good-by, Belli," p.19) On June 7, 1964, near the beginning of his testimony before the Warren Commission, Ruby told Chief Justice Warren, "Mr. Belli evidently did not go into my case thoroughly, circumstantially. If he had gone into it, he wouldn't have tried to vindicate me on an insanity plea to relieve me of all responsibility, because circumstantially everything looked so bad for me. It can happen—it happens to many people who happen to be at the wrong place at the right time. Had Mr. Belli spent more time with me, he would have realized not to try to get me out completely free" (5 H 182).

Mel Belli, according to his former law partner, Seymour Ellison, took his loss in the Ruby case, and then being fired by Ruby, "harder than anything else in his legal career. He literally went into a shell for about a month, very rarely even showing up at the office. He even turned down a big publicity case at the time involving an ax murderess named Jean Toman who insisted she would only be represented by Mel. It was the type of high-visibility case Mel would normally have a relish for trying" (Telephone interview of Seymour Ellison by author on October 7, 2006).

* In one of my capital cases, the defendant had left the military service and learned that his wife, a woman of rare beauty whom people came to court just to ogle, had had an affair. He stalked the man for two weeks and finally, after waiting in the backseat of the man's car, shot him to death. It was a circumstantial-evidence case and after the verdict of guilty of first-degree murder, although my office wanted me to seek the death penalty, in my summation in the penalty trial (in contrast to Texas, the penalty trial, with the same judge and jury, is separate from the guilt trial in California) I went against my office—at least to the extent that I never pushed for or even affirmatively asked for death, instead telling the jury there were good arguments for life imprisonment as well as death. I learned later from a law student of mine whose spouse was on the jury that despite this, on the first ballot the majority of jurors voted for death, but because of the position I had taken, one by one they eventually came over to life imprisonment. For years thereafter, the defendant's mother would write me a Christmas card always thanking me for saving, she felt, her son's life.

‡“You know what really made them [Dallasites] mad at me?” the fun-loving barrister, who traveled the world and stayed at its finest hotels with friends like actor Errol Flynn, would later ask. “My saying that they do not even know what to use a bidet [a low basin, used especially in France, for bathing one’s private parts] for—the one I saw in Dallas had flowers planted in it” (Wills and Demaris, Jack Ruby, p.82).

* “We didn’t buy” the psychomotor epilepsy defense from the “so-called expert witnesses,” Ruby juror J. Waymon Rose said. “It was ridiculous...It just didn’t impress us at all,” said another juror, Douglas Sowell. “That [psycho] motor epilepsy stuff didn’t make much sense,” added juror J. G. Holton Jr. (Dempey, Jack Ruby Trial Revisited, pp.139, 157, 183)

* Although Belli was the most famous trial lawyer in America at the time, he had achieved his fame in the practice of civil law, while Darrow had achieved his in criminal law.

* - See endnote discussion for possibility that if I had waited to interview Marina, as I was going to do, I may not have gotten to interview her.

* - On September 9, 1964, Marina told the Warren Commission, "I have no doubt that he did kill the president" (5 H 608). As late as November 23, 1980, she told Dan Carmichael of United Press International that her husband was "not innocent" of Kennedy's murder. But I knew Marina had come a long way since she told Dallas Morning News reporter Hugh Aynesworth a few months after the assassination how "ashamed and sorry" she was for what her husband had done (Dallas Morning News, March 7, 1964, sect.4, p.1).

The first time Marina publicly asserted a change in her position was in a November 1988 interview in Ladies' Home Journal, and she had only come three-quarters of the way to where she is today. "It was a very complicated plot, brilliantly executed," she told the Journal. "Could any intelligent person believe that that kind of thing was organized by one man? When Lee was arrested, I remember he said, 'I'm a patsy.' I strongly believe that with all the evidence that has come to light, he probably was telling the truth...I don't think that all this was about John F. Kennedy. It was more about Robert, who was going after organized crime, and who would not be attorney general anymore if his brother was killed. When I was questioned by the Warren Commission, I was a blind kitten. Their questioning left me only one way to go; guilty. I made Lee guilty. He never had a fair chance...I buried all his chances by my statements...But I was only twenty-two then, and I've matured since. I think differently. [I'm sure you do, Marina, but I didn't know that all the things you told the Warren Commission and FBI you saw with your own eyes and heard with your own ears actually never happened. Your eyes and ears hadn't "matured" yet at the tender age of twenty-two? In any event, and this is a critical point that has to be noted, other than her belief in her husband's guilt, Marina has never retracted any of the testimony she gave to the Warren Commission and later to the HSCA.] Only half the truth has been told. I want to find out the whole truth. It may be a bitter truth at the end for me. But I want the truth. In America, a wonderful country, you should get the truth." (Blythe and Farrell, "Marina Oswald, Twenty-five Years Later," pp.183, 237) By 1992, Marina told Time that "Lee simply did not shoot anybody," adding, "I do believe it was a conspiracy, carefully orchestrated and covered up" ("Marina's Turn," p.71).

* Indeed, the only compliment that Marina would accept from me in our two conversations was when I told her she was “a down-to-earth person.” “Thank you,” she said.

* - The late Mary Ferrell, a conspiracy researcher from Dallas, said she had books in her collection saying that the Martians and Venusians were responsible for the assassination (Dallas Morning News, November 20, 1983). Ferrell is believed to have had the largest private collection of JFK assassination-related documents ever, but sold it to an individual named Oliver Curme from California for a sum in excess of $1.5 million (JFK/Deep Politics Quarterly, January 2003, p.35).

* - At least one writer (not even a confirmed conspiracy theorist, but obviously eager to join in the confirmed silliness) posits the possibility that two assassins fired from virtually the same spot. “Even if it were determined,” Edward Jay Epstein says, “that all the bullets fired came from the same rifle—and microballistic analyses of the fragments recovered indicated they were fired from Oswald’s weapon—it would still be at least theoretically conceivable that the rifle was passed from the hands of one sniper to another between shots” (Epstein, Legend, p.334). Yes, and it is also theoretically possible that the assassin was a robed nun whose eyes were closed and who used her Catholic prayer book as a gun rest.

* No, really. Per Newsweek, someone at the November 1991 Assassination Symposium in Dallas argued that “Kennedy was shot by LBJ himself, who concealed his six-guns under a cape” (Gates with Manly, Foote, and Washington, “Bottom Line: How Crazy Is It?” p.52).

* After all, as early as 1947, an English physician diagnosed JFK's Addison's disease during his trip to Ireland, and when Kennedy returned to the states from London in September of 1947, "he was so ill that a priest came aboard the Queen Mary to give him extreme unction [the "last rites" of the Catholic Church] before he was carried off the ship on a stretcher" (Dallek, Unfinished Life, p.153).

‡A variation of this notion is that spun by Oswald's mother, Marguerite, to author Jean Stafford. Although she told Stafford her son had been "framed" for Kennedy's murder, she allowed, "Now maybe Lee Harvey Oswald was the assassin. But does that make him a louse? No. No! Killing does not necessarily mean badness. You find killing in some very fine homes for one reason or another. And as we know, President Kennedy was a dying man. So I say it is possible that my son was chosen to shoot him in a mercy killing for the security of the country. And if this is true, it was a fine thing to do and my son is a hero." (Stafford, Mother in History, pp.12, 18)

* Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation on January 1, 1863, did not free a single slave since almost all the slaves at that time, close to four million, were in the South (all were below the Mason-Dixon line), which was then under the control of the Confederate Army.

‡ Though it is frequently stated in the many lists of Lincoln-Kennedy coincidences that Lincoln's secretary was named Kennedy, his main secretary was John G. Nicolay. Lincoln's only other secretary was John Hay.

‡ Nearly all Lincoln-Kennedy coincidence lists say that “Lincoln’s assassin, John Wilkes Booth, shot Lincoln in a theater, then fled to a warehouse. Kennedy’s assassin, Lee Harvey Oswald, shot Kennedy from a warehouse and fled to a theater.” But Booth fled on horseback to the Maryland home of Dr. Samuel A. Mudd, who treated Booth’s broken left leg. Booth was shot to death by a Union sergeant while hiding in a burning barn in Virginia twelve days after he shot Lincoln.

§ Contrary to what some lists say, Mrs. Lincoln was seated to Lincoln's right, while we know Mrs. Kennedy was seated to Kennedy's left.

* - Though it is frequently stated in the lists of Lincoln-Kennedy coincidences that Booth was born in 1839 and Oswald in 1939, Booth was born in 1838. Also, it is frequently stated that Booth and Oswald were southerners. But though Booth clearly was on the side of the South during the Civil War, he was born in Maryland, the northernmost of the slave states that was nevertheless a part of the Union during the Civil War. Indeed, one of the biggest defeats suffered by the Confederate forces of General Robert E. Lee in Lee's move north was the battle of Antietam in Maryland in 1862, when the Union Army repulsed the Confederate advance in what may have been the bloodiest single day (September 17) of the entire Civil War, with 23,000 Union and Confederate soldiers being killed or wounded. Although Maryland is below the Mason-Dixon line, causing some people to consider Maryland a southern state, the famous line separated the free states from the slave states, not the North from the South. Maryland was and is a "border state" between the North and the South, but I don't believe it is considered a southern state in the public consciousness.

* At 6:45 on the morning of December 12, 2003, a fifty-year-old Dallas man, Richard E. Clem, fired a bullet into his head while standing on the white X on Elm that marks where Kennedy was fatally wounded in the head forty years earlier. Clem, a twenty-seven-year postal employee, was found by the police lying in a pool of blood, his feet, perhaps unintentionally on his part, pointing toward the grassy knoll. Clem left no suicide note and his son was reluctant to say that his father's decision to kill himself was due to the president's assassination. He did say his father often went to Dealey Plaza to think, had read many books about the assassination, and was "greatly interested how our president could be murdered in broad daylight, in front of hundreds of people, police officers, secret service officers, etc., and still leave behind so many questions." Clem was not known to be part of the conspiracy community. (Michael Grabell, "Man Found Shot Where JFK Slain," Dallas Morning News, December 13, 2003, p.1B)